"Daily Noonday Lenten Services in War-Time were held in historic St. James' church, Lancaster, from February 18 to March 30. The services, lasting from 12.05 p. m. to 12.30 p. m., consisted of two hymns, appropriate prayers, a fifteen-minute sermon and benediction and were in charge of the rector, the Rev. Clifford G. Twombly, D. D., while the sermons were preached by ministers of the various co-operating denominations—Protestant Episcopal, Reformed Church in the United States, Presbyterian, Methodist Episcopal, Lutheran, Moravian and United Evangelical. On many days every seat in the large church was occupied and the poorest attendance was more than a good-sized congregation. Dr. Twombly is a leader in all moral and religious efforts and the people of Lancaster are again greatly indebted to him for this blessed Lenten season.

"It is not possible to estimate the deep spiritual effect of these services but some things are plainly evident: It served in these troublous times to lead people to God for strength and wisdom and love and to find inspiration for service and sacrifice in the person of Jesus Christ. to forget individual preferences and to unite in common worship; to recognize the place and leadership of the Church in human development; to stimulate Christian unification; to promote both piety and patriotism and bringing together a large body of devout and earnest people it promoted a larger sense of fellowship among the congregations of the various denominations participating.

"The cumulative effect of these services reached a culmination on Good Friday, when probably the largest congregation of the season gathered to commemorate the extreme sacrifice of Christ, emphasized in a magnificent sermon by Dr. Twombly on the significance of the cross. People of all faiths and people of no professed faith came under the inspiration of these services and the whole community was richly blessed.

"No one can adequate express the debt of gratitude which Lancaster owes to Dr. Twombley for the inspiration which has come from these services."

BISHOP ISRAEL PLEADS FOR HOLY TRINITY, PARIS

Asks American Churches to Give $15,000 to Develop New Work

As a result of the resignation of the Rev. Dr. Watson as rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris, and the change in the needs which the Church has to meet, a serious situation has arisen, which is explained in the following letter received from Bishop Israel:

c/o Morgan, Harjes & Co.,
31, Boulevard Haussmann, Paris 90
March 18, 1918.

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Some three months ago, through information gained by correspondence with the rectors of the American churches in France, Italy and Switzerland, I made a report to Bishop Whitehead of the Commission on American Churches in Europe of the condition of these congregations. Saturday I returned from a two months' visitation of our camps, during which time I spent several days in each of our parishes in Nice, Florence and Rome, and with the Rev. Clement Brown, who has a licensed chapel in Cannes, and I found no cause to change the statements made in my report. Of this I will write later.

Just now, a new and serious situation has arisen at the Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris. On March 11 the Rev. Dr. Watson presented his resignation to the vestry. Anyone realizing the strain, both mental and physical, of the last four years, through which Dr. and Mrs. Watson have passed, will not be surprised, for there is a limit to human endurance even among the strongest. The old "American Colony" of Paris has dispersed, and with it the demand for the present dignified form of Cathedral service: a new era has come and a new problem has arisen from war conditions, to meet which new methods must be originated.

Paris is full of Americans of every type of Churchmanship; and hence in the services and in the methods of Church work there must be radical changes made. In his present condition of fatigue, Dr. Watson feels it unwise and virtually impossible for him to attempt these changes. After advising with the bishops here, he has taken the one means by which he feels some priest may be able to continue to keep up the Church in its present position of leadership for American Christianity, which he has so ably represented in Paris and among the French people.

The vestry, with many expressions of regret and esteem and with emotion, accepted the resignation, and, as some slight expression of their feeling, unanimously requested him to continue his relationship with the parish by accepting the title and post of "rector emeritus without duties or emoluments, and with a right to a seat in the chancel at all times".

Dr. and Mrs. Watson will shortly return to America, where, at the request of the vestry, they will represent, after a few months' rest, the needs of our work in Paris. A committee, composed of the wardens and the bishop-in-charge, have secured the services of the Rev. J. W. Beekman, formerly dean of the pro-Cathedral of the diocese of Bethlehem, as "Locum Tenens" for six months, from April 1.

With Dr. Watson's retirement the intimate and important relations in which he has been associated with the French authorities from the beginning of the war will, of course, cease, but we hope the loving interest and contributions of his many friends in America will continue, in order that his successor may remain in touch with the work.

Owing to the greatly reduced income occasioned by the war, and the unparalleled opportunity for continued leadership on the part of the Church of the Holy Trinity, the bishop-in-charge has appealed to the Commission on American Churches in Europe for $15,000 annually during the war, and for a few years thereafter. This appeal he hopes the Church in America, realizing its importance, as everyone must who understands the situation, will support and urge.

With regards, I remain,

Sincerely yours,
ROGERS ISRAEL,
Bishop of Erie.

In Charge of the American Churches in Europe.

ROMAN PRIEST PREACHES IN A PROTESTANT CHURCH

Takes Part in Large Patriotic Meeting in Hastings, New York

HASTINGS-ON-HUDSON, NEW YORK—One of the recent "by-products", directly traceable to the great war which is drawing us all closer together, was a remarkable meeting held in Grace Episcopal church, the Rev. Horace E. Clute, rector, when the Rev. Father John F. White of St. Agnes' Roman Catholic church, East Forty-third street, New York, preached the sermon. He had the support of his associate clergy at St. Agnes', and of the local priest of St. Matthew's Roman Catholic church, Hastings, in planning for the meeting with Mr. Clute. He is a virile young priest about to leave for the front as a Navy chaplain.

Other speakers were: the Rev. E. W. Thompson, D. D., of the Hastings Reformed church; Col. F. Q. Brown, a prominent New York banker of Dobbs Ferry, who is one of the Railway Commission chairmen at Washington, who spoke on "The Third Liberty Loan"; Dr. Albert Shaw of Hastings, owner and editor of the Review of Reviews; Mr. Henry Israel of Hastings, Y. M. C. A. worker in English prison camps, and others. Two crippled American soldiers, also suffering from shell shock, recently returned from the front, said a few words. One, Instructor Jones, was from the famous "Fighting 69th". The music was furnished by soloists from All Angels Episcopal church, New York, and others.

This unusual meeting was the direct outgrowth of a meeting for the Knights of Columbus war drive, held in St. Matthew's Roman Catholic church, the Rev. Father Thos. O'Keefe, rector, on the evening of St. Patrick's Day, when the Protestant clergy of Hastings sat in the chancel, and Protestant laymen were present in large numbers.

The meeting at Grace church opened with a few moments of silent prayer when each one reverently offered to God his own petitions as his heart and conscience told him to do. Regular Episcopal forms of service were dispensed with for the evening.

COMMANDMENTS APPEAR ON COUNTY COURT HOUSE

Bronze Tablet Given by Jews, Roman Catholics and Protestants

From Bishop Whitehead

PITTSBURGH, PENNSYLVANIA—On Monday noon, April 8, in Allegheny County Court House, a new precedent was set that is likely to have wide following in all Christian lands. A bronze tablet of Commandments was presented unitedly by Jews, Catholics and Protestants through the International Reform Bureau, which initiated the project. Wall charts of the Commandments had previously been accepted by courts in Washington and Greensburg, both in Pennsylvania, for display in frames inside the building, but Pittsburgh's Court House is thought to be the first, as Dr. Wilbur F. Crafts put it, "to show its real cornerstone to all who pass by—the cornerstone Justinian placed at the foundation of the first code of European civilization twelve hundred years ago".

Mr. H. D. W. English read the following letter from the Rt. Rev. Cortlandt Whitehead:

It is a matter of very great regret to me that I shall be out of the city on Monday, at the time of the installation of the tablet on the Court House, containing the Ten Commandments, the basis of all law and justice.

From the very outset I have been enthusiastically in favor of the movement to keep the Ten Commandments before the eyes and minds of the people; and I rejoice to know that in many court houses, school rooms, industrial plants, military camps, as well as in many churches all through our land, these Divine words are to be conspicuously displayed. The influence must inevitably be good, and by God's blessing will result in the establishment before the community of high ideals, and it will be a help towards a nobler standard of living.

And surely the Summary of the Law putting over against "Thou shalt not" the higher principle "Thou shalt," is most valuable.

WAR BONDS TO ENDOW PEW

Old Swedes Church Has Novel Pla to Further Liberty Loan

M Cutting, who was forty-three years old, cently entered the service of the Y. M. C. in which he and his family have been dee interested. It was while serving in Fra as a secretary that he was stricken. M Cutting's father is a prominent figure in city and diocese of New York.

OUSE OF BISHOPS HAS A TWO DAYS' SESSION IN N. Y.

"To join in ordaining or commissioning any Army or Navy chaplain, appointed the State or accepted as a volunteer, om whatever Church he may come, would to deny that any truth, including that of e Triune Being of God or of the Inrnation of the Eternal Son, is of real imrtance and necessity.

"We would urge by all means refraining om all unnecessary controversy and rilry in caring for our soldiers and sailors, d the exercise of the greatest possible nsideration and co-operation that does t violate convictions and principles; and e prayerful preparation for the careful d deliberate consideration of questions ncerning Faith and Order which now dide us. For such a world conference our ommission, appointed several years ago the General Convention, is earnestly rking.

"The hasty adoption of ill-considered exedients in the face of an emergency we lieve would endanger and retard, rather an further, the cause of reunion, and the alization of our Lord's intention and ayer that His disciples may in one Body ar witness to Him and to His word."

The report was adopted.

Later the Bishop of Vermont presented supplementary report of the Special Comittee appointed to consider the Memorial Dr. Newman Smyth and others, to which as also referred the New Brunswick case, hich reached the House after the adoption the foregoing report, which said in part: "The principles underlying that reply apy to this particular case. No steps should taken with regard to reunion in particular localities or between particular dies which would hinder or endanger the der object of the reunion of the whole dy.

"The action suggested by the New unswick churches cannot be regarded as merely local concern; it would imperil ity within our own communion.

"Apart from matters which clearly beng to the jurisdiction of the Bishop of e diocese, and with regard to the two estions about which advice is specially ked, we are clear

"(1.) That Confirmation as the apostolic nception of Baptism cannot be surrenred or treated as an optional alternative any other form of Reception to full urch fellowship;

"(2.) Nor could Ordination or Consecran be given to a minister who would exise his ministry in partial independence the body which gave his commission.

'We feel convinced that, however laudable e intentions of the promoters of this heme, its execution would have the effect, wever far from their design, of adding rather than diminishing the divisions ich we deplore.

'The committee unanimously recomnds, in addition to the adoption of the ove statement, the appointment of a comssion of three bishops, to be named by chair, with whom the Bishop of New sey can consult in any action that may called for."

On motion, the recommendation of the mmittee was adopted, and the chairman pointed as such commission the Bishop of Bethlehem, the Bishop of Newark and the Bishop of Pennsylvania.

The Bishop Jones Case

The Commission which was appointed to consider the matter of the resignation of the Bishop of Utah having reported, the House of Bishops passed the following resolutions:

"Resolved: That the House of Bishops declares its belief that the Government of the United States has obeyed the law of moral necessity in seeking to stop a war of deliberate aggression by the only means which are known to be effective to such an end.

"Resolved: That the House of Bishops believes that any member of this House is entitled to the same freedom of opinion and speech as any other citizen of the United States, but in the exercise of this liberty he should be guided by a deep sense of the responsibility which rests upon one who occupies a representative position.

"Resolved: That the House of Bishops is unwilling to accept the resignation of any bishop in deference to an excited state of public opinion and therefore declines to adopt the report of the special Commission or to accept the resignation of the Bishop of Utah for the reasons assigned by him in his letter of December 20, 1917."

After the adoption of the foregoing resolutions the Bishop of Utah presented his formal resignation dated April 11, whereupon the House of Bishops passed the following resolution:

"Resolved: That with full recognition of the right of every member of this House of freedom of speech in political matters subject to the law of the land, nevertheless in view of Bishop Jones' impaired usefulness in Utah under present conditions, recognized by himself, the House of Bishops accepts the resignation of the Bishop of Utah as now presented."

The letter of the Bishop of Utah was a simple resignation without qualification.

The House adopted a resolution, presented by the Bishop of Bethlehem, expressing its cordial appreciation of the proposed plan of the General Board of Religious Education to increase the number of candidates for the ministry, and authorized the Board to take the steps contemplated in that plan.

The special committee appointed to consider a resolution urged by the Church papers, which was printed in The Churchman last week, reported as follows:

"After a careful examination and consideration of the resolution presented by The Churchman Company, The Living Church, Southern Churchman and The Witness relative to the Zone Postal System, the committee wishes to express its sense of the injustice of the system and certainly hopes there will be a change in the proposed law before it passes Congress. The committee believes the resolution involves too many questions for the House of Bishops to take up at this time, and wishes to express its regret that it must make such a report."

The bill in question had been passed by Congress several months ago.

Dean Gresham, who was elected Missionary Bishop of the Philippines, was associated with the Church in the South, where he was rector of St. James' church, Baton Rouge, Louisiana, and Grace church, Charleston, South Carolina, and others.

TRIBUTE TO CHURCHWOMEN KILLED IN PARIS CHURCH

Mrs. Landon and Daughters, Murdered on Good Friday, Honored

New York City—A memorial service was held Sunday at the chapel of St. Martin of Tours, in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine for Mrs. Mary Grinnell Landon, wife of Edward H. Landon, a retired lawyer of this city, and her daughters, Mrs. Lucy Landon Speed, wife of Captain Ralph Speed of the British Army, and Miss Ruth Landon, who were killed on Good Friday in a church in Paris by a shell from the long-range German gun. Dean Robbins, a relative of those who were killed, preached the sermon.

"When death is met by those who have encountered it because of their loyalty to some high cause", said the Dean, "we have a moving and a very sacred name for it. We call it martyrdom. I feel that we have the right to use that word today in speaking of the noble women who were in Paris on Good Friday for reasons wholly loving and unselfish, whose work there was a ministry of compassion, and who met death there while they were in prayer. We think of their giving their lives in association with the great sacrifice which they were in church to commemorate. We think of them as faithful martyrs in a sacred cause.

"I said that the Landons were in Paris for reasons wholly loving and unselfish. They went at the outbreak of the war to be with Mrs. Landon's aged mother in a time of great anxiety and peril. They remained not only to care for her, but also to carry on work for the wounded soldiers in France. Mr. and Mrs. Landon were engaged in the work of the Red Cross. Lucy Speed and Ruth Landon were nurses in the American Hospital. Only yesterday I received a letter from one of their fellow-workers which gives so true a picture of their activities that I shall read extracts from it as their memorial:

"'May I tell you', she writes, 'that during 1915 Miss Ruth Landon and her sister, Mrs. Speed, worked with me in Paris at the American Hospital? They devoted their entire time to helping to care for the wounded at the American Ambulance; every day at 8 o'clock they came in the wards and remained until 6 p. m. The work was very trying. Miss Ruth began her work in my ward, 239. She spoke French and translated English into French for both doctors and nurses, wrote letters for the wounded men and fed them, and although only a young girl she did more than many a mother could have done. The men called her grandmother, and today in France there are many hundreds who will grieve to know that this beautiful girl was murdered. Nearly four years of work, reading to the blind, taking them out and finding friends to help relieve their suffering, and all the hundred and one acts of kindness! There will be deep grief in many a home.'

"Their prayers and their gifts have gone up as a memorial to them, and now they have added the final gift of their lives. That is not death; that is translation. If our eyes were opened we should see it so. From lives of loving service they were caught up to a joyful immortality."

Our Weekly News Letters

BOSTON

Bishop's Letter to Fighters — Bishop Lawrence has sent to every one of the four thousand men and boys of the diocese who are in war service a personal letter in facsimile of his own handwriting. The first page of the letter bears a cut of the "Old North Church" (Christ church) in Boston, forever associated with the beginning of the war for independence:

April 19, 1918.

My Dear Friend:

This is Patriots' Day. From the belfry tower of the Old North church hung the lanterns that sent Paul Revere galloping to Lexington and Concord. The old spirit is in the air of the Commonwealth today. A week ago last Saturday some 70,000 men and women, everyone of them workers for the country, marched through the streets of Boston and today thousands of soldiers, marines and sailors are tramping the same streets by the State House and the Shaw monument. We are thinking of you this morning. You stand to us as the men who stood their ground at Concord Bridge while we are like those who were left to till the farms. You are at the front, we in the rear: all of us bound together in our common cause.

As your Bishop and friend I would not let this day pass without sending to every Massachusetts man and boy belonging to the Episcopal church who is serving in the army or navy this letter of Godspeed. The chances are that I confirmed you—at all events I follow you with deep interest. Do you know that there are over four thousand men and boys from the diocese in the service? Your star is on the service flag of your parish church and your name is on a card in my office.

You know better than I do that the man who serves his country best is the man who does his military duty right up to the hilt. You know also that the test is not only in detail but in character, the man behind the gun.

I am confident that in character you stand worthy of your country and your church. You have a keen sense of honor; you are clean in talk and life; you are in every way upholding the standards that those at home and your rector expect of you. I hope, too, that you are backing up the religious work in every way, the services of the chaplain and of the Y. M. C. A. The chaplain has a difficult job; he is an officer and at the same time he wants to get near the men; give him support. If you are a communicant, lead off in going to Communion when there is a chance.

We all of us in our homes and our churches are thinking of you and praying for you. We are proud of you. We will do anything we can for you. You will do everything you can for us: true to duty, true to your Master Christ. God bless you.

Count me sure as faithfully

Your friend and Bishop,

WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

Easter Communions — Trinity church, Boston, reports about 1,100 communions on Easter Day. At the principal service of the day there were about 2,000 people in the church and several hundred had to be turned away.

War Preachers—On the Second Sunday after Easter several of our Boston pulpits were occupied by war preachers. At the morning service at the Church of the Advent, Canon Savage of Hexham, England, just back from the battlefield, preached on "Serbia Crucified". At the afternoon service of the Church of the Messiah, Lieutenant H. G. Wilson of the First Canadian Division, spoke on "My Experience in the Trenches". At Christ church (the "Old North") Capt. Louis Keene of the Canadian Expeditionary Forces made an address at Morning Prayer. Lieut. Wilson also spoke at the evening service of Trinity church, Newton Centre.

"Watch and Ward Society"—The fortieth annual public meeting of the Watch and Ward Society was held at the Cathedral on the afternoon of Sunday, April 14. The work of the Federal Government in promoting sound moral conditions and the cooperation of this society in New England was especially recognized at this meeting. The speakers were Col. M. B. Stewart, chief of staff, Division Headquarters, Camp Devens, the Rev. Endicott Peabody, D. D., headmaster of Groton school, and the Rev. Frederick B. Allen, president and founder of the society.

Bishop Hulsa in Town—The Bishop of Cuba was the speaker at the monthly meeting of the Massachusetts branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, which was held in the chapel of Emmanuel church, Boston, on the afternoon of April 17.

"The Cambridge Conference"—The Cambridge Conference for Church Work and the Summer School for Church Music are to meet for their annual session, June 21-July 6 this year. The detailed program has been published and may be secured from Miss Marian De C. Ward, 415 Beacon street, Boston. The Rev. John Mockridge, D. D., rector of St. James' church, Philadelphia, will act as chaplain during the conference.

NEW YORK

In Memory of Lieutenant Peters—On Easter Monday a service was held in memory of Edward McClure Peters, Jr., First Lieutenant in the United States Army, and Acting Captain Machine Gun Battalion, who was "killed in action, fighting for civilization in France" on March 11. This service was at St. Michael's church, of which Lieutenant Peters' uncle, the Rev. John P. Peters, D.D., is rector. Easter hymns, "Fight the Good Fight" and the beautiful hymn, "For Passing Souls", were sung, and the triumphant Scriptures of the Burial Service, together with Rev. xxi. 1-7, were read.

Elsewhere in this issue is chronicled the death of Robert Bayard Cutting, the son of Mr. R. Fulton Cutting. These are only two of the young Churchmen of New York who have recently laid down their lives in France. We are hearing every day of others.

Bishops in New York—On Sunday a great many of the bishops who were present in New York for the meeting of the House of Bishops preached in the city parishes. Bishop Tuttle preached at the cathedral in the morning, and in the afternoon Bishop Partridge. The latter chose a most unusual text from Deuteronomy. "When the host goeth forth to battle, then keep thee from every wicked thing", and preached a most stirring sermon from it.

Joint Confirmation at the Cathedral—On Sunday evening, April 28, at 8.15 o'clock, Bishop Greer will confirm a class in th Cathedral made up of candidates from t or twelve parishes. Each pastor will bri his own flock and present it individual This is the second such service to be he in the Cathedral. Last year Bishop Gre found the joint Confirmation so successf that he determined to repeat it. The fi choir will be present and the occasion important one.

The Grace Church Yearbook—Gra church has just issued its fiftieth year boo The first volume issued by Bishop Pott at the end of the first year of his rect ship was the first of all annual paroch reports in the Church at large. W that slight pamphlet of thirty-two pages is interesting to contrast the 267 pages achievement recorded for the year 19 1918. Yet the first report and this l one include accounts of the same paroch organizations.

The Grace church disbursements for year were $380,377.97, of which, howev there was spent upon the parish itself $1 887.51 as compared with $213,935.37; i. a saving over the previous year of $1 047.86. The parish gifts for benevol work outside amounted to $184,490.46 co pared with $119,316.01 for last year. Th additional gifts outside the parish ca to $65,174.45; i. e., the parish reduced expenditures for local work by nearly $ 000 while increasing its outside gifts more than $65,000. The large sum parochial work includes the maintena of East Side work, Italian work, Day N sery, Hospital, Mission House, and Va tion work, a comparatively small pro tion of this whole sum for parochial w being spent upon Grace church itself.

Your Vote and What It May Do for —This is the subject of the course of lectures the Young Married Women's ciety at Grace chapel is inviting the c gregation to attend. The lectures are be given by Mrs. L. F. Gignoux and rector appends a note to the invitation ing: "The lectures are of great im tance and I urge every person in the ch congregations who is twenty-one years older to attend all the lectures." Thi the second class on civic education held Winter at Grace chapel. Meanwhile sim meetings are being held at Calvary, cension, St. Mary the Virgin's, St. Micha the Church of the Advocate in the Br I was present at the first meeting at Church of the Ascension. How the Gr wich Village mothers did love to cast mock ballot and how eagerly they inqu whether they were entitled to vote! "I going home to tell my 'usband to 'is paipers," was the indignant assever of one English woman whose first husb had been naturalized but whose second band, having never taken out his pa had disenfranchised her.

At Calvary church the Civics class b with an address from Deaconess Yo So much enthusiasm did she arouse am the young girls of the G. F. S. who fo the nucleus of the class that they have ranged to secure some of the books women voters which have been publi this spring, so that they may supple their class instruction by reading furthe themselves. At St. George's a class t by Miss Isabel Sanders for the G. has just been concluded. Mrs. Van to teach the class at the chapel of the tercession, which will be held on Tuesday ghts in May.

Patriotic Minstrel Show—The St. orge's War Relief Club, whose activities ve been mentioned in these columns a mber of times, is now busy rehearsing r a minstrel show to replenish its relief nd. They have engaged Terrace Garden the night of April 26, and are making eat preparations. The money will be ed for the service members of the club d for their families. The Servitor, a news eet published by the club, gives all the est news about the boys at the front.

WASHINGTON

rvice in Memory of Young Officer—der authority of the Bishop of Washing- n a very beautiful service was held in the thelehem Chapel of the National Cathe- al recently, in memory of Lieut. Peyton nway March, Jr., son of the Acting Chief Staff of the U. S. Army. Lieut. March s killed in the service of his country in accident at one of the Army aviation hools in Texas, in the month of March, d was buried at Arlington just before his her's return from France. He was a aduate of St. Alban's, the National Ca- dral School for Boys, in the class of 5, and possessed both the affection and high regard of the faculty and of the student body, and was a young man of exceptionally fine character.

He is the first to lose his life of the numerous graduates of St. Alban's School in the service of the Nation in this war.

The music of the service, consisting of "I Heard a Voice From Heaven"; Psalm 91 chanted to Lord Mornington's setting; Sir John Stainer's anthem, "What Are These and Whence Came They?"; and the hymns, "Abide With Me" and "The Strife is O'er", was rendered by the cathedral choir. The beautiful standard regimental United States ensign belonging to the cathedral was carried in the procession. In the absence of the Bishop at the session of the House of Bishops, the service was conducted by Canon DeVries and Canon Myer. The lesson was St. John 14: 1-28, and appropriate commemorative prayers were used and to them were added intercessions for our soldiers, sailors and aviators, and for victory in the present battle. The entire student body of St. Alban's School were in attendance.

PHILADELPHIA

Samuel Gompers Addresses the Clergy—The meeting of the Clerical Brotherhood on Monday, April 8, was addressed by the president of the American Federation of Labor. He made an appeal to the clergy to present and press the Liberty Loan.

"The American people are just beginning to realize what is meant by war. The first response to this new loan surpasses any patriotic demonstration yet seen. There is in this country a pro-German organization that presumes to act under the name of Socialism—its socialism and its philosophy are made in Germany.

"A well-organized labor movement is the best antidote for mob violence. If Russia had possessed a labor movement there would be no Bolsheviki."

Three Deaths Among the Clergy—Three of the clergy of the diocese have lately died. The Rev. James Clayton Mitchell died the Tuesday before Easter, and was buried from the Church of the Messiah, Gwynedd, on Easter Even. Mr. Mitchell was ordained deacon in 1892 and priest in 1894. He had been rector at St. Paul's, Chestnut Hill, Trinity, Lansdale, and Calvary, Germantown, in this diocese, and was rector of St. Paul's, Hoboken, in the diocese of Newark. On Easter Day both the Rev. Edward James McHenry and the Rev. Charles George Currie died. Mr. McHenry was rector of the Church of the Holy Comforter for the past fifteen years. He had formerly been at Great Bend and New Milford and in Scranton, Pennsylvania. Two of his four children are in the ambulance service. The Rev. Mr. Currie, a retired clergyman, was buried from St. Paul's church, Chestnut Hill, on Wednesday in Easter week.

Rector of St. David's, Radnor, Retires—The Rev. George W. Lamb, rector of St. David's, Radnor, for fourteen years, has tendered his resignation of this historic parish. He felt that a younger man might be of more value to the Church. He has been made rector emeritus.

Rector and Headmaster—The parish of St. Paul's church, Ogontz, has called the Rev. P. J. Steinmetz to be rector, in place of the late Dr. Cole. The parish is interested in the unusual experiment of calling a man who will continue his present duties as headmaster of the Episcopal Academy. Mr. Steinmetz will have opportunity "to practise as well as preach".

Scholarship for Cambridge Conference—An examination for a scholarship to the Cambridge Conference will be held in the Church House on Saturday, May 25. The subject for the examination will be "The Old and the New Testament, and the Prayer Book" (through the confirmation service).

The examination is open to any communicant between the ages of 17 and 25.

Deaconesses Form Diocesan Chapter—After a conference of deaconesses held at St. Faith's, New York, last Fall, Bishop Rhinelander called the deaconesses of the diocese together at the house in Philadelphia. There were thirteen present at this first meeting.

The Bishop laid before them three main objects: (1) To make the work more effective in every way. (2) To realize the true meaning of the Order, and its place in the Church, and to make these known to others. (3) That from the Chapter meetings might be gained the highest ideals and inspiration for upholding womanhood in those about.

There have since been held two business meetings for the drafting of rules and by-laws, the choosing of officers, etc. A devotional meeting was held on the Wednesday after Easter—early Communion, breakfast, and afterward an address by Bishop Rhinelander to the twelve deaconesses who were present.

The next meeting will be held in May, when there will be a general discussion of subjects of vital interest to deaconesses.

KENTUCKY

Remarkable Growth of Mission—St. Mary's church, Madisonville, has had a remarkable growth. Occasional Church services had been held by the Rev. G. C. Abbitt, but while other religious bodies had large edifices it was less than two years ago that a small Episcopal church was built. At this time the present rector, the Rev. C. E. Buxton, took charge, and the church has gradually taken a leading place in the city's activities.

The building has been enriched with furniture and stained windows so that today it is the most beautiful church in the city. Plans are now under way for a parish house. Offerings are made to every worthy cause. The choir has grown from four choristers to thirty, among these twenty boys and girls who sing every Sunday. The Sunday school has increased 500 per cent. The communicant list that numbered fifteen has grown to forty-one. Seven were confirmed in February, eight more await the visitation of the Bishop in May and it is expected a large class will be ready in October.

The warden is now a captain in the army and another communicant is head of the Kentucky Red Cross Unit in France. The rector expects to go as chaplain before the end of the year.

Mr. Buxton is chaplain of many organizations, a member of the City Committee, chairman of the local Y. M. C. A. and scoutmaster of a full troop of Boy Scouts connected with the Church. Beside these he has four other missions many miles apart under his spiritual care.

CHICAGO

New Service Schedules at Camp Grant—With the coming of the Rev. H. R. White of the diocese of Michigan City, and a son of its bishop, to Camp Grant as regimental chaplain, 332d Machine Gun Battalion, the Rev. Frank E. Wilson, the volunteer chaplain, has been enabled to establish a new schedule of services. Lieut. White's assignment placed him directly back of the Y. M. C. A. building, where the second service has been held on Sunday mornings. He, therefore, arranged to take that service, thus giving Mr. Wilson the opportunity to conduct services for the colored Churchmen. At the celebration of the Holy Communion, thirty-five came forward to receive the Sacrament. Four Sunday services of the Church are now held in camp; one in the Base Hospital chapel; on alternate Sundays with the colored regiment and the artillery taken by Mr. Wilson; and the central service taken by Lieut. White.

"Lieutenant" Wilson—Some weeks ago division headquarters issued an order checking upon the whole matter of uniforms, which contained the clause "All civilians attached to this command shall always appear in the uniforms prescribed". There was no uniform prescribed for Mr. Wilson. In view of the difficulties created by the situation the State Council of Defense conferred upon him the chaplain's commission of first lieutenant, attaching him to the Wilmette Unit of the militia, but for detached service at Camp Grant. "So it happens", says Lieut. Wilson, "that Wilmette is graced with an absentee chaplain and I have gone into a first lieutenant's uniform".

A G. F. S. Admission Service—"A service of admission to the Girls' Friendly Society in a military camp! It sounds strange, doesn't it? Yet we had one". Another one of the lieutenant's reports. One of the Red Cross nurses was thus admitted, Bishop Griswold officiating. Some fifteen of the nurses are Church women, and services are held in the Base Hospital chapel for them. and for the soldiers in the parts of the camp adjacent.

The Easter Rallies—The Diocesan Board of Religious Education has appointed the second Sunday after Easter as "Easter Rally Day". One rally will be held on each side of the city, one on the North Shore, and one on the Burlington line southwest of the city. Reports as to the total amounts received in the Lenten mite boxes will be made, and the board expresses the hope "that with the heavily increased responsibilities of the Board of Missions this year, our children will make their gifts more generous than ever in order that we may bear our full part in this important work".

The Fox River Valley Institute—The postponed Winter meeting of the Fox River Valley Church School Institute was held during the month past at St. Mark's church, Glen Ellyn. Delegates were in attendance from eight of the valley cities. Three discussions were held in the course of the afternoon: "How to Obtain an Increased Attendance", led by F. B. Wyckoff of Glen Ellyn; "How to Develop Loyalty to School and Church", led by the Rev. F. H. Millett of Wheaton, and "How to Prepare the Lesson", led by the Rev. F. V. Hoag of Geneva. The preacher at the evening service was the Rev. J. M. Johnson of Elgin, on the subject "Co-operation of the Laity".

Men's War Work at St. James—The Rev. James S. Stone, D. D., after reading of what had been done by the men at home during the Civil War, organized a class of business men of his parish for "War Work". The class has already furnished six hundred large packing cases for the Red Cross, and is at present working on the second six hundred. The work has proved popular from the start, and the class now has over fifty members who volunteer to give one night a week to "packing case carpentry". The class meets in two sections, one on Tuesday, and one on Friday nights of each week.

Rector of Grace Church, Oak Park, at Camp Bowie—The rector of Grace church, Oak Park, has arrived in camp, and writes briefly: "Have visited a large number of sick boys, made many calls of courtesy, and walked and ridden many miles in this tremendous camp. Service every night and four on Sundays. It is very hot and dusty, typical Texas weather. I am, of course, in uniform and have been assigned to the 141st U. S. Infantry as my headquarters and should be addressed as Captain F. R. Godolphin. If anyone wants to send me Smileage Books they can be used to advantage".

Confirmation Class Buys Liberty Bond—The thank offering of the recent confirmation class at St. Chrysostom's church, Chicago, amounted to approximately one hundred dollars, which amount was invested in a Liberty Bond and the same presented to the endowment fund of the parish. Mrs. Joseph T. Bowen has presented the parish with a set of four silk flags of our Allies in the war, Great Britain, France, Belgium and Italy. These flags are carried in procession after the American flag, which was presented by the Woman's Guild.

PITTSBURGH

Bequest to the Church Home—In accordance with a request left by the late Mr. Reuben Miller in a letter to his children, they have lately given to the Church Home of this city $20,000 to be added to the endowment fund of the institution.

Memorial—On Easter Day there was unveiled at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, an exceedingly handsome painting of the Ascension, which fills up the rear wall of the chancel above the reredos. The artist was Professor Dabo, and the work was placed by the J. and R. Lamb Company of New York, and completed the adornment of the chancel executed by them during the last year. The altar and reredos were given by Mr. Reuben Miller as a memorial to his wife, and this painting is given in memory of Mr. Miller, by his children, two sons and two daughters.

BROOKLYN

A War Anniversary Service—The University Club of Brooklyn commemorated on Sunday, April 7, the first anniversary of the declaration of war against Germany by President Wilson. This occasion was also the club's second annual service at the Church of the Incarnation. In the procession were carried the Church and National flags, and the service flag of the University Club, and the church was beautifully dressed with the flags of the Allies.

The musical portion of the service wa sung by the University Glee Club, assiste by the choir of the church, accompanied b organ, piano, strings and tympani, under th direction of Mr. Zeiner, organist of th church and conductor of the Glee Clul The members of the club wore their aca demic gowns. The Very Rev. H. E. W Fosbroke, D. D., dean of the General Theo logical Seminary, preached.

The Rev. A. W. E. Carrington, rector o the church, conducted the service, and thei were a number of visiting clergy presen

Archdeacon Resigns—The Ven. Robe N. Ward, who has been serving in th diocese as the archdeacon of the S. V Convocation, has resigned in order to a sume charge of St. Mark's parish, Bea mont, Texas. He will take up his new wo on May 1.

His report for the last three months very gratifying. He has visited twent two parishes; held upwards of fifty ser ices and made 200 parish calls. The Co vocation will meet at La Grange about t middle of April to nominate a success to Archdeacon Ward.

A Loyal Parish—St. John's parish, C lumbus, Texas (the Rev. Gaynor Bank rector), placed a silk service flag in t chancel on Easter Day containing eighte stars. As the total number of commu cants in the parish is only thirty-six, t is a very large proportion and takes nea all our male members away. Among the represented on the flag are the form rector of the church (Chaplain E. Earle), the former junior warden (I W. G. Youens), and Lieut. Bruce Mai field, who is the son of Congressman Mai field, a former warden of this pari Every one of the eighteen enlisted or v unteered—not one was conscripted.

New Chaplains—Two new civilian cha lains have been appointed in this dioce The Rev. F. S. White, D.D., goes to Ca MacArthur at Waco and the Rev. Geo Ossman to Camp Logan at Houston.

Knights Templar Service—The Knig Templar attended service in force at C fax on Easter Sunday. The Vicar, Rev. H. H. Mitchell, who is prelate of commandery, preached on "The war in light of the Resurrection". The Vicar been appointed on the State Liberty L Committee, and is also one of the "F Minute Men".

Easter Offerings—The Easter offeri throughout the district were large this y in spite of the lack of clergy and numerous other calls upon the pocketbo of our parishioners.

LOUISIANA

oes as Chaplain—The Rev. Robert S. upland, D.D., rector of Trinity church, ew Orleans, has resigned to accept an pointment as chaplain in France, by shop McCormick of the Church War mmission. A congregational meeting s strongly requested him to reconsider resignation, but latest advices seem to dicate that he will not. Dr. Coupland ne to Trinity in 1911 and has greatly deared himself to the people. During his ctorship he has twice declined an elec- n to the Episcopate.

ovel Easter Service—An unusually in- esting and helpful service was held in inity church, Natchitoches, on Easter y, when the vested choir was joined by vested choir of the church in Mans- d at the 11 o'clock service. The visiting ir came over in automobiles, a distance sixty miles, and did the same thing at Easter service last year in Minden, enty-five miles from Mansfield. An un- al unity and solidarity prevail among se churches under the leadership of the est in charge, the Rev. J. Orson Miller. three are old-established churches, the rch in Natchitoches being started in 1. The present church building, brick Gothic in design, with a bell that is e-third solid silver, was erected in 1857 memory of a child five years old, daugh- of Gen. J. IDAHO ster Offering Wipes Out Debt—Easter nday evening was a happy event in life of St. Michael's Cathedral, se. A large and representative gather- of the communicants and supporters of Church met at the Bishop Tuttle church se to receive reports for the past year. e Rt. Rev. J. B. Funsten presided and ned the meeting with prayer. After the ging of "America", Dean Alward Cham- laine made his annual report for the r. He spoke of the splendid work of auxiliaries, Sunday school, and other rch societies, and concluded with the nouncement that the Easter offering, as esult of the special effort put forth this r, amounted to $6,700.07. Of this amount Sunday school contributed $610 as a ten offering.

he finance committee rendered its re- t, showing $6,306.13 received in church rings, independent of amounts raised in various organizations; the disburse- ts amounted to $6,122.32. Over $1,000 been given for missionary, Red Cross, Indian, hospital and other philanthropic purposes.

The special Easter offering of $6,700 will be used in canceling a long-standing mortgage in the church, and other local indebtedness. This will allow the consecration of the cathedral, and it is the purpose of the Bishop and the Dean to invite the aged Bishop Tuttle, of pioneer days, the Rt. Rev. Ethelbert Talbot, bishop of Idaho from 1888 to 1898, Dean Deuel, and all other former rectors and deans to be present on that joyous occasion.

An announcement of special interest was that a handsome new pipe organ is soon to be presented to the cathedral by members of the Davidson family in memory of the late Charles O. Davidson.

The first act of the newly elected chapter, having been called together in a special meeting by the Bishop, was to vote an increase of $300 in the salary of Dean Chamberlaine.

SOUTHERN OHIO

Emery Memorial Dedicated—The Emery memorial, St. Philip's Parish House, Circleville, was formally dedicated April 4 with appropriate services, conducted by the Rt. Rev. Boyd Vincent, D. D., bishop of southern Ohio, assisted by the Rt. Rev. Theodore Irving Reese, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor, and the rector, the Rev. David McDonald, acting for the church, and Prof. M. C. Warren, superintendent of Pickaway County schools, representing the laity.

When the exercises opened, the halls and gallery contained nearly four hundred people, a number which severely tested the building; a test of heating, ventilating and lighting systems, of its accessibility for ingress and egress, and of its acoustic properties. That the building successfully passed these tests is a source of pride to the architects and building committee.

Bishop Vincent formally accepted the building in the name of the diocese and was followed by the singing of the Doxology by the entire audience. In his address, Bishop Vincent paid deserved tribute to Mrs. Mary Emery of Cincinnati, the donor of the building, and handsomely complimented womankind in general for her progressive spirit and accomplishments in the face of all difficulties. Furthermore, he contrasted the expensive obelisks and mausoleums which fill our cemeteries and are of no practical advantage to the community to such a building as this, a living memorial, to be used and enjoyed by all.

Prof. M. C. Warren showed clearly the purposes of the building. He said in part: "The Church and the School go hand in hand, and neither lives without the other. Just as it is necessary to have teachers in schools and in churches so is it necessary to have teachers in social activities. Here, in this building, where all sects and creeds will meet on common ground, all social affairs will be supervised with Christian leadership, and a proper outlet under moral conditions is provided for the working out of the physical requirements, all of which tend toward a better moral manhood and womanhood".

The exercises closed with the singing of "America", and the benediction by the Bishop.

SPRINGFIELD

In War Work—The Rev. Arthur G. Wilson, priest in charge of St. Barnabas Mission at Havana, Illinois, left on April 8 for Peoria, where he has been selected as one of the three hundred civilians to enter Bradley Polytechnic School for training in the various branches of mechanical work. Mr. Wilson did not claim exemption upon his occupation or being a married man. He was placed in Class A 1 by the local board. He assisted the exemption board with the examinations and without remuneration. He also drilled squads of men in army tactics, giving much of his time and energy to this work.

He was born in England and has his first papers as a citizen of the United States. Recently Mrs. Wilson accepted a position as teacher in the Mason, Illinois, public schools. The church in Havana has granted Mr. Wilson leave of absence during the period of the war. The local Havana paper says: "He is very popular with the members of his church and has done good work since coming to Havana. He is also scoutmaster of the Boy Scouts, and will be much missed in this work."

Enlists as Private—The Rev. George D. Child of St. John Baptist Mission at Elkhart, and literary editor of the diocesan paper, has also obtained leave of absence for the period of the war and left April 4 for Toronto, Canada, where he has enlisted as a private. His wife and children will reside in Champaign, Illinois, until his return.

This makes three priests of the diocese who have gone to the front to take their part as ordinary privates in the army. The Rev. Thomas Dyke, formerly of St. Peter's, Mound City, Illinois, joined the Canadian army as a private last Summer and is already overseas. The diocese of Springfield has shown itself to be no slacker in the hour of the country's need.

The offering of the Church War Fund amounted to about $1,400, exceeding the quota.

A fourth clergyman has applied for a chaplaincy and will probably go soon.

The Bishop has appointed the Rev. John C. White literary editor of the diocesan paper in place of the Rev. G. D. Child.

John C. White.

GEORGIA

Work Among the Soldiers—The Bishop and clergy of the diocese are fully alive to the opportunity for work among the soldiers. The Bishop has a list of all the communicants of the diocese who have enlisted and has written personal letters to them.

One of our clergymen, the Rev. R. N. MacCallum, rector of Grace church, Waycross, has recently become a civilian chaplain at Camp Wheeler, in Macon, in the diocese of Atlanta. The local clergy at Augusta, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, the Rev. William Johnson, the Rev. F. W. B. Dorset, and the Rev. P. T. Prentiss, are doing fine work at Camp Hancock, Augusta. Camp Suther, an aviation camp now in process of construction, will he completed in about six weeks. This camp is situated at Americus and is to have 1,500 aviators in training. Here will be a fine opportunity for work.

In Augusta the Bishop has administered Confirmation several times to officers and men of the division at Camp Hancock. He has already confirmed twenty-six who were presented by Chaplain McFetridge of the 108th Field Artillery, Chaplain Houghton of the 103d Engineers, and by the Rev. N. B. Groton, civilian chaplain, supported by the War Commission of the diocese of Pennsylvania and also by the rectors of the parishes in the city. Another Confirmation class was presented to the Bishop on April 3.

The Bishop has also preached several times at regimental services in Camp Hancock, at the 103d Engineers, the 108th Field Artillery and the 112th Infantry. Not only are the chaplains doing faithful service, but in most cases the line officers are most cordial in their co-operation with the chaplains.

Ninety-sixth Annual Convention—The ninety-sixth annual convention of the diocese will be held in St. John's church, Savannah, April 17. On the evening before the convention the Episcopal Church Club of Savannah will hold its spring meeting. The speakers will be the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, rector of St. Paul's church, Augusta, and Mr. Robert G. Tatum of Sewanee. Mr. Tatum will tell of the ascent of Mt. McKinley by Archdeacon Stuck of Alaska, whom Mr. Tatum accompanied on the trip.

At the missionary meeting on the night of the 17, the first speaker will be the Rev. William Johnson, rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta. The second address will be given by the Rev. N. B. Groton, civilian chaplain at Camp Hancock, Augusta. The next speaker will be Mr. Tatum. The last speaker will be the Hon. J. Randolph Anderson, who will speak of diocesan missions from a layman's standpoint.

JAMES B. LAWRENCE.

NEW JERSEY

Ordination—On Maundy Thursday, in St. Wilfred's church, Camden, the Rev. Robert G. W. Williams was advanced to the priesthood, the Bishop of New Jersey officiating. The candidate was presented by the Rev. Charles M. Perkins of West Collingswood, who also was the preacher, and with the Rev. Thomas L. Josephs joined in the laying on of hands. A larger attendance of clergy was inexpedient in the Holy Week.

Mr. Williams has been for some time working at St. Wilfred's, and will continue there as rector.

Proposed Summer School for the Clergy—The Prospectus has recently been issued of a Summer school for the clergy, the first of its kind under directly diocesan management, to be held at Ruth Hall, Asbury Park, June 17 to 22. The appointed place is ideal for the purpose, and the plant of this new school for girls, known as Ruth Hall, will afford all essential accommodation.

The General Committee of Arrangements comprises the Bishop of the diocese as chairman and the Rev. Messrs. Hamilton Schuyler, vice-chairman; Francis H. Richey, secretary, and Morgan Ashley, treasurer. There are appointed also sub-committees on publicity and enrolment, lectures and schedules, finance and house arrangements.

The total charge for attendance, including enrolment fee, board and lodging for the five days, is fixed at ten dollars per person.

The program of instructions has not yet been fully arranged, but there are already promised for the Faculty Bishop Kinsman of Delaware, Dr. F. F. Kramer, warden of Seabury Divinity School, and Dean Fosbroke of the General Theological Seminary.

It is proposed to map out a course of study along the lines of the subjects dealt with at the school which may be pursued privately throughout the year and thus stimulate definite and systematic intellectual effort.

CONNECTICUT

Rector's Anniversary—April first marked the fifteenth anniversary of the present rectorate at the Church of Our Saviour, Plainville—that of the Rev. Robert Henderson Burton. The rector preached his anniversary sermon at the second service on Easter day, reviewing the work of the past fifteen years and outlining what is hoped to be accomplished in the near future.

The anniversary services proper were held on Easter Monday, beginning with a group meeting of the Women's Auxiliaries for the surrounding parishes in New Britain, Southington, Bristol and Forestville, which was well attended by delegates from all these places, as well as many from Plainville. Bishop Acheson presided at this meeting and made the opening address, others taking part being Mrs. J. A. Biddle and Miss Bessie Franklin of Hartford. At 7.30 p. m. Bishop Acheson preached and confirmed a class of six candidates, three of whom were baptized in infancy by the present rector when he first took charge of the parish.

Organist Since 1861—In his sermon the Bishop, besides congratulating the rector and the people on the anniversary, paid tribute to the long and faithful service of the organist. The parish was organized in 1859 and since 1861 has had but one organist, Miss Nellie Lewis, who, besides faithfully filling this important position, has been active in all the work of the parish, giving of herself and her means for the up-building of the church and seldom absent from any service. This is a record that it is doubtful if there is another such in any parish in the country. The Revs. W. D. Williams, D. D., of Southington, Samuel Sutcliffe of New Britain, and W. P. Downes of Bristol were present in the chancel.

PROVIDENCE

Dr. Kellner to Preach—The Rev. Prof. Max Kellner, D. D., of the Cambridge Theological School, will preach at St. Martin's church during April, in the absence of the rector, the Rev. Arthur L. Washburn, who has gone to France.

United Services of Intercession—Under the leadership of Bishop Perry, assisted by a committee of clergymen of various Christian communions, the citizens of Providence gathered in three downtown churches on Sunday, April 7, at 5 p. m., for united prayer and intercession at this juncture of the war. The same service was used in each church, and included patriotic hymns and a call to prayer. Bishop Perry was among those who officiated at the First Baptist Church, and President Faunce shared in the service at Grace church, where the combined choirs of Grace church and St. Stephen's church led the singing.

Large Pageant Given—An elaborate missionary pageant was given at All Saints' church on Saturday afternoon, April 6, with over 200 children in the opening procession of nations. The various missionary fields at home and abroad were vividly portrayed in costumes and scenes and enactments. The educational value was distinct, and will long remain in the parish.

Clerical Club Meets—The Clerical Club of Rhode Island met at Grace church on April 8. A vigorous address was made by the Rev. Asbury E. Krom, D. D., on "The Literature of the War".

ARIZONA

Tuberculosis From Being Gassed—St. Luke's Home for Tubercular Patients in Phoenix has been overcrowded for some time, but a new bungalow for six soldier patients has just been completed and will help considerably. It is to be financed for one year by a friend of the home. Among the patients is a former member of the French Foreign Legion, who was "gassed" twice as well as wounded and tuberculosis resulted. We hope in the future to be able to increase the capacity of the home for such patients.

Nurse for Navajo Indians—Miss Frances Young of Pittsburg, a devoted Church woman and a most efficient nurse, has recently joined the staff of our Navajo Indian "Hospital of the Good Shepherd" Fort Defiance. Miss Anne Cady, head nurse of the hospital, is in the East presenting the work wherever she is given the opportunity.

Notes—Arizona more than quadrupled her apportionment for the Church war fund in the offerings made on Sunday, January 7.

The Girls' Friendly Society is steadily growing in this diocese. The branch in Phoenix is one of the largest, if not the very largest, west of the Mississippi. Other branches have been started in Tucson, Prescott, Globe, Ray and Clarkdale.

In a recent Confirmation class at St. Andrew's Mission in Nogales were the Mayor of the city, the country treasurer, a prominent physician, and an Army chaplain who had been a member of the Seventh Day Adventist body. This is the second minister from another religious body to be confirmed by our Bishop within the past three months.

WYOMING

Easter Monday was the occasion for the dedication of the new parish house of St. Thomas' church, Rawlins, which has been completed at a cost of $3,500, the money being raised locally through the efforts of the rector, the Rev. Franklin C. Smith, assisted by a committee of laymen headed by Mr. George Bible.

The building was dedicated by Bishop Thomas, and following the service a dinner was held. The joy in the realization of the completed task was marred by the fact that this was the last official appearance in Rawlins of the Rev. and Mrs. Smith, who have since departed to their new field in the diocese of Bethlehem. They were presented with many handsome gifts.

Knights Attend Easter Service—Easter services at St. Matthew's Cathedral, Ir e, were of particular significance this year. class of eleven was confirmed by Bishop omas on Easter Even. It is now a cus- n for the Knights Templar to attend the ster Day service, and this year the cus- n was observed, the Templars attending a body.

By great good fortune it was possible bring Professor Robert M. McElroy, ucational director of the National Secu- League, to Laramie for an address at the hedral in the evening of Easter Day. So at was the crowd that many went away appointed in finding room in the nave.

dians Crowd Services—The following er from Mrs. B. S. Cooper gives a pic- e of Easter as it was enjoyed at St. Mich- s Mission:

NORTH DAKOTA

Interesting Woman's Guild—The man's Guild of Gethsemane Cathedral one of the most effective organizations be found anywhere. It consists of prac- lly all of the women of the parish, di- ed into four sections alphabetically, which vents cliques, each section having its n chairman and working independently, all four sections meeting together in crypt of the cathedral once a month as uild. Each of these monthly meetings ollowed by a brief social time, at which eral hostesses serve tea, and tea dues of cents each are collected. This gives ellent opportunity to welcome newcomers get acquainted. The third Tuesday of n month this same organization meets he Woman's Auxiliary. The Auxiliary er raises less than three hundred dollars ear, which is mostly given in specials is in addition to the united offering other work.

ernoon Tea Room—An interesting ure of the guild work is the opening of fternoon tea room in the largest depart- t store downtown, where tea, sand- ies and cookies may be had every after- n from 2.30 p. m. to 5 p. m. The tables attractively arranged in one corner of second floor and everything is so dainty it is quite the thing for tired shoppers est and refresh themselves or for little ies to be given among friends. One on of the guild takes charge of it each k and thus each section only serves once month, two or three ladies serving each rnoon.

ter at the Cathedral—Easter was a adid day at Gethsemane Cathedral, the ther was ideal and this brought out e congregations, and it is gratifying to that the offerings at all of the serv- ices of that day were devoted to missions —not to meet our apportionment, but in addition to our apportionment. It is most encouraging to find the children's offering fully equaling that of last year and every indication of going considerably ahead when all returns are completed.

Helpful Noonday Services Under Federation—The noonday services under the auspices of the Federation of Churches of Fargo held each noon during Holy Week at the Liberty Theatre were a source of inspiration and help to many. Bishop Tyler was the speaker throughout the week. There was an increasing attendance and interest throughout the week and the definite wish expressed on the part of business men and women that such services be made a feature of Holy Week each year.

Church and College—The State Agricultural College, Fargo College, the Moorhead Normal and Concordia College, all being located here, naturally tend to give quite a college atmosphere to Fargo. The effort is made to keep the Church in touch with the young life of the schools by occasional social evenings given by the young people of the Cathedral to the students and these efforts are meeting with encouraging response.

English Church News

The Appointment of Bishops—The English Church Union has started the discussion of the method by which our bishops should be chosen: it is safe to predict that many other Church societies will do the same. Lord Halifax, the president of the E. C. U., was, of course, in his most sorrowful mood—it was a "time of deeper distress and perplexity than he could remember in his 60 years' experience"—and his address went over all the points of the Henson controversy. But he concluded by saying that they must not allow indignation to be their guide and counselor. What had happened might prove a blessing in disguise, and lead to a recovery of the Church's inherent liberties. Sir Walter Phillimore further expounded the official resolution. It would not be a good thing if the clergy and laity of any diocese could force any bishop on the episcopate: the collective episcopate ought to have a say, and also the Crown, as representing the nation generally. The three parties should concur before an appointment was made. Had the Prime Minister consulted the bishops, or any body of divines, it was certain that Dr. Henson would never have been forced on the Church, he said. Some part of the responsibility should be taken from the shoulders of the Prime Minister.

The Dean of Exeter's Proposal—The aged dean of Exeter, Bishop Earle, has apparently quite recovered his health. Notwithstanding the fact that he was ordained sixty years ago, and must, therefore, be nearing the "nineties", he writes as vigorously as any modern reformer, and shows a wonderful capacity for gauging the needs of the time. His plan for the election of bishops is that the Crown should order the dean and chapter of the vacant See to send in three names, to be considered along with any others suggested from other sources. The objection to Dr. Earle's scheme, as pointed out by a Times correspondent, is that it would lead to "wire-pulling". He would prefer that there should be a Diocesan Board, representing the most important sections of Church opinion, to whom the Prime Minister should submit his choice for approval, before submitting the name to the King. No doubt all possible plans will be thoroughly canvassed by the Archbishops' Committee on Church and State, which is about to go into the question. It is of the greatest practical importance: something must be done quickly. Two new Sees, Coventry and Bradford, are just about to be constituted. The faithful Churchmen who have subscribed the money will feel it rather badly if there is another high-handed selection without any regard to their wishes, and other schemes of division of dioceses will be held up till something is settled. The present Prime Minister can be trusted to appreciate the force of a democratic demand.

Canterbury House of Laymen—The Guardian has been saying severe things to the layman, in commenting on the recent proceedings of the Canterbury House of Laymen. It heads its article "The Ineffective Layman", and makes out a good case for its contention that the present house is lacking in that business-like efficiency which we are taught to expect from the layman. It would be unfair to say that the present house is deficient in ability; it has some first-rate intellects among its leaders. But its resolutions are singularly inept and colorless. One would have thought, for instance, that it could have managed to express its own mind on the subject of the appointment of bishops, but all that it succeeded in doing was to commend the subject to the notice of the Archbishops' Committee—quite an unnecessary resolution, as it was well understood that that committee was anyhow about to take the subject in hand.

A Clear Ruling Wanted—I have referred to the protest which the parishioners of St. Anselm's had made to the Bishop of London regarding Canon Hepher's conducting devotions in a nonconformist church. The average newspaper reader is greatly puzzled to find that the Bishop has at the same time prevented the Rev. Conrad Noel from accepting an invitation to speak to the Congregationalists at the City Temple. Of course, there is a distinction between conducting "silent devotions", with mere suggestions for lines of prayer, and preaching a sermon. But Mr. Conrad Noel is one who delivers what he calls "the Catholic message"—presumably in halls, not in churches—to all kinds of non-churchmen. He explained to the Bishop that he did not propose to go to the City Temple on a Sunday morning "because it is the time of the parish masses". But he felt that he could conscientiously go on a Thursday morning. The Bishop refused his sanction, and Mr. Noel had to decline the invitation. But he asks for a reconsideration by bishops, priests and laity, of "these open-minded approaches to Catholics from groups outside Anglicanism".

The Pope and the War

To the Editor of The Churchman:

I wish to write you in regard to an article appearing in The Churchman of March 16.

First, let me say that I am Episcopalian, born and bred. I am also an American, having lived in Canada only since my marriage, and am still intensely loyal to my own country and also loyal to the country of my adoption. The article referred to comes under "Chronicle and Comment on Current Events," entitled "Lost Prestige".

"There was a supreme crisis in the war when the Pope might have spoken words that could have shaken the world. When Belgium lay at the feet of the despoiler, Christ's vicar upon earth was silent", etc.

While having no leaning whatever to Romanism and no desire to defend the Pope, I feel, as I am sure many others will, that your criticism is somewhat out of keeping with the attitude of the United States at that time. When the Germans so ruthlessly devastated and outraged poor, little helpless Belgium, the whole civilized world listened with bated breath hopefully, prayerfully, for one word of protest from the President of the greatest Republic in the world, and listened in vain; it did not come; when Edith Cavell was murdered no word of disapproval came from the President—who is supposed by other nations to be the mouthpiece of the entire country. The great country stood aside and let brute force trample under foot the weak and helpless.

One word of protest would have meant more from the United States than a volume from the Pope, for at that time Germany would have done much to avoid war with the United States. All Americans living here felt it very keenly, as Canada had responded so nobly before any call was made, with her very best. I feel sure your article will call forth much criticism, in view of the facts as they were.

This is in no sense in defense of the Pope, only that, as far as I can see, he did no worse on that occasion than did the President of the United States.

I have been for many years a reader of The Churchman, looking forward to its arrival each week; the past few months it has been particularly interesting and I can quite feel with the man who "was carried beyond his station, being so deeply absorbed in The Churchman". Clara L. Watson.

Ecclesiastical Lese Majeste

To the Editor of The Churchman:

Our Roman Catholic friends show a commendable readiness to demand correction of erroneous statements about their church and their faith, whenever made; and their effective organization of forces is such that such corrections are almost always made promptly and completely. Perhaps this very fact has its dangers; for we regret to find, on the part of some Roman Catholic leaders, an apparent determination to establish a law of lése-majesté over here, to protect the Vatican and all its occupants from any criticism whatever. A flagrant example of this is given by Cardinal O'Connell, Roman Catholic Archbishop of Boston—the same who recently warned his spiritual subjects that to vote for a certain constitutional amendment prohibiting the appropriation of state funds for private institutions would be to commit the sin against the Holy Ghost! In a recent number of the Red Cross Magazine, Kipling's new poem was reprinted, which contains an incidental comment on the Pope's "neutrality" in the Great War. Cardinal O'Connell thereupon demanded an apology, public retraction, and other amends, with a threat that, unless all this were granted, he would break with the Red Cross entirely. We quote from his letter to the New England manager of the Red Cross:

"Why such stuff as Kipling's poem is ever written must always remain a mystery to us. This is not the first time that Kipling's abnormality has led him to prostitute a noble gift to a base purpose. But still more mysterious is it to find such stuff in a Red Cross magazine.

"Our people are heartily sick of such 'accidents', and it is difficult to persuade even the most patient that such crudities of vulgar sentiment flaunted in their faces are merely accidental.

"Hundreds were on the point of taking down the Red Cross sign from their windows and refusing to be further connected with the society.

"Your honorable letter expressing officially and personally your regret of the untoward incident will do very much to delay such action which would be unfortunate of course. But they will still await satisfactory amends from the magazine, which must be forthcoming at once.

"I must repeat that our good Catholic people are heartily sick of this miserable display of Orangeism in America, and their own self-respect forbids them to tolerate it another day.

"Our people are giving their all, their own blood, their sons in the Army and Navy, their best efforts to the Red Cross.

"What in comparison with their numbers and their means these Kiplingites are giving, besides their ever-ready sectarian bitterness, would be worth while investigating.

"And we should like to know, moreover, just who is responsible for this insult in the Red Cross Magazine.

"You know you can always rely upon me for co-operation, but I trust that everyone will remember that it is CO-operation with a very large Co."

The Red Cross has made its apology. It was undoubtedly improper to introduce, however incidentally, a reference to the Pope in the manner that it appeared in the Kipling poem. It is no part of the function of the Red Cross to pass upon questions of neutrality, and the expression of regret from the War Council is undoubtedly sincere and genuine.

But, though the Red Cross Magazine is not the place for such a discussion, there are facts that cannot be evaded. Belgium remembers how Cardinal Hartmann, unrebuked by the Pope, intruded himself int Cardinal Mercier's jurisdiction and gloate over the prostrate free people. France r members the denunciation of Vatican agent against the "atheist Republic". Italy ha still in mind the case of Mgr. Gerlach, member of the Pope's household, actuall living in the Vatican, tried, convicted, an sentenced to death as the head of the Au trian spy system in Italy. And it was onl in January, 1917, that Cardinal O'Conne himself declared he did not know who bega the war, or whether Belgium had any ne trality to violate.

But, however this may be, the Pope and h policies are justly subject to criticism proper places, even by his own loyal spi itual subjects. It is only "in faith an morals" that he ever claims infallibilit and then under conditions which seldo occur; and the most glaring moral crisis the world's history has not led to the e ercise of the gift of infallibly pronounci judgment. St. Catharine of Siena, to nar no other, criticised the Pope and his p litical schemes, much to His Holiness's sp itual profit. And His Eminence of Bost must learn that threats of boycotting w not pass unchallenged in free America.

Brotherhood in Camp Pike

To the Editor of The Churchman:

Rev. Chas. F. Collins of Jonesboro, Ar ansas and Mr. G. A. Kenderdine of i Brotherhood of St. Andrew are in charge the Church's work in Camp Pike, eight mi north of Little Rock, Arkansas.

We have established headquarters Christ Church parish house, Little Ro and we wish to have every one interes in any soldier in Camp Pike send us name, company and regimental address. C of us will then call at once. The men moving on and the ones here today may gone tomorrow; so make haste.

Camp Pike is one of the sixteen cant ments of the National Army and at pres accommodates more than 30,000 officers men. As these are mostly from the W and South the percentage of churchmen small and we have no means of getting curate figures, but there must be fi three to five hundred men. Two-thirds the camp is under quarantine, which gre restricts the work, but we have at least celebration of the Eucharist each Sunda camp in Y. M. C. A. hut 35.

This is the only distinctively Episco service we are permitted to use on ground.

Mr. Collins, the voluntary chaplain lected by the War Commission, is a sp did man for the place and we have cordial support of Bishop Winche Bishop Saphoré, Suffragan, and of the l clergy.

A number of priests of the Church acting as Y. M. C. A. secretaries in c viz., the Rev. B. E. Brown of Tarb North Carolina; the Rev. Verue Stove Little Rock; the Rev. Malcolm Lockh of Batesville, Arkansas; the Rev. Keicher, recently of Trinity parish, York City, and Ven. D. E. Johnson of colored Y. M. C. A. None of these exercise any priestly functions in the c As Y. M. C. A. secretaries their activ are all along non-denominational lines

reland is always to the fore politically, haps not always judiciously. But this y be due to an overlooked factor that kes for righteousness despite the unrest creates. Ireland is in reality seething h a very wholesome national consciousss which has expressed itself in other l more helpful directions than those ich manage to get her on the front page. e is a sort of pace-maker for the rest of United Kingdom. She is its agricultural eriment station where the problem of insive farming is being tested. The econic organization of her agrarian indus-s followed hard upon the liberation of land, which preceded by some years the ie movement in England, Scotland and ıles. But Lloyd George's courageous pol- of agrarian democratization will bring th its peaceable fruits of economic rightısness in due season. Seasonal Industries

SEASONAL INDUSTRY. By Mary Van Kleeck. New York: Russell Sage Foundation. 917. $1.50 net.

The seasonal industry in question is the linery trade in New York; the investigan was undertaken with a view to remedy- conditions which resulted in the "Tri-gle" fire of 1911, in which 147 girls and men were burned to death. There were, fact, two inquiries, one authorized by the ite Legislature.

n this investigation the Sage Foundan co-operated, making a study of milli-y shops while the State agency studied idy, paper and block making, the manuture of men's shirts, and employment in partment stores. Despite some reluctance, not actual recalcitrance on the part of ividual employers who resented the in-tigation of ledgers and pay-rolls, the undation's committee secured data from women milliners, concerning the work-s schooling, family conditions, nativity, urly earnings and expenditures; a record all her positions: "her report of the milli-y shop in which she had been most re-tly employed"; and "the investigator's ord of the report".

The investigation showed the increasing ed of public control, in view especially the conclusion reached by the New York ite Factory Investigating Commission in 4 that $9.00 a week is "the least sum cessary for decent maintenance for a rking woman in New York City," and t of "more than 100,000 men and women four important industries besides millinery . . . one-half . . . received less than $8.00 a week . . . , one-eighth . . . less than $5.00, one-third less than $7.00, two-thirds less than $10.00, and only one-sixth . . . $15.00 or more". The testimony of the millinery workers was that budgets fall short of a "desirable standard." Low wages in such a seasonal industry, in fact, are a greater individual and social menace than low wages in a regular occupation. Demands for new hats are not constant, but periodic—and the workers suffer during the slack seasons. The only way to avert the hardships of seasonal industries is so to arrange production in those trades as to distribute work over the entire year or to provide opportunity for the seasonal workers to fill in their "idle time" in some other occupation. This dove-tailing of industry is one way of meeting the industrial demands of wartime—unless the increasing high cost of living or "sumptuary legislation" materially reduces the demand for fancy and expensive hats!

Psychology and Sociology

AN INTRODUCTION TO SOCIAL PSYCHOLOGY. By Charles A. Ellwood, Ph.D. New York: D. Appleton & Company. $2.00.

Professor Ellwood, of the University of Missouri and author of other studies in psychological aspects of society, presents here a systematic text book on the subject.

Leaving overworked fields of individualistic and subjective psychology the author launches into an examination of the objective and subjective aspects of human society, the nature of social unity and continuity, and social change, under normal and abnormal conditions. He then develops a study of some practical principles of social action, as instinct and intelligence, imitations and suggestion, sympathy and consciousness.

The book is clear, intelligible and while of necessity largely theoretic cuts away much of what still separates psychology from the social sciences. The author thinks that the psychological side of social theory should become a recognized part of sociology and that sociology should make an advance along lines of applied psychology.

Dr. Ellwood sustains his ability for critical analysis and comparison with a fine patience for different points of view and gives one the satisfactory feeling that his conclusions are made with ample care. One feels grateful for so thorough a work in this comparatively new field.

Two Books of Voyages

THE CRUISE OF THE CORWIN. By John Muir. Edited by William F. Badé. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. $2.75.

That enthusiastic American naturalist John Muir, who could always make his readers feel the romance of nature, had the good fortune in 1881 to be a member of the Corwin expedition through Bering Sea and the Arctic Ocean in search for the explorer De Long. The expedition touched many interesting, and until then largely unknown, points in the great lone land, and published reports of scientific value. Dr. Badé has edited Mr. Muir's journal of the cruise and included many illustrations, most of them being Mr. Muir's own sketches. The chapters on the glaciation of the Arctic and Subarctic regions and "Botanical Notes" are the first printing of much valuable scientific wealth gathered on that historic cruise by Mr. Muir, and give his conclusions as he wrote them.

The romantic story of adventure and exploration, told with engrossing and charming effect and with colorful description, is the main interest of the book for the general reader. Scientists and historians likewise will enjoy with the general reader this last and without doubt best book from the pen of the man who so delightfully toured us through Our National Parks and lured us for A Thousand Mile Walk to the Gulf and fascinated us with travels in Siberia and Alaska.

Jewish Philanthropy

JEWISH PHILANTHROPY. By Boris D. Bogen. New York: Macmillan Company. $2.00.

The aim of Jewish philanthropy is primarily "never to become a burden on the general community". Those who are at all familiar with the principles of social service which may be found in the Old Testament, some of which were worked out under the Diaspora when the chosen people were scattered to the four winds of heaven only to congregate again in ghettos, will not be surprised at the magnitude and comprehensiveness of the modern Jewish effort at constructive relief of members of their race. The Jew's pride of race has combined with the aversion of the Gentile to make Jewish charity stand on its own feet.

Part of the problem has of course sprung from the large fact and factor of immigration, which has been met, in part constructively, through the effort to distribute newcomers to places where their labor is needed, and especially to get them back to the soil—an especially significant process in view of the Jews' earlier history in Bible lands, if not in the more recent nations of Europe. The education, or, in more recent phrase, "Americanization" of Jewish immigrants, has been a leading part of Hebrew philanthropic endeavor.

The final chapter discusses the tendency to take charity out of the synagogue and at the same time, by way of compensation, to unite the synagogue with charitable endeavor. "Jewish religion without applied Judaism became a dead matter. The young generation, especially, was not attracted by oral social service; it required active applications".

Mogu the Wanderer

MOGU THE WANDERER. By Padriac Colum. Little, Brown & Company. $1.00.

A most fantastic tale of the Oriental variety in which a sort of childish barbarism in man is given full play. No restraint whatever is imposed on any of the primal passions, and their exhibition is kept respectable by the ingenuity of the plot and the perpetual shifting of the scene. In other words, it is a true Arabian Nights' entertainment, and there runs all through the story of the beggar (who becomes Vizier and then loses his head, of course, and to save his head physically, after many atrocities, returns to the status of the beggar) a vein of satire; and what is more, perhaps through all the gaiety one may suspect at least intentional the suggestion of a sad query: Are even we, the eminently respectable spectators (or readers) under thinkable or unlikely conditions capable of such preposterous folly, such inconsiderate cruelty?

We hope the play will be put upon the boards, because it would be marvelous fun, we think, and give scope for a lot of delightful, immediately intelligible, acting, while it could be as great a spectacle as the materialistic manager might require. We commend it to the reader, and also to the manager hunting a vivacious popular play, which shall interest the man of the street and the man of education alike, under reasonable conditions of presentation.

France and America

YOUNG FRANCE AND NEW AMERICA. By Pierre de Lanux. The Macmillan Company. $1.25.

A timely book dealing with the possibilities of co-operation between the youth of France and America at the close of the War. The author spent the year 1917 in America and is peculiarly fitted not only to bring a message from Young France but to interpret New America to itself. This he has done with courtesy and consideration and has presented to us a vision of the future that is inspiring in its potentialities.

Such books as this by M. de Lanux help America to a clearer appreciation of the aims and aspirations of modern France. A beginning has already been made by M. Jusserand in his stories of Rochambeau, Lafayette and de Grasse and the help that they brought to the leaders of our own Revolutionary War. The publication of the magazine New France in August of 1917 and the presentations of Jacques Copeau and his company of French players in New York this winter have continued the work of education.

We shall be drawn still closer to the youth of France when our own brave boys return from her battlefields with their more intimate knowledge of country and people. It is to prepare us for this day that M. de Lanux writes.

Hugh Gibson

A JOURNAL FROM OUR LEGATION IN BELGIUM. By Hugh Gibson, Secretary of the American Legation in Brussels. New York: Doubleday, Page & Company. $2.50 net.

Every man will appreciate this book who agrees with Rabbi Wise that, "As Lincoln declared that this Union could not last half slave and half free, so the world realizes today that civilization can never last half Prussian and half human".

The reader here has an inside view of the unspeakable diabolism which the German soldiers practiced upon the defenseless people of Belgium. Not only did the official position of Mr. Gibson afford him exceptional opportunities for observation, but circumstances made these opportunities unique. He took over the German legation when war was declared. He was present and heard King Albert's great speech of defiance. He was in Louvain during the pillaging and burning of that city. He passed many times through the firing lines between the Germans and Belgians with American dispatches. He was in Brussels when the Germans entered. Later, he had all manner of official and unofficial dealings with them. Under many varying circumstances he met and talked with King Albert. And he spent forty-eight hours trying in vain to save Miss Cavell from the savagery of the Germans.

This exposé is one of the vital contributions of the time to an understanding of this War. If, after having read it, any man in America does not find his blood boiling against those who are responsible for this carnage and its atrocities, then let him, like Judas, go out and hang himself.

War French

WAR FRENCH. By Cornélis DeWitt Willcox, Colonel U. S. Army and Professor of Modern Languages, United States Military Academy. New York: Macmillan Company. 1917. Price 75c net.

Colonel Willcox has prepared an admirable little handbook for the Sammies in France. "Our officers and men, under intensive training for the War, will have but little time to make a formal study of French", says the author. "This little book is accordingly written in the belief that it may help them to some knowledge of that language. An officer or soldier who knows a few words or phrases is more useful to the Government than if he were ignorant of these words or phrases. For example, if you go into a bakeshop and say pain combien? you will have got what you want almost as well as if you had been able to run off a regular conversation with the shopkeeper."

Favorite Hymns

FAVORITE HYMNS. By William Lee Hunton. Published by the General (Lutheran) Council Publication House. $1.35.

This resumé of the origin, authorship and use of some of the hymns many devoted Christians love, no matter where they are in the Church Catholic, will be cordially received. Using the Christian Year as a guide, the hymns of the centuries are gathered around each of the seasons of the Church with illuminating historical and devotional comments. The author says the preparation of the manuscript was as fascinating as a study in fiction. We can believe him. He has created an atmosphere for the hymns he selected by digging out many a forgotten incident or neglected story of the past that will make them all the more precious to those who use them frequently. Including the Te Deum (the great international anthem, he calls it) one hundred and forty-five hymns are commented upon, nearly every one of which is in the Church's hymnal.

DENMARK AND SWEDEN (With Iceland Finland). By Jón Stefansson, Ph.D., Lectu in Icelandic at King's College, London. of the Nations series. New York. G. P. nam's Sons. $1.50.

RCHBISHOP OF YORK SAYS FAREWELL TO AMERICA

You, Mr. President, will remember that the brilliant banquet here five weeks I could summarize my impressions of erica only by the word 'prodigious'. After trip my vocabulary fails, and I must back on the same word.

'I have learned certain things about the ited States. I have learned that the real erica is confined within the state or in which each person you meet happens to dwell. There are some people in ston who have little culture; in Chicago ture is made to hum. There are some ple in Philadelphia who could not remember their grandfathers. I have learned, , that no country makes more of titles n a democracy without titles. I suppose is like the man in the dry State who, en he goes into a wet State, makes the st of his opportunity. But what I have rned most of all is that the United tes contains the most kind, generous and rm-hearted people in the world.

'But I have learned even more about myf. I have learned that I am learned and scholar. In one place I was a venerable late, in another a well-preserved middled gentleman. In one place distinguished appearance; in another homely and afle. A soldier's wife in Michigan said: e seems to speak English beautifully. He s left the ordinary English behind, and ked up all his h's'. There has been a tain compensation, however, in the fact t in almost every city I have been told t I bear a remarkable likeness to George ashington.

'Nowhere have I found any one who ded me to return. In one place I was d, 'Go home, Arch, while the going is d'. I discovered a really original man! ewhere my welcome has been monotous.

The Mystic Chord of Memories

'I have been touched beyond words by touching of the mystic chord of mem- es which bind our two great nations to- her. There is here a new spirit of real e for the country to which I am about return. I feel that all the misunderndings of the past may be forgotten in great hope for the future. While I w that the comradeship will remain unnged until we finish the work we are in, is really to the future that I look. I l not leave out the common destiny to ich this struggle is bringing us. In any cussion of this subject I could not leave the people of the great Republic of nce" (Applause).

The Archbishop, in speaking of his visit the Western front, said, "I remember say- to the commander 'I must get away m all of this noise!' and he sent me r to that great cathedral of Amiens. ere I spent three memorable hours, and re I was able to hold communion with all t is invincible in the soul of that great ple.

And yet, through our common speech l traditions, there must always be a cial and unique link. Two great nations ich God has so plainly joined together no man hereafter, on any pretext, atpt to put asunder. When this war is r we must together use all our common l to build up a concert of free people. s to that future that I am looking. Let it be taken for granted among us that these two nations stand together as never before. When the conflict is over they will be able to say 'Never again'. We shall have vindicated the purpose for which history forces this common speech.

"Do Not Fret"

"There is a growing sense among the American people of their responsibility for their decision made one year ago. Perhaps for the first time the great bulk of American people have realized that that thin line of British and French soldiers is really, at the present time, holding for the United States everything that the United States holds most dear. I know that there is among some a great dissatisfaction because of the slowness with which you have been getting ready, but I would say to you, Do not fret. Do not worry. You will not be too late if you come into the war with all your strength, and every part of the country united. Put all your emphasis in the single word 'Now'.

"The only thing that worries me in this evening is the contrast that it seems to present to the awful reality of war. I have felt as if a hand were bidding us draw back the curtain. I can hear the beating of the wings of the Angel of Death. I can see the hand over us writing 'Thou art being tried in the balance'. Our people, as we know from the address of the Prime Minister, are really feeling that our supreme hour has come, and I am grateful that I am able to say when I return that this great people will not fail us, that you will come to our succor and are only sorry that you cannot come now.

"If it should happen that our two countries are for the moment smitten to the earth, there will be here and then the great strong hand of this republic ready to succor and pull them to their feet again.

"There is another word that I feel I must say when I think of that solemn finger over us. It is not only our citizenship, but it is also our churchmanship that is being tried. It is even a more solemn thing to be a member of the society of Jesus Christ than a citizen of England or America. Not all the brilliance of this scene can withhold my lips or your hearts as we remember what we owe to Him at this momentous turning point in our history".

Finding Our Soul

After speaking of the dangers of that materialism which was creeping over the world before the war, the Archbishop continued:

"We have learned, if our decision means anything, that all these things are as nothing, as things to be cast aside. There is nothing a nation can gain in exchange for its soul. We shall not have met the crisis unless men and women, business men, politicians, women in society, are learning to put first things first, for the first things are things of the soul. If in this way good is brought out of evil, Germany, by her challenge, will have led our nations to find their souls. It will mean that we have abandoned the material standards of the nineteenth century and desire to have the spiritual standards of the twentieth.

"It was a great moment in the history of the United States when it ranged itself definitely on the side of the spiritual.

"No new world will come unless a new spirit brings it. There is no other source from which it can come except through the spirit of Him to Whom we owe allegiance. The world is being made ready for a new coming of Christ.

"It is a time when we are under great responsibility. We, bishops and people, must be heralds of His coming. It is to be a civilized society such as the world has never seen. The war puts the issues clearly before us all. Is this great republic to stand for the ideals of Jesus Christ? We have the opportunity of making a great future.

"It is to that task that we must go forward. The man for the times is the man who hears the trumpets blow. Is there a sure response to the inspiring call of Him whose name we bear? My heart must needs be with you, for you have given so abundantly to me. I would say 'Go forth, and the Lord God of our fathers be with you as you go'."

Vestry Pays Annuity of $1,000

Radnor, Pennsylvania—At the annual meeting of the vestry of old St. David's church on Easter Monday the Rev. James Hart Lamb, D. D., presented his resignation as rector, to take effect June 1, 1918.

Whereupon the vestry passed the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in recognition of the faithful pastoral services and successful financial administration of the Rev. James Hart Lamb, D. D., during the last sixteen years, we, the vestry of old St. David's church, hereby elect the Rev. Dr. Lamb to the honorary position of rector emeritus and agree to pay him an annuity of $1,000 during his lifetime.

SEVENTH YEAR

The ALL NIGHT MISSION, now in the seventh year of its career of service, during which it has sheltered over 200,000 men, fed over 150,000 and helped over 14,000 to a new start in life, and has made 800 visits to prisons, 900 visits to hospitals, and conducted 2,000 services, is in need of funds.

This is a unique and practical rescue mission for men which never closes NIGHT OR DAY, where the weary, wandering souls to whom all doors are closed may find sympathetic friends to talk and pray with, free shelter, clothing, food and drinking water, NIGHT OR DAY.

Through Mr. Dudley Tyng Upjohn, its President and Treasurer, the Mission asks for support to continue and extend its work. Contributions may be sent to 8 Bowery or P. O. Box 81, New York City.

This work is endorsed by the Rt. Rev. Charles S. Burch, D.D., Bishop Suffragan of New York.

OBITUARY

HENRY W. HOUGH

At a meeting of the vestry of Grace church, Kirkwood, Missouri, held on the 10th of April, 1918, the following action was unanimously taken:

Since it has pleased our Heavenly Father to call unto Himself our dear brother, fellow vestryman and senior warden, Henry W. Hough, in the ninetieth year of his age, we make it no less a pleasure than a solemn duty to place on record our appreciation of his personal worth and his most honorable and valuable service. It was because he loved the church sincerely and so well that he was called to serve as vestryman, lay reader, junior warden and senior warden for a continuous period of fifty-nine years—from the organization of the church and parish, Easter Day, 1859—to the end of his life; and it was because church duties were to him no less a delight than obligations of conscience that through this long period he never failed to attend the vestry meetings except on account of illness or absence from the city, and to take active part and give wise and thoughtful counsel in the deliberations.

He was one of the small number of devoted Church people who founded and organized the Kirkwood church in the regular Sunday meeting begun in the dwelling house of Harry I. Bodley in 1857—so that his personal connection with it embraced a period of sixty-one years. He watched its beginnings with affectionate concern, and contributed a full share in the giving to it the good name it enjoys, both in the diocese and at large. For many years he was a delegate to the Diocesan Convention and on various occasions a delegate to the General Convention.

Resolved: That a copy of this minute be sent to the widow and family of our deceased brother, and a copy also to THE CHURCHMAN.

MURDER OF MAR SHIMUN

Syrian Catholicos First Head of Nationality to Perish in the War

NEW YORK CITY.—Mar Shimun, Patriarch of the Assyrian Church, was killed recently, according to a cablegram received by the State Department at Washington Saturday last.

Mar Shimun is the first political head of a nationality who has paid the supreme sacrifice of this war. To his people he was both King Albert and Cardinal Mercier. In 1903, when a boy of 16, Mar Shimun was selected to become Catholicos or Patriarch, to succeed his uncle, Ruwel Reuben, who was on the point of death. He was consecrated Catholicos on April 12 of that year. He was educated by native teachers and by members of the mission established by Archbishop Benson of Canterbury at the patriarchal seat, Qudshants (Kochannes) in Kurdistan.

DR. JOWETT SAYS FAREWELL

Preaches Last Sermon at Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church

NEW YORK CITY—With manifest sadness on his own part and on the part of those who crowded the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church Sunday morning, the Rev. Dr. J. H. Jowett said farewell to the congregation to which he has ministered for the last seven years. Dr. Jowett is about to return to England in response, as he explained, "to a call as imperative as the peal of a soldier's bugle", and said he would go back "as ambassador of the hearts of the American people". More than 2,000 person were excluded from the church after every seat had been occupied.

Missions Board Committee Meets

NEW YORK CITY.—The Executive Committee of the Board of Missions met in the Church Missions House, New York, April 9.

From the domestic field we received and acted upon the resignation of the Rev. J. Brown as missionary in the Diocese of Florida. The Rev. K. G. Finlay was requested to attend as representative of the Board the Conference of Southern Mountain Workers to be held in Knoxville, Tennessee, April 10-12.

The resignations of Deaconesses Cra and MacDonald were also accepted as missionaries in the District of Porto Rico. At the request of the Bishop of Porto Rico Miss M. K. Cramer was appointed as missionary teacher. The retirement of Miss A. M. Clark as a regularly appointed missionary in the District of Hankow was accepted, but at the Bishop's request she is to continue as a missionary employed in the field for one year. The Board accepted with great regret the resignation of Dr. John MacWillie as missionary physician in the District of Hankow.

The resignation of Miss G. J. Tracy as missionary in the District of Kyoto was also accepted, as well as the resignation of the Rev. H. H. Kelley of the District of Alaska. Permission was granted to the Rev. T. R. Ludlow, of Hankow, to proceed to France to work among the Chinese, under the auspices of the Y. M. C. A. Mr. J. MacDonald, at the request of the Bishop was appointed as missionary in the District of Hankow.

WILL YOU SANCTION THIS?

By REX BEACH

PRESIDENT AUTHOR'S LEAGUE

CONGRESS—or a sufficient majority of it—has voted to destroy magazine reading.

It has accomplished this by passing a simple law re-establishing a postal "zone" system for all publications—a zone system and postal principle that was abolished by President Lincoln in 1863, and by establishing through a complicated system postal rates that mean increases of from 50 to 900 per cent. postage increases to all periodical readers.

By this "zone" system American readers of periodicals—home, educational, scientific, business, or religious—are to be penalized by enormous postage increases on the weekly or monthly papers they read, and the greater their accidental remoteness from the city of publication the greater is the penalty that is placed upon them.

Magazines have been a slow growth. In the process of their development and evolution it has happened that publishing is chiefly concentrated in the East. This large magazine increase in postage, therefore, discriminates unfairly but with great force against the entire West—beginning even with Western New York and Ohio and increasing rapidly until such States as Washington, Oregon, New Mexico, and California are to pay nine times the amount of postage formerly paid on the advertising pages alone of their magazine. What this increase means in cost to readers is incalculable.

And the tragedy of this 50 to 900 per cent. magazine increase postage law lies in the fact that this loss of readers will come from classes and from sections of our nation where widespread reading should be most encouraged — from people in remote sections where life is a bitter struggle on the margin of subsistence—where the habit of reading is just forming and the little weekly or monthly budget for magazines has but so very recently become recognized as an important item in family life. The terrific magazine postage increase will wipe these out. That is the real tragedy to this nation.

This 50 to 900 per cent. postage increase on magazines is not a war tax. Publishers were already taxed by excess profits and income taxes. It is not a war tax; Postmaster General Burleson has so stated in his annual report when he declared it is permanent postal legislation—unless repealed through your protests to Congress and Congressmen. Will you write—telegraph—or urge the passage of resolutions of protest against this destructive law?

WILL YOU HELP?

Write to your Congressman, protest against this destructive law, and demand its repeal.

Get your club or association to adopt resolutions demanding its repeal.

Will you enroll to help repeal this law that penalizes periodical readers with heavy penalties?

If so, send your name and address—and a copy of any resolutions adopted—to

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Every possible effort has been made by the Circulation Department of The Churchman to speed up deliveries of the paper. The war has caused such unparalleled congestion at the New York Post Office that such efforts have proved to be unavailing. The Churchman suffers in common with all other periodicals published in New York City. Two weeks ago subscribers living just across the river, in New Jersey, received their copies of The Churchman Thursday following the week of publication. The papers were mailed on the preceding Thursday. In order to facilitate deliveries by at least one day, The Churchman, starting with this number, goes to press one day earlier than formerly; that is, on Monday. This is an extreme disadvantage in handling news, but it is done in the interest of subscribers. It will not eradicate the difficulty, but it will help.

FRECKLES
Now Is the Time to Get Rid of These Ugly Spots.
There's no longer the slightest need of feeling ashamed of your freckles, Othine—double strength—is guaranteed to remove these homely spots.
Simply get an ounce of Othine—double strength—from your druggist, and apply a little of it night and morning and you should soon see that even the worst freckles have begun to disappear, while the lighter ones have vanished entirely. It is seldom that more than one ounce is needed to completely clear the skin and gain a beautiful clear complexion.
Be sure to ask for the double strength Othine, as this is sold under guarantee of money back if it fails to remove freckles.

Freckles

There is just one way to remove freckles and make the skin clear and beautiful. It is in this way that Kintho Cream gets rid of the old, freckled skin, gradually and harmlessly, and gives a soft, clear, white, youthful and beautiful skin, which of course should have no freckles.

Just get a box of Kintho Beauty Cream at any drug store and apply it night and morning as directed, and your freckles should begin to disappear in a day or two. It is well to get a cake of Kintho Soap also, as this helps to keep the freckles away, once Kintho has removed them.

CHURCH schools have been having a difficult time to keep their heads above water financially. Yet we have been accustomed to look upon them as one of the great assets of the Church where foundations are laid and workers developed. The matter is one of the important problems now before the General Board of Religious Education. THE CHURCHMAN is glad to be able to devote this issue to a discussion of the Church school.

The Rev. William E. Gardner, D.D., the secretary of the General Board of Religious Education, is too well known in the American Church to need any introduction to the readers of THE CHURCHMAN. He has co-operated with the editors in planning this number, and has written our leading article, Shall the Church School Be Encouraged?

The Rt. Rev. Herman Page, D.D., who asks Need Church Schools Fail? writes from the point of view of a bishop who has faced the problem. Dr. Page was for many years the rector of St. Paul's, Chicago. In 1915 he was consecrated bishop of Spokane. Interested in the General Board of Religious Education and a leader in Sunday school development, he knows the value of the parishioner trained in a Church preparatory school. As a bishop who found three poor but energetic schools in his district, he knows the situation from the other side.

The Rev. Frederick Herbert Sill, O.H.C., is the headmaster of Kent school, Kent, Connecticut. At the request of the editors, he has written The Kent Plan, an account of the ideals and methods at Kent. It is interesting to note that the same plan is in operation at the Loomis Institute, Winsor, Connecticut, a new school, built on the Loomis foundation and opened about three years ago.

The Rt. Rev. Hugh Latimer Burleson, D.D., bishop of South Dakota, is a well-known and much loved figure in the American Church. As son of the Rev. Solomon Burleson and brother of four others who have served in the ministry of the Church, as dean of Gethsemane cathedral, Fargo, and as editor of the Spirit of Missions he is known to Church people throughout the United States. In 1916 he was consecrated bishop of South Dakota.

The verse in this issue is by the Rev. Arthur Ketchum, acting rector of the Church of the Epiphany, New York, and Clinton Scollard of Clinton, New York, two contributors familiar to the readers of THE CHURCHMAN, and Norreys Jephson O'Conor, the Irish poet.

A subscriber who was in arrears in his payments on THE CHURCHMAN recently sent in a check to cover the amount, with a year's payment in advance, and enclosed the following jingle. The sentiment appealed so strongly to the circulation manager that he asked to have it published. It is now sung each morning with patriotic fervor by the subscription department. Here it is:

THE STEADY SUBSCRIBER

How dear to our heart is the steady subscriber
Who pays in advance at the birth of each year.
Who lays down the money and does it quit gladly,
And casts round the office a halo of chee

He never says: "Stop it; I cannot afford i
I'm getting more papers than now I ca read."
But always says: "Send it; our people a like it—
In fact, we all think it a help and a need.

How welcome his check when it reaches ou sanctum,
How it makes our pulse throb; how i makes our heart dance.
We outwardly thank him; we inwardl bless him—
The steady subscriber who pays in ad vance.

Our Church Schools

THE CHURCHMAN is devoting a special number to the general subject of Church Schools because we believe it to be one of the pressing problems with which the Church in its educational capacity has to deal.

The most important observation in Dr. Gardner's illuminating article Shall the Church School Be Encouraged which we publish this week, is the proposal that a secretary of the department of secondary education be appointed whose business it shall be to assemble the facts relating to our Church Schools. This is always the first step in any constructive process. Without a knowledge of the facts we shall not understand the problem which we are given to handle; much less shall we know how to work towards its solution.

There have been a good many ways of making Church Schools in America. They vary from the individual business enterprise, capitalizing to the full the name of the Church to entice patronage, to the conscientious struggle of bishops and other diocesan authorities to create a school where religious and moral training may be conducted under the governance of the Church. We have here the explanation why our Church Schools have had so precarious an existence in this country. Some schools whose usefulness to the Church has been tainted by a commercial spirit have flourished like the green bay tree. Others which ought to have developed into strength and wide influence have died or are being starved out of existence. The law of the survival of the fittest has not always ministered in this connection to the survival of the worthiest.

Till very recently there has been little enthusiasm among us over the problem of religious education. The matter has gone by default. It is not unnatural that in periods of great expansion, whether in the Church or in the Nation, a good many things are left at loose ends. Bishops and dioceses have had a good many troubles. While there are starving missions and while there are vast areas inadequately equipped with churches and missionaries, we could hardly expect the harassed diocesan to take on extra responsibility. But it is evident that we are entering upon a new state of development here in America. Education is taking a foremost place in the councils of the Church. Everybody is discussing our theological schools —sometimes foolishly, sometimes with wisdom. But the hopeful fact is that people are discussing and are trying to get the facts. And now the question of secondary education is coming to the fore. Dr. Gardner suggests the right temper in which to attack the problem. What we need is the assembling of facts so that the Church as a whole may know the nature and magnitude of the problem with which we propose to deal.

We venture to say that the facts when we have them will inform us whether our method of dealing with our secondary schools has been such as to encourage the schoolmaster. Without schoolmasters we cannot, of course, have great schools. But we shall never have schoolmasters unless their vocation is seriously regarded by public opinion within the Church, and an environment provided in which the right kind of men and women can function with freedom and efficiency. It remains for the Church to inspire them with a sense of the dignity of the work which they are doing.

The Music-Hall Mind

WE borrow the phrase from The New Statesman. One is frequently given to marvel these days at the capacity of some people for detachment from all the passionate and disturbing interest in the stern theme upon which the heart and brain of the world is focused at the hour. These people are living from hand to mouth, spiritually speaking. They utter a flippant protest if you mention food conservation; they don't like to knit and they won't roll bandages; they won't try to digest war rolls and bread and they let the other fellow save for liberty bonds. They know that Serbia is starving, French orphans holding out hands to them, and Poland a desert of misery, but they chat and smile and look as young and happy as they did in the fat and careless days before August, 1914.

These people have the music-hall mind. They never know despair till they get sick or lose their money; they never go to church except to get a minister to bury or marry them; they don't worry about social inequalities and wrongs or "national ideals" so long as their withers are unwrung. They fill their days with domestic satisfactions and civilization furnishes them with sufficient diversions to keep the attention from wandering into the zone where the soul is joggled by harsh questions.

No one except people in their own class envies these people, but we marvel at them. And incidentally they teach us a very solemn truth in Christianity. As we watch them, we realize that the Cross must forever remain the evidence that the Christ is living in the world. Somebody must always be willing to die for these people. They are a spiritual liability; never an asset. They borrow everything they use, country, home, nursery tales of chivalry for their children, the bestowals of science, art and learning. Somebody else sweats blood, spends and is spent, worries, dreams dreams, and hangs upon a cross—just to save the world from sinking into the slough of the people who have no cross to worry them. Verily they have their reward.

Our Reserves

IT is better to suffer from nerves for having felt too deeply than not to feel at all; but it is an unfortunate disposal of gifts that one part of the race worries too much and the other part altogether too little. It is evident among us that people are beginning to feel the strain of continuous anxiety and passionate sympathy as regards the war. We can think or talk of but little else. As some one put it, we seem to be under the tension of the home where the family are anxiously counting the passing hours while one of its members is battling with some exhausting disease and trying to hold out until the crisis is past.

This is wasteful, and it is well perhaps to remind ourselves that it indicates a poor disposition of our spiritual forces. We need to bring up our reserves. Never before has there been laid upon the clergy so heavy a responsibility as that which they are carrying now. It is their privilege to help their people to look at life as Nietzsche put it "with the unmoved eye and look of eternity". No message from the pulpit is a Christian message these days that does not steady the heart. We do not mean that the preacher should aim merely to be soothing. No honest soul wants that. But we all want help in keeping ever in mind the truth that Christ has not withdrawn from the battle line of the ages. Germany is clever and she is wicked, but she is not clever enough or wicked enough to conquer five hundred millions of souls if in penitence they will ask the Christ to teach them the way of kindness and the way of freedom. Never fear! Calvary stands for both a method and a promise—the saving method of atonement and the sure promise of victory. When we utter desperate words we have lost for a little time the perspective of faith.

Keeping our spiritual balance is partly a matter also of discipline. It depends upon how we have deployed our forces. People have frequently marveled at the poise of the President. Never apparently has his conduct indicated that things were getting on his nerves. We suspect that this is partly due to his daily regime. In times of stress and grave anxiety he can be found daily on the golf links and in the evening at the theatre. We should all do well to insist upon a variety of interests. It is not well to talk exclusively of the war. To do so is to waste our reserves. It may incidentally be remarked that the people who have given up Church work to devote all their time to war work are making a mistake. An hour at the Woman's Auxiliary might steady our feverish thoughts. Religion has in its keeping reserves of strength which can enable us to carry on the fight with courage and the good cheer of faith.

Dr. Jowett

DR. JOWETT'S return to England marks the end of another distinguished ministry at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church in the City of New York. Sunday after Sunday attendants at service in the famous old church could always count during Dr. Jowett's pastorate upon hearing evangelical Christianity preached in simplicity and with power. His ministry in America has extended over a period when there was a heavy strain upon the pulpit to yield to many diversions from preaching the Gospel of Christ. A man of his gifts might have taken to the forum and become, between Sundays, a popular lecturer; he might have been diverted into the tempting role of the great administrator or he could easily have devoted himself to the fascinating work of preaching a futurist gospel to the intellectuals. He chose none of these tasks for his calling. He preached week by week the power of the Cross to save.

The wide influence of Dr. Jowett's ministry is largely due, aside from his fine ability, to his willingness to be a specialist. He conserved his forces for the vocation of prophet. He felt that he was called to preach the Gospel. He was determined to be preacher and pastor and nothing more. The Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church is a highly organized institution. It has its multiform activities like other rich metropolitan churches; but its organization has been so effected as to spare the leader for the free exercise of his spiritual leadership. This can hardly be said of all the great churches of New York and other American cities. The clergy themselves are to blame for this lack of precision in definition of the ministry. Dr. Jowett knew that there were thousands of people hungry for religion, waiting week by week for the evangel. He so ordered his life that, whatever else might be neglected, he had prepared himself to preach the Gospel to his people.

The people of New York have grown accustomed to seeing the pastor of the Fifth Avenue church walking on a week-day morning in the park, his thoughts preoccupied with the theme of his Sunday morning sermon. How he contrived to evade the pressure of the age which has gradually been transforming the rectors of our great parishes into business administrators, it is difficult to say. But we know that his narrowing of the ministry to its legitimate specialization has paid. No other pulpit in New York has, perhaps, wielded an influence comparable to his. He carries back to England not only the gratitude of the people of his own Communion but of thousands of Christians of other churches who from time to time have heard from his lips the Gospel of good news.

THE WEEK

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

Now

DURING the anxious days while we have been watching the British front in Flanders a new spirit has been sweeping over America. No one seeing the set faces of men and women who are scanning the war bulletins can mistake this fact. We feel it as we hear people talking about the war and it is discernible even in the guarded utterances of editorials in the daily press. America is determined to do her part and to do it now. The problem upon which to set our teeth is not whether somebody blundered in the past or whether all might have been different had we begun sooner to set our house in order. Bitter things are being said about that; but where one sees an increasingly united American sentiment is in the determination to put officials on the job who are equal to the task. Mr. Schwab's appointment answers that demand and the anxious public breathed a sigh of relief when the appointment was announced. It will breathe another sigh of relief when it learns that some other departments are similarly manned.

The nature of the foe against which we are pitted and the crisis which we are facing have, while the word "Waterloo" is being freely spoken in England, penetrated at last the American brain. We now see that the hour has come when our most pressing duty is not to discuss peace but to fight, and to fight with every ounce of brain and muscle we possess. The facts were before us three years ago. Now we have opened our eyes to them. We can be thankful for that. People are saying "if only it is not too late". It is not too late to win, but it is too late to win by any half-hearted consecration or sacrifice. We can't waste time as we have wasted it in the past getting convinced that it takes trained soldiers to fight modern battles and it takes multitudes of them. We can't waste months or even days in waiting for inefficient people to learn their jobs when there are able men at hand to render effective and quick service.

There is a look of determination on men's faces which shows that the American people no longer will tolerate postponements of preparedness. The President has a united, willing people behind him. They want him to know that there is no sacrifice which he can ask in the interest of victory which they are unwilling to make. We believe that the people of America would uncomplainingly submit to as drastic a curtailment of luxury and even necessaries as the German people endured when, one month after the declaration of war, every private automobile and bicycle was swept from the streets of Germany. We think that the process of educating American sentiment is about complete. The administration can now trust the people to order their lives according to military necessities. It is now or never.

Elephants and Things

MR. GERARD stated at a meeting in New York a short time ago that Germany raised her great war funds without street-speaking or elaborate advertisement. In contrast to this we are witnessing in our American cities the most elaborate and spectacular campaign for the Third Liberty Loan that has ever been employed in the behalf of any cause. Processions of camels and elephants parade Fifth Avenue in New York, boys and girls by the thousand solicit subscriptions on the streets, booths for the selling of bonds are everywhere; men and women are speaking through megaphones to the passing crowds; and vaudeville stars and stage favorites are devoting their charm and cleverness to the gigantic task of getting America to lend its money to the Government for the protection of our country, our honor and our homes against the world foe.

Why is it necessary to go to such lengths to persuade loyal citizens to part with their money? The answer is that we want a big over-subscription and we want every man, woman and child to contribute. It is an adequate and satisfying answer. But we wonder whether the people who hesitate to buy bonds, who require so persistent and elaborate a campaign to awaken their interest, realize the alternative which we face at present. If Germany wins, she will not send a pleasing circus parade of elephants with gorgeous trappings mounted by dazzling ladies up and down the streets of our great cities to collect the indemnity. She will demand at the point of the sword or rather the mouth of the cannon every dollar we have. She will strip us to the bone. It is no tender modest enemy that we have undertaken to fight. The war is thousands of miles away, but war can travel fast these days.

The moral is "don't wait for the vaudeville star to solicit your money, or processions of elephants and camels to show you that your money is needed. Buy a Liberty Bond and buy it now".

Now for the Smoker

IF the powers of darkness think that they are going to be let alone after all "the wets" become dry, they are mistaken. The smoker is in for a season of exposure and publicity. A small cloud the size of a large man's hand is visible just over the horizon. The Anti-Cigarette League its astride the cloud. Some of the more carnally-minded among us had hoped for a little breathing space, where what vices were left upon our hands might enjoy immunity from attack. We had done our bit in conceding one after another our major vices to the reformer, now he threatens to take our smoke away. There is to be no quarter for any venial weakness. The average smoker wonders whether longevity and a fattened bank account offered in return for his cigar will be a delightsome thing.

But the anti-smoke campaigners are crusaders of light in so far as they propose to let us know what our smoke bill is in money and blood pressure. This we ought to know. Many who have arduously acquired the taste may resolve to start life without the smoker's handicap. This much must be conceded by even the most stand-pat of immoralists—smokers are frequently a public nuisance; men carry smelly, lighted cigars into public conveyances; they give one last puff as they enter a crowded elevator; they befoul the air of our cars and even the sidewalks and seem to have no compunction about it; doctors and clergymen enter sick-rooms with stale fumes about their clothes. The smoker must begin to set his house in order if he wishes to retain his innocent and soothing vice.

The Russian Church

DURING the chaotic months which drag on in the Russian situation some of us anxiously ask, What of the Russian Church? In the English Challenge there is appearing an admirable series of papers by Madame Tvegintsov. The editor of the Challenge sums up the situation as follows:

While the Church had been to a great extent the spiritual home of the peasants, it had been entirely out of touch with the working classes of the great towns. Among them Western ideas of progress were current, indeed many observers noticed with alarm—alarm which the event has justified—the capacity of the Russian mind to take up Western notions without criticism. The Bolshevists represent the working classes of the great towns, but not in any very great degree the peasants of the rural districts. It was inevitable, in view of the long history of alienation, that the Bolshevists should set themselves against the Church. Now the Government of the day has despoiled the Church of its property, and the Patriarch has answered with cross-examination. There is war between the Church and the Government. This, as we have said, is natural, but none the less regrettable. If the Church had been capable of rising to a position in which, without taking sides as between political parties, it was able to stand as the moral guide of the people, it would almost inevitably before very long have regained its position of influence, to the great benefit of the nation. That way perhaps is still not entirely closed to it, but, as far as the scanty information allows us to see, the Church has followed the more natural, but more disastrous, course of taking sides definitely against the Bolshevists. That being so the future is all uncertain. The working classes of the towns who are at the moment in power are opposed to the Church. The peasantry are probably still attached to it; but not too much should be built upon this fact. The religion of the peasant in Russia, though genuine and profound, has been also a matter of tradition and habit. It has not risen to the level of a deliberate apprehension of truth when presented as an alternative to other possible views of life. A religion which is merely accepted from tradition is never very powerful in controlling passions. Consequently, we cannot be surprised to know that there is even among the peasantry a strong anti-religious movement.

The U. S. School Garden Army

SIX million school children enlisted in the United States School Garden Army—that is the prediction. Already in the South and in California, where the Winter has really gone for good, and it is possible to muster the young recruits and arm them with spade and hoe, thousands of boys and girls are wearing the green ribbon and the badge of the army and working hard in their school gardens. In Texas each school garden means at least $25, a total increase of two and a half millions in the garden food supply of the State. The organizers of the army are traveling from State to State recruiting by means of parades and pageants. Cardinal Gibbons has issued a call to the parochial schools of the Roman church. Everywhere the children are showing a fine enthusiasm.

It is to be hoped that the older folk will show a similar zeal. England plans the greatest crops in her history. "The Larder depends on the Gardener" is an English slogan that every individual with a square foot of arable land should take to heart. The failures of 1917 will spell the successes of 1918. There must be no second year slump. The only part most of those over here can have in the gigantic struggle over there is to conserve food and buy Liberty Bonds. It is perfectly possible for thousands of families who have heretofore been consumers to be producers of sufficient food to stock their own pantry shelves and fill their own barrels with corn meal.

Bishop Montgomery's Resignation

THERE are some English bishops who are no more than a name to Americans; others, though known by their writings, are nevertheless very hazy personalities to us. But Bishop Montgomery since the 1916 convention has become a vivid and definite part of our conception of the English church. His work we have always known; we have followed his episcopate of twelve years in Tasmania and since 1901 his admirable administration of the S.P.G. We have read his books and his frequent articles in the English missionary papers. Then two years ago he himself visited the United States as a member of the official delegation sent by the English church to General Convention. The dynamic of his personality made itself felt here as it has in every other part of the Anglican Communion. We found (to quote an English editorial writer) that "the Bishop is something more than an organizer, that he is an inspirational force, a statesman of real genius, with a rich gift of imagination". So we are able to share in the dismay felt by our trans-Atlantic fellow Churchmen at Bishop Montgomery's resignation from the administrative headship of the venerable Society.

The Next Red Cross Drive

ONE hundred million dollars to be raised between May 20 and 27 is the task the Red Cross has set before us as the next thing to be done when the Third Liberty Loan has been subscribed. Of course we shall put our shoulders to the wheel. There is no question that whatever the Red Cross asks it must receive. In an investigation which the social service secretary in one of our Eastern dioceses was recently interested to make, it was found that in no case had the Red Cross failed to provide everything possible for the needs and comfort of the men stationed within its borders. Reports from the Front assure us that the Red Cross has proved 100 per cent. efficient.

Governor McCall on Lynching

THE present Governor of Massachusetts has again spoken solemnly and with force on one of our national disgraces:

"Let us bear one thing in mind, that lawlessness at home and lynchings, the threats to boycott a language or a literature, do not express the great mood in which a great nation should express itself in a war like this. The atrocity in western Illinois the other day was no more an outrage upon the victim of it than it was upon the American people. The brutality of lynching does not at all surpass its cowardice. Nothing more contemptibly cowardly can be imagined than for a crowd of armed men to seize a single unarmed man and put him to death. If such cowardice could be regarded as distinctive of a nation, no amount of heroism on the part of its soldiers in the field could make atonement for it.

"There has been quite too much talk in our politics, even before the war, of hanging people to lamp-posts. The spirit of lawlessness has received an impulse from men who should be the leaders and teachers of the people. The first duty upon us, after supporting to the utmost our soldiers and our allies, is sternly to repress those barbarous exhibitions of lawlessness."

The Mystery of Atonement

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

IN these days it is frequently said that the Christian doctrine of Atonement has ceased to have any meaning for the ordinary man, that it baffles and irritates him if he thinks about it at all, and that it has no real bearing upon the facts of life as we encounter them day by day. Never was a greater mistake. If there were no gospel of Atonement we should have to find one; human nature cries out for it; we might dispense with almost any other article of the Christian faith but this—in fact the Christian faith pivots upon it. Stripped of its theological dress, the insistent spiritual need which is met by the atoning work of Christ is apparent to everyone and needs no explaining. We all know it only too well, and whether the gospel that is preached as a remedy for it be true or not, there is no other gospel which even professes to be able to satisfy the demand thus created.

The law of measure for measure, of cause and effect, operates with no less exactitude in the moral than in the physical sphere, though less obviously so. Men delude themselves that there may be some way of getting round it, but they have only to interrogate the experience of past and present to know that nothing could be more futile. No man ever breaks a law of nature; it breaks him if he tries. With a precision that knows no exceptions effect follows cause on the plane of the outer world; measure for measure is dealt out; action and reaction are equal and opposite. Is it reasonable to suppose that it is otherwise in the realm of moral and spiritual because the final issues are hidden from us? No, indeed; the divine order will be vindicated at the cost of the transgressor, long though it be before the full results of evil-doing work themselves out. Every sin carries its punishment wrapped up within itself; every infraction of the laws of God produces its appropriate penalty in the soul of him who makes it, and therefore ultimately in his lot, whether in this world or in that which is to come.

The mills of God grind slowly, but they grind exceeding small;
Though with patience stands He waiting, with exactness grinds He all.

Let it be granted that this does not always seem to be the case. The wicked flourish like a green bay tree—up to a point. It is marvelous how long an evil-doer may continue to prosper; for years and years circumstances may even appear to aid him, events conspire to baffle and defeat all efforts for his overthrow. He becomes bolder, more arrogant, more confident, more impious—and then one day the blow falls. And, just as previously everything that happened seemed to favor him, now everything works for his discomfiture. Any close observer of human affairs will testify to the frequency with which the judgments of God at length overtake the impenitent even in this world. And the same might be said of the fate of nations. Cynical Germany is profiting at the present hour, or to all appearances being permitted to do so; she prospers by her iniquities and cruelties; "many there be that say, Who will show us any good?" We can afford to wait. God has not finished with the Kaiser yet. Moral processes do not complete themselves within the horizons of our temporal vision; the final adjustments are made in the great beyond and filter through into the workaday world. Things right themselves even on earth, given time enough; and souls pass on, to what we do not yet know, bat, judging by all natural analogies, we may be perfectly sure than in the supernatural it is to reap as they have sown. Wickedness is wrought on earth, crimes are perpetrated daily upon the weak and helpless that cry to high heaven for vengeance, and God remains silent. But there is something awful about that silence. It is not the silence of indifference or inaction. There is a judgment that ever proceeds and which nothing escapes.

It is the thought of this which is so terrible to a sensitive conscience. The feeling may not be exactly fear though it would be folly to say that no fear is intermixed with it; it is the consciousness of the inexorableness of law in relation to the things of the soul as to those of the flesh which overpowers us; we remain bound fast to the sequences of our deeds; we cannot shake off responsibility for them, the law grinds on but it never grinds out. Drop a stone into a pond and the ripples it will create will go on widening until they are arrested by the banks and equilibrium is restored. But there are no banks to the infinite; there is no stopping-place for the sequences of an evil past. Set a train of mischief going, and long after it is beyond your ken, let alone beyond your power to atone for it, it will be bearing bitter fruit. Superficial indeed, as well as presumptuous is the claim that a man should be prepared to bear the consequences of his own misdoing. How could he? The consequences of his most trivial act or thought are endless.

But the appalling prospect thus created, if once it is fairly faced, demands some relief, and there is no more urgent demand associated with contrition. We want the seemingly impossible; want the entail of sin to be severed, the handwriting of the ordinances against us to be blotted out; we ask for nothing less than the canceling of the past, the supersession of the law of measure for measure by a divine amnesty, the transmutation of the products of our ill into eternal good. Our prayer is like that of the dying Arthur in the Idylls of the King:

I have lived my life, and that which I have done
May He within Himself make pure.

Now this is the very thing which is offered to us in Christ, and offered nowhere else and by no other means. Poor sin-bound humanity has always been craving for it and always trying to get it in one way and another, "but there is none other name under heaven, given among men whereby we must be saved". How the work is effected we do not know; it begins and ends in mystery; but in the beauty of holiness its results are evident for all the world to see.

Here then we have an amazing paradox. As man sees, there can be no such thing as forgiveness, no emancipation from the self-incurred penalty of the evil we have wrought. As God sees, they who are in Christ are as though they had never sinned at all; they are not under law but under Grace. "He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him".

Sectarianism In Yourself

YOU should not look for sectarianism in those sects which you condemn. No doubt you will find it there and will condemn it whole-heartedly. It is more important to look for it in yourself, and in those with whom you habitually act. You will find it when you adopt some facile rule for distinguishing tares and wheat. You will find it when you employ some convenient standard set by the fashion of the day, for determining what is catholic or orthodox, enlightened or liberal. Your standard may be a part of the truth of God, but you can isolate it into a falsehood. Perhaps nowhere can you stumble more easily into sectarianism than in the search after unity. For sectarian unity, the unity of those who pronounce a shibboleth in exactly the same way, is the easiest thing in the world to achieve. In despair of achieving a larger unity according to the will of God—which is one of the hardest of tasks—you may fall back on that easy course, and lapse into a contentment that is death. Beware of agreements. Agreement to differ is the worst kind; but agreement on selected articles may be a worse danger. It is a substitute for the unity of the Body of Christ; and it is a substitute that satisfies.—From "Unity and Schism" by the Rev. T. A. Lacey, M.A. (The Bishop Paddock Lectures for 1917.)

Shall The Church School Be Encouraged?

By THE REV. WILLIAM E. GARDNER, D.D.

FORTY-FIVE schools for boys and sixty-seven schools for girls have been listed by the General Board as claiming the right to be called "Church Schools".

All of these are in some degree under the control and influence of those interested in the Church. Some are privately owned by one or more individuals and conducted in accordance with a policy defined by the individual. Some are leased schools; boards of trustees, confronted with the difficulty of securing heads and faculties, lease the property for a term of years to individuals. Some schools are conducted by a board of trustees, the majority of whom are Churchmen, and some are responsible to the diocese, the property being owned by the diocese and the trustees elected by the Diocesan Convention.

There are over ten thousand boys and girls in these Church schools. Has the Church any responsibility toward these schools? Should they be looked upon as occupying a distinct and important place in the educational life of the Church?

In answer to this question the General Board has two convictions. The first is that the Church should welcome the existence of these schools and expect from them graduates whose imaginations have been kindled by the best in religious history, and whose Church loyalty has been challenged and won because they have seen the needs of the world for the best in Christian civilization.

The second conviction grows out of the first: if the Church looks to the schools for a product, she owes to the schools not only interest in their well-being, but a responsible co-operation in their methods, an accrediting to some degree of their teachers, and assistance in their finances.

These convictions are based on at least five conditions that are evident.

1. There will always be parents who prize highly the Christian education of their children in the parish church and who will want that education completed under the influence of Church schools and Church colleges. Dr. DeKoven's contention in 1866 that "Christian training differs from all other training in this one respect—that it believes in an implanted supernatural life which can and must be developed", and that the development of this life must depend upon Church institutions still holds good.

2. There will always be parents, either within or without the Church, who will clearly formulate their desires for the education of their children in terms of body, mind and spirit. To such parents the Church school will always make its appeal.

3. The remark that "there is an increasing number of parents who distrust the public schools" has no reliable foundation, but it is true that we are meeting many who believe in the theory of the public schools but who dislike to trust their children to the public schools because of local conditions.

4. There will always be home conditions which will make advisable the sending of the child to a boarding school. These arise frequently from domestic difficulties and more frequently from a city environment which does not provide the right atmosphere, both mental and physical, for certain types of children.

5. Church schools will always have a field because of the age-long conviction that early adolescence is the time for the influences that arise from a dominating personality. It is the age of hero worship. To find a worthy schoolmaster or schoolmistress for our boys and girls is a desire that will increase rather than decrease.

These motives are back of the success of the Church school; they make permanent certain successful schools and they command for these schools the interest of influential boards of trustees and the gifts of annual subscriptions and large sums for equipment.

It would seem that a unit of the Church's educational life containing 10,000 students resting on strong motives, and backed to a degree by a considerable, though inadequate, financial support, deserved the best consideration of the Church. But there is lacking both among the schools and in the Church at large any commonly held conviction on the purpose and value of Church schools and any plan for the maintenance of their standards or their support.

One headmaster of a very popular school expresses his dissatisfaction with the failure of his own school to maintain any standard in the teaching of religion.

He has written to me as follows: "This is an age in which everybody is dissatisfied with everything. Among these things with us is the teaching of religion. People may have fancied that we are dissatisfied with our system, but we are not. We ought to have a thorough overhauling of our curriculum and sacred studies. Do you think you could come up and do us a service in these ways?"

Probably all the school heads would speak as emphatically. Every Church school wants to do more than prepare pupils to meet the college entrance examination; but the extent to which the school will teach morals and religion will be largely determined by the public opinion of the Church.

Another problem is the right number and location of schools. This is being discussed most earnestly in our Western dioceses. Bishops Beecher, Burleson, Funsten, Page, McElwain and others have each called for the consideration of the Church school as a provincial responsibility. They suggest that a competent committee should inform itself by expert service, concerning the conditions of Church schools, and develop plans whereby secondary education within the province might be treated as a whole and the province organized to back it.

Bishop Burleson, although he has the beginning of a fund with which to create a boys' school, plans to co-operate with Bishop Beecher of Western Nebraska and make Kearney Military Academy the boys' school for South Dakota.

The problem of securing teachers is growing more and more difficult. There are some teachers who are. Churchmen and Churchwomen at the present moment in secular work, who would be glad of an opportunity to teach in Church schools. Loyalty to the Church and spiritual ideals in education cause them to be dissatisfied with the limitations and the atmosphere of secular work. There are also effective teachers in our Church schools who deserve advancement, but who will not go into the market for it. This lack of unified knowledge about the teachers not only discourages teachers, but stands in the way of the Church school's securing the best teacher for any particular vacancy.

The financial problem is interesting to the educator because it has been demonstrated that where a school is properly equipped and properly advertised and managed it can be self-supporting, only appealing to its patrons from time to time for new equipment. This makes the current financial problem of the Church schools centre around the proper commendation of the school to the public.

These are some of the problems of the Church preparatory school as viewed by the General Board. In the face of these problems its position is definite. It believes that the Church should expect a helpful product from the Church school and therefore the Church as a whole should encourage and stand back of the Church school.

The General Board has no hard and fast system of education to promote. It believes that the process of Christian education demanded by the Church and the Nation is rapidly taking shape. In this process the Church school has a very important function.

As a Church, we must provide for those Church parents who wish their children to come under Church influences throughout their entire life.

As a Church, we must recognize a responsibility to the State and to secular education; and must commend to the teachers and leaders who guide the educational processes of the Nation, those spiritual forces which we believe essential to the highest moral development of men and women in a democracy.

As a Church, we must support the Church school because of its missionary possibilities. Every Southern bishop will tell us of Sunday schools organized and parishes instituted because of the loyalty of some graduate of St. Mary's School, Raleigh. The same results have come from all our schools.

As a Church, we must encourage Church schools because of the need of Church institutions where we may begin early to train our future leaders. With the calls for an increase in the ministry, for lay workers in religious education and social service, we should inspire large numbers of our adolescents in the early days of their education by those direct influences that can be so effectively given in a Church preparatory school.

The General Board believes that religious education depends more on men and women than on systems. If the Church is to seize the special opportunity offered by the Church schools, the General Board must have a man who will specialize on secondary education as Dr. Bradner specializes on parochial and Mr. Micou on collegiate education.

The Board is now appealing for the salary of this man. With Western Church schools closing because of the war, and Eastern Church schools raising special funds to meet deficits, the encouraging of our Church schools becomes a war-time education measure. The Baptist laymen have just raised $175,000 for the support of some of their boarding schools. Cannot the Church provide a few thousand dollars for the unification of this work?

The secretary of the Department of Secondary Education would begin his work by assembling the facts about our Church schools. He would try to make clear to the whole Church, and especially to the provinces in which certain schools are located, the values of the schools, their conspicuous products and their future possibilities, as well as their needs. By the help of faculties he could hold conferences when standards of studies, sacred and secular, could be discussed and recommended. He would keep a list of available teachers and help those secular teachers who wish to enter Church school work.

Such a man would ultimately become a source of information and suggestion, to which bishops, provincial committees, trustees, and faculties would turn with expectation; such a man would commend schools to parents who are seeking the particular school for their children; he would also be sought by patrons who desire to give endowments to Church education.

The encouragement of the Church school as helpful to the Church's life can be shown by assisting the General Board to provide a secretary who will define to the schools the expectation of the Church and help them to unite in meeting that expectation.

The Kent Plan

By THE REV. F. H. SILL, O. H. C.

SOME five years ago I received an invitation from the business manager of one of our leading Church periodicals to advertise the Kent School in its columns. The solicitor pointed out the fact that the Episcopal Church was the Church of the well-to-do. In support of this I was told that the rector of a Philadelphia suburban parish had counted nearly fifty limousines rolling away from the porte cochère of his stately stone church on a previous Sunday morning. This was an illustration of the clientele of the Church, the kind of people who read its periodicals. To put Kent before such people would bring applications from "the most desirable class". I explained that this was just the class I was studiously avoiding, not because I did not appreciate the many wonderful characters produced from among the privileged classes in society, but because I felt that the boys of that class were the only boys for whom the Church was making any provision in its boarding schools.

I shall not attempt in this article to justify the existence of boarding schools or to describe in detail the opportunities they offer. I am personally grateful for the privilege of being at the head of a family of one hundred and fifty boys, and to be given the opportunity to assist in training them in every department of life. There can be no doubt as to the prestige of the schools which are known as Church schools. Here in New England the Church is justly proud of St. Paul's, St. Mark's, Groton and schools of that type.

I desire, however, to point out in this article the fact that we are terribly one-sided in our work in secondary education in our boarding schools for boys. I should say that the number of such schools under the care of the Church in New England is fourteen, carrying a student body of 1,470. There are but two of this number with a tuition fee of less than $850 and most of them charge a flat $1,000, not to mention the extra expenses which amount to from $200 to $500. It stands to reason that if it costs from $1,000 to $1,500 to educate a boy and to meet his expenses for but a scant nine months of the year few but boys of the privileged class can take the opportunity offered. There are very few scholarships available in these schools and even then it is a question whether it is wise for a boy of limited means to cast in his lot with the sons of wealthy parents.

I have been in school work now for twelve years and what I say in this article I can prove from personal experience, and if anyone wishes to verify the facts presented the files and accounts and everything, in fact, a Kent School are open to inspection.

The Church is not willing to support in any wholehearted way the schools which strive to bring the opportunity within the reach of boys of moderate means. God only knows what a struggle it has been to build up this plant here. I doubt if I should have the courage to go through a similar experience. I feel sorry for the men I know who are struggling to maintain such schools as this and I can well understand why so many have failed. I wish I could publish some of the letters I have received from men in the Church with fortunes at their command. Most of the funds I have raised for this $175,000 plant have come as a result of a most persistent series of appeals through correspondence. I cannot stand up in pulpits and make appeals for this work on the ground that it is a charitable venture for the unfortunate. There is little element of pathos in this work but it presents a tremendous opportunity and I have tried to lay the facts before the men of the Church. Friends outside the Church, old college mates, good women, and some few men whose names appear on every subscription list have given generous support. The fact that the Order of the Holy Cross has been back of the work has been a great help. Mr. ————, a prominent High Church layman, has his secretary write: "Mr. ———— requests me to state that your proposition does not interest him and your request for a contribution is respectfully declined with thanks." A very broad-minded Baptist, on the other hand, writes: "An Episcopal institution such as you describe does not come within the scope of my philanthropical activities." The Very Rev. Dr. ———— is consulted by a delegate to the General Convention and writes a long dissertation on the folly of attempting to conduct a first-class school on a $400 per boy basis. "Let such boys go to the public schools." A president of a Church club says that the only way to establish such a school is to cater to the wishes of some one benefactor and call the school after said gentleman. Meanwhile, I have seen Churchmen contributing $500,000 dormitories and $150,000 gym nasiums to secular institutions of learning. Just because ve have managed to squeeze out of several tight places nany conclude that we have a large endowment fund, vhereas we have just about $50 a year income from endowment. Others say that wealth flows to us from our monastery on the Hudson, whereas my brethren over here feel the pinch of poverty much more joyfully than ve do.

I am not writing all this as an appeal, for we are naking no appeal at present, but simply as an illustration of the encouragement the laymen give a man who is rying to extend the privilege they crave for their own sons to some who cannot pay the same fee they pay. I have letters on my desk now from two men who are going through my experience and I cannot encourage hem to look for much help from the big men of the Church. Boys of the privileged class must get the first chance.

I can prove that there is a very great demand for a school with a moderate fee, providing, of course, the school is proving its ability to maintain a good scholastic standing. Appeals come from all over the country, especially from people interested in educating boys in their particular parishes. I am ashamed when I think of the number of applications I have to refuse, not that I want to make this school any larger at present, but because I have but three or four other Church schools to suggest. They are frequently at too great a distance from the applicant to make attendance possible. I suppose I know his one fact as to the demand for a school under Church influence with a moderate fee more intimately than anyone else in the Church at the present time, and not a day goes by that does not call for a letter which practically says, "the Church has nothing to offer you for your boy". This is especially heartrending in connection with requests from the clergy for their own sons, or for boys in their parishes who give evidence of a vocation to the priesthood.

This lack of encouragement does not spring from any particular attitude as far as Churchmanship is concerned. Some of our most loyal benefactors have been communicants of parishes quite opposed to what the O. H. C. stands for. A brother priest of mine, a Low Churchman, in a Southern diocese has had the same experience that has come to me. My readers would be surprised to see the names of some of the men who write me in behalf of boys applying for admission.

I can also prove that it is not necessary to charge $1,000 a year for a boy. We can meet running expenses here at Kent at less than an average of $500 a year. That has been one of the most interesting features in a way of this work. As I say above, anyone is at liberty to come and examine our books. They will find that we pay our eleven masters adequate salaries. We have no man at less than $1,200 a year and we give some $2,000 a year. In addition to this the men receive board, lodging and laundry and, in the case of married men, house and subsistence for their families. How do we manage? Well, first of all, I should mention what we call our self-help system. The boys consider it a privilege to share in every possible way in the work of maintaining the daily life of the place; they wash the dishes, make the beds, do all the cleaning of class rooms, corridors, etc. They care for the furnaces and manage to do a good deal of work around the place. They unload the coal from the cars and put it in the bins. There is nothing they can do which they are not perfectly willing to do. They conduct their own assemblies and study halls and are so responsible for the discipline of the place that, with the exception of one man in the dormitory for younger boys, no master has any duties outside of the class room. I can show anyone what I show the boys themselves that they are saving the management about $125 a year per boy.

The life of the place goes along with the spirit of self-help. We have very simple buildings. We have absolutely no waste space. Our overhead charges are reduced to a minimum. Of course, I could write several columns on the advantages to the boys of this system of self-help, combined with simplicity of life. There is real educational value in it. There is developed a joy of fellowship in labor. Snobbery cannot flourish in such an atmosphere. We think we get an exhibit of real social democracy, with a Christian background.

It may seem that I am directing attention to Kent in this article. That is really not my purpose. What I want to do is to see the experiment tried elsewhere. I wish all of our Church schools might combine in an effort to reduce their fees. It can be done if the boys are trusted sufficiently to be of service. It ought to be possible at least to prevent further increase in fees by turning to the boys' productive power. It is a wonderful thing for a boy to know that his labor is a real asset. It makes him feel a fellowship with the great class of industrial workers.

Each diocese ought to have a Church school with a moderate fee. Churchmen ought to endow such schools as are already existent. I mean the struggling schools. Please do not think me envious, but I do wonder at times why it is necessary to endow schools which with their earning power through large fees ought really to be declaring big dividends, but that seems to be the way with those who are interested in Christian education. Churchmen ought to support schools for Church boys before handing over their surplus wealth to institutions of learning where the creeds of the Church are being discounted. Yet how frequently the last will and testament of some communicant of the Church puts princely sums at the disposal of godless boards of trustees.

I do not want anyone to worry overmuch about us up here at Kent, for we can see daylight ahead, but there are other Church schools with noble purposes which are really in distress. Information as to which ones I mean can undoubtedly be procured from the General Board of Religious Education. This distress is especially acute in these days when our Church institutions find their customary benefactors beset with appeals to help war charities, and when it is doubly hard to ask for objects close at hand.

Doors

By ARTHUR KETCHUM

THERE are as many doors in the world
As stars in the sky,
Doors of oak dark with age
On heavy iron hinges,
Bronze doors with visions of Heaven and Hell
Graven upon them,
(All doors lead to Heaven and Hell
For someone, sometime——).
Doors with white carven cornices
And fanlights with a gilt eagle,
Doors past pillars at the end of porticos,
Doors only for Priests or Kings,
Frivolous doors, green, little windowed,
Curtained with gay colors,
Great doors of glass, grilled or frosted
With filmy laces.
Battered doors of the poor, sagging
On weary hinges,
Sinister doors that open and shut furtively,
Iron doors that close never to open,
Doors past number or imagining.
But there was only one door in the world
That was mine,
A little door, mottled with shadow
And shifting sunlight,
A little door, different from every other;
I opened it and you entered.

Need Church Schools Fail?

By THE RT. REV. HERMAN PAGE, D.D.

WHEN I came to Spokane as bishop I found here three Church schools which had been in existence for nearly a generation, Brunot Hall for girls and Houston School for boys in Spokane, and St. Paul's School for girls, Walla Walla. These schools were ably managed and had done notable work. All possessed considerable property coupled in every case with debts which threatened disaster. After more than two years of bitter struggle on my part Brunot Hall and Houston both had to close. St. Paul's, Walla Walla, for the present is thriving, having a large number of students; but it still has a heavy debt. The problems connected with these schools have led me to a careful consideration of the whole subject of Church schools.

The first question to be answered was whether the day when these schools were needed had not gone by. The answer which I reached was distinctly—no. In spite of our splendid public school system there are those who prefer the private school for various reasons. In some cases the parents want to give their children a distinctly religious education. The substance of the answer, however, is that private schools will always be needed wherever there is a problem connected with the home. When a mother dies the problem in the family is not one of geography or arithmetic but of home influences. If a father is much away from home his boys often require the discipline best obtained from a man. There are problems that arise because of neighbors' children or from environment which make private schools greatly needed for many boys and girls. While a great majority of our children must and will attend the public schools, the need for private schools is a large and growing one.

A cursory study of the situation would seem to make it evident that the genius of our Church is peculiarly adapted to the conducting of secondary schools. They have achieved a high reputation throughout the country. One has only to mention St. Paul's, Groton, St. Mark's, Shattuck and the Episcopal High School of Virginia for boys, and St. Agnes' School, Albany; St. Margaret's, Waterbury, and Kemper Hall for girls, as types of Church schools scattered all over the country. Not many years ago it was looked upon as the duty of almost every missionary bishop to found Church schools.

I am sure that the experience of every clergyman has been like my own. In St. Paul's, Chicago, among the best of my laity were former students of Racine College and Kemper Hall. I remember well how one year I presented for confirmation two girls trained at St. Mary's, Knoxville. Afterwards I presented for confirmation their sister, their brother, their father and their mother. The Church has today no more earnest and loyal helpers than the members of this family. I am sure this story is more or less typical. These schools have offered the Church a great opportunity and they have been for her a singular source of strength.

Until I became bishop I had no conception of the relation of the Church as a whole to these schools; but it did not take me long to learn that in any definite systematic way it had no relation whatever.

My first problems were those of administration. Almost at once I was confronted with the problem of selecting a principal. To my immense amazement I found that there was no place in the Church to which I could turn for help. The officials of the Board of Missions had practically no experience and could give no advice. The same was true of the Board of Religious Education. When it came to such important matters as the standardizing of education, costs, tuition charges, etc., not a bit of help could I get from any individual or group that was in any sense competent to give it. The same condition held true on the financial side. I was astonished to find that the Board of Missions gave no assistance whatever to these schools in the Domestic Field, although some assistance came through the Woman's Auxiliary and some small appropriations were made toward new buildings. In most cases but little help can be obtained from graduates so the sole financial burden is placed upon the individual bishop.

Everyone who has had experience with education knows that in the long run it is always more or less dependent on charity. The richest and strongest Eastern schools which charge the highest tuition fees are constantly asking for money. A secondary school if well equipped may pay its way for a short time, but whenever new buildings or equipment are needed it is necessary to look for donations from charitably disposed people. This support is quite as essential in secondary schools as in colleges, although in a far less degree.

It is also clear that schools which are entirely dependent on bishops, and especially missionary bishops who have many other heavy financial responsibilities, cannot hope to maintain standards unless the Church as a whole is prepared to formulate some school policy and stand behind it. Because of the lack of such policy there has been no real co-ordination and no consistent support for these schools; and the story is for a large part that of one wreck after another. In past years many good schools have been closed. Figures recently presented at a meeting of the Board of Religious Education show that the Church has nearly 120 schools, that fifteen have been closed within the past year and that next year more are likely to be closed. This process will go steadily on unless something is done and done quickly!

There are thousands of boys and girls in these schools. It is safe to say that if the schools were ably administered with the whole Church behind them they could double their usefulness in a short time. Here is a work for which we are peculiarly adapted which would enable us to give the best sort of religious training to thousands of boys and girls who will be the future leaders in this country.

For the past generation colleges and universities have caught the imagination of those interested in education but there are not wanting signs that many of our keenest thinkers are coming to realize that the most important period in a child's life is when he is in the secondary school. At this period many of the most far-reaching decisions of life are made. At this time the bent of character is often determined.

There is only one way to deal with this situation. My own analysis of it may be wrong, but one thing is clear—while the Church has been and still is peculiarly strong in this field, she is losing ground rapidly. It is surely all important that we bestir ourselves to learn the facts. If the secondary school system in the Church is to be saved and developed it is high time that we set to work. If it ought to die it surely would be well to find this out and shorten the period of agony for many institutions. There would seem to be one proper way to handle this situation, namely—that proposed by the General Board of Religious Education—to secure some thoroughly competent man and let him proceed at once to study the school situation with the advice and help of a proper committee of the board. If it seems inadvisable to push the work of the schools then the Church and her educators will know what to do. If they should be supported then surely this secretary to the Board will develop a wise co-ordinated plan which will enable us to bring these schools to the highest efficiency and command for them a support worthy of the task. Personally, I believe these schools offer the Church one of her greatest opportunities. If she does not seize it soon it may be too late.

Four Great Schoolmasters

JAMES DEKOVEN, D.D. (1831-1879), became Professor at Nashotah House on the 15th of September, 1854. In his diary on the same day he wrote: "My Parish School opened today. Thank God! May He bless it and make it succeed." This reveals the teaching spirit of the man. The School was at Delafield, five miles from Nashotah. He could not find happiness in teaching Christian Theology unless he also taught children Christian Faith.

Dr. DeKoven was born in 1831. As a student in the seminary he gathered "uncouth ragamuffins" in the long room on Sunday afternoon. From this school at least one boy later applied for Holy Orders.

After graduating from the seminary he accepted a position of teacher in Nashotah House. Incessant and exhausting toil filled his Nashotah days for, besides his teaching, he gave part of every day to his school at Delafield, often walking five miles back and forth through snowstorms and without regular meals.

In 1859 he was elected Warden of Racine College and here he remained until his death in 1879. Calls from Trinity Parish, New York, and St. Mark's, Philadelphia, could not draw him away from his beloved Racine. All who came under his influence felt his indomitable Christian courage and his glorification of the teaching office. That Racine College should have withstood the test of the time and is today a Preparatory School and a Junior College is due to the gift of life and fortune of Dr. DeKoven.

HENRY AUGUSTUS COIT, D.D. (1830-1895), was born in Wilmington, Delaware, in 1830. After a brief course at the University of Pennsylvania he accepted the position of Assistant Professor at St. James' College, Maryland. Later he assumed charge of a large parish school in Lancaster, Pennsylvania, and in 1856 became the first Rector of St. Paul's School, Concord.

Dr. Coit began his work under unique conditions. Only three boys were in attendance at the School. He was practically told: "You have possession of lands and buildings, but we cannot promise you a salary and you must derive your support from the fees of the scholars". When he died in 1895 his three boys had increased to three hundred.

He is pictured as dominating and vitalizing the life of the School. "His alert intuitions that penetrated the most callous nature: his insight into motive; his fanatical clarity, his probes to vanity, utter routing of the forward and bumptious, his irony, sometimes cruel, for the self-complacent and pragmatic; his aggressive challenge to laxity, gentle self-revelation to the over-shy and reticent, compelling sympathy, sustaining hand to the weak, appreciation of ability and talent with cautionary signals; and beyond all, a pervasive atmosphere of life lived in an empyrean, well above the sordid and 'terre a terre'."

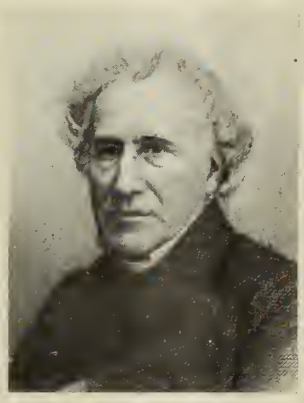
Bishop Doane averred that Dr. Coit had laid the deepest foundations and built the best superstructures that have been laid or built for the Christian training of boys.

WILLIAM AUGUSTUS MUHLENBERG (1798-1874) made his contribution to the work of both public and Church preparatory schools, and though he passed in his time for a dreamer and a prophet, the practical power of his influence is acknowledged today.

Dr. Muhlenberg was educated at the Philadelphia Academy and Pennsylvania University. His boyish journal is filled with references to religious thoughts and occupations. In days when theological seminaries were unknown he was ordained deacon and became assistant and chaplain to Bishop White of Pennsylvania.

His first parish was Lancaster, where under his leadership a public school building was erected costing $10,000.

Next at Flushing, Long Island, he set about the creation of the school known as St. Paul's College at College Point, which at one time had nine professors and five instructors in a temporary building. After eight years of unselfish devotion he received the call to establish the Free Church of the Holy Communion in New York City and turned to parochial activity which ultimately yielded the first free church, St. Luke's Hospital and the social experiment of St. Johnsland.



Dr. Muhlenberg served two purposes: he awakened a general interest in parochial education, and by an experiment pointed others to the true method and aim. It was at College Point that Dr. Coit found the educational ideals of personal influence, contact and example, and also the resolution to be strict in intellectual culture that religion should never be held to account for inferior scholarship.

ALBERT SMEDES, D.D. (1810-1877), was for thirty-five years Rector of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, North Carolina. It was said of him: "He was one of the best educational gifts of the North to the South".

Dr. Smedes was born in New York in 1810. While preparing for Law at Columbia he turned to the Ministry, and later entered the General Theological Seminary. After serving the Church in New York City and Schenectady, because of the severity of the climate, he accepted the invitation of Bishop Ives of North Carolina to open a Church School for girls in Raleigh. Here he remained until his death in 1877.

His unusual executive ability made the school a success. With an innate knowledge of human nature he chose skilled assistants, and with their aid the school graduated hundreds of young women whose influence was felt in the South.

As Rector of the school, Dr. Smedes was kind, wise, generous, just, acknowledging merit, pitying weakness, and demanding faithfulness in teachers and pupils.

In 1889 Bishop Garrett of North Texas wrote: "I find all over my Diocese the beginnings of Sunday schools and churches, the work of St. Mary's women, and I am determined to establish a Church School for girls as the best means of building up my Diocese."

Dr. Smedes was, indeed, another of those pioneer teachers who laid the sure foundations for the great system of schools for which the Church can always be grateful.

The Knight of the Labyrinth

By FLORENCE CONVERSE

VII

Thereafter, within a while came Sir Hugh to a garden gate; and when he had lifted the latch, lo, a garden! the fairest that ever he saw, with rose-trees higher than his head, and lilies in borders numberless as the white hosts of heaven; and he might not leave the pebbled path lest he tread on the violets. Moreover there were wallflowers in the garden, and gillyflowers, and mignonette, and all manner of herbs, mint and lavender. "Would that my lady were by my side in this fragrant place!" quoth Sir Hugh Lepenseur.

And it befel as he strayed up and down, a-breathing that incense of flowers, that he was come to an arbor all overhung with climbing roses, and in the arbor a pale youth that shredded rose petals into a porcelain bowl, and mingled spices therewith; and ever and anon he would dip his hands deep into the bowl and stir that sweetness, the while his face was bent to the bowl's brim.

Then said Sir Hugh, "Prythee, Sir Squire, art thou of those that are on quest?"

And the youth made answer, the while his fingers dripped rose petals, "Are we not all on quest?"

But Sir Hugh asked him yet again, saying, "Art thou living wight, or phantom of this labyrinth?"

"Nay", said the youth, "I am flesh and blood, I make no doubt; yet am I a thing of ether also and insubstantial as any other fragrance".

Then Sir Hugh bethought him as how perchance this was one of those that had lost his wits, and he pitied him. And drawing nigh unto the rose bowl he dipped his fingers therein and questioned him of that sweet medley, and he said, "Is this a medicine thou makest for to cure the King's daughter of her infirmity, fair youth?"

But the squire made answer languidly, "An it cure the King's daughter, it may; but for mine own delight I make it, and none other".

Then spake Sir Hugh and admonished him, saying "Alack, good youth, is this to be on quest?"

And the youth laughed. And immediately Sir Hugh was aware of a noisome odour in that place, as it were sour swill, and the rotting of dead matter. And he cried out, "Methinks the labyrinth is ill-drained; or haply they that are set to cleanse it do not their duty, the old king being dead. Come away out of this garden, sweet youth, thou art poison-pale".

"Go thou, an thou wilt", quoth the youth then. "There be many that come and go again, but the garden pleaseth me well".

"Nay, but the evil stench, the foul smell, dear lad, canst smell it?"

"Yea," the pale boy answered him, "of a truth I do smell it. I like the smell."

Then did Sir Hugh clap hand to nose and departed out of the garden as swiftly as ever he might. But thereafter as he was a-walking up and down amid that maze, he wept to think on the lone youth in the garden.

VIII

Now whether had sped one day only, or three days, or seven, the while Sir Hugh Lepenseur went up and down in the labyrinth, him knew not, but right well was he ware that he was anhungered and would eat. And about this time he came to the end of an alleyway where was a closed door, and over the door the carven image of that poor prodigal the which did fill his belly with husks, and to the right and the left, over the arch of the door, were carven swine. And Sir Hugh opened the door, and behold, a great hall of a castle!—As huge and as high it was as the hall of the Round Table at Camelot, and here also was a table, but not round. Long it was,—so long that it stretched from the one end of the great hall to the other, and many folk dined thereat. And the hall was full of pages and servitors running hither and yon and bearing platters and flagons of all manner of meats and wines.

Now when they that were set down to table saw Sir Hugh Lepenseur stand by the door they called out to him right heartily, "Come hither, Sir Knight, come up hither! And there was made a place for him above the salt. For there stood midway of the board a saltcellar after the fashion of those days. But this saltcellar was costlier by far than that one King Arthur had, or King Mark of Cornwall, or any other that Sir Hugh had yet seen. As tall was it as the image of the Black Virgin in the Cathedral of Chartres, howsoever it was the image of a lady that walked on a wave of the sea. Some said it was the enchantress Venus, but others said it was the Lady of the Lake that was fostermother to Sir Launcelot. Howbeit, the image was of silver, richly chased, and the hollow of the trough of the wave was filled with salt. And above this saltcellar sat the great folk, as the fashion was in those days; but the lesser folk sat below. But Sir Hugh, for that he was Knight of the Table Round and godson of King Arthur, was bid above the salt.

Rightso came servingmen with a wild boar's head and pages with tankards and flagons to set before Sir Hugh, the which did eat and drink, but nothing over much. Then said one that sat at meat with him, "Sir, 'tis plain to see thou wilt never die of a surfeit."

"Marry, God forefend!" quoth Sir Hugh. "We that are of the fellowship of the Table Round do make better end, I trow." And to them that beset him with capons and pasties and pomegranates and sweetmeats from Constantinople, he made answer, "It is enough", and again, "I prythee bring me a basin and a napkin to wash my hands". Nevertheless, he was ware that for the most part the guests spared not to eat and drink. Or there was did gorge upon pasties of venison, and when he had come to the bottom of the dish and licked his fingers, immediately there was set a full dish in its stead. And one there was that went around and about the table dipping his fingers into this platter and that bowl, and munching, and anon spewing his food on the floor. And there was yet another sat still in his place and called for all the cates and viands ever were cooked in king's palace, howbeit, when they were set before him, one after other he did but nibble daintily and bade take away. And there were more than half a score fell under the table drunk with wine, the while Sir Hugh abode in the place.

Then said that one that spake Sir Hugh fair in the beginning, to wit, that he should not die of a surfeit,—"I prythee, sir, pass the salt". But when that Sir Hugh had dipped out of the saltcellar with his dagger that other, tasting, said, "Call you this salt?" When upon all they that were nigh dipped in their daggers, and when they had tasted they cried out, "It hath lost its savor!" And many fell to weeping. But he that spake Sir Hugh caught hold of the saltcellar by the damsel head of the silver image, and fell to belaboring the page therewith, that all the salt was spilt out on the floor, and more than one servingman fled howling with a bloody pate. But Sir Hugh got him forth from that mêlée with what haste he might, and when he was come again in the gray byways he gave God thanks, "For that I can keep my body under and am not tempted of the flesh as weaker men be". And he went on his way right well content.

The Temple

THE stately temple upon Mount Moriah,
Whose fame about the earth once wide was blown,
Where trod the holy feet of the Messiah,
Is toppled stone from stone.

Its porches, colonnades, its altars gilded,
Are now no more than are the shifting sands;
Not so the sacred temple that He builded,
The House not made with hands!

Church Schools and Democracy

By THE RT. REV. HUGH LATIMER BURLESON, D.D.

ARE your secondary Church schools rendering a real and important service in the development of that democracy for which the allied nations of the world are making such tremendous sacrifices?

This may seem to some a strange, and not a very pertinent question. "Church schools," they would say, "are Church schools; useful of course in their way; desirable, no doubt; but hardly a factor in the upbuilding of democracy."

I would not be understood to claim that their contribution to democracy is the first and most vital claim which these schools have upon the interest and support of the Church; but if it could be shown that they have, as a matter of fact, aided materially in upbuilding those ideals which are now seen to be the only stable foundations of life and character, might we not hope that languid acceptance and perfunctory endorsement of these schools might be transformed into earnest approval and cordial support?

It would seem to be taken for granted by many that the truest democracy must of necessity be found in our public schools, where the children of the plowman and of the plutocrat are supposed to consort together in a beautiful brotherhood. I should doubt whether it so works out in fact. Admirable as is our public school system, association does not involve assimilation; and it may be reasonably doubted whether the contacts of the public school are always those which make for democracy. The influence of the school cannot reach far enough into the personal and home life of the children to do thorough work in democratization.

At any rate, I claim for our secondary schools an opportunity and an influence wider and deeper than that of the public school; not only because it is continuous and compelling upon the plastic lives whose days—as well as whose lessons—it orders, but because it freely makes use of the religious motive and appeal which, as all thinking men increasingly recognize, must underlie any safe and stable democracy.

For democracy is something more than a form of government; it is a habit of mind, a way of looking at life. It is essentially a Christian product, and we cannot profess it or propagate it without taking upon our lips the declarations of the Gospel. It has no better sanctions than any other theory of government, unless it rest upon those great ideals which began to dawn upon the world when the first Great Democrat swept out the carpenter shop in Nazareth, and laid away His tools in order, and went out to redeem a world.

We are all familiar with Gladstone's famous dictum that the victories on the battlefields of England were first won on the cricket fields of Eton and Harrow, Oxford and Cambridge. And have we not reason to believe that training for leadership in democracy, of an immensely valuable sort, is given in our Church schools, where patriotism and religion go hand in hand? Personally, I am convinced that this is true. And if there be isolated instances of failure; if anywhere there be a Church school which unwittingly ministers to class distinction and social snobbery, the cure lies not in discarding Church schools, but in correcting and perfecting this splendid instrument for the creation of leaders in the great cause to which an embattled world has pledged itself.

It may seem to some that I speak with a favorable prejudice. I freely admit that I am a product of Church schools, that I was a teacher in Church schools, and that I am now president of three Church schools; but as such I want to testify that I have known no finer democracy, no more generous loyalty, no worthier leadership than that which has been born and nourished, and is now being inculcated in these institutions of the Church.

It may be possible some day to prove this contention. It would be interesting to know what record is being made, and will be made, by the boys and girls whom the Church has trained. I feel certain that it is more than a worthy one. I believe the words will be true of them which Winifred M. Letts wrote in her wonderful poem The Spires of Oxford:

They left the peaceful river,
The cricket field and quad,
The shaven lawns of Oxford
To seek a bloody sod;
They gave their merry youth away
For country and for God.

God rest you, happy gentlemen,
Who laid your good lives down;
Who took the khaki and the gun
Instead of cap and gown;
God bring you to a fairer place
Than even Oxford town.

What Happened to Two Schools

WHEN our missionaries in the foreign mission field succeed in establishing a boys' school that so commends itself to the people of the city that boys are sent in to it from a radius of many miles; when the number of those boys increases year by year so that the school buildings become inadequate and the students spill over into a neighboring house; when the graduates of that school are known in their parishes as sources of strength and help to their pastors; and when a not inconsiderable number of these young men pass through college into professional schools and the seminary—that boys' school is the subject of lantern lectures and illustrated articles in the Spirit of Missions, it is called one of the strategic outposts of the Church, and generous men and women delight to give of their time and wealth that it may be properly equipped and may continue to lay foundations on which to upbuild the Church in that land.

More than fifty years ago Trinity parish, New York City, founded a school in connection with Trinity chapel. For half a century boys from all over the city, from Brooklyn, and in recent years from suburban towns at some distance, found in that school the training and the inspiration which have made them strong powers for good in the city and the Church. The teachers on the school staff have been notable for the influence they have exercised over their pupils not only during their school years but afterwards. An instance of this is the fact that one of the teachers, a woman of the type that boys look up to with reverence, gratitude and affection, is at present writing regularly to thirty-five graduates of the school now members of the American Expeditionary Force in France.

Trinity parish maintained another school for boys in the schoolhouse behind old Trinity church down town. Several years ago it was disbanded and some of the boys entered the chapel school.

Under the late Rev. Joseph Peck Robinson, who had he lived would surely have been counted among the great schoolmasters of the American Church, and under the two clergymen who followed him, Trinity chapel school grew too large for its small buildings. The future seemed rosy. But the equipment was totally inadequate, and since the school was a free school and since Trinity Corporation is carrying very heavy financial responsibilities, it seemed best to the vestry to close it. This was done last Summer and the boys to their sorrow and to the dismay of their parents were disbanded. A few entered Trinity School (on West Ninety-second street); others were forced to enter public schools which for various reasons had always seemed inadvisable.

Thus ended the history of two of the most hopeful Church schools in the city of New York.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

GERMANY IS ENCOURAGING MORMON MISSIONARIES

Polygamous Living Among Kaiser's People Given Religious Sanction

LOUISVILLE, KENTUCKY.—The Rev. Jas. McGaw, General Field Secretary of the National Reform Association, in addressing the monthly meeting of the Louisville Ministerial Association recently, stated that "since the Mormon religion has now spread into eleven of the Western states, and twenty-two of these representatives have been members of the United States Senate, the time has come when the Americans should put an end to the corrupt living enforced by the religion".

He explained that thousands of the missionaries from the Mormon Church had been sent to Germany, where they are encouraging the German polygamous living, basing it on religious principles. He pointed out that Germany, in order to raise an army within twenty years that would be as large as the present army, has encouraged the birth of 3,000,000 since the beginning of the war outside of wedlock and that this has been sanctioned and advocated by high German officials.

Mr. McGaw further advocated that a law should be passed that the Bible should be read daily in the public school.

At the end of his address the Ministerial Association unanimously adopted the following resolutions, calling upon Congress for an amendment to the Constitution which would put an end to polygamy:

> Whereas, The sanctity of the marriage relation is the foundation of the stability of this Government;
> Whereas, The Central Powers of Europe are reported to be encouraging polygamy;
> Whereas, There is a propaganda in behalf of polygamy in the United States, and,
> Whereas, The report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to the United States Senate shows that the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, known as the Mormon Church, teaches polygamy as a divinely ordained system of marriage and that many of the ruling authorities of the Church live in polygamy;
> Therefore, We do respectfully urge upon the Congress the speedy adoption of the resolution to amend the Federal Constitution, as follows: "Article XVII. Polygamy and polygamous cohabitation shall not exist in the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction. Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation".

The meeting was presided over by the Very Rev. R. L. McCready, dean of Christ Church Cathedral, who is president of the association.

Jews and Christians to Federate

HUDSON, NEW YORK.—A movement has been initiated by the Men's League of Christ church parish here to federate the men's organizations of all the churches. A banquet was held on April 9 in the City Hall of the combined organizations of the churches, including the Jewish Synagogue, as follows: First Methodist Episcopal, Christ Episcopal, Emanuel Lutheran, Reformed, St. John's Lutheran, St. Mary's Roman Catholic, Universalist, A. M. E. Zion, Baptist, Anshe Ammes Synagogue, Presbyterian, St. John's M. E., All Saints Episcopal, Our Lady of Mt. Carmel.

Between 400 and 500 men sat down to supper. As was proper, while the character of the gathering was recognized by the speakers, the speaking took on a patriotic character. Indeed, the chief speaker, William B. Guthrie, LL. D., was chosen to speak upon the national situation. The invocation was made by the Presbyterian pastor and the benediction pronounced by the pastor of the Roman Catholic church.

As an incident, some of the churches which have had no regular men's organization are now forming them in place of the temporary ones effected in order to participate in this community gathering. No doubt some permanent association will grow out of this initial gathering.

ONKERS BUSINESS MEN RAISE $8,700 FOR CHURCH

ublicity Campaign Conducted by 50 Laymen Over-reaches Goal

How a committee of "live wires" made of men who plunge every day into the ick of the fight in the New York busi-ss world, and who in several important ses are not members of any church, put er a successful campaign for an $8,000 aster offering in St. Andrew's church, onkers, New York, and how their rector ot only had the joy of placing $8,500 on e altar on Easter, but is receiving more bscriptions so that the latest report was an fering of $8,700, is a story that should courage and stimulate the rector and ves-y of every parish in the country.

The important element in the story is is: that committee carried into their work r the Easter offering the publicity meth-ls that are used by the advertising depart-ents of every big concern, and that are aking the Liberty Loan and Y. M. C. A. d Red Cross and all the other organized lrives" the big successes that they are.

St. Andrew's is a church of 1,200 com-unicants. There is a small income which n be used for structural maintenance of e church buildings, but for all other pur-ses it depends on voluntary contributions. t. Andrew's needed to enlarge and repair ie organ; the heating plant was worn out ith twenty years' service, and was very asteful of coal; there was a debt of ,500; $1,500 more was needed for current xpenses. The vestry was discouraged with ie struggle. Current expenses could barely e met (witness the debt). There was no oney for the missionary apportionment. ne thousand six hundred and fifty dollars as the most that had ever been given in the aster offering. Eight thousand dollars was rgently needed this year.

ENTER SPECIAL COMMITTEE

Then entered the Special Committee on ie Easter Offering. The treasurer of the estry wrote them a letter with a summary f the needs of the parish. They had that tter printed, with one of their own, and nt to everybody in Yonkers interested in t. Andrew's. This circular was got up in ie most approved publicity style, with lenty of red ink and display type. It was eaded Attention! MEMBERS OF ST. AN-REW'S MEMORIAL CHURCH, and adorned at ie top with a red arrow that curved down ie page, forcing the man who received to read every word.

The statement of the parochial needs was ade plain without a possibility of misun-erstanding. With it was the welcome in-ormation that the treasurer of the parish as able to guarantee $2,000 from "certain ndividuals" provided the other $6,000 was aised by the rest of the parish. The old Bible rule of the tithes was recommended nd the letter closed with the statement hat "wars may come and wars may go, ut the Church and God must go on for ver".

This letter was followed by a second, the urden of which was: "It's YOUR Church, t's YOUR Parish, It's YOUR Rector, and It's OUR Duty to Give to Their Support".

"St. Andrew's has always been the peo-le's church and everyone is always welcome o benefit by its advantages whether they ontribute one cent or a thousand dollars", he letter said. "The MANY WHO CAN should give freely so as to average for those who would give if they could. St. Andrew's is a real institution, and its influence for good is felt throughout the length and breadth of our city. Within its walls we, who are a part of it, worship in peace and comfort. Here our friends and relatives are married; our children baptized and given a religious education; the poor and needy are cared for; the sick comforted and the dead buried. Our church gives us all this and more; and it is the greatest of all privileges for each and every one of us to be permitted to contribute to this great and worthy cause on Easter Day."

The letter closed with the encouraging statement that besides the $2,000 that was pledged on condition the rest of the $6,000 came in, another $2,000 was assured.

THE PERSONAL VISIT

The members of the committee followed the second letter with personal visits. Pledge cards were signed. Then came Easter and the great offering. Among the others were many volunteer subscriptions from those outside of the Episcopal Church, including several Romanists and Jews.

The reason these men rallied around the rector of St. Andrew's was because he was as much opposed to frog-pondism in town and parish as they themselves were. The response to that appeal for the Easter offering was in the nature of a vote of confidence not alone on the part of the church, but of the community. There were many volunteer subscriptions from men outside of the Episcopal Church. The rector of St. Andrew's has been active in some civic housecleaning which has been in progress in Yonkers. The present mayor was nominated by Mr. Brown after his address before the Civic Club which Mr. Brown had started at St. Andrew's. Judge Wadhams came up to St. Andrew's and helped fight for Thomas Mott Osborne against the Westchester crowd; George W. Perkins spoke at St. Andrew's while the senator from that district was trying to knife his appointment by the Governor; Governor Whitman himself spoke at a fine meeting on February 10 on the Federal amendment question, although feeling in Yonkers ran strong in the opposite direction. It has been a church militant program all through.

"A Personal Testimony"

At the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian church, New York, on Good Friday, the Rev. J. H. Jowett gave this message to the ministers of America:

I want to bear this testimony before the ministers of the United States as the time draws near for me to leave this pulpit. I know no diction, no ethics; I know nothing that radiates moral energy like the preaching of the Cross of Christ. The Cross unveils the holiness of God, the sacrificial love of God and the dynamic energy of God.

My heart is sad as I think of the condition of the world. I'm weary waiting for the reformation of mankind, but I confess before you that I know of no other place where we can find hope save in the dynamic reforming energy of the Cross.

Meditate at the Cross until it becomes meaningful to you. Preach the Cross until it becomes meaningful to others. It is the dynamic of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth.

REV. J. A. STANSFIELD SENT ABROAD BY N. Y. PARISH

Is Raising $2,000 for "General Pershing Hut" for Church Army

NEW YORK CITY—The Rev. J. Attwood Stansfield, known throughout the country as a missioner, is going to France to serve as priest and evangelist. His support and expenses are provided by Mrs. Miles Standish of New York, and he is to represent in some measure the Church of the Transfiguration, having been added to the clerical staff of that parish.

Mr. Stansfield has lately been requested by the Church Army of England to represent them in the United States and to lay before the Church the wonderful work of that organization and secure interest and contributions for it.

General Pershing has recently written a letter to Prebendary Carlile, the head of the Church Army, thanking them for what they have done for American soldiers while in England. It is proposed to raise $2,000 to purchase a hut to be known as the General Pershing hut, which will be a thank-offering for the Church Army's noble work for American soldiers.

Contributions may be sent to Rev. J. Attwood Stansfield, 281 Fourth avenue, New York, and will be forwarded.

TRAINING GIVEN VOLUNTEERS

Three-Weeks' Course Offered at Y. W. C. A. National Headquarters

NEW YORK CITY—Owing to the success of the first volunteer workers' training course, the Workers' Bureau of the National Board Young Women's Christian Association is offering further similar instruction.

The future courses open July 9, September 17, November 5, and, in 1919, February 4. They last about three and a half weeks. The fee is $10. This instruction is planned to train committee women, organizers and administrators, investigators, leaders in girls' clubs and patriotic leagues, teachers for leaders, speakers and would-be speakers, clerical workers and helpers and women who can do odd jobs, whether they intend to work in the Young Women's Christian Association or some other organization.

These courses will be given at the national headquarters and training school of the Y. W. C. A. at 600 Lexington avenue, New York City. It is hoped that many workers will be able to come to New York for this few weeks' instruction which will enable them to work so much more efficiently in their home towns.

Hankow Dorcas Society

HANKOW, CHINA.—A very interesting work is the Dorcas Society here at Boone. It was started to bring together the Chinese and foreign wives connected with the university. Meetings are held once a month at the home of either a foreign or Chinese member. They drink tea, study the Auxiliary lesson, with prayers and hymns, and decide on sewing to be done in the homes. Just now the members are making garments for Dr. James, to use in connection with her hospital when she returns.

CHURCH HAS LARGE PART IN SOCIAL WORK PLANS

National Conference Will Devote Much Time to Discussion

The National Conference of Social Work, formerly known as the National Conference of Charities and Correction, which meets from May 15 to 22 in Kansas City, Missouri, will give more of its time than ever before to the discussion of the relation of the Church to social work. An announcement from headquarters says:

"Will the Church stand by and see war wipe out, in the words of Edward T. Devine, 'the hard-earned program accomplished by decades of conscious organized effort to reduce poverty, disease and crime and to improve social conditions? Slowly, patiently, hopefully, through the years of peace', this mind tells us, 'by one infinitesimal gain after another, mankind has tried to diminish misery and increase well-being. We write our triumphs in the statute books and constitutions. War comes, such war as this in which we are engaged, and in a few months all seems lost. By all the tests of social welfare which we are accustomed to apply, western civilization in four years has plunged into a whirlpool of destruction which mocks at the ideals and efforts of the nineteenth—and as we thought—the twentieth century. The destruction and devastation which appalls us are but incidents in a stupendous evolution—most regrettable incidents in progress toward an end with which they seem incompatible. Somewhere and somehow there is—there must be—a reconciliation'.

"The conference sermon this year will be in the nature of a symposium on the relation of the Church to social work and the speakers will be of representative Protestant, Catholic and Jewish faiths.

"Never before has the Church borne such a vital relationship to the welfare of communities. Never before has there been such a program at a National Conference meeting bearing on this relationship. Church workers cannot afford to miss the opportunity for Church and welfare history will be made in these few days replete with virile measures. 'The subtle disorganization of family life, the emotionalism and unrest which affects young men and women, the noticeable increase in juvenile delinquency, the presence of new dangers to public health and vitality owing to inadequate food and fuel, the danger of lowered industrial standards, the undermining of family economic well-being through increase of prices beyond wages—all these tendencies must receive most alert and constant attention'. So says Robert A. Woods, president of the conference and head of South End House, Boston. Surely these are dangers that affect the Church, that the Church must feel and shall have to reckon with.

"The National Conference of Social Work is the one great nation-wide medium of exchange between individual social, health, prison, recreation, industrial, relief and other workers and between organizations and communities all over the United States and Canada interested in the 'how and why' of community well-being.

"To attend this conference is the aim and ambition in the life of nearly ever social worker in the United States. Said Robert A. Woods: "No national conference has ever before been so charged with the sense of actuality, so invested with fateful significance, so formed with singleness of purpose, so wrought together into a quickening scheme of thought, of faith, of practice.' Attend the conference. Write to the Secretary, William T. Cross, 315 Plymouth Court, Chicago, for the program and details of attendance."

CLASSES IN NAVIGATION HELD ON INSTITUTE ROOF

New York Seaman's Institute Prepares Men for Sea Service

New York City.—Seamen and landsmen are going to school these days. They are reading and listening to lectures with a serious intensity which promises well for our coming Merchant Marine.

In the navigation and marine engineering school on the enclosed roof of the Seaman's Church Institute there are 150 students working in its several departments.

The engineering courses under Institute control were begun on February 25, and the United States Shipping Board free classes in engineering on March 18.

On the same date preparatory courses for admission to Annapolis were started. This prepares students to take competitive examinations and may also be taught by correspondence. The only requirements are one year's service in the Navy of the United States and, naturally, all applicants must be under twenty-one years of age.

These examinations are held all over the world, questions being sent from the Naval Academy to the different supervisory examining boards; examination papers are then submitted to the Academy, where they are marked and listed in the order of merit.

Entrance to the Academy entitles a boy to the position of midshipman in the Navy, the educational advantages of a college, and an ensign's commission, in line of promotion.

Mr. Allison V. Armour, a member of the Board of Managers, who is tireless in his intelligent participation in the Institute work, has completely equipped the chart room of the school at a cost of $393.

The April Prayer League Leaflet

The April number of the Church Prayer League Leaflet contains special intercessions for the districts of Salina, North Texas, North Dakota, and Brazil and for the work among the Southern Highlanders, as well as for the reunion of Christendom. The League offers a plan which very few would have time to make out for themselves. It arranges in order all the missions of the Church and sets their immediate needs before the League members in due succession. In every number there are seven suggested subjects for prayer, and in regular rotation every missionary district comes into the list of such subjects.

BISHOP BRENT ASKS DIOCESE FOR INDEFINITE WAR LEAVE

Visits British Front, Where He Is Received With Enthusiasm

Bishop Brent has asked the Diocese of Western New York for indefinite leave of absence for war service. There seems to be strong likelihood of his continuing his work with the Y. M. C. A. in France for the period of the war. An interesting account of a visit he recently made to the British front appears in the Church Family Newspaper. It is written by one of the British chaplains, the Rev. B. G. O'Rorke, D. S. O.

"Bishop Brent, the newly-elected Bishop of Western New York, has recently paid a visit to the British troops in France", he writes. "From the headquarters of Bishop Gwynne, the Deputy Chaplain-General, he toured around certain portions of the B.E.F. lecturing and preaching. It is not easy to describe, and impossible to exaggerate, the good effect upon the entente cordiale between the two nations—Great Britain and America—which resulted from these tours. The Bishop, by virtue of his personal character and Canadian birth, is peculiarly fitted for such a mission as this. He felt himself charged with a message from his own country to ours, and both he and his message met with an enthusiastic reception wherever he went. His tall figure, gentle but virile personality, and his eloquent and stirring words will linger as a permanent inspiration in the memories of all who had the privilege of meeting him. It is in order to extend the range of his appeal that this account of his visit is written by one who accompanied him on one of his tours.

"The Bishop traveled in a twelve-cylinder car, the latest word in American cars. His entourage consisted of a chauffeur and a secretary. All three of them wore the uniform of the American Y. M. C. A. The tour which is about to be described was a week-end visit to the headquarters of the —— Corps. The first item on the Bishop's program was a celebration of the Holy Communion in a neat little hut, wooden, square, fitted up with blue altar hangings, and containing accommodation for about fifty. There were twelve communicants, including the corps commander, another general, and several of the rank and file. Bishop Brent celebrated.

"After breakfast the Bishop went on a round of visits to certain divisions in the neighborhood, preaching at their church parades. In the afternoon he delivered a lecture on 'America and the War' to a crowded audience of soldiers in a rest camp. He spoke from the platform of a large cinema hall. The Bishop explained why it was America entered the war. . . . It was simply and solely for freedom. . . . No summons from an ally had come to her. She had entered the war at the call of conscience. To win for herself and for the world liberty, that was her motive. The same ideal underlay all her previous wars. In the War of Independence America had fought not so much for independence as for freedom. It was a satisfaction to the Bishop to recall that a large portion of the foe against whom his country had fought in that war were not men of British blood, but mercenary Hessians.

"In the Civil War the motive again was liberty.

"So also the Spanish-American War was on behalf of the oppressed. The war in which America had now taken up arms was the fourth in her history. She had remained out of it as long as she could do so without losing her soul.

"The Bishop next proceeded to answer the question why America had not come in earlier.

"Finally, the Bishop asked the question, How had America come in? With all her heart and with both her hands. . . . The fight in which they were engaged was a fight for democracy. They must strive in their joint crusade not only to make the world safe for democracy, but to make democracy safe for the world.

"With this stirring appeal the Bishop brought his remarks to a close, after speaking for about an hour and a quarter. The chairman called for three cheers. The audience rose and accorded them lustily. The Bishop replied with a happy smile that when he returned to the American army he would tell the American soldiers that these cheers were for them."

This picture shows a detail of the new reredos for St. Thomas's church, New York City. One side of the reredos is devoted to American Churchmen, and the other to English Churchmen. On the American side, besides Bishops Seabury and White, who are shown in this detail, George Washington, Bishop Brooks and others will appear. The reredos is the fruit of much thought and careful planning and designing on the part of the architect, Mr. Goodhue. It will be carved in warm-colored, fine-grained sandstone from Wisconsin.

DEDICATION AT CAMP DIX

Inter-Church Headquarters Opened With Appropriate Ceremonies

WRIGHTSTOWN, NEW JERSEY.—At a union service in which several denominations participated, "Inter-Church Headquarters" at Camp Dix, here, was dedicated Sunday afternoon, April 14, at three o'clock. Music was furnished by one of the military bands from the camp and the program of speakers included General Scott, General Greene, Dr. Robert E. Speer, chairman of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches; President W. H. S. Demarest of Rutgers College; Dr. John F. Carson, chairman of the National Service Commission of the Presbyterian Church, U. S. A., and Mr. Joseph T. Alling, camp general secretary of the Y. M. C. A.

PLAIN SPEAKING ON EVIL THAT MENACES SOLDIERS

Dr. Grammer Rebukes Misleading Statements of Philadelphia Officials

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA—At a luncheon at the City Club recently there was a general discussion of the social evil in the city. This had been pointed out most clearly by the Fosdick report, and by charges made by the Secretary of the Navy. The city officials had practically denied the charges which stated that "Philadelphia was the worst city in the country and a very real peril to the soldiers and sailors".

The rector of St. Stephen's, the Rev. Dr. Grammer, was heard with much interest, especially because of his recent study of the conditions in other cities where enlisted men were wont to gather. He said:

"This city is a source of peril to our enlisted men, and we ministers have been so busy preaching of the forgiveness and mercy of God, we have not been busy enough with keeping the city clean for the man who is to fight for the nation. Despite the stories of a mistake here and there in the Fosdick report, it is in the main correct, and does not begin to reveal the real conditions. The Church must not exploit the present situation for denominational ends: I promise that my term as president will be used as no camouflage for such purpose.

"We must make this town safe for the enlisted man. I have sat in the Municipal Court, and I was struck with the extreme tenderness of heart of our Judge toward fallen women. The reason for this tenderheartedness would have been a mystery if one did not understand politics.

"It was a revelation in benignity to hear the Judge, after a physicians' report that recommended the sending of the woman to some institution, say, 'O, that place is no good; put her on probation'.

"In Norfolk they handled the vice situation properly. They drew up platoons of soldiers about the Negro districts, and they would not let a man through this cordon. We should have such a thing here. There are tasks in this city that you cannot handle by preaching in your pulpits and going around visiting your people. Evils cannot be cured by eloquence; and we want action, organization and hard work."

The last report on this condition is that a number of armed men from Camp Meade have been summoned to form such a guard in the city. The Government has sent an officer of Marines to take charge of the matter that the city authorities have so obviously neglected.

GIFTS AND MEMORIALS

Easter-tide at St. Thomas' church, Amenia Union, New York, was signalized by the first use of a memorial brass altar cross and brass vases presented by the members of St. James' church, Hyde Park-on-the-Hudson. The cross is a memorial to the late Rev. Dr. Ashton, archdeacon of Dutchess. The vases are a memorial to the Rev. Samuel Roosevelt Johnson, D. D., one-time professor of dogmatic theology in the General Theological Seminary, who died at Amenia Union in 1873. Both these former rectors of St. Thomas' church are buried in St. James' churchyard, Hyde Park.

LETTER FROM JERUSALEM TELLS GRAPHIC STORY

British Tommies, Unexpected, Eat Luncheon of Captive Americans

"Here is a copy of a letter which we received yesterday from Jerusalem, our first word from our friends in a year and a half, as our letters to them were returned unopened, and their last to us contained only part of one page", said a reader of THE CHURCHMAN a few days ago.

"The American Colony consists of a community, composed mostly of Americans, who have been living in Jerusalem for about 37 years. Their home is about a quarter of a mile outside the Jaffa Gate, and we first had the privilege of knowing them when we were so fortunate as to be quartered with them during an around-the-world trip. Our friendship has continued ever since, and the march of the British army on Jerusalem has been of more thrilling interest to us than any of the battlefields of Europe".

The letter follows:

Dear Tried Friends: Yours are the second letters we have received from America, and we, like you, had our last written letters returned to us.

You must have noticed a great sameness and monontony in our letters for we could not tell the condition of things here. So true is that not only as regards letter writing, but even our conversation and our thoughts, that now, when we are released, we find our vocabulary so circumscribed and our inability to express ourselves by writing so marked as a result of the restrictions under which we lived for so long.

We find also that our memory does not serve us as well as before; things that we are so familiar with have been expunged from our memory.

We have lived for over three years under a continuous tension, never knowing what we may be called upon for, never knowing whether we could possibly continue to exist, never knowing who would be the next to be arrested for exile or peremptory punishment. When night came we were grateful that we had been spared to one another for that day, and when morning came we were glad that this dark night had passed and left us unscattered. It is true the authorities have been sympathetic and considerate of us; that Jamel Pasha was kindly disposed to us and made us promises that we should be allowed to stay, even though the city was evacuated; that the late Turkish Governor was most kindly disposed towards us and entrusted us with their most vital interests to the envy of his own people.

But all these things might be changed in a moment, seeing it was a time of martial law, detectives, and of egotism rampant. Thank God, through it all He kept us unscathed. The city was to be evacuated, the public buildings were to be blown up, every mill in the city had dynamite placed in it, there were orders received for the exiling of class after class, the inhabitants were to be called upon to furnish food for the army, the cannon were to be placed in the houses and in the streets, and the city was to be defended to the bitter end; and, in spite of it all, the forty-first siege of Jerusalem was bloodless and brought about a peaceable capitulation, and all our fears, entertained for three years, of the woes and depredations to be committed by the defeated and retreating army, were without foundation; were not realized in the least.

When the German military power become predominant they did plan our disruption, they did requisition our goods, they did plan and decree the interning of our six American young men of military age—but the lunch prepared for their journey was eaten by the British Tommies who came in upon them unexpectedly and delivered us. We offered to nurse the wounded soldiers, and were given successively four hospitals; forty of our people spent day and night at this arduous work, not receiving even the bread they must eat, and it is a great satisfaction that we in their hour of need were able to repay some of the obligation we felt under to them for the asylum and protection the country had afforded us for 37 years. We have been asked to reorganize their soup kitchen when we had to close ours; now forty-five hundred come here daily to be fed. Although three of our people contracted the typhus through contact with the poor, thank God, all were brought safely through. We are all well and send you heartfelt greetings and gratitude for the interest you evince in our welfare.

With greetings to all friends.

Yours,

JACOB E. SPAFFORD.

NAVY CHURCH PENNANT ADOPTED FOR CHURCH USE

General War-Time Commission Publishes Instructions for Making Flags

NEW YORK.—In response to a widespread demand and in recognition of the national significance of religious services at this time, the General War-Time Commission of the Churches has, in agreement with the National Catholic War Council, selected a "Church Flag" which the churches may make use of as a symbol of their patriotic faith and zeal.

The standard form of the flag is the regulation church flag of the American Navy, a triangular white pennant with a blue Latin cross placed horizontally in the centre. It is the custom in the Navy to fly it during divine service just above the American flag and on the same staff. It is the only flag which may be so flown. The Commission has learned from the Government that there will be no objection to the use of the flag by the churches.

The simplicity of the flag makes accuracy in its proportions desirable. A good size for outdoor flying is three feet by eight feet nine inches. For churches which might desire to have the flag made locally the proportions are given. The pennant should be three times longer than it is wide. The proportions for the cross are: Long bar, same length as short edge of the flag; short bar, one-half of the long bar; thickness of both bars, one-third the length of the short bar; the long bar should project above the short crossbar by one-third the length of the latter. When mounted on the white triangular pennant, the short bar of the cross should be parallel to the short edge of the flag and one-third of the latter's length from it. The other form of the flag is a blue Latin cross on a white rectangular ground, the latter being one and one-half times as long as wide. The proportions for the cross are those given above. Both flags may be used for draping within the church, but only the triangular pennant should be flown from a vertical pole.

A circular giving a full description of the flags and their use, and quoting dealers' prices, may be had on application to the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City.

WAR HAS UNIFYING EFFECT ON YONKERS CHRISTIAN

Roman Catholics and Protestan Hold Common Meetings

YONKERS, NEW YORK—The unifying eff of the war upon the community of Yonk has been very marked. During the rece Knights of Columbus campaign Protesta and Roman Catholic laymen spoke side side in Roman Catholic churches and the request of the chairman of the ca paign committee, himself a Protestant, ma of the Protestant clergy spoke to their o people in behalf of the fund.

"This united backing of our soldier bo a very large percentage of whom, fro Yonkers, are Roman Catholics, has promot a degree of cordial understanding and tru and good will between Roman Catholic a Protestant patriots hitherto unknown this city, and today we are working heartiest unity in behalf of the Third Li erty Loan", said the Rev. Francis J. Brow rector of St. Andrew's church.

Last Thursday evening at St. Andrew Memorial church the first of a series proposed Liberty Loan meetings in the ci churches was held, with a very strong li of speakers, and among them the Rev. Ric ard Ormund Hughes, pastor of St. Deni Roman Catholic church, and Mr. Alfr W. McCann, the journalist who is a con municant of St. Denis' parish. The mee ing opened with processional hymn and brief service of war-time intercession whi Mr. Brown conducted, vested, as usu and the several speakers spoke from t chancel steps.

On last Monday evening Mr. Brown a dressed Father Hughes' people at a simil meeting in St. Denis', though probably what they call their "Auditorium".

Next Sunday afternoon Mr. McCan who is a brilliant and forceful speaker, to give an address at the Vesper service St. Andrew's.

"Certainly when these Roman Catho boys are giving their lives in behalf democracy and free institutions", said M Brown, "no suspicion of possible tyrann at the hands of their co-religionists ca rightly hold us apart or deny to them ou heartfelt gratitude and enthusiastic back ing".

Church Unity at the Front

ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA—Frederick S. Alli a graduate of Amherst College, who is service in France, writes concerning a vis of Bishop Israel to his part of the front

"The Bishop was very encouraging to m because of his liberality. He spoke of Communion service he had held the previou Sunday at which Bishop Williams, the Meth odist bishop, had assisted him; also of hav ing been invited by a Catholic chaplain t pronounce the benediction at a mass th Bishop attended".

AUL SHIMMON WRITES OF PATRIARCH HE SERVED

ar Shimun, Killed at Age of 31, Greatly Beloved

By Paul Shimmon,
Representative of the Late Patriarch

Binyanin Mar Shimun (Benjamin My rd Simon), the Patriarch of the Nes- rian Church, was the one-hundred and rty-eighth Catholicos of the East, and he is recognized as the civil head of the As- rians of Kurdistan and even in Persia. he manner of the death of this great urch prelate is still shrouded in mystery. he telegram received through the State partment on April 12 for the Armenian d Syrian Relief Committee tells all we ow of him.

The isolation of the Nestorian Assyrians probably the most tragic event in the story of this war.

A small nation, out of touch with the orld war, they were drawn into its vortex d engulfed by it. The Assyrians have paid e supreme sacrifice in the death of their triarch and very likely of their greater an power who were able to take arms ven to them by the Russians who now evi- ntly have retreated and left these Chris- ns to face the combined fanaticism of urks and Kurds and Persian Moslems. ar Shimun is the first church and civil ler to pay the supreme sacrifice in this ar.

We loved and almost adored our Patri- ch. He was only 31 years of age when met his fate and had been our chief ishop since 1913. He was educated, as is been the custom for ages, under the nds of special teachers, and also enjoyed e tutorship of the clergy of the Archbishop Canterbury's Mission.

Mar Shimun was a most affable man. here was something princely about him, nd yet he was thoroughly democratic. here being no hotels in the East, the triarchal house was the largest guest house Kurdistan. Surma Khanim, the charm- g sister of the Patriarch, presided over it l. She is also a Nazarite, as are the Nes- rian bishops in the East, who abstain from eat all their life. Usually a bishop is suc- eeded by one of his near relatives, who brought up from childhood with the hope f becoming his successor. We know noth- g yet of the safety and escape of his ccessor.

Two brothers of Mrs. Shimun have paid e sacrifice in this war. One, Hormuzd, as a student in Constantinople when the ar broke out. He was brought to Mosul, nd nothing has been heard of him since. nother brother, Eshia, died during their ight in 1915.

Then his people, after a great stand gainst the combined force of Turks and urds, were driven out of their mountain omes, and crossed to Persia, where they ere looked for by the American Commit- e for Armenian and Syrian Relief. The ussians made great use of the splendid ghters of the mountains. Their young en performed great deeds of valor and ven the Russian Cossacks were spellbound t their audacity and their tricks in climb- g the slopes of the mountains.

When the new order of things took lace in Russia it exposed all nationalities oncerned in a great plight. Rumania, erbia and Armenia were involved more than the nations in the West. The As- syrians numbered some 125,000 before the war. This is exclusive of the Jacobites and the Chaldeans, amounting to about 150,000. There is no doubt that the greater part of the 125,000 have been involved in the telegram referred to above, at least the part of them who are still left after the great toll of the past three years is taken into consideration.

Lady and General Azgapetian, Armenians connected for two years with the Russian Red Cross in Persia, who had seen much of Mar Shimun and of his sister, Surma, called the other day to express their great shock at the recent news. The General said:

"I found Mar Shimun a man of liberal ideas and high principles. He was naturally very anxious as to the future of his nation, but hoped that under the protection of the Russian army the remnants of their once great nation might yet be saved from extermination. . . . He was looked upon by his people not only as their Patriarch, but also as their king. And still he was a man of extremely gentle and unassuming ways, winning the hearts of all with whom he came in contact. He had a very high opinion of all the Americans with whom he had to deal and always spoke with gratitude of all the generous assistance that had been given his suffering people. . . . He always seemed to have a premonition that he would have to become a martyr".

His people in this country mourn him deeply, and in many places they have held special services, fasting all the day in his memory.

For all the courtesy that I have received on his behalf from the American people I wish to express my deep appreciation. A nation that is undertaking to carry on a great war has found time to give of its life and substance to rescue our people. Such nations cannot and will not die.

Three Among Many

I spent a month and more in Washington lately and talked with such distinguished Churchmen as Randolph McKim, Roland Cotton Smith, Macbride Sterrett, and George Williamson Smith, doctors in divinity all, and they agreed with me that THE CHURCHMAN, after somewhat of a lapse, is fast regaining its old-time vigor and interest, and assume that they don't mind my telling you so.

Yours faithfully,

G. MONROE ROYCE.

New York City, April 13, 1918.

Two Others

"I feel impelled, after having just finished reading a certain number of THE CHURCHMAN, to tell you how greatly I enjoy it. I have read THE CHURCHMAN with more or less regularity for twenty-odd years; but there have been few times when it has seemed so perfectly to fulfil the function of a Christian newspaper."

"May I be permitted to say that I now enjoy THE CHURCHMAN more than I have enjoyed any periodical since Dr. Fulton laid aside his battle-axe?"

A CHALLENGE TO LAYMEN FROM THE ST. ANDREW'S

Brotherhood Calls for Men to Work in the Great Camps

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.—"We are now fighting for all we have and are", said a representative of St. Andrew's Brotherhood the other day. "The issue is clear cut, there is to be no going back. Already there are some 75,000 Churchmen enlisted in the service and the demand is insistent that the Church care for them. To this end the War Commission of the Church is exerting all its power. The clergy have responded nobly to the call. The present challenge is to laymen.

"The Church's War Commission has entrusted the laymen's work among the men of the Army and Navy to the Army and Navy Council of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. The plan of the Council is to put one Resident Secretary in each of the large Army and Navy training camps. There are now more than thirty of these secretaries actively at work. But the need is for men and more men. There are still many camps where a Churchman secretary is urgently needed.

"Who will offer himself for this service? In its opportunity to serve God and country and men it is unparalleled! Middle-aged men and others who can work without salary are wanted. Men who will need a salary are just as badly wanted. It is not necessary that they be members of the Brotherhood; the application of any earnest Churchman will be gladly considered.

"This work in the camps does not duplicate the work of the Y. M. C. A. Its call is stronger to Churchmen than the other. It strikes deeper!

"The Church is challenging her strongest and biggest men to undertake in this war work the biggest task ever attempted by her laymen. Here is a most unusual opportunity to minister in a most effective way to young men away from home and facing strong temptations and also an unparalleled opportunity to render a most telling service both to Church and to country.

"Every strong Churchman enlisted in this work will be made stronger and more useful to the Church in the supremely important work to be done in the reconstruction period following the war".

The Challenge to Laymen is imperative. Those interested should communicate with Frederick S. Titsworth, Executive Secretary, Church House, Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania.

ORDINATION

On Tuesday in Easter Week in Christ church, Red Wing, Minnesota, Bishop McElwain advanced to the priesthood the Rev. B. N. Lovgren. The Bishop preached the sermon and the candidate was presented by the Rev. A. E. Knickerbocker. The Rev. Mr. Lovgren, who has been serving as acting chaplain at the Bumpkin Island Naval Training Station, Boston, returned to his work immediately after his ordination.

If your copy of The Churchman is late in arriving, wait two weeks before writing. We are doing all that we can to speed up deliveries.

Our Weekly News Letters

NEW YORK

The Cathedral League—The Hon. Franklin Roosevelt, assistant secretary of the Navy, and Dean Robbins are to be the speakers at the annual meeting of the Cathedral League on Saturday, May 4, at 3.30 p. m. in Synod House, Cathedral Close. Bishop Greer will preside, and after the annual reports and the election of officers the members of the league and their friends will hear from these two most interesting speakers. J. Lawrence Aspinwall has been president of the league since Mr. Robert Hone, president of the league since its foundation in 1902, resigned last Autumn.

Church Club Elections—Henry L. Hobart was elected president of the Church Club at the annual meeting on Wednesday night. Mr. Hobart succeeds Mr. William E. Curtis, who has been president since the death of Dr. E. R. L. Gould in 1916. The other officers elected were: Vice-presidents, Stephen Baker, William Jay Schieffelin and J. Greer Zachry; secretary, Francis Skiddy Marden; treasurer, Edward S. Pegram; trustees, class of 1921, George Gordon King, Alvin W. Krech, Samuel Thorne, Jr. Mr. Hobart has served three terms as trustee of the Church Club and has been chairman of the board of trustees each time. For a number of years he was chairman of the Committee on Admissions. After the business meeting, Miss Edith M. Hadley, president of the Girls' Friendly Society in the diocese, addressed the club on the work of the society

Another Memorial Service—On Sunday, April 21, memorial services were held in the Church of the Incarnation for Ensign Curtis Seaman Read, the son of Mrs. William A. Read, a parishioner of that church. Ensign Read was reported killed in the naval aviation service in France on February 26, but the report was contradicted, and it was a long time before the fact was verified.

At the Cathedral—Saturday, April 27, is the day of the children's service at the cathedral when the children and choirs of all the Sunday schools in the diocese gather to present their Lenten offerings for missions. The service is at 2:30 p. m. There are usually about one thousand vested singers in the procession, and the cathedral is filled with children. The speaker will be the Rev. Theodore R. Ludlow, missionary in Hong Kong, China. Two banners are presented, one to the school giving the largest total offering and one to the school with the largest per capita offering. If any school wins a banner three times in succession that banner is kept. Last year Calvary Sunday school won both banners. It is predicted that they will again win the banner for the largest total offering, and if they do it will be the third time, and they will have the satisfaction of owning the banner.

The preachers last Sunday at the cathedral were Dean Robbins in the morning and the Rev. R. T. Henshaw, rector of Christ church, Rye, in the afternoon.

Children's Mission—Fr. Huntington, O.H.C., and Fr. Tiedeman, O.H.C., have concluded a very successful children's mission at St. Anne's church in the Bronx.

MARGARETTA MILLER.

PHILADELPHIA

Sunday School Easter Offering Service—On Sunday, April 21, at Holy Trinity church all the Sunday schools of the diocese will hold a special service of presentation of their Easter offerings for Missions. The speaker will be the Rev. Dr. Tomkins, rector of the church. A banner is presented each year to the school which has the largest per capita offering. One school this year has doubled its offering by selling Thrift Stamps to the children every Sunday.

The Sunday School Superintendents to Meet—The eighth meeting of the Association of Sunday School Superintendents will be held at St. Peter's church, Germantown, on Thursday, the 25th. Supper will be served in the parish house, and later there will be a discussion on "How to Use the Bible". The special speaker will be Mr. David McConoughy, secretary of the Every-Member Plan of the Presbyterian Board of Missions.

United Offering Service—The fourteenth annual presentation of the United Offering of the Woman's Auxiliary of the diocese will be held on Thursday morning, April 25, at the Memorial church of St. Paul, Fifteenth and Porter Streets. The preacher will be the Rev. Joseph H. Earp, rector of the parish.

Parish Administration Club — Some twenty of the younger clergy have organized a Parish Administration Club to consider the better management of parish work. The next meeting will be held on Wednesday, the 24th, with the Rev. Mr. Booth at St. Luke's church in Kensington. After luncheon all present will discuss "Peter by the Fire". "He is Still Standing and Sitting" will be led by the Rev. G. J. Walenta of St. Simeon's church. "Peter's Opportunity Today" will be opened by the Rev. J. K. Moorehouse of Conshohocken. "Peter's Critics at Fault" is the title of a paper to be read by the Rev. H. L. Hannah of Holy Communion chapel.

Every-Member Canvass at Overbrook—The Rev. Robert Norwood of St. Paul's church, Overbrook, has set a very good example of courage and loyalty in undertaking an Every-Member canvass in the midst of the Liberty Loan drive. On Sunday, the 14th, a canvass of St. Paul's was begun for the meeting in pledges of the parish budget of $25,000.

Archdeacon Russell Addresses Women—Christ church, Germantown, was crowded on Wednesday night, the 17th, when Archdeacon Russell addressed the women of Germantown and Chestnut Hill. This was the seventh annual service of this section of the Auxiliary. The needs and the plans of the work among the colored people at St. Paul's school at Lawrenceville were well and appealingly set forth.

St. Stephen's Church and the Enlisted Men—St. Stephen's church has entertained about 12,000 enlisted men each month in the club that the parish has fitted up for their use. Recently the entrance of the man who brought the total count to 50,000 was marked by the presentation by the rector, Dr. Grammer, of a watch. Recently St. Stephen's placed its first gold star on the parish Service Flag. Jose Francis Covert was the first soldier fro the parish to lose his life while in t service of the country. Mr. Covert, w recently died in a naval base hospital France, was for some time organist of t Episcopal church at Selinsgrove.

The Diocesan Convention—The Conve tion has come and gone again—and in fine atmosphere of fellowship and hosp tality. This was due in considerab measure to the well carried out plans the standing committee and the Episc palian Club whereby delegates were ente tained in various Boston families and t Spring dinner of the Episcopalian Club h as its guests all the Convention delegat There was no partisan spirit in eviden and but few measures where there deve oped any sharp differences of opinion.

Women Delegates—The proposal to a mit women delegates to the Conventi when parishes chose to elect them carri the most popular interest of any action the Convention. It was debated at lengt The Rev. Frederick B. Allen led the affirm tive forces as chairman of the committ introducing the resolution. He was el quently supported by Dean Rousmanie Mr. William H. Lincoln, one of the Conve tion's venerable and well-loved figur urged the admission of women "not as question of expediency, but as a questi of justice". Prof. Joseph H. Beale of t Harvard Law School argued for the ado tion of the committee's resolution. T Rev. John W. Suter opposed the admissi of women. George S. Selfridge, Esq., to the same side of the question, urging t experience of the diocese of Californ where he said he was informed by Arc deacon Emery they had given up the a mission of women delegates in favor of "House of Churchwomen". The R David B. Matthews and the Rev. Simon Blunt, D.D., added their voices to the opp sition. The resolution was lost in the cle cal order 42 to 64.

"Taxation Without Representation"—proposal of the Rev. Malcolm Taylor chairman of the "Committee on Apportio ment for the General Board of Religio Education" to incorporate the dioces $1,800 apportionment in the official "Co vention Fund" each year met its chief opp sition in the feeling that the "Conventi Fund", being distributed as a tax on all t parishes with the penalty for nonpayme the forfeiture of representation in Co vention, should not be added to by apportionment over which the diocese h no control whatever—even by its deput in General Convention. The feeling seem also very strong that the smaller parish of the diocese had already sufficient di culty in meeting their Convention-tax wit out menacing their standing by any ad tion to their burden. The proposal w defeated decisively, with the understandi that the $1,800 would be paid by volunta apportionment on parishes and missio after the fashion of the missionary appo tionment. A committee was later appoint in accord with a suggestion of the Bish in his annual address, to "take up the wh subject of apportionments upon the dioc by the various commissions and organiz tions and correlate them in some syste ı Advance in Democracy—The first ps were taken—with no opposition what-r—whereby it will be possible next year to legislate that the missions of the dio-e may in the future have definite repre-ıtation in Convention, by sending one egate entitled to one-third of a vote, ere now they have no delegates and no e—except through their parish-priests, the clerical order.

ıe Elections—The annual elections re-ted as follows: Standing committee: e Rev. Messrs. John McGaw Foster, ederick W. Fitts, Charles E. Jackson and thur W. Moulton; Messrs. Joseph H. ale, William V. Kellen, Joseph Grafton not and Philip S. Parker.

Diocesan Board of Missions (to serve ee years): the Rev. Reginald H. Howe, D., and Mr. H. V. Hayes.

Cathedral Chapter (to serve three years): e Rev. Philo W. Sprague and Mr. Hunt-gton Saville.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod: the v. Messrs. William L. Clark, Ernest J. nnen, Edward T. Sullivan and the Rev. . Alexander Mann; Messrs. Charles H. ldwin, William H. Bent, Charles E. Ma-n and Huntington Saville.

Trustees of the Diocese: the Rev. Dan-D. Addison, D.D., and Mr. Philip S. ırker.

Diocesan Board of Education (to serve ree years): the Rev. Frederick W. Fitts d Mr. Charles C. Coveney; (to serve un-pired term of one year) Mrs. A. G. Erick-n.

he Convention Dinner—The dinner ven by the Episcopalian Club to Conven-n delegates was at the City Club and was tended by a large number of delegates d club members alike. The speakers after nner were Bishop Lawrence and the Rev. . Percy Silver, chaplain of West Point. Chaplain Silver made an extremely effec-e, eloquent and witty speech on the sub-ct, "Church and Army: What They May earn From Each Other".

. F. S. Service—The eleventh annual ocesan service for candidates of the rls' Friendly Society was held in Trinity urch, Boston, on the afternoon of April The famous "missionary pennies" saved the girls throughout the diocese each ar were given this year to the Church eneral Hospital at Wuchang, China. The eacher at the service was the Rev. Ken-th Ripley Forbes of St. James' church, oxbury.

Var Commission Fund—The Bishop has nounced that this diocese has given to ıte, in cash and pledges, to the War Com-ission Fund the sum of $119.258. The nount asked for by the Bishop and his piscopalian Club committee was $90,000.

arish Freed From Debt—Easter Day as a very happy one at St. Luke's church, iles, Ohio, when the largest offering in ıe record of the parish was presented, be-ıg sufficiently large to free the parish from ll indebtedness and diocesan obligations. his closes the first year of the rector's ork, the Rev. F. C. Roberts, during which me a handsome new altar has been in-talled in the church, a bishop's chair given y a parishioner, and many other improve-ments made. An American flag and a service flag containing twelve stars have been presented. A new parish house is now under contemplation.

SPRINGFIELD

Large Number Confirmed—The number of confirmations in the diocese will exceed three hundred this synodical year. More than have been confirmed in a single year since the early part of the episcopate of Bishop Seymour.

War Fund—Additional offerings of $126.80 for the War Fund Commission have been received making the total for the diocese over $1,500; our apportionment being only $1,100.

CHICAGO

Stars of Gold—The "Gold Star", spelling "sacrifice for country", is making its appearance on the service flags in our churches. The list is headed by the name of Dumaresque Spencer of Trinity church, Highland Park. Mr. Spencer was killed while on air patrol duty in France. Memorial services were held at Trinity church. Mrs. Spencer, on hearing of her son's death, said simply: "I would gladly give another son to die".

Norman James Tweedie, member and choirman of Trinity church, Wheaton, died of pneumonia at Camp Zachary Taylor, and was buried with full military honors from Trinity church. The Wheaton company of the State Militia acted as escort.

Alexander B. Burns of St. Andrew's choir, Downer's Grove, died in France "from wounds received in action". The memorial service was held at the Village Square under the direction of the Downer's Grove Community League.

Warren Houser of St. Luke's church, Evanston, died in France of pneumonia. Word of his safe arrival preceded by but two days the news of his death. A memorial celebration of the Holy Communion was held at St. Luke's.

Frank B. Parkhurst, yeoman at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, also of St. Luke's, Evanston, died at the Training Station Hospital, of pneumonia. The burial was held from the Lady chapel of St. Luke's, with military honors.

Lexington Conference Against Reunion—The Chicago-Indianapolis district (commonly known as the Lexington Conference) of the Methodist Episcopal church (colored), comprising the colored congregations in Ohio, Kentucky, Illinois and Indiana, met in Chicago the past week. Bishop Thomas Nicholson of the Chicago Area presided. The chief action of the conference was the passage of a resolution on "Organic Unity", which said:

"Resolved, That the Lexington Conference declares its conviction against the proposition for union with any Church which calls for or demands the restricting of the rights or privileges within the Church on account of race or nationality. We offer co-operation with any one who seeks to promote union of divided elements of Methodism or any part of the Church of Jesus Christ, and hold ourselves ready to make such concessions to promote a union as may be reasonably asked of a self-respecting people".

The conference also passed a comprehensive resolution "calling upon the members of the churches to manifest their patriotism by subscribing to the Liberty Loan, according their support to the Government in their food conservation plans, and urging the boys of the colleges of the Church to use their summer vacation by engaging in farm work". It was further resolved "that the third Sunday in May shall be observed as "Patriotic Day".

G. F. S. Activities—St. Andrew's branch entertained the West Side branches on a recent evening and gave the girls a real treat by securing Sergeant Baldwin of the Canadian Recruiting Mission as the speaker of the evening. He spoke of his experiences at the front. The rector of St. Andrew's reports that the girls of the branch have subscribed for one thousand dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds.

St. Chrysostom's branch is making surgical dressings for the Red Cross under the direction of Mrs. J. A. Capps, wife of Major Capps, chief of the medical staff at Camp Grant, Rockford.

The Grace church branch at Oak Park has adopted Bertha Chatouillet of St. Amand en Puisave, Niene, a six-year-old French war orphan. The branch is also at work on surgical dressings for the Red Cross.

"Four Minute Men"—Two of the diocesan clergy have recently received and accepted appointments as "Four Minute Men". The Rev. Benjamin E. Chapman, the rector of St. Andrew's church, will work in Chicago. The Rev. Albert E. Selcer, S. T. B., rector of Grace church, Pontiac, will work in Livingston county.

War Commission Secretary a Busy Man—The Rev. George Craig Stewart, D. D., of St. Luke's, Evanston, had a busy four-day period last week. He left Evanston on Sunday afternoon, returning on Thursday. During his absence he attended meetings of the War Commission, the Joint Commission on Social Service, and the Church Club dinner given to the Archbishop of York in New York; from New York he went to Camp Sherman, at Chillicothe, Ohio, where he preached to the officers and men; thence to St. Louis to speak before the Church Club of Missouri.

CONNECTICUT

Archdeaconry-Clericus Meeting—The Easter meeting of the Hartford Archdeaconry and Clericus was held as St. James', Glastonbury (Rev. Ed. G. Reynolds, rector), April 11. The sermon by the Rev. Fred W. Harriman, D. D., rector of Windsor, was a telling appeal to the clergy and laity alike to hold fast to the fundamentals of Christianity in these days of uncertainty and anxiety.

Professor H. M. Urban of Trinity College, Hartford, gave an excellent dissertation on "The Religion of H. G. Wells". He expressed the opinion that any analysis of Mr. Wells' religious position in his later books must prove a bitter disappointment to Mr. Wells' admirers. Prof Urban closed his remarks in suggesting that people would probably be grateful in the future to the Vatican for the efforts it had put forth to keep clear its judgment in eternal verities, whenever it had spoken in the last three years. The meeting adjourned at 4 p. m.

Service Flag—A service flag was dedicated at St. John's, Warehouse Point, at the afternoon service, on April 14.

Woman's Auxiliary Reorganized—The Woman's Auxiliary of St. John's church, Hartford, has recently been reorganized. Under the leadership of Mrs. Charles A. Pease it is now a vigorous unit of the Woman's Auxiliary and a potent factor in the life of the parish. Bishop Brewster confirmed 53 candidates at St. John's in his recent visitation.

Dr. Brady Preaches—The Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady was the preacher at St. Paul's, Southington, April 14. The repairs and improvement to the church property are nearly completed, which is a matter for congratulation to both rector and people.

WILLIAM T. HOOPER.

WESTERN MICHIGAN

New Church—Excavation for the cellar of the new St. Philip's colored church, Grand Rapids, was begun during Holy Week, and the basement, costing $2,562, will be partially completed so that it can be occupied about June. Most of the funds were contributed by the members of the congregation, but Miss Rebecca L. Richmond of Grand Rapids made the building a possibility at this time by a generous subscription of $1,000. The completed structure will cost $10,000.

Easter Offerings—The Easter offerings in the various churches of Grand Rapids were as follows: Grace church, $1,225; St. Mark's church, about $1,300; St. Paul's church, $191, and St. Philip's mission, $143.

NEW JERSEY

Fourth Anniversary Celebration—The fourth anniversary of the rectorship of the Rev. Chapman Simpson Lewis, M. A., rector of Christ church and chapels, of South Amboy, New Jersey, who came to the diocese of New Jersey in 1914 from the deanship of St. John's Cathedral, Quincy, Illinois, was observed on Easter Day, the congregation worshiping in an entirely new church interior, the renovation of which had been in progress for several months past and costing $3,000.

During the past four years he has administered Holy Baptism to 145 persons, read the burial office 121 times and presented for Confirmation 160 candidates, nearly half of whom were adults. Over $6,000 has been expended upon the parish property. As a token of appreciation the Vestry at their Easter meeting voted an increase of $300 to the rector's stipend, this being the second increase during his rectorship.

SPOKANE

Only One Girls' School—We have only one girls' school for our communicants in this diocese now, and that is St. Paul's, Walla Walla, Washington, which, at the time of writing, is full to overflowing. There are fifty boarders, which is the capacity of the school, and ninety-one day scholars, making one hundred and forty-one in all. Bishop Page says: "It is my hope that generous men and laywomen who believe in education, especially religious education, will help me year by year to reduce the debt of $30,000, which has accumulated with the course of the years, and which is being steadily reduced year by year. The school has been brought to a position of unusual influence under the singularly able and devoted leadership of Miss Nettie M. Galbraith.

I visited the school a few months ago, and was agreeably surprised with the splendid progress which is being made in the development of the girls, spiritually, intellectually and socially. Miss Galbraith is assisted by a most efficient staff, who share her enthusiasm, and are doing all they can together to raise the school to the highest pitch possible.

New Branch Formed—A new branch of the Women's Auxiliary has been formed at St. Matthew's church, Spokane, as a direct outcome of the Mission Study Class, held during Lent by Miss Halliene Hall, and has an enrolment of twenty-five members, with Miss Jessie H. Hicks as president.

First Anniversary Celebrated—Christ church, Glenrose, which is just six miles from Spokane, celebrated its first anniversary Sunday, April 14. The work is making slow but steady progress. It has paid its obligations in full, and the main debt at the present time is the organ. There is a small vested choir, and the organist of St. David's church renders valued assistance week by week.

Colored Mission Makes Progress—St. Thomas' Mission for the colored people of Spokane is making good headway under the devoted leadership of the Rev. M. J. Stevens. The communicants are steadily reducing the debt on the building, and also are planning to further increase the church's usefulness amongst the colored people of the city and vicinity.

VIRGINIA

Chapel Opened—On Sunday, March 10, the new Emmanuel Chapel of Cunningham chapel parish, Clarke county, Virginia, was opened with very impressive services and large congregations. The services were conducted by the rector of the parish, the Rev. B. D. Chambers, assisted by the Rev. Giles B. Palmer of Meade Memorial chapel, White Post, and the combined choirs of the parish rendered the music. The sermon at both the morning and evening services was preached by the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D. D., of Petersburg, who was rector of the parish thirty-one years ago, when the old chapel upon the same site was built and consecrated by Bishop Randolph.

The new chapel, built of the native blue limestone, is very attractive and will seat about two hundred and sixty.

Change in Missions—The Rev. W. Roy Mason, rector of a large group of missions in Greene County, Virginia, has been elected rector of Christ church, Charlottesville, Virginia, in succession to the Rev. Dr. H. B. Lee, resigned. Mr. Mason has accepted the election and expects to take charge about August 1. Mr. Mason will instruct Mr. Lewis, who graduates from the Virginia Seminary in June, in the details of the mission work, preparatory to installing him in charge when he takes up his new work.

Mr. Borie, while waiting in New Y for an appointment as a foreign mission decided to make this trip to Europe back.

The little mission church, where Mr. Bo had done excellent work in the Sun school, was appropriately decorated w flags and flowers and was crowded w his friends.

The Rev. R. H. Peters, a kinsman of Borie, conducted the service; the Rev. E. McAllister, rector of the church, who, his early life was in the merchant mar service, spoke on that subject; Lieut. La rence Truman, a veteran of the Span war, appeared in his old uniform and lated how Mr. Borie had served in his co mand in Spanish America; the Rev. R. McCready, dean of Christ Church Cathed made an address on "The Good Son", a read the last letter Mr. Borie had writ to his mother and a letter of appreciat from the organization with which Mr. Bo had connected himself; F. F. Gilmore, perintendent of St. Thomas' Sunday sch spoke on the "Helper in the Sunday scho and the great loss the community a church had suffered.

teresting Anniversary Celebration—e twenty-fifth anniversary and Silver bilee of St. Luke's Episcopal church of eiser was celebrated in a most appropri- manner by the members and friends in series of events which began with the it of Bishop Funsten, when the Easter mmunion and Confirmation Service was d. It was closed with the "Parish Silver bilee Social" at the Washington hotel, nday evening.

The Bishop brought his greetings on ursday evening and spoke of the steady wth of the Church in Weiser during these enty-five years, and he emphasized espe- lly the fine spirit of co-operation and erence that possessed the congregation. ere were seven in the Confirmation class d the highest number partook of the Holy pper that had ever been known.

The Easter services were very impres- e. The redecorating of the church inside s the "Jubilee Thank-offering" of Mr. d Mrs. Jos Akers.

The rector delivered an anniversary ser- n that will long be remembered by the ngregation.

The Jubilee Social held Monday evening the Washington was one of the happiest casions in the history of this church. out 140 members and friends gathered in dining-room and enjoyed an evening of urch history and music and reminiscences d refreshments. NORTH CAROLINA nt Well Observed—Reports from the rious parts of the diocese show that Lent s unusually well observed this year. The endance upon the daily services in the o Raleigh parishes was exceptionally od. At the Three Hours' Service at rist church, Raleigh, on Good Friday the endance was excellent throughout the vice. And this parish had the best ster in its history. Nearly three hundred made their communion at the early service, and a large number at the 11 a. m. service. At the latter service the church was crowded to the doors, with many chairs in the aisles. And the children's service in the afternoon drew another large congregation. The children marched in procession from the Parish House into the church, led by a crucifer. The vested choir, the flags of the Allies, our own national flag, and the beautiful Sunday school class banners presented a patriotic and picturesque scene and attracted much attention from passers-by.

In spite of the many objects to which the parish has generously contributed during the past year, the Easter offering was the largest the parish has ever made. It was a happy day for the rector, the Rev. Milton A. Barber, who on that day completed his eleven years in the parish.

On the Sunday after Easter a national and a service flag were dedicated, after which the choir and congregation sang one verse of the national anthem with thrilling effect. The parish has forty-six men in the service of the country.

Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary—This year, for the first time, the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held at a different time and at a different place from that of the diocesan convention. The Auxiliary met at the Chapel of the Cross, Chapel Hill, the seat of the State University, April 16-18. The distinctive features of the meeting were the presence and addresses of Dr. W. C. Sturgis, the educational secretary of the Board of Missions, and of the Rev. Dr. Patton, secretary of the Province of Sewanee. On the afternoon of the first day Dr. Sturgis held a conference for men only, at which were present representatives from a number of nearby parishes. Milton A. Barber.

TENNESSEE

St. Raphael's House Reopened—St. Raphael's House, Monterey, founded by the Ven. Archdeacon Windiate, has been reopened under the direction of the Rev. A. C. Killeffer, as a school for mountain boys and girls. It is very advantageously situated for this work at the junction of four large counties having a total population of 52,000. Of the 2,100 of school age in these four counties only sixty per cent. go to school. St. Raphael's is intended to furnish a centre for missionary and social service work throughout the entire region.

"At the Front"—The Church in Tennessee is "at the front" in all the patriotic movements of the times. Many of the clergy have offered their services as chaplains or as Y. M. C. A. workers. The clergy and prominent laity of the Church have been enlisted as "four minute men" in the larger cities, and are active in every patriotic rally. The churches throughout the diocese are provided with Honor Rolls and service flags, with an increasing number of stars (and already not a few gold stars), and a note of loyalty and patriotism is added to the church services everywhere. In the city of Memphis, the room in which the noonday Lenten services were held for the business men has been retained by the Memphis Clericus, and daily for the period of the war prayers for the soldiers and sailors and the success of the war for Christian civilization are being offered at the noon hour. MINNEAPOLIS

A Unique Gift—A most unique gift was made on Easter Day to St. Mark's church, Rev. James E. Freeman, D. D., rector, when Mr. William C. Edgar, editor of The Bellman, Minneapolis, presented the church with a little statue of St. Joseph. The little figure stands in a niche, appropriately carved, and in the parish paper, The Outlook, the rector quotes from The Bellman the story of this unique gift. The concluding paragraph of the article is interesting. "Since my return in 1915, St. Joseph has occupied a place in my library, but I have never felt that he should stand elsewhere than in a church, and I am most gratified that St. Mark's has given him a permanent and appropriate place near the entrance of its own school. Here he may resume the guardianship of children to which he devoted himself in far distant Belgium, and I devoutly hope that his existence henceforth will serve to remind those who see him of the heroic people from whence he came who have undergone such terrible and unmerited misfortunes and have borne their misfortunes with such high courage and splendid fortitude. . .. ."

NEWARK

$10,000 for Bonnie Brae Farm—On April 6 nearly 200 men and women representatives of a large number of parishes were brought together in Newark for a war dinner by the trustees of the Bonnie Brae Farm for Homeless Boys, that the support of this new undertaking of the Church might be presented. Brief addresses followed the dinner and then interested laymen in a short time received parochial and individual subscriptions for the coming year amounting to $10,000 to be used in part for the support of the home and part, if deemed advisable, for a new cottage beside the farmhouse, that more boys may be received. It is a home and not an institution and it has come into existence to give a chance to boys not likely to have one without it.

Clerical Changes—Several changes among the clergy are taking place; Rev. Waldo A. Amos resigns St. Paul's, Hoboken, to take a very responsible position with the Red Cross Society; Rev. F. B. Bartlett of West Hoboken, resigns to go to South Dakota; Rev. Hugh D. Wilson of Passaic resigns to go to Western Colorado; Rev. Geo. G. Daland of Bloomfield resigns to go to New Mexico, Rev. Arthur L. Charles leaves Bloomfield for Brooklyn.

LONG ISLAND

A Christian Flag—At All Saints' church, Great Neck, L. I., of which the Rev. Kirkland Huske is rector, there was consecrated a Christian flag on Easter Sunday; the money for this was sent home by Mayor and Mrs. Dwight, who are at the front; he, with the engineers; she, doing canteen work. The beautiful chancel designed by Goodhue has now this added beauty. At this same church on the Sunday After Easter, a service flag was consecrated, having fifty-eight stars.

A Successful Canvass—A splendid chapter in the history of the Church of the Messiah, Brooklyn, of which the Rev. St. Clair Hester is rector, was enacted recently. It was the culmination of several conferences and meetings in which the vestry, the Men's Guild and the men and women canvassers participated. As the result of much thought and preparation it was decided to undertake an every-member canvass for the several purposes of getting the people better acquainted with each other, correcting names and addresses, securing information and new members, encouraging people to come to church, straightening out misunderstandings and inviting people to enlist in the systematic offering movement to give a definite sum for parish support and missions and charities every Sunday.

Much valuable information was secured in the way of getting names and addresses right, names of children to be baptized, and persons to be confirmed, clearing up misunderstandings and making people feel that their presence was desired and needed in the worship and work of the Church.

One rather odd experience; a family was found where one child goes to the Nostrand Avenue Methodist Sunday school, one to the Washington Avenue Baptist, one to the Simpson Methodist, husband to the Friends' church, mother nowhere, and one to the Church of the Messiah Sunday school.

We quite agree with the comment made, something of a denominational mixture, and this family surely must find some virtue or diversion in division!

RHODE ISLAND

Sunday Schools Meet—There was a goodly assembly of the Sunday schools of the diocese on Saturday afternoon, April 13, at the annual Presentation Service of the Sunday School Lenten Offering for Missions, in Grace church, Providence. Bishop Perry officiated, and the address to the children was made by the Rev. Charles E. Jackson of the Church of the Ascension, Fall River, Mass. The offering was $5,000.

Service Flag—A service flag with fifty-six stars, presented by Governor Beeckman, was unfurled at St. Stephen's church, Providence, Sunday afternoon, April 14. Mr. Thomas W. Foster, senior warden, replied to the Governor's presentation speech, accepting the flag in behalf of the church. The rector, the Rev. George McC. Fiske, D. D., officiated, and patriotic songs were sung. A visiting delegation from the Naval Reserve Training Station at Newport was entertained by the parish through the day. The service flag hangs in the church porch. Each star is numbered to correspond with the names on an honor roll. A complete record of each man in service is kept at the church.

HARRISBURG

Debt Paid—The indebtedness on St. Mary's church, Waynesboro, has been paid off in full. Steps are being taken for its consecration in the near future. It is in charge of the Rev. F. A. Cook, who also has charge of the Church of the Transfiguration, Blue Ridge Summit, and Calvary church, Seartown.

Memorial Tablet—A tablet in memory of Albert Dorwart, son of the Rev. William Dorwart, archdeacon of Harrisburg, has recently been placed in St. Albert's church, Duncannon. It is of hand-wrought brass. It was given by friends of Albert Dorwart in Virginia, where he spent three months among Indians at Amherst, Virginia, laboring in the interest of the Church. Albert Dorwart died in the service of the country in which he had enlisted many months before his death.

English Church News

The Battle Background to Holy Week—It is to be hoped that by the time these lines appear the extreme tension, under which we have been living through Holy Week, will have been relaxed. Judging by your newspapers, extracts from which are published here, the American clergy must have been saying much the same things as we have been saying to our congregations. And such intense prayers have probably not been offered since the early days of the war. "This year is not like other years", writes the Archbishop of Canterbury. "Let this week send us daily, hourly, to our knees. Unite, I urge you, in prayer and sacrament. Unite in steady confident reliance upon the supreme guidance, the promised blessing, of our living Lord. Pray to Him for victory". And so, when Good Friday was reached, there was an extraordinarily increased intensity in the services all over the country. It was no day for furbishing up old sermon notes: the well-known preachers had all an appropriate message to give, according to the newspaper reports, and it may be assumed that the rank and file did likewise. There was little, if any, holiday spirit—usually our greatest difficulty in Good Friday observance. And old difficulties of disunion are disappearing: as witness the united service held in Hyde Park. The Bishop of London conducted it, assisted not only by his suffragans and the clergy, but also by prominent Free Churchmen. Practically all the religious bodies in London were represented. Even the Roman Catholics, who are precluded by their own rules from joining in such an effort, were in sympathy with it. Father Bernard Vaughan wrote a letter to the Bishop of London, expressing his pleasure at this rally of London citizens around the Cross of Christ.

Other Good Friday Observances—There was a breaking of all precedent at Windsor, where a combined intercession service was held under the leadership of the new dean (Dr. Baillie). The local ministers were present with their congregations, and one of the ministers, a Baptist, had the opportunity of being the first "Free Churchman" to take part in a service at St. George's chapel.

The Rev. R. J. Campbell broke new ground by introducing the cinema for the first time into church. It was not such a very long step forward, as stereopticon views of the Passion have been shown in many churches in Lent for some years. The cinema was bound to come. But the difficulty has always been to find a suitable cinema representation. Mr. Campbell believes he has found it in the film "Christus", which was recently produced in London. Immense pains have been taken, I believe, to see that there should be nothing in this film likely to jar the religious sentiment, and one cannot help feeling relieved that it was introduced, not by the clergyman of the advertising type in search of a new sensation, but by one of Mr. Campbell's reverent cast of mind. Of course, the church w crowded on Good Friday evening. M Campbell conducted a devotional servi before the pictures were shown.

Easter at St. Paul's—Of course th thought of Easter victory after battle o curred to many preachers. The Bishop London's text at St. Paul's was "Than be to God Who giveth us the victo through our Lord Jesus Christ". He said used the present tense, not the future, b cause victory was on the way. And could say "through Jesus Christ" becau "without a quiver of conscience we cou identify our cause with His". Victory w impossible to those who denied Him. B victory had been delayed by our permitti temptations to surround soldiers whi should not have been allowed, and becau class misunderstandings and sectional je ousy had weakened national efficiency a impaired efficiency. But now, all ranks h closed in, and petty disputes were silence The Bishop then went on to refer to t revelations of Prince Lichnowsky, who he had once met at a public breakfast, a whom he described as an honest man. T famous memorandum bore out what "w who were supposed to be making ex pa statements, said at the beginning of t war". It was impossible that to the har red with the blood of so many victim should be finally entrusted the dominati of the world. But this conviction must accompanied by a universal and sustain effort.

The Conscientious Objector—Our Chur has never quite made up its mind about t treatment of the conscientious objector. T Nation does not love them, and suspects t genuineness of their convictions. Some ti ago Bishop Gore entered a plea on th behalf: he thought that we ought to very careful in casting doubt on an attitu which may be the result of genuine conv tion. According to the Guardian the Rom Catholic Church will have nothing with su objectors. It has condemned them emph ically and mercilessly, "and it is not to t credit of our Church that it has been mealy-mouthed on the subject". It is, suppose, hardly likely that such object belong to the Roman Church, nor, for th matter, to ours. They generally prof some rather freakish religion of their ov Such a consideration, however, should affect a matter of justice. There are so indeed, who have no respect for the "sa tity" of the consciences of these men, n ably the Dean of Manchester (Bishop We don) who cannot respect the conscie which, while claiming the rights of citiz ship, refuses to perform the correspon ing duties. But it is rather to be hoped th the present loophole may be maintain For there is a good deal of talk now removing the exemption of the clergy fr military service, in the present need for available man-power. The younger cle will undoubtedly respond well, if cal upon, but there will certainly be some w will feel obliged to claim the protection the "conscience clause". And it will be ha to deny their right to do so.

ntion is called to the fact that The Open Forum is designed for letters and for articles. No letter exceeding 350 words in length can be published, except under very special circumstances.—The Editor.

Mr. Wheeler and Mr. Empringham

he Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

r. Empringham in your issue of March 30 to be pathetic at my expense. The ps seems to me on the other side. Here clergyman of our Church who reads ne Communion Service that the bread wine which we offer are gifts of God is before the Prayer of Consecration), yet in his newspaper article he declares gift to be a poison. That is to say, he uses the Communion Service he in his heart—if he thinks at all—this on which we now offer unto thee. How he possibly justify that? Again, last there was read in our churches the ble of the vineyard. In that parable Master of the vineyard, who represents , not only plants a vineyard but makes inepress therein. Aocording to Mr. ringham this Master, who represents the ighty, established a factory of poison. in, in the Gospel for the Second Sun- after Epiphany, we are told that Jesus iself made the water into wine and it to the guests. Will Mr. Empring- say that this wine that Christ made poison?

r. Empringham makes a statement that public records of England show that ty per cent. of the drunkenness in that is the result of drinking beer. This I y. But I am not to be turned from position by bringing in the case of Eng- l. The British Parliament is competent lo that and I know that that wise body not prohibited the sale of beer but has ulated it. I know further that American contains only 2 3-4 per cent. of alco- which is the rule in force now, and can- possibly be intoxicating. And I know after two months' debate in Congress n all the arguments that Mr. Empring- brings forward were fully presented and other side also was heard, Congress de- d to prohibit the manufacture of spirits ing the War but to permit the manufac- of wine and beer. On the express rec- nendation of the President, a prohibition inst the manufacture of wine and beer had been proposed in the pending bill. stricken out. Finally I know that ohol in beer is not exactly the same drug the alcohol in whiskey. If Mr. Em- gham would study the subject thor- ghly he would learn that the effects of ny substances, including alcohol, vary ically according to the composition of the stance which contains them. Chlorine is a poison, but combined with sodium makes common salt which is a necessary life. A warm bath is beneficial; a bath water of the temperature of 212 would ld a person to death.

Mr. Empringham's remarks about the ics of the legal profession are out of e. There was a time when some law- s maintained the position which he otes, but that is now condemned by the ions of professional ethics adopted by e American Bar Association and by the r Association of this State. But in any case it has nothing to do with the present situation. I am not acting as counsel in this matter for any one. I am a communicant of the Church and have been for sixty years. I consider the amendment for national prohibition to be opposed to the teachings and example of Christ and St. Paul, and therefore am in duty bound to oppose it.

Clergy Not Neutral

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

It is bad enough to have the writer of the article in the Atlantic Monthly compare the Church to "Peter warming himself by the fire". But what puzzles us in Philadelphia is the ominous note coming from New York that the accusation is true that the Church has been slow to speak out in the crisis or to attempt to interpret the great struggle in terms of God. Has there been such a failure in New York? Has there been such a failure in other parts of the Church? There has been no such failure here in Philadelphia. There has been no suggestion of neutrality in the pulpits of the Church here from the beginning. There has been no failure to try to interpret the situation in terms of religion. Our lay people have not complained of lack of attempt to make them understand the War and the right attitude of religion to it. Some of them have complained that we would not let them forget it even on Sunday. One layman told me that the Episcopal Church in Philadelphia was trying to drive the Nation into a foreign war!

Bishop Rhinelander and Bishop Garland have spoken straight out from the beginning and their leadership has been followed in almost every parish in the diocese. The last sentences of the second paragraph of Dr. Van De Water's letter would not apply here at all. Some of us may have "found it difficult when advised by our Chief Magistrate to maintain strict neutrality, to obey"; not "a few of us" but the overwhelming majority of us "found this impossible." "Confronting calamity and monstrosity we had to speak out." But we have never "felt lonely" in so doing, we had the goodly company of the whole body of the clergy. No Churchman in Philadelphia could write this sentence: "I regret from the bottom of my heart that some Anglican bishop or primate could not have spoken as boldly and fearlessly during the last three calamitous years as, for example, did Cardinal Mercier of Belgium". He could not write it because he could not help remembering the bold, brave and thoughtful utterances of his own bishop. Nor could any one here say, and I do not believe any one here wants to say: "That the laity are leading the clergy, and not the clergy the laity, in this time of tremendous test gives some of us painful concern and deepest distress". It is not true. At least it is not true here. Here we feel certain that the Church in all its orders, clerical and lay, has been a leader in rousing public indignation against wrong and stirring enthusiasm for the Holy Cause of Right. And we had confidently supposed that the same was true of the Church in the rest of the land. Why this everlasting tendency to discredit the Church? There is a saying about birds that foul their own nests.

The Roman Creed

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

O tempora! O mores! Alas, and alas, indeed! Do you wonder that a Protestant Catholic so exclaims when, under a heavily-leaded caption of "The Spirit of the Reformation", so distinguished a writer as the Rev. F. J. Foahes Jackson, D. D., ventures to print in THE CHURCHMAN, our leading church paper, so misleading a statement as that contained in the following question and answer: "Are we severed from the Roman Communion because our Creed is not theirs? It is the same."

Now, of course, if the writer meant only that the Roman Communion and the Anglican had in common the two historic Creeds, the statement would pass unchallenged, but the context in which his statement stands implies his meaning to be that no fundamental difference of belief separates these communions; and how any Anglican can make such a mistake is past the comprehension of any one who knows, and cares for, "What Protestantism means to us". As "the judicious Hooker" declares, the grand point upon which hung the controversy between Rome and the Reformers was the question of how we are to be justified (i. e., saved) before God: Is it by our own inherent righteousness, as the Romanists claim, or is it "only for the merit of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, by faith, and not for our own works or deservings", as our article puts it?

With these two branches of the Catholic Church as far apart as they are upon this vital question—not merely in the opinions of individuals in each branch, but in their authoritative, formulated standards of doctrine, Rome in her Trent decrees, and the Anglican church in her Articles and Liturgy —surely, Mr. Editor, you cannot be willing to let such a statement as that in question go unchallenged, nor should Dr. Jackson be denied the opportunity of disclaiming any such meaning as his language seems to convey.

And, on the other hand, if Dr. Jackson believes with Dr. Van Allen of Boston that "Justification by Faith is as dead as the reprobation of the non-elect", (See Dr. Van Allen's foreword to Dr. Ewer's Book of Sermons on the Failure of Protestantism, etc., p. 9), then it is only right and fair that Dr. Jackson should plainly so state, so that we may know "What Protestantism means" to him et id omne genus.

PHILIP W. FAUNTLEROY.

New York City.

[NOTE.—We are sure that Dr. Jackson in saying that our Creed is the same as that held by the Roman communion refers to the historic Creeds. We cannot find in Dr. Jackson's most interesting papers on the Reformation any collapse of Protestant principles.—EDITOR.]

From the Anvil to the Pulpit

LIFE AND LETTERS OF ROBERT COLLYER. By John Haynes Holmes. New York: Dodd, Mead & Company. 1918. 2 volumes. $5.00.

In the hard days before the factory acts, when children were taken out of workhouses to yoke them to the spinning frames, Collyer's father at the age of ten was picked up in London, and his mother at the age of nine in Norwich, and were set to work in a cotton mill at Blubberhouses in Yorkshire. Thus they became acquainted, in due time fell in love, and were married, and bore Robert, one of the strongest, handsomest, ablest and best lads in England. It seems to put eugenics to confusion, but the workhouse was a place for the unfortunate as well as for the incompetent; the grandfathers on both sides were sailor-men who were drowned in great storms leaving their families without support. "We have no family tree to speak of", said Robert Collyer, "only this low bush".

At the age of eight, the boy must go to work in the mill, thirteen hours a day for two shillings a week. The factory bell which for six years called him to this labor is now at Cornell University; together with a horseshoe made on his anvil when this hard time was over and he became a blacksmith. The promise of the future was in his love for reading. "I read", he says, "when I was blowing the bellows in the forge, and in the evening when there was no candle I poked my head down toward the open fire, and never ate a meal, if I could help it, without a book close to my hand. I did worse than this, for when I went a 'courting my wife I read all the books in her father's house, instead of—well, what's the use telling what I ought to have done". Years after, in 1861, he records in his journal, "I have just completed the Encyclopedia Britannica, a grand work in 21 volumes, begun in 1853".

The young blacksmith joined the Methodists, and found in their meetings that he had the gift of speech. Immediately, in their direct way, they set him to preaching, and this useful exercise he continued when he and his wife came to America. He was so successful in it that he gave up the anvil for the pulpit: among the Methodists, till he abandoned the theory of everlasting punishment; then among the Unitarians, on account of the example and friendship of Dr. William Henry Furness of Philadelphia. He had a large and popular church in Chicago, which was burned in the great fire; then a large and popular church in New York. He died in 1912, at the age of eighty-nine.

The reader looks with some curiosity to see how Mr. Holmes has dealt with Dr. Collyer's vigorous activity during the Civil War. There is nothing in these pages to show that the biographer has any pacifist prejudices. He describes with apparent sympathy the service at Collyer's church on the Sunday following Lincoln's call for volunteers. The place was hung with flags; the pulpit could not be seen under the red, white and blue; the sermon was from the text, "He that hath no sword let him sell his garment, and buy one"; after which amidst shouts and tears they sang the "Star Spangled Banner", while young men hastened to enlist.

Dr. Collyer gave an amusing account of his one glimpse of President Lincoln. "It was on a sunny Saturday afternoon, and I remember, as we went past the White House toward the bridge, my soldier said, 'See them feet, sir?' There were perhaps half a dozen pairs set sole toward us at two open windows, and my man said, 'That's the Cabinet a-setting. See them big feet in the middle o' that window? Them's Old Abe's'."

This distant view of the Government at Washington is a symbol of a certain remoteness—a "baffling remoteness", the biographer says—in Dr. Collyer's relation to the contemporary life. With the exception of several dramatic moments, he never took a leading part. The history of the intellectual movements of his time, and even of the social movements—in spite of the experiences of his youth—can be adequately written without the mention of his name. His biographer is frank about it, and somewhat apologetic, but to the reader it does not greatly matter. The character and not the plot, as Mr. Holmes says, is the great thing; and to this note the whole book is set. Several recent biographers have disappointed their readers' by excess of restraint. They have made us acquainted with the facts without making us acquainted with the man. It is not so here. This biography is full of warmth and light. It is rich in familiar conversation and friendly correspondence. It is a pleasure to read it for its own sake, as a book delightfully written.

It is "different", as Collyer was different. The reader enters into the writer's sympathy and reverence and affection.

1917 Revolution and the Russian Church

the English Challenge Madame Zve- sev is contributing a series of articles absorbing interest on the Russian rch.

Once more, as three centuries ago, Rus- lies prostrate under the enemy's heel", Madame Zvegintsov, "torn by civil war, ayed by conscious or unconscious trait- all her old and new ideals crumbled dust. Will she once again 'arise and rn to her Father', and will the Church e too and be as of old the spiritual force ch will help the agonizing nation to find rue self and save it from destruction?

The Revolution of 1917 brought the rch emancipation from a two centuries' dage. One of the earliest acts of the provisional government was the grant- of the freedom of worship and of con- nce, and the promise of the convocation n All-Russia Church Assembly for the ganization of Church life. These acts promises were indeed 'glad tidings of at joy' to those who loved the Church suffered for its abasement. Local rch meetings were held in numerous vostships for the elections of delegates to diocesan councils, summoned by almost the bishops for discussing all vital prob- s of Church and parish reform and wing up instructions for the future dele- es to the Great Church Assembly. The sionate debates which characterized e local councils composed both of clergy laymen gave ample proof of the sacred that had lain smouldering for so long er the apparently quiet surface of rch life. These diocesan councils ngly advocated the renewal of the an- nt right of the flock to the election of r bishop, and such elections did actually e place in many dioceses, including the ropolitan sees of Moscow and Petro- d, the laymen after a lapse of many years ng on equal rights with the clergy.

At last came the day for which so many sons of the Church had hoped and ted in vain. On August 15-28 the All- sia Church Assembly was opened with at solemnity; a special service was cele- ted at the Uspenski Cathedral, ending n the Creed chanted by all the several dred members.

In the subsequent debates all the diver- cies of opinion which had created such ent altercations at the local councils stallized themselves into three distinctive rents. The 'extremists', representing the st radical members of the clergy and y, advocated the complete separation of Church from the State, absolute inde- dence of the Church as a 'State within State', radical reforms of Church and ish organization, and an almost absolute trol of the clergy by the laity. Their onents—the conservative members of council—although fully admitting the l necessity of reform, were unable to ounce the old principle of 'orthodoxy, autocracy, and nationality', and secretly hoped to use the patriarchate as an instru- ment for the restoration of the monarchy. All the moderately liberal members of the assembly were naturally absorbed by the third current, which has apparently suc- ceeded in obtaining the ascendency. Con- templating the ultimate separation of the Church from the State, the representatives of the moderate group pointed out that the former, only just emerging from a state of semi-paralysis, was too weak materially, and perhaps morally, to stand alone without the support of the State. But such material support from the government was in no way to encroach upon the right of the Church to a complete autonomy, nor was the Church to take part in political life.

"The restoration of the patriarchate was advocated as a return to the early traditions of the Eastern Church, while the danger of the patriarchate becoming a source of eccle- siastical despotism and reaction would be averted by the creation of a permanent Church Council of members freely elected from among both clergy and laymen. Fun- damental reforms and reorganization of the parish were included in the program.

"How far these reforms would have been realized under normal conditions of life it is impossible to say, but some of the most vital problems were solved by the revolutionary course of events quite independently of the possible decisions of the assembly. The election of the patriarch coincided with the outburst of civil war in Moscow during the November revolution. As soon as the Bol- sheviks came into power they not only con- fiscated all lands and property belonging to the Church, and decreed the complete sep- aration of the Church from the State, but set up a regular persecution. Churches were plundered and burned, sacred vessels pro- faned, ikons smashed and trodden upon; hundreds of priests were sent out of their homes and parishes penniless and destitute or cruelly murdered by the infuriated mob.

"But amidst all this storm and strife the Church Assembly pursued its deliberations, tracing the outlines of the new edifice of the regenerated Russian Church. A perma- nent supreme Church Council was created, presided over by the Patriarch, and com- posed of three bishops and representatives of the white clergy and laymen, the latter being elected for a period of three years, at which interval, under normal conditions, an All-Russia Assembly is to be periodically convocated.

"Among the lay members of this council we find the names of Russia's eminent pro- fessors and philosophers, the spiritual suc- cessors of Vladimir Solovyev and Prince Sergi Trubetskoi.

"In the terrible cataclysm overwhelming Russia these men see the hope of her salva- tion in a regenerated national Church, puri- fied and strengthened by persecution, bereft of all worldly goods, but rich in the 'in- exhaustible treasure,' which is the living Spirit of an eternal God."

15 Years in Hawaii

Bishop Restarick has completed fifteen years in Hawaii. Among other interesting facts he tells us that five kinds of Prayer Books—American, Japanese, Korean, Chi- nese and Hawaiian—are used. Three of them have on the title page words which trans- lated mean: "The Holy Catholic Church". There are congregations of Orientals where the men all dress as we do, the girls as our girls, and the women in Chinese, Japan- ness or Korean costume, as the case may be, the men and boys being seated on one side of the church and the women and girls on the other.

THE REV. ROBERT HOWLAND NEIDE, D.D.

WHEREAS, The Rev. Robert Howland Neide, D.D., closed his earthly work on March 6, 1918, after a twenty-eight years' rectorate in St. Mark's parish, therefore be it Resolved: That this vestry spread upon its minutes the expression of its deep sense of loss to this parish, and to the community caused by the death of Dr. Neide. His thorough consecration to his holy office indicated by his devotion both to the work of the parish and in the broader field of the diocese showed him to be a true priest of the Church, while his cheerful and kindly attitude and wise counsel created a strong personal bond between the rector and the vestry. His death is a keen personal loss and sorrow to every member of the vestry, but his gracious personality and the work he did so well in the parish through so many years will ever be held in grateful memory.

Resolved: That a properly inscribed copy of these resolutions be transmitted to Mrs. Neide and that copies also be given to the bishop of the diocese, to the Standing Committee, and to the local paper for publication.

ST. FAITH'S SCHOOL MUST HAVE $6,000 FOR IDEAL

Saratoga School Must Have New Buildings or Defeat Purpose

SARATOGA, NEW YORK—In the midst of its greatest prosperity St. Faith's School, Saratoga Springs, New York, finds itself confronted with conditions which, unless removed, will defeat the purpose for which Miss Shackelford founded it. The school was intended to be a place where girls of moderate means could secure a thorough secondary education plus the advantages of a Christian home. For twenty-seven years St. Faith's has been quietly fulfilling this purpose: today it has more pupils than ever before and its work is being more and more widely and favorably commented upon. But its buildings are overcrowded and it has no hall nor gymnasium in which to carry out the State requirements in physical education. Unless larger accommodations are forthcoming the school must reduce the number of pupils and its charges for board and tuition must be largely increased. This would automatically close the doors against those for whom Miss Shackelford founded the school. To avoid such a defeat the trustees have planned to erect a building to cost $6,000 and it is hoped to have "Shackelford Hall" ready for use next fall. The work is more needed than ever now that many men in the service are looking for just such a school as St. Faith's in which to place their daughters. A circular now being distributed seeks co-operation in raising the required sum.

For Country

A RECENT ISSUE of Trench and Camp, newspaper published by the men of C Zachary Taylor, Kentucky, contained a tograph and an article entitled "Ange the Camp Hospital". The photograph that of Mrs. J. Arthur Forster, a Chu woman of this city.

The article said in part:

There is a woman in the city of Lo ville who is probably doing more than individual in the South toward cheering soldiers who are confined in hospitals. woman is Mrs. J. Arthur Forster, wh known at the camp as the "Angel of Hospital". She is devoting every mo of her time that is not required to at to her home duties to making the pati happy at the Camp Zachary Taylor hospital. Every day, at the proper ho she brings sunshine to the wan face the various wards. Oftentimes she br them good things to eat, but she never g anyone any dainties without first consu the doctor or nurse in charge. Her w is systematic and efficient. If she br a basket of things for "her boys", as calls them, she makes a list of the th she wishes to give each boy in that w and has the list checked and approved.

Many who have attempted to do hos work have failed because they did not good judgment. They did not follow rules and regulations.

IMPELLED BY THE statement of Presi Wilson that "upon the farmers of country, in large measure, rests the fat the war and the fate of the nations", General War-Time Commission of Churches has prepared, through the R Section of its Committee on War-T Work in the Local Church, a "War-T Program for Country Churches", whic now ready for distribution. The pamp may be obtained from the General W Time Commission, 105 East Twenty-se Street, New York City, at the rate of $ per hundred, or $10 per thousand.

THE REV. JOHN BRIAN MCCORMICK's a cation for a chaplaincy has been accepted on April 15 he left for a five or six w course at the Chaplains Training Sc at Camp Taylor, Kentucky. If his w proves satisfactory, he will receive his c mission and be assigned to overseas d Mr. McCormick has been curate at Chapel of the Intercession, New York for two years. He is the son of the Bis of Western Michigan.

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—Bishop L rence in his speech at the Massachus Diocesan Convention mentioned the tremely interesting fact that Bishop B is now a Major in the American army tached to the staff of General Pershing having under his supervision and gen direction all the chaplains of the Amer army in France. He has as his aide Roman Catholic chaplain and a Protes chaplain. Bishop McCormick has been pointed to an almost identical position the American Red Cross—having the su vision of all Red Cross chaplains with American forces.

OUR FIRST TANK BLESSED

ouched With the Cross as the Symbol of Sacrifice

Boston, Massachusetts.—The great ank", "America", which has recently been mpleted near Boston, was given its name the most remarkable and significantly sol- nn manner. General John S. Johnston, e Commander of the Department of the ortheast (who we understand is a com- unicant of the Episcopal Church), has e most intense feeling that we are fighting is war utterly in self-defense and that is completely a crusade in the name of ligion and righteousness. He was there- ore determined that the newly commis- oned "tank" under his jurisdiction should ot only be given formally a name, but that should be given a name with all religious olemnity. So instead of breaking a bottle f champagne or mineral water over her, e secured a large brass cross, called upon ne of the priests of this diocese—the Rev. lbert E. George—to bless the cross and ien proceeded to name the dread engine f war "America" by striking it solemnly ith the cross—symbol of sacrifice for right- ousness' sake.

ODE TO THE LIBERTY LOAN

By Thomas Rochester Shepard

Ve have sent our dearest and bravest to where hey enter the strife with a brutish foe.
Iuch have we given—we, who may not go;
Iuch, but not all. For ourselves, shall we dare, iving our heart's blood, bone of our bone,
o call that our full part, while, safe in the home,
Ve hug wealth and ease, help them not with our plenty,
ut leave them, unaided, to perish alone?

od! what a crisis in the soul of man!
eeper, vaster, than this strife of nations, than he struggle of the free against the tyrants,
s the choice presented to our spirits—
Whether to lack self-rule, and 'mid indulgence, uxury, lower joys of life, ourselves to lose,
r with our higher wills this to refuse,
nd rouse, and lift the spirit's banner high,
nd daily in our grosser selves to die, nd all our vital resource to contribute nto this cause supreme, upon whose field
f blood our sons depart in their effulgence.

Seek, then, to save by sacrificial thrift,
And, while you lend, your sacrifice is gift.
Fear not, it will return to you with largess.
Yet, pour your aid out, as if gone forever.
We gave our sons, and some will come no more;
Shall we do less with what we need not spend?
How then, hereafter, meet their shining spirits,
Saying, "You gave yourselves, I lent my comforts,
Though grudgingly at that"? Shall thus our shame
Those noble souls tempt to deny their name?
Nay! dying to gross life, in this cause live;
Lending, beside our sons ourselves we give!

Our School Service Bureau

FOR YEARS we have maintained for the benefit of readers of The Churchman a School Service Bureau, which has aided parents materially in selecting the right school.

Years of experience have given us a knowledge of good schools which school-seekers will find valuable, and it is entirely at the service of our readers.

In seeking advice about schools we ask our readers to give the following information:

The age and sex of the child.
The maximum amount you are able to pay.
The state or section of the country preferred.
If any special training is required.

With such information at hand, we shall be glad to suggest schools to meet the conditions.

There is no charge whatever either to the school or school-seeker for this service.

Are Our Rectors Doing Their Bit?

HAVE you urged your people with all the power at your command to invest their money in Liberty Bonds? Have you insisted that every organization in your parish, from Sunday School to Men's Club, should own at least one? Julian Street says in Collier's Weekly: "While the man in the trenches stands ready to give his life, what are we asked to give? Nothing. While the man in the trenches gambles his life, what are we asked to gamble? Nothing—not even our sleek, comfortable dollars . . . . . We are asked to seize an unexampled opportunity for the exercise of intelligent self-interest." Not even sacrifice is asked. Our people are asked only to be awake and intelligent.

A TIRED, HUNGRY, QUESTIONING WORLD

Will the Church equip hundreds of preachers and thousands of teachers needed today and tomorrow by the tired, hungry and questioning world?

The General Board of Religious Education is asking the Church for a War-Time Education Fund of $45,000 to meet conditions in Christian Education made crucial by the war.

If you wish to help

—recruit the Ministry
—hold college students now drifting from the Church
—form thousands of training classes for teachers in parishes
—strengthen our Church Preparatory Schools

subscribe to the War-Time Education Fund now, that our plans may be put into operation at the earliest moment.

—Bishop Talbot

The Geoeral Board of Religious Education is authorized hy the General Coovention to advance Christian Education in homes, Church Schools, Preparatory Schools, Colleges and Universities, and io the Traioing for the Ministry.

Send suhscriptioos, pledges or Liherty Bonds to Rt. Rev. Ethelhert Talhot, D.D., Chairmao of the Executive Committee, Room 73, 289 Fourth Aveoue, New York City.

THE REALITY OF PSYCHIC PHENOMENA

By W. J. CRAWFORD
Net $2.00

The author, a Professor of Science in an Irish University, undertook to examine and measure by physical apparatus the actual size and direction of the forces employed in the levitation of tables and kindred phenomena. His results, tabulated and precise, have the authority of definitely proven scientific data, and are not only important but astounding in the light they throw on the mechanics of table turning and levitation.

THE THEORY AND PRACTICE OF MYSTICISM

By the REV. CHARLES MORRIS ADDISON, D.D.
Net $1.50

A series of lectures originally given to a class of students for the ministry, now brought together and printed in book form by request of many who admired the simplicity of the treatment of the subject and the clearness with which the author points out that mysticism is not an abnormal, but a normal function, and up to a certain point can be obtained by anyone willing to devote time and care to the improvement of his own power of mental concentration.

STUDIES IN CHRISTIANITY

Net $1.25

Christianity has meant something different to every age and every generation. It has changed and grown, altered in form and expression, yet remained always itself. The author in these brilliant and unconventional Studies endeavors to sift out the permanent factors from the passing ones, and to crystallize for us the fundamental truths which Christ taught, not as his own, but as the Word of God.

THE SECOND COMING OF CHRIST

By S. P. T. PRIDEAUX
Net $1.60

Reviewing the beliefs which have been held at different periods concerning the time and manner of Christ's Second Advent, the author inclines to the view that this coming has been continuous since the Day of Pentecost, occurring to each believer as he becomes capable of experiencing it. A careful, reverent and satisfying discussion of a most difficult and yet vitally important question.

THE MIRACLES OF JESUS

By the RT. HON. AND MOST REV. COSMO GORDON LANG, D.D., Lord Archbishop of York
New American edition
Net $1.60

The Boston Advertiser says: "In this very helpful volume the author studies the miracles of Christ as revelations of the eternal purpose of God towards his children."
Northwestern Christian Advocate says: "His point of view is thoroughly evangelical and his work is thoughtful and suggestive."

RELIGION and COMMON SENSE

By DONALD HANKEY, Author of "A Student in Arms"
Net 60c

A simple, straightforward defence of the truths of the Christian revelation, showing that when once the real basis and nature of Christianity is understood, the ordinary rationalist attacks lose their force and their danger.

THE TEMPLE—A Book of Prayers

By the REV. W. E. ORCHARD, D.D.
Net $1.00

New and revised American edition, with an Introduction by Frank Crane.
Dr. Orchard in this simple little volume shows to us some of the wonderful struggles of his inner soul in his effort to achieve the spiritual life. We know of no book of prayers so illuminating to the mind and soul of those seeking the very presence of God.

LAST WORDS on GREAT ISSUES

By J. BEATTIE CROZIER
Net $3.50

New York Herald says: "They deal with religion, faith, spiritualism, politics and sociology. They are straightforward, plain spoken and dynamic. One cannot doubt his utter sincerity, for he convinces one that he has set down the results of his knowledge of life as he has seen it."

A MANUAL OF MYSTIC VERSE

Net $1.25

This collection of poems will prove of value from two separate points of view. In the first place much of the deepest and sincerest religious feelings of the world has been expressed in purely secular verse. Secondly the book is interesting historically because it traces the progress of religious feeling from the earliest period of English poetry down to the present.

THE PARABLES OF JESUS

By the RT. HON. AND MOST REV. COSMO GORDON LANG, D.D., Lord Archbishop of York
Net $1.60

New York Christian Advocate says: "It is a book to meditate over and will reward such meditations, for it is full of helpful thought, expressed with much quiet charm of manner."
Outlook says: "Mr. Lang does not approach his subject with a critical but wholly with a practical purpose."

In Press

THE NECESSITY OF CHRIST

By the REV. W. E. ORCHARD
Net $1.25

This book shows that the whole modern movement in philosophy and religion, so far from displacing Christ, constitutes a unique revelation of His necessity and only confirms the position given to Him by the historic Christian faith.

THE ULTIMATE BELIEF

By A. CLUTTON-BROCK
Net $1.00

Lyman Abbott says: "So much have I been interested in a little book, 'The Ultimate Belief,' and so heartily do I agree with its spirit and its fundamental principles, that I have a desire to introduce it to the readers of The Outlook. According to Mr. Brock the ultimate beliefs are three—Belief in Morality, Belief in Truth, and Belief in Beauty."

THE FAITH OF A FARMER

Net $2.25

This remarkable diary records the religious views and experiences of a well-known Essex farmer. The theme of the book is the relationship of God and nature as seen by one who combined a practical business mind with an entirely mystical outlook.

THE MYSTIC WAY

By EVELYN UNDERHILL, Author of "Mysticism" A Psychological Study in Christian Origins
Net $3.50

A book in which we are made to see the life of Christ and His Church in the light of the visions of the great mystics—the loftiest, sweetest, sanest souls in this world of futile sounds. One lays aside this volume with a new sense of the reality of the ideal and the validity of the unseen.

A CRUSADER OF FRANCE

From the French of CAPTAIN FERDINAND BELMONT
With an Introduction by HENRY BORDEAUX
Net $1.50

Chicago Daily News says: "The simple letters of his glorious French youth tell things. They tell more of the living details that make the men in this war than any book yet published. It is a simple assertion to make, this classifying of the book in superlatives. The letters are conclusive in satisfying the tenderest curiosities. In allowing Capt. Belmont's letters to be reprinted in this country France allows itself to be read. The letters have that rare quality, atmosphere."

James R. Smith

On Saturday, April 20, the Cathedral Congregation in Faribault, Minnesota, was overwhelmed with the news of the sudden death of the Junior Warden, Mr. James R. Smith; and the whole community grieved with them.

Quiet, modest, brave, good to look upon, he was like the shadow of a rock in a weary land. He grew up in the Cathedral, in its Sunday school, always at church, early taking his father's place as vestryman, sharing all its responsibilities, the dear friend of all its rectors. He was Mayor, and all honored him.

Strength and happiness entered the room with him, and with them an unselfishness and self-forgetfulness which humbled us all.

One of his friends and comrades throughout his life wrote me today, "No one ever thought of sending Jim to the General Convention, but no one has had a funeral for thirty years that he hasn't been a bearer". What a tale that simple sentence tells of a love and fellowship which radiated into every corner of the town which became more beautiful because it was from beginning to end his home!

Charles Lewis Slattery.

CHAPLAINS BILL CHANGED

President Asked to Have Portion Referring to Age Reworded

Washington, D. C.—The Chaplains Bill which recently passed Congress has been returned by the President with a request for the re-wording of the last clause, which, as passed, read:

"Provided, That the maximum age limit of chaplains in the army shall be 45 years."

Feeling that this might be interpreted to force the retirement of chaplains reaching 45 years of age, the President asks that the bill be amended to prohibit the appointment of chaplains who are more than 45 years old.

FOR the present crisis, a prayer which has been used by some of the clergy during the anxious days of the great drive in Picardy was sent to us by the Rev. Laird W. Snell, rector of Grace church, Cortland, New York. The prayers which have been used since the early days of the war have come to seem outworn and inadequate during the last awful month.

The Rev. Dickinson S. Miller, who contributes a very suggestive article on Education of the Clergy: The Root Question, is on the faculty of the General Theological Seminary and of Columbia University, New York. He is also a member of the special Committee on a New Canon on the Education of Ministers.

This Is Our Spring Book Number—Perhaps it would not be out of place to tear down the veil of mystery which hides some of our reviewers and introduce them in the open. "H. J. House of Bishops and Church Unity

WE publish in full on the third editorial page of this issue of THE CHURCHMAN the reply of Dr. Newman Smyth and Professor Walker to the report of the committee of the House of Bishops upon the proposal submitted to that body by a hundred or more petitioners from several Communions in America, including some of our clergy and laymen. We think that Dr. Smyth and Professor Walker have justification for the resentment which they express over the wording and spirit of the bishops' report. We wish that that report might have been conceived in the sympathetic spirit which already exists among the men of every Communion at the Front and in the camps. If the report accurately reflects the attitude of our Church towards tentative proposals submitted in behalf of church unity, the Episcopal Church has not budged one inch toward the spirit of humility and fellowship in which the advocates of unity can ever get a hearing.

In saying this we are fully aware that the House of Bishops in a two days' session employed with other pressing and controversial matters could not reasonably be asked to commit themselves to any plan of unity. Hasty and inadvised action would only damage the cause of unity. But the bishops might so have phrased their reply as to convince the petitioners that the Episcopal Church is having searchings of heart in this matter and is humbly conscious that some of the burden of reconciliation rests upon us as well as upon our fellow-Christians of other Communions. Rome could have taken no loftier or more patronizing attitude toward Protestants than the House of Bishops took in their unhappily-worded report.

In religious controversies no phrase has ever been coined which offers ampler cover for evasion of the issue than the one which creeps into every discussion of church unity—"co-operation that does not involve convictions and principles". In nearly every discussion of church unity we get as far as the phrase "conviction and principles" or "involving essentials", and then we run to cover. We do so in a mood of complacency that would indicate that we had made a contribution.

No conscientious man will ever encroach upon conviction if he can help it. He may unwittingly do so in his eagerness to attain an end passionately sought. But in every reformation, every stride forward in spiritual freedom, the Holy Spirit has inspired majorities to examine in humble mood their principles and convictions. For convictions, principles and conceived essentials may stand in the way of progress. The heaviest cross of St. Paul's ministry in his care of all the churches was the peril to church unity from people's convictions. It took all his inspired energy to get discordant groups of Jewish Christians to perceive that their essentials had nothing whatever to do with Christianity. It is possible to change our convictions. Converted people frequently do so. The Pharisees had convictions and they stuck with martyr-like tenacity to their essentials. Constantly to hurl these phrases into the faces of our Presbyterian and Congregational friends when they submit a proposal is an evidence either of intellectual sloth on our part or of insincerity in our expressed anxiety for church unity.

We look in vain for a single phrase in this document of the House of Bishops that suggests that they are conscious that a new world is in the making and that mankind is shaken by a cataclysm such as the world has never known. It has as cloistered and detached an air as if it had been written a hundred years ago. Empires are tottering to their fall around us; an old civilization is crumbling to dust before our eyes; feudalism and capitalism are merging into a new order of society at this very hour: but the Episcopal Church through its spokesmen meets the eager craving of sister Churches for a new fellowship in a mood as cold and unyielding as if nothing were happening around us to make us brush away the dust from our archives and on our knees ask God whether we have fully understood principles and essentials. May not the time be ripe for some new convictions?

In Bishop Lawrence's address to the Convention of the Diocese of Massachusetts he said: "We are entering a new world. While we will esteem reverently the past, we have fully understood principles and essentials. May of tradition: old bottles have got to give way. We will use our brains, our inventive faculties, our newborn enthusiasm, our prayers to break with tradition if we must, to adjust the ancient forms to the needs of today: to rewrite theology, reinterpret liturgics and let free the Spirit of God, that He may create a new heart in our people and a new soul in our Nation."

We wish that we might have discerned in the bishops' reply to the Memorial and the New Brunswick petition a willingness to employ "our brain, our inventive faculties, our newborn enthusiasm, to break with tradition if we must, to adjust the ancient forms to needs of today, to rewrite theology, reinterpret liturgics and let free the Spirit of God". If we may venture upon prophecy there will be a good many old bottles broken in all our Churches before unity is achieved. But we have yet to see signs of any of the old bottles giving way.

Guarding the Family Circle

THE editor has received the following letter: "Many readers of THE CHURCHMAN will greatly regret the publication in its columns of Bishop Lawrence's fine lecture before the Harvard Medical School February 24, 1918. Discussion of these topics is out of place in a Church paper especially supposed to be fit for family reading. Many people have withdrawn their subscriptions to the New Republic because of its late very free discussion of certain topics."

The letter was anonymous. We sympathize with the unwillingness of the writer to have attached to his name the stigma of this particular type of prudery. It is very hard for us to be patient with such a person. It becomes no easier to be restrained in our judgment of his folly when we are told that a great many nice people feel precisely as does the writer of the letter that we have quoted. To paraphrase the words of our President uttered in another connection, "What we are opposed to is not the feeling of these people but their stupidity. Our heart is with them but our mind has a contempt for them."

The medical profession in a half-hearted way has been trying for generations to get these facts concerning social infection before the people. They have failed to get the co-operation of the press. We think that persistency might have succeeded. There is an especial reason why the medical profession should feel responsible for educating the community in a knowledge of this evil; but the responsibility of the Church is greater in this regard than is that of the medical profession. The Church is asked to bless the marriage of man and woman. It cannot divest itself therefore of moral responsibility for giving its benediction to a marriage that is likely to be a curse to those whom it joins together and to the children who may issue from that marriage.

What reasonable people find especially irritating in the type of prudery that would not permit any sex problem to be mentioned in the family circle is a refusal to weigh consequences. They may guard that family circle by a rigorous exclusion of unpleasant topics, but they cannot shelter the inmates from suffering the penalty of ignorance. Millions of helpless infants are born year after year into the world blind, mentally maimed or doomed to an early death. They have been sacrificed to a preventable disease, but because the word sex enters the discussion people must not be told the facts. Society can go on enduring its present toll of infant mortality, innocent mothers can continue to bear the agony caused by this infection, young men can be made to endure suffering all out of proportion to their guilt, but the name of the dread disease must not be breathed by fathers or mothers in the family circle.

The Church has taken pretty firm ground on the subject of divorce. It is time to attack the problem of disrupted homes from the other end. Let us begin to lay the emphasis upon the sort of marriage the Church will bless. It is about time that girls brought up in a guarded family circle be told by their mothers what kind of marriage will end in immeasurable suffering and sorrow. The worldly side of marriage receives full emphasis from most American homes. Due consideration is given to money question and the "social set". The question of infection is a problem that falls within the range of Christian interest. It is sheer mockery for the Church to bless some of the marriages which it today blesses without any sting of conscience.

Besides, it is folly nowadays to ask whether the question of social infection is a fit one to be introduced into the family circle. The modern home is not protected against salacious literature so long as the popular novels are read; nor against the knowledge of the sex problem if our boys and girls go to the theatre. THE CHURCHMAN will publish anything upon this subject that so responsible an authority as Bishop Lawrence sees fit to send us.

THE WEEK

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

A Troubled Conscience

MORNING after morning, as one opens the daily mail to read distressing appeals for immediate help for our brothers across the seas, one wonders if the world is growing callous to suffering. These reports of misery in Serbia, Armenia, Belgium, because there is a lack of funds with which to purchase food for their relief, are made by responsible persons and are true. The anguish and want which they depict are really being endured at this very hour by millions of human beings. What troubles our conscience is that most of us have much more food than we need and we have the money to purchase food for those who are starving. New York City alone, we suspect, could keep alive if it chose to do so all the hungry people in these stricken lands.

Why don't we do it? We should, if we stopped to think about the conditions that exist and if the appeal was brought directly home to us. Opening a letter at our breakfast table with the picture of a starving Serbian baby on the first page is getting to be a commonplace sensation. Sometimes we send a cheque, sometimes we forget to do so. The problem is very complex for conscientious people, because they have doubtless stinted to the utmost to answer war appeals. These war charities are carried by a small percentage of people. We wish that our clergy, our teachers in the schools, our newspapers might bring home to those who have been accustomed in time of peace to turn a deaf ear to charity appeals that these exceptional times demand extraordinary sacrifice. Buying Liberty Bonds is not sacrifice. The same people give again and again to all the war charities. There should be in America not a million names on these relief lists but twenty-five millions. Is your name there?

An Item in Democracy

IT remained for a representative of labor to make the most telling thrust at Mr. Hylan's fuddled conception of what a Health Department is for. Incidentally this representative of labor has indicated what sort of extravagance is true economy in a democracy. Mr. James J. Bagley of the Pressmen's Union in answer to a flippant question of the chairman of the committee of investigation, said:

> Your ideal of democracy is to save $30 to stop the publication of a pamphlet giving the history of the Health Department. My ideal of democracy is to spend $300 for the printing of that pamphlet. My ideal is to have the greatest number of persons in the country read that pamphlet, so as to know exactly what the Health Department of this city is doing.

Mr. Bagley also called attention to the fact that 60 per cent. of workingmen examined in the draft were rejected for physical reasons. "We want you," he said, "to tell the working men what to do to keep in good physical condition."

The Dark People

IN Ernest Poole's new book on Russia's Crisis, friends of democracy the world over will get reassuring news of the essential soundness of the soul of Russia. It is from the children of dark Russia that the new world may yet get its freedom. One of the liberal bishops said to Mr. Poole:

> "I hope that after this terrible war all peoples will be brothers in Christ. And yet I want to see each nation keep its self-hood. Do you understand? You must remain Americans; we Russians must stay Russian—and then meeting as eternal friends we shall have the more to give to each other.
> "We shall have more to give than some of you dream. I see for Great Russia a future now that may spread its influence over the world—not as the Germans spread their Kultur, but simply by the power of a religious brotherhood so vast that all the world will feel how good it is to be our friends."

Foreign Students in the United States

THERE are at present something like 6,000 foreign students, representing fifty nations, enrolled in the United States. About one-third of these are on scholarships supplied by their own governments to win which they must have passed a severe examination. The rest have come here as the result of their own initiative and perseverance. They represent the future leaders of China, Japan, Latin America, Armenia, India. The length of their stay varies from two to eight years. They are studying in over five hundred different institutions in every part of the United States and Canada.

Three years ago the Committee on Friendly Relations Among Foreign Students was organized in order that the problems affecting these eager young foreigners in our midst might be solved in a central clearing house. Offices are maintained in New York, and in addition to a general secretary, Chinese, Japanese and Latin American secretaries are employed to co-operate with students of their own nationalities. This committee has recently published an Educational Guide for Foreign Students, which may be procured from them for 50 cents by writing to 124 East Twenty-eighth street, New York City. This Guide is published in English and, we presume, in as many languages as there are foreign students.

For a number of years Church people have made it a point to show hospitality to foreign students who come here with letters from some missionary bishop or who by chance cross their paths. Only recently a church in the Province of Rhode Island united to entertain a group of Chinese students who were holding a conference in their city. There seems to be no more direct way in which to do missionary work than by showing Christian hospitality to these strangers in our midst. It is a reproach the shame of which we should all share that Chinese students not infrequently return to their homes with the report that "America is not Christian. I have been there, and I saw no Christians".

The Massacre of the Innocents

DURING the month of March twenty-seven children were killed by automobiles in the streets of New York. One of these, a six-year-old boy, was knocked down by a motor vehicle a stone's throw from the doors of THE CHURCHMAN. The toll of life in the streets of the metropolis was 12 per cent. greater last month than in March, 1917.

A short item, crowded into an inconspicuous corner appears in the newspapers; perhaps an editorial or a cartoon that speaks more eloquently than words. Then we go gaily on.

This is the same sort of toll that we used to pay for unprotected machinery; many casualties among grown workers, more among children, and a printed sigh. But we have learned at last that machinery can be protected and accidents avoided. Firetraps were likewise condoned. Then came the Triangle fire.

That we need to conserve the man power of the United States is a truism. Then why kill twenty-seven children on the streets of one city in a single month?

Reply to the Bishops' Resolution

DR. NEWMAN SMYTH and Professor Williston Walker have made the following reply to the report on the memorial to the House of Bishops in regard to Christian unity.

In the communication accompanying the Appeal for an act of unity, which was laid before the Episcopal House of Bishops at their meeting April 10, in New York, we expressed the earnest desire that at this present crisis there might come from the Episcopate a call of Christian leadership to which other churches of every name might respond. In their reply, which has been communicated to us, we regret to find expressed only a "humble lamenting of the comparative powerlessness of the Church in this great world crisis", an exhortation to the practice of the non-controversial virtues, and to prayerful preparation and patient waiting until at some undetermined time after the war is over the proposed World Conference "may take into careful and deliberate consideration the questions concerning Faith and Order which now divide us". In this reply no policy is outlined, no suggestion is offered for immediate action to meet the crisis which the Church now faces. The reply seems to us to be the failure of Christian statesmanship. The hour of supreme duty passes—and official Christianity remains silent.

The immediate practical question presented by us was this: shall any of our soldiers and sailors, who are now venturing their lives in the defense of our common Christianity against the Caesarism of the world, be deprived of their full assurance of the sacraments of religion when an Episcopally ordained clergyman may not be available? The practical solution which we suggested, and which went to the very core of our existing disunity, was that a joint consecration and authorization should be given to the chaplains by both the Episcopal and non-Episcopal Churches. We desired that whenever any of our soldiers and sailors at the front or on battleships should seek from the Churches for the bread of life, the answer should not be an ecclesiastical stone. The reply of the Bishops rejects our proposals as a "patched up peace", an "ill considered expedient, endangering and retarding the cause of Reunion, and provocative of fresh misunderstandings;" but it offers to us no other proposal. When we seek further for the reasons for the Bishops' summary rejection of our appeal, we find that they do not take up the successive considerations which we deemed might render our suggested action feasible and honorably acceptable to them as well as to ourselves; but, leaving these without notice, they turn aside and, while not mentioning the names of any communions, they offer two reflections upon non-Episcopal Churches in general as their reasons for rejecting any overtures for immediate acts of Church unity. They allege that "the real difference between religious communions goes down, in many cases, to the recognition, or not, of a definite revelation of God's mind and will made by our Lord Jesus Christ His incarnate Son, and of His Church as the minister of His truth and grace". Have the Bishops forgotten, or have they never heard, that at a preparatory North American Conference for the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order a paper was presented by the Congregational Commission containing the following declarations concerning the Spiritual Basis of Fellowship: "The basis of the proposed World Conference is the faith, resting on the Incarnation of the Son of God, of the whole Church as itself created by Christ and continued from age to age by His indwelling Life until He comes".

"The invitation of the World Conference appeals directly to the Christian conviction of the essential and indestructible wholeness of the one Church of God throughout the world." This declaration of faith was solemnly adopted without dissenting voice by official representatives of some sixty different churches of the United States and Canada, and included among them were several bishops and clergymen of the Episcopal Church. While the notable confession of faith still stands, we submit that this difference which is given as a reason in the reply for continued division between us does not in fact exist, and that the allegation of it should be withdrawn.

We are obliged to notice that this objection in this reply goes still further. It is said that "to join the commission of a chaplain from whatever Church he may come, would be to deny that any truth, including that of the Triune Being of God, or of the Incarnation of the Eternal Son, is of real importance and necessity". It would hardly seem necessary for us to observe that while exceptional cases might require some special consideration, that need not prevent those who are in essential agreement in faith from practising their religion in mutual trust together.

The second of the two reasons given not only for declining our proposals, but also any negotiations with us looking toward immediate steps for the unification of our Christian forces, runs as follows: "We must remind the memorialists that in the case of many of the religious communions represented by them there is no central and authoritative body with which we can treat as to questions of inter-communion. By the terms of their organization each congregation is independent as to its doctrine, discipline and worship". While this statement was being adopted by the Bishops, we would respectfully remind them, there were lying on their table the following resolutions of the National Council of the Congregational Churches, and also of their Commission on Unity. The National Council at its last meeting in October, 1917, unanimously resolved that "we do hereby authorize and enjoin the Executive Committee, our several commissions and particularly the Commission on Federation, Comity and Unity, so far as in them lies, to seek the peace of the Churches, and to do whatsoever they may find occasion to do in order that the many Churches of our own country may become one Christian power to overcome the world". And in order that we personally might be sufficiently accredited to the House of Bishops there was also laid before them a vote of our Commission on Unity authorizing us "to enter into negotiations with the House of Bishops, or any body representing the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States, and to receive in behalf of said Commission any communication which may be presented". Our National Council we believe to be a "central body" representative of our Congregational democracy, which, while exercising no lordship over our churches, possesses such moral authority that our Episcopal brethren, if so disposed, may confidently treat with it on questions of common concern for the advancement of the Kingdom of God.

We are far from insisting upon any proposals we may have suggested as the only or the best possible measures in this hour of emergency. We still hold ourselves in readiness to receive from the Bishops, whether collectively or individually, any overtures for unifying action that shall express the fundamental unity of Christianity. But we cannot on our part consent to remain in what the Bishops have so truly described as a position of "comparative powerlessness". At this hour, when as of old all the tribes of our Israel are called to come down against the mighty, our churches cannot be content to sit like Reuben among their sheep folds listening to the pipings of their flocks. We must decline therefore to re-

Our City of Refuge

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

A FEW years ago Professor Santayana of Harvard in a masterly essay made the striking statement that such hold as the Church of Rome possessed over the minds of men today was due to its firm refusal to be rationalized. The same would apply mutatis mutandis to all other Churches. The Professor was writing from a detached standpoint concerning the struggle of the Modernists against authority. In his judgment, he said, the instinct of authority was right in its firm opposition to Modernism and all its works, for if Modernism as a spirit, tendency or outlook were to succeed, the peculiar claim of the Church to a hearing was doomed. The Church is either the custodian and mediator of supernal mysteries or it is nothing; the moment you reduce it to the level of a society existing side by side with others for the promotion of temporal well-being, and with no stronger sanction for its existence, you have destroyed any spell it has ever been able to exercise over heart and conscience.

This perhaps is not quite the way the distinguished academic in question put his case but is sufficiently near to it to be allowed to pass. It is worth pondering seriously. There are many persons at the present time who insist that the Church must be prepared to assimilate its dogmas to modern modes of thought or perish, that as an institution it is looked upon with scant respect because of its failure to do this, and that until we are able to couch our message in the mental dialect of the age there will be fewer and fewer to listen. Of those who utter this warning or reproach not a few are earnest Churchmen themselves; it is hardly possible to take up a periodical devoted to the interests of the educated classes without coming across their latest jeremiads, often very ably expressed. They are right too if we have regard only to the duty of making ourselves intelligible to the masses; the profoundest truths can be simply stated, and the greatness of a theme is no excuse for obscurity. Never was a simpler teacher than our Lord so far as the form of His utterances were concerned, but who has ever yet exhausted their spiritual content? No one who dares to speak in His name today should be satisfied with any lower ideal; it is our bounden duty to state Christian truth as far as we can in language that the humblest can understand; there is no justification for employing the mental symbolism of a by-gone age when addressing ourselves to the needs of the present.

But that is all that should be conceded, and we should be careful not to go farther. The Church is a supernatural society and must never lose sight of the fact or the very thing it seeks to accomplish will be rendered void, namely, the task of winning for Christ the allegiance of a sinful, suffering world. The form of an appeal is one thing and the substance is quite another. Christianity is not primarily a system of ethics nor a scheme for the regulation of human affairs in the lump, nor indeed of secular application at all. This is a perilous thing to say if it be not carefully qualified. No one would be so foolish as to assert that the Gospel had nothing to say on the subject of man's relation to his brother man here on earth or how peace and happiness can best be secured to human society as a whole; but let it never be forgotten that this is not the first object of Christian endeavor but only the outcome thereof; the first object is to bring men into right relations with God and the life eternal, to put them in touch with a reality above and beyond all temporal values. To make the mistake of encouraging men to think and feel about religion as though it were on all fours with Parliaments, Medicine, Commerce, Art and Science, the Press and Literature generally—in fact with all that constitutes the sum of human interests in an ordinary way from hour to hour—is to bid for spiritual bankruptcy. The world we have cheated thus will curse us by and by if we do.

For the world is hungry—weary and hungry for the stable and abiding, for divine cleansing and comfort, for escape from itself, and retreat to a refuge immune to the ills of mortality. We have this treasure in our keeping; the Church is, or should be, a City of Refuge for troubled souls, for those who have learned the utter emptiness of life which concentrates attention upon earthly well-being only or chiefly. Do not let us rationalize too much in dealing either with the wicked or heart-broken; they do not want to prove, they want to possess. "A religion that I can understand is no religion for me" was the startling observation once made to the writer by a man of the world. The former disapproved it at the time, but is far from wishing to do so now. That which transcends reason need not outrage reason; the spiritual and the intellectual are on different planes, and even the ethical may be advocated on natural instead of supernatural grounds. Religion is in essence both super-intellectual and super-ethical, though in the midst of temporal conditions it has to be presented in terms that take account of intellectual and ethical values.

Let us pay heed to the warnings of experience in these great matters. Human nature does not alter so very much after all, and what human nature craves in religion is not that which most closely resembles the rest of life but that which does not. The weary and the heavy laden, the disenchanted with secular hopes and prospects, the mourner and the penitent, the lonely and the sad all alike yearn for the touch of the one staple reality that transcends the shifting shows of time and sense. If religion cannot give them that then they have no use for it. In the words of Francis Thompson, himself no bad representative of the modern mind in its more spiritual susceptibilities:

> I dimly guess what time in mists confounds;
> Yet ever and anon a trumpet sounds
> From the hid battlements of Eternity;
> Those shaken mists a space unsettle, then
> Round the half-glimpsed turrets slowly wash again.
> But not ere Him who summoneth
> I first have seen, enwound
> With glooming robes purpureal, cypress-crowned;
> His name I know, and what His trumpet saith.

The Church is a City of Refuge from the world, not the servant of the world nor one more organization added to the multitude that make up the sorry world and are destined to pass away with it or before it; the Church is a ship to outride the storm that overwhelms secular institutions and individual fortunes, it is not a thing that man can either make or destroy; the Church shall live when nations and civilizations cease to be, indestructible, imperishable, but only because it is not of this world but of that which is to come.

For the Present Crisis

O GOD, in this hour when the future of humanity trembles in the balance, while the armies of the nations meet in desperate onset, and the power of the foe appalls and makes the heart to sink, give unconquerable faith and resolution, we pray thee, and in thy good time the victory, to those who fight for right and the cause of thy dear Son dying to save mankind. Be thou in this hour wisdom to our generals, decision to our officers, courage and heroism to our fighters, endurance to the wounded, tenderness and strength to those who minister to them, light eternal to the dying, and the spirit of faith and prayer and holy trust to those at home, with comfort from above to all who mourn; we ask through him who on his cross bore the agony and curse of the world's sin and rose from the dead that men might live in him; thy Son, the world's Redeemer, Jesus Christ. Amen.

ducation of the Clergy; the Root-Question

By THE REV. DICKINSON S. MILLER

VE cannot advance or even get upon firm ground in this subject until we ask the root-question, What for? What is the object of theological education? at do the clergy require to know in order to meet vital needs of their people?

This appears to be almost too elementary a question ıame at all. It is a curious fact, however, that we all wont to fall into the strange habit of leaving it uncon-red. It belongs to the dangerous class of "obvious" ters: so obvious that they need not be mentioned—therefore need not be faced! We have a fine dis-e for the obvious, we learn to class certain thoughts as ious, to form the habit therefore of putting them dis-ıfully aside whenever they appear; and hence really have never confronted these thoughts in our lives!

It will not do, for instance, either to adopt or to retain udy as a preparation for the ministry because it is a e thing" for the clergy to be familiar with it, nor yet ıuse a learned ministry is an admirable thing, nor ıuse we have always held that the ministry should w so-and-so, nor because the attainments of the min-y should never fall below a certain standard, etc., etc. se, as thus expressed, are arbitrary opinions. There ıo guiding principle. They ignore the definite test. ıt test is solely this: Are these studies part of the equipment for the clergyman's actual lifework? If ning is required it is because learning actually tells ıis lifework. It may tell in the finest, the most spir-l way, the least noticeable way, but it is because it ; and only for that reason that it should be included he curriculum. We have not in the case of theological cation the choice between a "cultural" and a voca-al, a liberal and a professional, view. There is no m for doubt that it is professional, not an affair of ure for its own sake. Everything must be measured he needs that are to be met.

Of course theological education should do a profound ice for the student himself, for his spiritual, moral, ıtal life. Still it does not exist for his sake. He and spiritual life and his whole life are to be applied to service of his people, and theological education is vided by the Church to form him for their sake, not own.

Medical and legal education have been transformed he past forty years by applying just this test. The ellent work of the Romanist Father J. T. Smith on Training of a Priest is largely dominated by the e principle, and the indications are that the carefully ɔared plan undertaken by Pius X for the reformation talian seminaries has been similarly influenced. Owing he act of General Convention the Church has now to sider "What changes in the present canons on theo-cal education are desirable?" It cannot be expected the question of theological education will ever be wn open more broadly than it is now, or that there ever be a better opportunity to focus scrutiny upon We can hardly forget the recent words of the Arch-ıop of York: "Do not suppose that the Church will he only institution unchanged by the war." The vol-written by seventeen Church of England army-plains and chaplains-general whom the war has ught closer to men (entitled The Church in the Fur-e) confirms this thought with singular unanimity, and Editor's Foreword says: "One thing is certain; we never again be content with much that we accepted quite natural in those far-away days before we came here." There seems to be full occasion at this time onsider the educational need of the priest in the light the vital need of the people. Is not the Church as ards this subject in the position of a Christian man remembers the duty of self-examination and amend-it?

Within the compass of this article I can offer only one two illustrations of the results that the root-inquiry ngs forth.

What then are the departments of the clergyman's work? Shall we say: (1) Sacraments and Services, (2) Sermons, (3) Sunday School, Bible Classes and the like, (4) The relation to individuals, including pastoral advice, (5) The organization of "parish activities" of any sort, (6) Parish Management in all its phases? Or, more formally: (1) Liturgical, (2) Homiletical, (3) Pedagogic, (4) Pastoral, (5) Organizing, (6) Administrative. I state the work in such a way that it will apply to all our parishes.

If now we look at the existing curriculum solely as a means to prepare a man for these functions, what is the result?

It is somewhat striking, if not startling. We are not in the habit of asking the question and hence we are not prepared for the answer. The bulk of the curriculum, we must conclude, is there for a homiletical purpose; the reason, that there is no other purpose that it could directly serve. Of course this is not its conscious purpose—there is the trouble. But if we consider the Biblical study, and the language-study tributary thereto, dogmatic theology, church history, Christian ethics, apologetics and the rest, perhaps all except music, a portion of pastoral theology, and a portion of religious education; in a word, the great bulk of the course; we see that it can in the main serve no purpose except to form a competent expositor of the Christian religion.

Of course we must extend the word "homiletical" a little (no other word is convenient) and make it cover, not only what is said in the pulpit and on the platform but also the teaching of religion and the expression of its principles in conversation and correspondence. Taken for the moment in this sense we must say then that more than three-quarters of the present course can have no other object than to prepare a man for this function. Let us repeat, the studies should form him inwardly and thus influence others through his example, etc.; still the main vent in his ministry which these studies have, their main relation to his usefulness, must be homiletical.

This conclusion, when suggested, has been accepted by so many that I need not labor the thought further here.

But the fact suggests a double comment. (1) Momentous as the prophetic office is (and indeed its importance, especially at this time, is not easily exaggerated) still such a proportion of the preparatory studies is more than its due share of the whole. And (2) the preaching function does not profit in any degree comparable with the outlay of time and work, for the simple reason that the bearing of all these studies upon it is not conscious and therefore is not made effective.

In homiletics there is much admirable and systematic instruction, but the time for it is apt to be decidedly stinted. One could be tempted to fancy it a minor study. Now if in fact a main end, though unavowed, of the curriculum is homiletics, why not avow it and act on the avowal? Why not give it a place in the centre which it has not now? Why not in the other work remember its needs? Is it not unpractical to have a curriculum the chief usefulness of which can be none other than that of preparing a competent spokesman for the Christian religion, and then putting the express study of spokesmanship off in a comparatively small compartment of the curriculum? If we thus give homiletics the importance in the education that its place in the lifework deserves we shall at once note how this act of justice lights up the whole situation. We shall see (to speak of but one aspect) how it calls for the two studies which must next be considered.

Looking again at the curriculum as it now is—standing back as it were and viewing it as a whole—another striking fact appears. The studies fall into two groups, one much larger than the other. The first let us call Christian knowledge or simply Christianity. It includes of course Holy Scripture, Dogmatic Theology, Church History, Christian Ethics, Liturgics (on one side), Polity, Apologetics, etc. The second group let us call Ministration. This would include the training in the functions incident to the priestly calling and includes Liturgics (on another side), Homiletics, Pastoral Care, Religious Education, Elocution, Music, etc. Are these two groups, Christianity and Ministration, really the whole equipment needed? The one represents the sacred knowledge which the Christian minister is to possess and bring to the world, the second represents the practical knowledge of the manner in which he is to do his duties for the world's benefit. But what of the world itself? What of "the field"? What of humanity, human life, the human soul, mind, instincts and emotions? What of the forces of society and the differences of individuals? Should not the Christian minister know something of the living material in and upon which he is to work? Should he make no attempt to attain a trained understanding of human needs? Still keeping our point of view from which we look over the whole scheme of study and measure it by the lifework which it should subserve, do we not clearly see that what is needed is not a twofold, but a threefold preparation; (1) Christianity, (2) human life in its need of Christianity, (3) the ministration thereto? There must be not only knowledge of the seed to be sown but of the properties of the soils in which it is to be sown, and of just how to sow it. The imperative demand for the second department springs out of the last. We cannot win and help and save without understanding. To this need Dr. Peters has drawn attention in his remarkable article On Training the Clergy.

Imagine a medical school in which much is impressed upon the students about the inspiration of healing and of saving life, about the general power of medicine to accomplish this end, about the prevalence of disease (like sin) in the world, about the history of medicine, etc.; also something about how to handle surgical instruments and how to administer drugs; but little or nothing about the human body, its organs, the way in which these organs become liable to disease, the special forms of disease and the modes of treating them, the relation of surgery and drugs, of food, fresh air, exercise and diversion to the actual ailments of men. Would there not be a certain resemblance between such a school and the average theological seminary? The study of human nature is required in each of the six departments mentioned above. In the exact measure in which a clergyman comes close to men and their problems does he feel this gap in his education. It is pointed out, for example, with a vigor and feeling born of experience, in the excellent article on "Religious Education and the Training of the Clergy", by the Rev. T. W. Pym in The Church in the Furnace.

Such a department of study falls at once into two divisions, practical psychology and practical sociology. It is with extreme reluctance that I use the word psychology at all. Most of the textbooks on this subject, though more or less adapted for university use, contain a great amount of material simply irrelevant to our purpose. What we need is the study of human nature and its needs, the study of temperament, mood, preference, and their roots; the inquiring into the causes of action and feeling. All this in the light of concrete, everyday cases. Psychology professes in its name to be the science of the soul. In its formal textbooks it is rather an introduction to that science, and for our purposes a prolix introduction. It is a long, long time getting to the soul. Practical psychology is for the most part not taught in universities. Still a literature of solid value for our purpose exists and is yearly growing. Any teacher of Christian ethics, of pedagogy, of homiletics, or of apologetics would be in a position to give solid aid to students by equipping himself to guide them in this study. To equip himself is not difficult. There would be certain literature of a more academic kind, appropriate for the teacher's preparation only, and other literature to be read by students with his aid. It is unnecessary to stand off from the subject on the ground that trained teachers do not exist; the subject is not intractable; they will exist by beginning the work. Half a loaf is better than none, especially if the half-loaf has a tendency miraculously to grow and multiply. One principle must be kept in view. We must cling to the psyche and let go the "ology". I say this as one who has had occasion to teach the science for the most part rather from the side of theoretic principle a analysis than from the side I now put forward. Guarc as here proposed, there is no teachable subject that c more readily deliver itself from the dry, nay, parch condition into which academic disciplines too easily f and steep itself in life. To turn from study to soc diversion is for the young man usually a relief. But is in the people he knows that he will find the most tell illustration and quickening for his knowledge of hun nature. This is one of the few studies in which the fac ties for "field-work", "source-work", "laboratory-wo do not wait to be elaborately provided. Memory its yields a store of illustration. Literature, not least novel and the drama, teems with examples. Nay, it is literary essays and the like that some of the best psyc logical analysis is to be found. Principles and theor such as "voluntarism" heavily propounded at the end the 19th century are to be read quite as tellingly set fo in Hazlitt's essays at the beginning of the century. the illustrative aid in biography I need hardly speak.

It has been well pointed out that unlike the student law or medicine, the theological student has to work f of all upon himself even though that work be for sake of others. Practical psychology means simply kn ing how to grapple with the human soul and charac To the priest far more than to the literal physician co the summons "Heal thyself". So immediate, so vita the demand for this study.

Moreover, it would help us strikingly to eke out a complete the work already done with acumen and disce ment by great confessors and certain devotional writ of the past. John Stuart Mill, in whom scientific psyc ogy of the older English type was bred in the bone, s that some of the doctors of the Church had a dee insight into the profundities and windings of the hun heart than one of Mill's own chief teachers. It because their eye was on the psyche and not on the olo The truth is that such work as that of these doctors the Church on the one hand and the practical psycho of the present time on the other cry out for each othe order to form the helpful knowledge and insight wh the Christian priest so urgently needs.

Psychology has become too much associated with cold dissecting methods of laboratory and lecture-ro It requires to become, and is becoming, sympathetic p chology.

Of practical sociology I need only remind the rea that the body of literature is much more clearly rec nized and established than in the corresponding type psychology. Under the name of social psychology two studies draw together and powerfully influence e other.

And they need to be taught in the seminary not they might be taught in universities but with an eye the clergyman's work and opportunities. In this se they are professional studies. We must study society the spirit of Him who "lifted up His eyes and beheld multitude" in their need. And we must remember theology, the science of God, is no more properly a st for the priesthood than psychology, the science of soul.

Four Englishmen

By THE REV. CHARLES LEWIS SLATTERY, D.D.

JNTIL recently the war has deprived us of biographies. This Winter, however, a number of excellent memoirs have been published. Mrs. Humphry ard has begun in Harper's Magazine delightful reminisces, giving us intimate revelations of the great people e has known. Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson, with an wavering assurance that the least detail of any member his family must be of interest to the world, has told e story of his sister. In our own country, besides the e of John Fiske, we are grateful for the brief memoirs d letters of courageous youth like Victor Chapman, o have found themselves in the Great War.

The four lives of which I intend to write in this article re all prominent, in one way or another, in the England the passing generation. It is impressive to discover t, though each must have known of the others, there no reference in any of the four books to such acquainceship. This shows the complexity of our modern life: live in a world of specialists.

The Life of Archdeacon Wilberforce[1] is marred in the ling. Always an eloquent preacher, for many years the vocate of Temperance, the loved and admired pastor of arge London congregation, he furnished material for a rceful story; but Mr. Russell, as an ecclesiastical layan, spends his valuable time with details which are tirely unimportant and dull. The glimpses which one tches of Bishop Samuel Wilberforce make one thankful at he never became Archbishop of Canterbury.

The life of Dr. Illingworth[2] is also disappointing in its rkmanship. Many of us have been grateful to Dr. ingworth's writings and had been led to expect a good al from his biography. Many years an invalid, he fused to leave his small country parish, where he could ep sufficiently well to study and to write; for he knew at his function was to clarify difficult aspects of theogical thought. The editor is constantly reminding us at Illingworth had a keen sense of humor; but there is rdly an example of it in the whole book. To be told at a man is jolly and to have no evidence of it is pressing. The most interesting period in each year for ingworth was when the Lux Mundi party, a group of oughtful Englishmen, met in his study for theological scussion. Out of these meetings came the important ok Lux Mundi. But the most illuminating pages in e memoir are those that contain the brief article of anon Scott Holland. Dr. Holland speaks of Dr. Illingorth's "deep droning voice so mellow and so winning", his fastidious care "in the choice of terms, and in the rve and movement of phrases"; but he also points out e limitations fixed upon life in an English rural rectory. Longworth," he says, "gave Illingworth no intellectual tercourse with men of his own calibre. He was alone ith himself, so far as thought went, for the greater part every year. And he was never much of a reader. He ad a few great books well; but hardly anything else. o it came about that he, who, in his younger days, was r most audacious pioneer in the free play of reason, ew unsympathetic to the new intellectual moods. He id not keep up with their changes and chances. He affed: he mocked: he held them at arm's-length. . . . . le was content with applying in some fresh form the miliar premises which he had made his own. This nded by giving a certain sameness to what he had to say. was the inevitable price that he paid for the security nd peace of the unchanging background which alone nabled him to do his work."

Stopford Brooke[3] is known to most of us through his ife of Frederick Robertson and through his facile books n English literature. He became at length practically a Unitarian, though never identifying himself with Unitarinism. He continued to be a popular preacher in a London chapel and was a delightful companion. There is a ertain atmosphere of worldliness, which keeps him from eing quite his best, and one has the feeling that form vas to him always a little more than substance. No etter illustration of this appears in the volumes than in this letter to one of his children, which, in spite of its suggestiveness, has its limitations: "I do not want you to knit your brows over a letter and to write it as if it were a task. A letter ought to be gaily written, and quickly, and should go to and fro like a swallow over the surface of things, but then it should go gracefully—and it should use pretty phrases, and the writer should care about putting them in a pretty, half-poetical, or glancing way, in order that the reader may be charmed."

The one biography of the Winter likely to be a book of permanent value is Lord Morley's Recollections.[4] Lord Morley leads us sure-footedly through the literature and politics of his time. It would be hard to find anywhere cleverer descriptions than are here given of George Meredith and Matthew Arnold. It is a pleasure to find so capable a critic giving Arnold's poetry a first place. Of Froude he says, "He was the easiest of companions at table or in a walk, fond of truth in his own way, but too ready to snatch her by the hair of the head and to think the quarrel between Protestant and Catholic the only thing in the universe that matters".

In the summer of 1891 Morley, at a luncheon at Londonderry House, met the German Emperor. "The Emperor bowed and shook hands", he wrote in his diary, "asked if I had recovered from my illness, and said that they had influenza in Germany, and there my intercourse with him ended. But I was immensely interested in watching a man who had such a part to play in Europe. He is rather short; pale, but sunburnt; carries himself well; walks into a room with the stiff stride of a Prussian soldier; speaks with a good deal of intense and energetic gesture, not like a Frenchman, but staccato; his voice strong but pleasant; his eye bright, clear, and full; mouth resolute; the cast of face grave or almost stern in repose, but as he sat between those two pretty women, he lighted up with gaiety, and a genial laugh. Energy, rapidity, restlessness in every movement from the short, quick inclinations of the head to the planting of the foot. But I should be disposed strongly to doubt whether it is all sound, steady, and the result of a—what Herbert Spencer would call—rightly co-ordinated organization."

One more description will indicate the background of the book: "After dinner, we went into what I do think was the most fascinating room I ever saw in a house—great or small—one of the libraries, lined with well-bound books on white enameled shelves with a few, but not too many, nick-nacks lying about, and all illuminated with the soft radiations of many clusters of wax candles. A picture to remember: Spencer with his noble carriage and fine red beard; Mr. G. seated on a low stool, discoursing as usual, playful, keen, versatile; Rosebery, saying little, but now and then launching a pleasant mot; Harcourt cheery, expansive, witty. Like a scene from one of Dizzy's novels; and all the actors, men with parts to play."

A man cannot write such a book as this, however privileged he may be, without inviting judgment upon himself. Keen as Lord Morley is seen to be in its pages, he never quite loses himself, and it is somewhat painful to find him constantly quoting all the opinions which others have of his quality and attainment. The very skill with which he introduces the praise increases the sense of self-consciousness and complacency. It is hard to find in the book any sense of the infinite mystery of life, and it does not look out upon any vision beyond a successful career. With all possible admiration for the honorable character which is revealed, one can only be sorry that the sense of awe and wonder before the majesty of living is lacking, and so an exceedingly brilliant man falls short of the greatness which seems almost within his grasp.

The Poetry of the Year

By MOREBY ACKLOM

I—IN THE FRONT RANK

A statement recently published in the English press announced that over four hundred volumes of new poetry had been published in Great Britain during the past eighteen months.

Poetry here has not come upon us in quite such a flood as that, but there has been sufficient of it produced to make the task of selection not entirely easy. However, the volume which probably contains the most arresting poetry offered to the American public during the past year, which has the rare and unmistakable hall-mark of true poetic genius, comes in the modest guise of a little volume of only sixty-four small pages, and under the unassuming title of Poems[1] by Ralph Hodgson. And, even so, the print is large and many of the pieces in the book are merely fragments.

Yet it is here that we meet a bold and original vision coupled with an extraordinary capacity for condensing into a few brief lines of music pregnant thought and wide imagination, that another might have spread over scores of pages. Who, for instance, can read this nameless poem of a single quatrain:

Reason hath moons, but moons not hers
Lie mirrored on the sea,
Confounding her astronomers,
But, O, delighting me.

without being haunted by it for evermore? Or who can taste the Wordsworthian simplicity of the description of the gypsy girl at the fair:

I liked the flaring yellow scarf
Bound loose about her throat,
I liked her showy purple gown
And flashy velvet coat.

A man came up, too loose of tongue,
And said no good to her;
She did not blush as Saxons do,
Or turn upon the cur;

She fawned and whined "Sweet gentleman
A penny for three tries!"
—But, oh, the den of wild things in The darkness of her eyes!

without realizing the whole grim tragedy implicated in these few melodious and apparently artless syllables? "The Bull", again is a whole epic tragedy flashed out in a half dozen pages of resonant, easy stanzas—while "Eve", in its tender yet fantastic reiterations, strikes a note of fairy-like strangeness.

No two of the poems in this wonderful little volume are alike; though they are all marked by that certainty of touch and inevitableness of word which mark the master. In fact, the puzzling point about the book is just that. So much art, so much imagination, so great a command of words, of music, and of subject, and yet so small an output.

Another new volume of great significance, though rather from its promise than its perfections of performance, is Mr. Sassoon's The Old Huntsman,[2] a peculiarly mixed collection of poems, of which the title piece is a dramatic portrait in blank verse—somewhat after the style of Browning, of an old foxhunter, who in his dotage, before the fire, soliloquizes and presents us with a picture of one phase of fox-hunting, feudal England which the war will end forever.

But the principal interest in the volume is in the shorter pieces: Many of these—and certainly the crudest—deal with the war. In fact, the war seems to give a savageness and wilful roughness to Mr. Sassoon's muse; yet there is essential strength in them, even when he is, in the name of the British soldier, unnecessarily profane. Few can read the eight lines captioned "Blighters", for instance, without sympathizing with its bitterness against the froth and inanity in vogue at home, while men are dying deaths of nameless horror in the trenches:

The House is crammed: tier beyond tier they grin
And cackle at the show, while prancing ranks
Of harlots shrill the chorus, drunk with din;
"We're sure the Kaiser loves the dear old Tanks!"

I'd like to see a tank come down the stalls.
Lurching to ragtime tunes or "Home, Sweet Home"
—And there'd be no more jokes in music-halls
To mock the riddled corpses round Bapaume.

But in very remarkable contrast to such verses as these is the calm beauty of "A Child's Prayer", "Today" and "Southward", and especially of "The Last Meeting", with its sudden rise to complete understanding of the mystery of immanence.

Ah, but there was no need to call his name
He was beside me now, as swift as light and—
I know that he is lost among the stars,
And may return no more but in their light.

Just as naturally as we asked what Mr. Hodgson has done, we may inquire what Mr. Sassoon is going to do; for this volume seems to indicate that he may do almost anything he sets his mind to.

For a complete contrast to Mr. Sassoon's imperfect and at present unmeasured strength, we may turn to Witter Bynner's Grenstone Poems.[3] It is a pity that Mr. Bynner's publishers announce on the wrapper of Grenstone Poems that it is a "passionate record of the coming of love", for whatever else his book is, it is not passionate. Graceful it is, deft, pretty in places, lyrical always, but never passionate. Even in the poems directly concerning "Celia", the mainspring of the sequence, where Mr. Bynner rises to his very best, there is a sophistication of technique that takes the keen edge off the emotion.

To be perfectly candid, Grenstone Poems is much too long. Mr. Bynner has collected together here many poems and verses which clearly had quite a different origin, and they not only impede the flow of the genuine Grenstone ones, they dilute them. The "Celia" poems are by all odds the most sincere and the finest in the volume, and they should have stood by themselves. Even so, Grenstone Poems stands ont head and shoulders above the season's work of American poets, by its perfection of workmanship and its beauty.

The publication here some six years ago or Forty-Two Poems by James Elroy Flecker raised interest among the discerning as to the future of this original and musical young poet. The opening of his career, that death, in 1915, cut short, p

Admirers of Mr. Masefield will be glad to greet his new volume Lollingdon Downs,[6] as it contains, possibly, more Masefield than it does poetry, consisting as it does of a series of short pieces not connected by any visible thread, and differing very much in subject and technical perfection, and yet in several of them is beauty, beauty of thought, of word and of suggestion.

The poems are curiously uneven. Mr. Masefield seems almost careless whether he makes poetry or verse, or mere metrical prose. Three at least of these pieces are of his best, and that is very good; but on the whole the volume is disappointing, because its aim is uncertain. The title, too, is baffling as it is not clear which, if any, of the poems are "Lollingdon Downs", and which are "Other Poems". The collection appears to be a gathering up of short odd pieces, some few of which fortuitously are similar in tone, or refer to various spots and associations in the same neighborhood. A book, in fact, to read when you are in the mood for solving a problem.

II—OTHERS WORTH WHILE

Directly we turn aside from the outstanding few, we are face to face with the very large production of verse that is not only good verse, but much of it very real and beautiful poetry. In fact, it is hard to say what prevents some of the many writers in this class from attaining to the front rank. Such a one, for instance, is Margaret Widdemer, whose Factories[7] has just been reissued by Henry Holt in a revised and somewhat enlarged edition. It is perhaps the insistent note of feminist propaganda that spoils the pure note of poetry in this writer's work. This gives much of her best work a touch of bitterness which robs it of its perfection as literature. For music and for technical skill Miss Widdemer has few competitors, though even in her most poetic work there is an undercurrent of disillusion that keeps persistently to the minor key. For simple beauty her "Greek Folk Songs" are perhaps the most singing things in this little volume, though it is a pity that the "Shadow of the Woodland" beginning—

"Shadow of the woodland, have you seen my sweetheart

inevitably suggests parts of Meredith's "Love in the Valley". But this whole collection is a thing of beauty and only unsatisfactory in that it somewhat misses the inspiration which a note of hope and faith would have given it.

Another reissue in a slightly different form from the original is Winifred Letts' The Spires of Oxford.[8] Substantially this same collection appeared no later ago than last year, under the title of Hallow-e'en and Poems of the War, but as the publishers somewhat naively explain in a note, the perfect little lyric "The Spires of Oxford" has proved so popular, and has been so much quoted, that they have made it the title piece of this new edition. Combined with Miss Letts' beautiful lyric gift, there is a touch of mysticism which gives some of her verse that haunting quality which we have learned to associate with the Celtic strain. Certainly the most beautiful of the new sonnets in this volume is the one entitled "The Tryst", in which the lover left behind, rather than meet the dear one in the glories of heaven, begs of God to let the meeting take place by the old sleepy river where they used to walk in days gone by.

The same thought as this last forms the high water mark of the poetry in a curious mixture of sardonic prose sketches and miscellaneous lyrics entitled The Thrush and the Jay,[9] by Sylvia Lynd, a new English author. The poem is entitled "A Freed Spirit" and the first four stanzas describe the glorious sense of beauty and freedom which the newly released soul finds in its new capabilities; then suddenly comes the regret for the beauties of earth—

"——And then it came,
A star among the countless stars at last
That might not be o'erpast,
This world without a name—
'Twas on the verge of night,
I poised in my great flight,
And saw a moon
Rise honey-colored in a purple sky
And watch so tenderly
The hills of June,
All night, all through the night, while the hills slept—
Down from my height I crept
And hid my face and wept".

The Thrush and the Jay is evidently the work of a writer who has had it in her to be a poet, but whom motherhood and the cares of life have led into a more prosaic path.

The same note of propaganda which we have already noticed as spoiling some of Miss Margaret Widdemer's finest verse is the moving force of the most noticeable pieces in Sarah Cleghorn's Portraits and Protests;[10] in fact, so definitely pacifist and socialist are her sympathies that it is a question whether this was a desirable time to publish the volume at all. Take for instance "The Poltroon", which is very poor as poetry, but a very striking and ingenious piece of propaganda. When Mrs. Cleghorn devotes herself to drawing simple pictures, which seems to be her métier, she is much more of a poet, though possibly less successful in arresting the attention.

It will come as a surprise to most of the people who have known Charles Warren Stoddard in his delightful travel sketches, to realize that he was as much of a poet as the handsome volume of his collected poems[11] shows him to be. His verses, principally on the Utopian Isles and Southern Seas, are not only beautiful in themselves, but they open up a new horizon for the reader and the dreamer. There is nothing in this volume that reaches a very high level as poetry, but there are several stanzas that make one want to be under the soft radiance of the Southern Pacific skies, and to breathe the tropic airs of the island paradises. The volume is particularly interesting in that it contains memorial verses on the author by several of his friends, including among others Joaquin Miller and Thomas Walsh, and a most intimate and representative portrait of Mr. Stoddard as a frontispiece.

A small book of unusual quality is Olive Tilford Dargan's beautiful sonnet-sequence entitled Cycle's Rim.[12] The half-hundred or so of sonnets which compose this little volume give the effect of chiseled jewelry work. Their restrained simplicity, and the consistently high standard of technical achievement, combined with the beauty of the book making, set this little volume apart from the majority of current poetry books. No reader will be inspired or carried away, but his mind will be rested by their calming influence. The temptation to quote is irresistible, but the difficulty is that any one of the sonnets is almost as good as any other of them; the first will stand as a representative of all.

Deep lies thy body, jewel of the sea,
Locked down with wave on wave. Pearl-drift among
The coral towers, and yet not thee, not thee!
So lightly didst thou mount, blue rung o'er rung,
The lustred ladder rippling from that land
Of strangely boughed and wooing wildernesses.
Province of dream unwaning, dream yet banned
From sleepers in the sun; but thou, as presses
The lark that feels his song, sped to thy sky.
O unrepressed! If thou wouldst choose be gone,
What sea-charm then could stay thee, bid thee lie
Too deep for cock-crow earth or heaven's dawn?
Yet must I chant these broken, mortal staves,
And lay my leaf of laurel on the waves.

Mr. Cale Young Rice is building himself up a reputation of considerable significance by a steady output of verse, the best of which is very good and the general standard of which is considerably above that of the majority of his fellow singers in America. His new volume Wraiths and Realities[13] holds a note of virility which gives a general impression of strength, in spite of the fact that several of the poems are quite small and lyrical, as for instance "A Wood Moment", "Strangeness", and "Iseult of Ireland". It is rather hard to place Mr. Rice exactly, but he seems to have more affinity with John Masefield than with any other poet at present in the public mind; and this in spite of his evident success in the purely lyric field.

The lyric note is struck with success, but with varying beauty in several slender volumes, notably The Door of Dreams,[14] by Jessie B. Rittenhouse; Love Songs,[15] by Sara Teasdale; Songs of Hope,[16] by Harold Speakman; Airs and Ballads,[17] by John McClure. Of these, the last shows an originality and a sense of freakish humor which makes the reader wonder just in what direction the author will develop. He is clearly young at his art, and he sings with a cheerfulness and happy insouciance which is very stimulating; but after all, humor is a very inconvenient thing for a young poet, while wit is absolutely fatal. There is always the difficulty that a humorous outlook may grow upon the poet and prevent his taking his art seriously; such a suggestion occurs, in fact, in Mr. McClure's "Apology":

I am a poetaster
And my knee I bend
To Marlowe, my master,
Villon, my friend.

I am a swashbuckler
And I break my sword
Before Blake, my tutor,
Shakespeare, my lord.

I should burn my song books
This very day
If singing didn't matter
So little anyway.

Now, if singing does not matter, the whole art of song falls to the ground, for it is only by work and trial, and more work and more trial, that the poet becomes able to sing a great song. There is sufficient evidence of the sense of beauty in Mr. McClure's work to make us hope that he will after all take singing more seriously than he claims to do.

Miss Rittenhouse's tiny volume is full of little poems that simply call out for quotation. The publishers epitomize the volume on the wrapper as "short and singing love songs", and though publishers' verdicts as given on book-wrappers are not generally prone to err on the side of modesty, it happens that this succinct description exactly expresses this little volume.

Sara Teasdale's Love Songs are more variable, and cover a wider range, and many of them are very beautiful. Take, for instance, that little gem "Wood Song":

I heard a wood thrush in the dusk
Twirl three notes and make a star—
My heart that walked with bitterness
Came back from very far.

Three shining notes were all he had,
And yet they made a starry call—
I caught life back against my breast
And kissed it, scars and all.

Few writers could equal the power of putting much into little which this exhibits in such perfection.

Mr. Speakman's little book is noticeable, not only for the extreme exiguity of its contents, but for the fact that it is decorated and illustrated by the author. It is curious that an author who so obviously has the lyric gift should be content with such an achievement as this.

Mrs. Edith Franklin Wyatt in her volume of collected magazine verse, which she calls The Wind in the Corn,[18] after the title piece, has committed the indiscretion of prefacing a volume of light verse, of distinct quality, by a sort of essayette on American Democracy which is liable to give the inquiring reader quite a false impression of the volume. If a good wine needs no bush, more certainly still good poetry needs no preface; and especially when the preface misrepresents the poetry.

A new recruit in the regiment of poets is to be welcomed in Marietta M. Andrews, author of Songs of a Mother.[19] There is a genuine, though not always material, feeling in this little book, and, like Mr. Speakman, Mrs. Andrews illustrates her own volume, showing a very considerable artistic gift. There is a simplicity and lack of pretentiousness about nearly all the poems that make them very restful reading, and give a personal touch, revealing more of the author to the reader than the majority of the books of poetry do. In "L'Envoi", beginning—

Speeding your little ambulance
Along the ruined roads of France,
You will be far from home, my dear,
Before these verses shall appear—the mother's heart speaks what so many mothers are feeling today, now that America is taking her part in the great struggle for civilization.

Mr. S. Middleton has been writing poetry for some time in the less majestic of our magazines, and now puts out a volume entitled Streets and Faces.[20] His work collected thus between covers shows a consistency and homogeneity which was not apparent in the scattered pieces separately, and it is clear that Mr. Middleton may have to be reckoned with, among the coming writers of verse, if he will show a strength to correspond with his power of vision. He is almost a stranger to the temptation of the lyric, but his power of reach and of giving us a dramatic or wonderful moment is exceedingly promising.

Readers of the sporting column in the New York papers will be no strangers to the name and fame of Mr. Grantland Rice; but those who know him simply as the facile rhymer of sport will be surprised at the vigor and music of his new poems in his little volume Songs of the Stalwart.[21] In spite of the fact that Mr. Irvin S. Cobb has paid Mr. Rice the very doubtful compliment of writing a preface to the volume, and saying what a sweet and kindly being the author is, etc., Songs of the Stalwart is a curious mixture of sentiment, humor, and real poetry, and we should judge better calculated to be "popular" than any local volume of verse of recent months. The verses to the memory of Alan Seeger, alone, would reveal Mr. Rice as a poet, while the baseball verses and golf stanzas should meet the favor of many who have no use for poetry as such.

As the most important part of Mr. Grantland Rice's volume is comprised of war poems, so is that of Mr. Vachell Lindsay's new book The Chinese Nightingale.[22] It is only natural that today the ordinary reader will not feel as elated about Monsieur Kerensky, and about the oratory of the Hon. W. J. Bryan as Mr. Lindsay shows himself to be. For the rest, we have Mr. Lindsay at his most "Lindsayish" in what he calls a "poem game", a sort of nursery rhyme amusement with stage directions and various other little pictures and portraits in verse, which Mr. Lindsay probably supposes are poems. It is hard to take this young man seriously in a great deal of his work, but there is no doubt that he has introduced a new, if primitive, sort of note into modern verse making.

Today many poets are writing, naturally enough, about the war and the war only. Among volumes which are principally or entirely filled with war verse may be specially mentioned Miss M. W. Cannan's In War Times,[23] which is musical beyond the average, and which shows a strain of haunting and elusive beauty which suggests Margary Pickthall.

Miss Cannan is the daughter of the secretary of the Clarendon Press at Oxford, and there is many a reminiscence of the placid loveliness of the University City in her verses.

Another volume that is equally noticeable, but in a different vein, is Patrick Macgill's Soldier Songs.[24] Lieutenant Macgill displays in these ringing vivid verses the same qualities of arresting realism and beautiful word painting, which made his Children of the Dead End a literary landmark; in fact, one or two of his verses "The Ole Sweats" and "The Guns," are almost good enough for Kipling in his earlier days.

In The Red Flower,[25] by Henry Van Dyke, there are a number of pieces written when Dr. Van Dyke was still holding his diplomatic position, and had to publish them, if at all, anonymously. His skill in versifying is too well known for this little book to need any patting on the back, but it may be said that we can challenge any other English-speaking people to produce a volume by an ambassador which would come as close to the heart of the common people as this.

A very notable contrast to The Red Flower appears in War Flames,[26] by John Curtis Underwood. Mr. Underwood's selections—we hesitate to call them poems—are couched in the heaviest of heavy vers libre, the average line being about twenty words in length; but they have pictures which have a certain force about them in spite of their aggravating lack of lyric, or even metrical quality.

Verse of an entirely different quality with an obvious tincture of popularity about the facile lilt are the verses of McLandburgh Wilson in The Little Flag on Main Street,[27] which appear in a most effective picture cover and a size that is handy for the pocket.

Last but not least, we may mention a charming little idyl—or it would have been an idyl in happier days—entitled The Ballad of Ensign Joy,[28] by E. W. Hornung, better known as the creator of Raffles. This tells the story of a young English officer, who married before he went to the war, and then when he heard from his wife that he was to be a father, fear clutched him, and for the first time in his life made him a coward. What he did, and how gallantly he redeemed himself in the end is told with a simplicity and freshness, and even with a skill that will surprise any reader who has hitherto known Mr. Hornung only as a writer of detective stories. Incidentally, the little tale contains a lesson for every young American who is going to the war.

EPORTERS DISTORT STORY OF RECTOR'S RESIGNATION

al Facts Concerning Mr. Urban Contradict False Publicity

New York and other newspapers have en wide and inexcusably misleading pub- ty to the resignation of the Rev. Leigh Urban as rector of the Church of the deemer, Astoria, New York. In order at Church people may know the facts in e case, there are printed below a letter om the clerk of the vestry of the Church the Redeemer, a statement by the vestry d a statement by Mr. Urban.

The letter from the clerk of the vestry, r. William Harison, follows:

o the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I have already given you a copy of a atement adopted by the vestry of the urch of the Redeemer, Astoria, Long land, on April 17, 1918, and a copy of a atement made by the rector, the Rev. igh R. Urban, on Sunday, April 21.

The vestry met again on Monday, April , the rector and all the members being esent. The Rev. Mr. Urban reported the ggestion of the Bishop of the diocese a possible basis upon which relations ight be continued, that the American flag placed in the church by mutual consent the rector and vestry with a statement the understanding on which this might done, and he voluntarily asserted his illingness to comply with this suggestion. he vestry also agreed and the following atement was accordingly adopted.

"The Bishop having requested that the rector and the vestry agree to put an American flag in the church as a symbol of the consecration of the Nation to Christ, and the loyalty of the rector and the members of the congregation to the country, but not committing the church to the war; the rector and vestry gladly adopted the suggestion, although the rector is opposed to all war, while the wardens and vestrymen are in favor of the present war."

Before the adoption of this statement ie rector had declared his intention to re- gn, and after its adoption he presented is formal resignation. It was accepted y the vestry, and the following minute as adopted:

Resolved: That the vestry sincerely regret the causes of the rector's resignation, realizing that the difference which has arisen is purely one of conviction and is irreconcilable; and they assure him of their affection and their uninterrupted respect for his straightforward and manly adherence to his belief and expression of it. The vestry greatly regret this severance of relations."

A flag will appear in the church next unday with the full consent of the Rev. Ir. Urban as rector, and he will be present.

I hope that in justice to the Rev. Mr. rban, you will publish all the foregoing, specially because the daily press has wo- ully distorted the whole matter from the eginning and has, among other things, nade it appear that the Rev. Mr. Urban esigned rather than comply with the Bishop's request. That is absolutely con- rary to the fact.

It ought to be added that the action of the vestry in all these matters was taken without any dissent whatever, and that the statement adopted by them is not mere formal expression but carefully states the facts of the case and does not overstate their whole-hearted respect for the Rev. Mr. Urban and the sincerity of his convictions.

Yours truly,

WILLIAM HARISON, Clerk of the Vestry.

157 Franklin Street, Astoria, N. Y.

April 25, 1918.

The following statement was made public by the vestry:

"The Rev. Mr. Urban sincerely believes that all war is contrary to the teachings of the New Testament. He has stated that he would have had no objection to continuing a flag in the church if one had been there before the war, but that to place one there now would amount to an approval of the war, and that therefore he cannot consent to it. None of the members of the vestry agrees with him; they all believe that the country ought to be in this war, and they desire to have the flag in or upon the church whenever it can be placed there in an orderly manner."

The statement, after saying that the authority in such matters lies with the rector, outlines the services of the parish in sending men into the Army and Navy, together with the backing given those men by the rector, through letters of recommendation, prayers at the services, the posting and publishing of their names, and continues:

"The rector has not since our entrance into the war made any controversial reference to it from the pulpit, nor has he engaged in any pacifist propaganda.

On Saturday night, April 13, some young men entered the church without authority of the rector or of the vestry, and hung an American flag across the chancel arch. After the early service on Sunday morning the rector removed the flag in the presence of the sexton and of Mr. Harison, a member of the vestry, without any disrespect to it either displayed or intended. He made no reference to these occurrences at the later services, as probably he would have felt compelled to do if the flag had remained, and his view undoubtedly was that as he was responsible under the canon it would have been inconsistent in him to have allowed it to remain.

"The Rev. Mr. Urban had previously announced his intention of visiting his parents, who live near Philadelphia and are not in good health, and left home on Monday. After the Sunday evening service he told the members of the vestry present that he very much regretted the situation in which the parish had been placed, and urged that the vestry hold a meeting and frankly discuss it in his absence. That meeting has now been held and the vestry has asked the rector to call another meeting next week at which he will be present with them and the situation will be dealt with.

"The affection and respect which the members of the vestry feel for the Rev. Mr. Urban add greatly to the regard with which they view his opinion in the matter of the war. They know that he is sincere, and

DR. BURKE GOES 300 MILES TO SAVE EXPLORER'S LIFE

Leaves Ft. Yukon for Herschel Island to Attend Stefansson

NEW YORK CITY.—A telegram to the Board of Missions from our Mission at Ft. Yukon, Alaska, gives the information that Dr. Grafton Burke, in charge of St. Stephen's Hospital, left Ft. Yukon on April 15 in response to an emergency call from Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the Arctic explorer. When he sent the message asking for help from our missionary physician, Mr. Stefansson was lying at Herschel Island seriously ill with what was supposed to be typhoid fever.

Dr. Burke will make a 300-mile journey on foot through one of the most desolate sections of Alaska in order to save Mr. Stefansson's life, if possible. It is probable that Archdeacon Stuck, who has been making a Winter journey along the Arctic Coast, reached Herschel Island soon after Stefansson's messengers started for Ft. Yukon. When Archdeacon Stuck was last heard from he was at Point Hope. This was in January.

SPRING CONVENTIONS HELD IN TWO DIOCESES

Western Massachusetts and Georgia Get Through Routine Work

Conventions were held during the past week in Georgia and Western Massachusetts. In the latter Bishop Davies paid high tribute to the late Archdeacon Sniffen and, for the sake of war economy, recommended cutting several items from the diocesan budget. A resolution that the diocese discontinue sending delegates to the Massachusetts Federation of Churches was voted down by a narrow margin after a hot debate.

The convention in Georgia opened with a dinner given by the Episcopal Church Club of Savannah, when Dr. Patton made one of his stirring appeals for the American Negro. Mr. Tatum, of Alaska, told the thrilling story of the ascent of Mt. McKinley, and the Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney spoke of the obligations of the Church in war times. The business of the Convention was largely routine.

PITTSFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.—The Annual Convention of the Diocese of Western Massachusetts met in St. Stephen's church in Pittsfield, April 23 and 24. On Tuesday evening there was a public service in St. Stephen's church at which Bishop Thomas F. Davies delivered his annual address. The Bishop paid a feeling tribute to the noble life and labors of the late Archdeacon Charles J. Sniffen, saying:

"Many an isolated house felt his cheeriness and courage. Many a lonely, discouraged soul came through him to know the comfort of the blessed gospel. It would be hard to pay him an adequate tribute, but I think I express what is in your minds and mine when I say that clergy and laity alike we feel that we have been parted for a time from that inestimable treasure, a friend! The loss to the diocese is very great."

Under finances Bishop Davies urged all parishes to see that its pastors receive a "living wage" and the stipends of certain missionaries must be raised at once. The Bishop recommends omission for the present of the annual offering for a diocesan building. The Bishop recommended that the annual sum of $775 granted him toward the expenses of a diocesan office and stenographer be stricken from the budget from May 1 and the money so released be applied to the increase of missionary stipends.

The business sessions of the Convention were held on Wednesday in St. Stephen's parish house. A spirited debate ensued on the motion that the diocese discontinue sending delegates to the Massachusetts Federation of Churches. The motion was lost only by close vote.

A Diocesan War Commission was created consisting of Bishop Davies, Rev. John M. McGann, rector of Christ church, Springfield; Rev. Latta Griswold, rector of Trinity, Lenox; Mr. John P. Merrill, of Pittsfield, and Judge Edward T. Esty, of Worcester.

The other elections resulted as follows: Standing committee: Rev. J. F. Carter, Williamstown; Rev. John B. Whiteman, Greenfield; Rev. Marshall E. Mott, North Adams; Rev. Lewis G. Morris, D.D., Worcester; Mr. Edmund P. Kendrick, Christ church, Springfield; Mr. Frederick S. Pratt, All Saints', Worcester; Mr. William A. Gallup, North Adams; Prof. Zelotes W. Coombs, St. Mark's, Worcester.

Deputies to the Synod of New England: Rev. John M. McGann, Christ church, Springfield; Rev. Robert K. Smith, Westfield; Rev. Stephen E. Keeler, Pittsfield; Rev. Donald N. Alexander, Leominster; Mr. Frank I. Sears, Webster; Mr. Willard E. Hoyt, Williamstown; Prof. Clarence B. Roote, Northampton; Mr. Bartow Crocker, Fitchburg.

Board of Religious Education: Rev. Latta Griswold, Lenox; Prof. B. B. Snowden, Easthampton.

Diocesan Board of Missions: Rev. Arthur Chase, Ware; Prof. Everett Kimball, Northampton.

Rev. John M. McGann of Christ church, Springfield, advocated electing a woman member on the Board of Religious Education, but it was found that the Diocesan Canons did not permit it.

The Convention voted to meet next year in All Saints' church, Worcester.

SAVANNAH, GEORGIA.—Preliminary to the meeting of the 96th Convention of the Diocese of Georgia there were held meetings of the Standing Committee, the Board of Corporation and the Board of Commissions, on April 16.

On the evening of April 16 a beautiful dinner was given in St. John's Parish House by the Episcopal Church Club of Savannah. In addition to the members, the delegates to the Convention were present. Mr. W.

ST. AGNES' SCHOOL WILL EDUCATE ARMY DAUGHTERS

Famous Albany School Seeks Scholarships for Children of Military

ALBANY, NEW YORK.—The trustees of St. Agnes' School for Girls, recognizing the enormous wastage of the choicest manhood of our Nation caused by America's entry into the world war, have decided as an important and patriotic measure of national defense to offer the services of the school to the Nation for the Christian education and training of the daughters of the Army and Navy men the ravages of the war will leave as a valuable heritage that must not be let pass out of the Nation's watchfulness. A widespread appeal will be made to obtain scholarships and funds for this worthy and patriotic purpose. Among others supporting the undertaking the following men and women prominent in affairs of the Nation have endorsed the movement:

Hon. Elihu Root, Hon. Franklin D. Roosevelt, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, Maj. Gen. William C. Gorgas, Maj. Gen. Henry G. Sharpe, Colonel Theodore Roosevelt, Rear Admiral Seaton Schroeder, Dr. John H. Finley, Hon. Bainbridge Colby, Bishop Leonard, Hon. Benedict Crowell, Hon. Charles S. Whitman, Bishop Lawrence, Maj. Gen. Hugh L. Scott, Maj. Gen. Franklin J. Bell, Maj. Gen. James Parker, Rear Admiral J. W. Helm, Bishop Nelson, Maj. Gen. Joseph E. Kuhn, Mrs. Woodrow Wilson, Mrs. Robert Lansing, Mrs. Josephus Daniels, Mrs. William Gorham Rice, Mrs. Charles S. Fayerweather, Mrs. Charles S. Whitman, Mrs. Newton D. Baker, Mrs. Wm. B. Van Rensselaer, Mrs. Theodore Douglas Robinson, and others.

Patriotism begins with our children. The daughters of America's Army and Navy men now fighting at the shrine of freedom on the blood-soaked fields of France to protect homes and firesides are the mothers of future America.

There is no method of progress that is so rich and complete in its benefits to humanity as Christian womanhood. The trustees of the school feel that to help educate and train the daughters that our men in the service have been forced to leave behind for real motherhood and citizenship is at once our highest and most important task.

Miss Gray, the headmistress of St. Agnes since America entered into the world war, has received a number of touching appeals from men in the service for the school to take their children at greatly reduced rates. It was knowledge of this fact that prompted the trustees to see if ways and means could not be devised so none should be turned away. It is hoped that before long it may be possible to care for and train one hundred daughters of Army and Navy men.

To give the Nation properly trained women, women who know how to lead purposeful and useful lives, how to shoulder the responsibilities and cares of real motherhood, women who can foster the ideal development of childhood, who can soften the sterner realities of the impressionable years of these young lives and preserve through them without impairment their love of home and unswerving loyalty to their country and its institutions is the task St. Agnes' School has dedicated itself to perform.

Fathers, mothers, sons and daughters are all asked to help in the expansion and development of this work. At least fifty per cent of all monies received will be invested in Liberty Bonds. All expenses in connection with the conduct of the campaign are being liquidated through a special fund provided for that purpose.

The scholarships are as follows: Endowed memorial $15,000; All year $700, School year $500.

Donations of any amount will be gratefully received. Cheques should be made payable to St. Agnes' School War Fund and the letter addressed to Jonas H. Brooks, Treasurer, 55 Eld Street, Albany, New York.

NEW SPANISH CHURCH PAPER

First Issue of El Nuevo Siglo Now in the Mails

NEW YORK CITY.—The first issue of the first step that has been taken under the auspices of the Board of Missions to provide Church literature for the mission field is the April number of El Nuevo Siglo. It is an eight-page sheet, published on newspaper stock in three columns of eight-point. Its special features are adapted translations of the Christian Nurture series, translations in book form of standard Church literature, news of the whole Church written in such a way as to interest Spanish-speaking people, and the presentation of everything in news, editorials and special articles from a positive as opposed to a negative point of view. The "Director" is the Rev. Arthur R. Gray, secretary for Latin America of the Board of Missions. The translations in book form are especially interesting, though rather curious in appearance in as much as they are printed in page form ready for binding when the whole book has been so published. This necessitates the printing of four pages, two of them upside down, on a single sheet of the newspaper, an ingenious and economical arrangement. The first chapter of Bishop Fiske's Religion of the Incarnation appears in this issue of El Nuevo Siglo. A good translation of Hymn 225 appears on another page.

HUNDREDS TURNED AWAY FROM SOLDIERS' SERVICES

Church in Southern City Packs Largest Hall Available Each Sunday

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—The Episcopal churches of Charleston have started a great community service for the men of the United States Army and Navy stationed in and around Charleston.

The largest hall in the city has been rented, which is located in the very heart of the city. The service is held each Sunday evening at 8 o'clock, consisting of a short service, popular singing generally led by one of the military bands, and a short practical address. After the religious services a social hour is provided and light refreshments are served by a committee of ladies representing all of the churches in the city.

So marked has the success of the services been that hundreds of people have been turned away each Sunday night from the services after the large hall had been filled to standing capacity.

Chaplain W. R. Scott, U. S. A., has charge of the services under the direction of the bishop of the diocese. Bishop Guerry is to speak at the Communion service the evening of May 10.

VIRGINIA DIOCESES UNITE TO BUILD UP STUART HALL

Seek Fund of $100,000 to Improve Diocesan Girls' School

RICHMOND, VIRGINIA.—The dioceses of Virginia and of Southern Virginia are making an earnest effort to raise the sum of $100,000, half of it from each diocese, for the purpose of freeing Stuart Hall from debt, and of making it in fact as well as in name a diocesan school for girls for the two dioceses.

From the time of the establishment of this old school in Staunton, seventy-five years ago, as the "Virginia Female Institute," until two years ago, the institution was not run by the diocese, but the property was rented to successive tenants who each one conducted and developed the school as his or her own individual property. Under this system the school grew to be one of the best schools for girls in the South, but it was in no sense a diocesan school beyond the fact that the diocese, and after the division of 1892 the two dioceses, owned the land and buildings and rented them out.

A new era started in the school two years ago, when the trustees adopted a plan which has made Stuart Hall a real diocesan school, under the control of the Church, and which will enable it to receive and train more girls than have ever been able to attend it heretofore.

In putting this plan into operation a debt was added to the debt already standing on the school. To clear it away, and provide funds to enlarge and develop the school, the sum of $100,000 is asked. In the diocese of Virginia there are four schools which are in some sense diocesan, the Episcopal High School, Stuart Hall, the Blue Ridge Industrial School and St. Anne's School.

In view of the article recently published in these columns on "The Kent Plan" the following comment by the editorial writer in the diocesan paper is interesting:

We ought to have schools of varying financial grade which would offer their training to all the Church people of our Diocese; to say nothing of the opportunity of giving religious training to children who come from families outside our Church. We need the schools for both boys and girls where the cost is $500 or more a year; we need more acutely still schools where $300 will cover all charges for a year's tuition. Other denominations have schools where the charges are even less; why could not we also?

GOVERNMENT ASKS G. F. S. AID

War Savings Society Should Be Formed in Every Branch

NEW YORK CITY.—The Treasury Department has asked the Girls' Friendly Society for its co-operation in the matter of War Savings Societies. "Realizing that you have thrift as one of your objects", the letter from the Department says, "you are urged to form a War Savings Society in every branch of the Girls' Friendly Society in the United States. The Government desires to promote the habit of saving as a war measure among the American people generally. The women of the country must necessarily take a leading part."

THEOLOGICAL COUNCIL HAS IMPORTANT MEETING

Sweeping Changes in Canons Proposed at Representative Gathering

NEW YORK CITY.—Representatives from all the Theological Seminaries were in New York this week to attend the fifth meeting of the Theological Council of the General Board of Religious Education which is formulating a new canon for the training of ministers.

There were representatives from the seminaries and Provinces. Those representing the seminaries were: The Rev. James O. Lincoln, D.D., from San Francisco, Cal., Vice Dean of the Pacific Divinity School; the Rev. Edward A. Larrabee, Dean of Nashotah House; the Rev. James H. Young of Seabury Divinity School; the Rev. William C. DeWitt, D.D., of Western Theological Seminary; the Rev. D. F. Davies, D.D., of Bexley Hall; the Rev. Frank G. Scott, D.D., of Bishop Payne Divinity School; the Rev. Cleveland K. Benedict, D.D., of University of the South; the Rev. Berryman Green, D.D., of Virginia Theological Seminary; the Rev. Lucien M. Robinson, D.D., of Philadelphia Divinity School; the Rev. Edward S. Drown, D.D., of Cambridge Theological School; the Rev. Wm. P. Ladd, of Berkeley Divinity School; the Rev. H. E. W. Fosbroke, D.D., of General Theological Seminary.

Representing the Provinces and other interests of the Church: The Rev. Charles H. Boynton, Ph.D., the Rev. William E. Gardner, D.D., the Rev. George G. Bartlett, D.D., the Rev. Wm. L. DeVries, Ph.D., the Rev. Dickinson S. Miller, D. Sc., the Rev. H. P. Nichols, D.D., the Rev. William H. Owen, Jr., Mr. George Zabriskie, the Rev. Francis L. Palmer, the Rev. Z. B. T. Phillips, D.D.

The Bishops on this Council are: The Rt. Rev. Edwin S. Lines, D.D.; the Rt. Rev. F. A. McElwain, D.D.; the Rt. Rev. C. S. Burch, D.D.; the Rt. Rev. H. J. Mikell, D.D.; the Rt. Rev. James Wise; the Rt. Rev. C. Fiske, D.D.

The most important business was the Council's action on a report offered by Dean Bartlett. After a year's work the Committee proposed to the Council changes in the present canons. These changes will correct much of the indefiniteness of the present canons, and bring the requirements of those seeking the ministry more in harmony with the modern needs, by allowing elective and alternative subjects of examination, thereby recognizing specialized training and unusual attainments on the part of the candidate. The new proposals allow a large amount of freedom in dealing with candidates of a mature age, with those of foreign birth and other communions.

"The report of the Council meeting will be published for the consideration and suggestion of all interested," said one of the members. "It is hoped that church-wide discussion will enlighten the Council, and enable it to make a final report to the General Convention, that will be representative of the wisdom of the Church. The one ambition in the minds of the Council is to have free discussion before the General Convention so that the action of the Convention will embody the conviction of the Church and become a canon obeyed as well as enacted."

Mr. Blanchard Randall of Baltimore, Maryland, was appointed by the Board of Education of the Province of Washington as its representative on the Council for the Education of the Ministry. Mr. Randall has been a delegate to the General Convention for many years; he is a member of the Board of Missions and will bring to the Council valuable suggestions.

GENEVA CONFERENCE PLANS FOR WAR SERVICE COURSE

Governing Board Meeting in Rochester Complete 1918 Program

ROCHESTER, NEW YORK.—Final plans for the program of the 1918 Geneva Conference were drawn up at the meeting of the Board of Governors held here last week. Bishop Stearly and others from the southern end of the Province were present. After a celebration of the Holy Communion at St. Paul's church, the business sessions were held at the residence of Mr. Kingman N. Robins. In addition to the classes already announced, it was arranged to have Miss Lindley teach a class on the Woman's Auxiliary and Dr. Gray teach the course on the senior textbook. The Rev. S. G. Dunseath is to teach the class on "Social Justice". Provision is to be made for a class on "War Service". July 10 is to be G.F.S. day; the Rev. Frank Nelson will be in charge of the special conferences that day. On July 8 the younger members of the conference will present The Great Trail, An Indian Mystery Play out of doors. The Western New York Junior officers will have charge of the Junior House, which probably will be two or three sections of Medberry Hall.

After the meeting adjourned Bishop Stearly, Miss Hobart and the Rev. J. W. Denness Cooper went to Buffalo, where a reunion of the Geneva Conference Alumni and a meeting to arouse interest in the conference under the auspices of the alumni group and Section III of the Junior Auxiliary was held at St. John's church.

CHURCH BOY SCOUT TROOP GIVEN FLAG BY PRESIDENT

Sold More Liberty Bonds Than Any Other in United States

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA.—Of all the Boy Scout Troops in the United States the troop from Christ church of this city sold the largest number of the second issue of Liberty Bonds. They have received from the President of the United States a beautiful silk flag as a reward for their work. The standard is ten feet long, made in two sections, to be secured by a brass fixture; the base is of the same metal to be carried in a special strap, and the top of the standard is surmounted by an eagle ten inches long. The flag bears a suitable inscription which tells that it is the gift of the President. The rector of the parish, the Rev. Walter S. Howard, is the scoutmaster.

Western New York G. F. S. Meet

BUFFALO, NEW YORK.—The twenty-sixth annual meeting of the Western New York G. F. S. was held on May 1 in Grace church here. On the evening of the 30th members and associates gathered for the annual service in St. Paul's church. The Rev. D. L. Ferris of Rochester was the preacher.

DR. GRESHAM CONSIDERING ELECTION TO PHILIPPINES

Says Right to Live to Be Measured by Deeds of Service

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.—On the Sunday following his election as Bishop of the Philippines, Dean Gresham made the following statement to the congregation of Grace Cathedral:

"My dear Brethren—You have already been informed of the action of the House of Bishops, taken at their recent meeting in New York, electing me to become Bishop of the Philippine Islands. In view of the intimate way in which any course that I may take in this matter must bear upon our mutual interests in Grace Cathedral, I feel that I owe both to you and to myself a brief statement at this time. It is hardly necessary for me to assure you that this action of the Bishops has taken me entirely by surprise. I had indeed lost sight of the fact that the Bishops were in session, and have not yet been able to understand why they should have chosen me for such a post. But the fact of the election is now established, and the responsibility of a decision rests upon my own heart.

"You must, I am sure, recognize that it is impossible for me at this time, just a few days after the appointment, to determine in what direction the path of duty leads. I must ask time to think it out—to think it through. To that end I must know all the factors and issues that are involved, and in and through my consideration of these, I must be sure of the guidance of the Spirit of God. The times in which we are living have taught us all the beauty, the grandeur, the greatness, of human service.

"The times are coming when the right to live on this earth, to say nothing of the right to fill posts of honor, will be measured by our readiness to render deeds of service to our fellowman. I have long felt that by this test Grace Cathedral offers a field of boundless opportunity for service to our city and our State. I am by no means sure but that duty points me to the work right here with you who have for years labored with me at our Bishop's side. It may be that this is the place assigned to me by God for the rest of my days.

"On the other hand, we all well know that it was at the call of duty and in the spirit of service that Charles Brent went out, as seeing Him who is invisible, to the far-away islands of the sea, whither our country's flag had gone, to achieve that work of Christian statesmanship that made at once the Nation and the Church its debtor. Incredible as it may seem, I am asked to build upon the foundation that he has laid. In the days that are now to come I am to visualize the field, and look within, and determine beyond a peradventure or a doubt, whether the task is indeed my own, or whether it must go to some other servant of the Church. I have asked for time to think it out—to think it through. I now ask for more than that. I must have your prayers that I may 'see and perceive the things that I ought to do, and have grace and power faithfully to fulfil the same'. You will, I am sure, be with me in spirit through the heartsearchings of all these days, that by our mutual instrumentality God's will may be done, whatever that will may be, and wherever that will may lead."

MISSOURI

Work for Boys Encouraging—The annual report of the Orphans' Home Association in St. Louis gives very interesting information also of the Griswold Hall for Boys, the most encouraging feature being that the Hall now is housed in its own buildings. These have been bought during the past year by a generous friend and deeded to the Orphans' Home. The present enrolment of boys at the Hall is twenty-one. During the year five boys were graduated with provision for their future assured either by having mastered some special line of work or else by having been taken into families of excellent standing. One lad left during the year to join the Navy. A Service Flag with four stars floats proudly over the door of Griswold Hall. In the Orphans' Home the average number of children enroled each month has been ninety-three. Some of the boys and girls are members of the Red Cross. Some have saved their pennies and nickels to buy Thrift Stamps. Some are busy at all odd moments knitting for the soldier boys. All of the senior girls mend and do fancy work and they take turns at getting up at 5.30 in the morning to make biscuit or pancakes for their own table. The children all assisted last Summer and Fall in preparing fruits and vegetables for canning and food conservation. Much sorrow is felt among all the friends of the Home because of the recent death of Mr. Kurt Jaenicke. The children were devoted to him both as teacher and as superintendent of the Sunday school. Mr. Jaenicke enlisted last Autumn for the work of the war and died while in training at Camp Doniphan.

Work Goes Forward—The Rev. L. H. White, minister of St. Mary's, St. Louis, gives word that friends have made generous contributions during the past few weeks which enable the Building Committee to go forward with the Parish House of the Bishop Tuttle Commemorative Church and complete it to the ridgepole. It was feared that the work might have to stop with the completion of the second story and the putting on of a temporary roof. Mr. White is to be congratulated that his hard work has borne such satisfactory fruit.

Gloria Dei Sunday School Leads Again—The banner given each year for the Sunday school having the largest per capita offering for Missions was won again by the School of Gloria Dei (Old Swede's) Church. The school numbers 235 children, and the average per scholar was $7. The total was increased a little by other gifts, not counted in the average, to $1.659.

The presentation of the banner took place at the service at Holy Trinity Church when all the offerings were recorded. The storm kept many away, yet the body of the church was crowded. Dr. Tomkins, the Revs. Franklin J. Clark and C. E. Betticher were the speakers. Bishop Garland made an address. Dr. Tomkins later read the roll of offerings: there are twenty-two schools which averaged over $1 per scholar. There was reported a total of $32,000: but the bad weather kept many away, and all feel confident that the $40,000 asked will be met when all returns are in.

The Rev. Samuel Booth to Go to France—The Rector of St. Luke's Church, Kensington, hopes to go to France in the near future as chaplain of one of the Hospital Units. The Rev. N. B. Groton, of St. Thomas' church, Whitmarsh, has returned from six months' service as chaplain to the troops at Augusta.

Service for Families and Friends of Unit 34—There will be a service at the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany on Sunday, April 28, for the families and friends of Base Hospital Unit 34 (now in active service overseas). An offering will be taken for the benefit of the Unit.

A Home Unit has been established here for this Unit. There are some 400 members of the organization: the Rev. Benjamin S. Sanderson is president. Meetings are held monthly at St. James' church. More than $1,000 in money, many boxes and packages have been sent to the men abroad. The Rev. John Groton, rector of the Church of the Savior in Jenkintown, is chaplain of the Unit serving abroad.

The Clergy Parade for Liberty Loan—The Bishops of the diocese are to head the clergy of the Church in the Liberty Loan parade on Saturday, the 27th. A committee has sent word to all of the clergy to march: and the word comes at this time with some of the weight of a military command.

NEWARK

Over the Top—The Sunday School Lenten Offerings of the Diocese were presented at a service held in Trinity Cathedral April 20 with an unusually large congregation and representation of the Sunday schools. The address was made by the Rev. C. E. Betticher; the offerings for General Missions presented amounting to about $75,000, a very considerable increase over the offerings last year. It is believed that when all the reports are received they will amount to $10,000, one-fourth more than last year.

Killed in Service—The Rev. Walter Handley, whose death was announced last week as having taken place while he was fighting in the ranks of France on Palm Sunday, may be the first of our clergy of the State of New Jersey, perhaps of a larger section in the country, to be killed in battle in this war. He was an attractive young Englishman who came to this country a few years ago and became a student at Drew Theological Seminary at Madison, New Jersey. Turning back to the Church in which he was brought up, he was ordained Deacon by Bishop Lines in May, 1915, and a year later at Ridgewood Presbyter by the same bishop.

He served his Diaconate at Christ Church, Springfield, Massachusetts, where he was very highly esteemed. Coming back to his own Diocese, he took charge of the Mission churches at Ridgefield, Fairview, Grandview and Woodcliff. But the call to go back to England to serve his country during the war was strong and he went, expecting to return to us when the war should be over. The way to distinctly religious work not opening, he enlisted in the army and, after training in Great Britain, he was sent to France in the Royal Welsh Fusileers a few months ago; and was reported as killed on the second day of the German Drive. For a time his family hoped that he might have been taken a prisoner; but the message which came left little hope of this. Further news concerning his death is expected. He was a very attractive and right-minded man, giving hope of much usefulness in the ministry; with a high sense of devotion, he gave his life for the country of his birth and the country of his adoption, and his memory will be cherished by all those who knew him on both sides of the Atlantic.

BALTIMORE

Liberty Loan Cantonment—For the past three weeks Baltimore has been interested in a realistic reproduction of a sector of the battlefront at the Fifth Regiment Armory, arranged to stimulate the people of the city to make a success of the Third Liberty Loan. Great crowds have attended from day to day and much enthusiasm has been aroused. Speakers of national reputation, including President Wilson, Ex-President Taft, Archbishop Lang, and Ex-Governor Goldsborough, have spoken to great multitudes of people. All of them have spoken with admiration of the exhibition as one of the greatest ever given in this country. Archbishop Lang was deeply impressed by it and said it was worth coming three thousand miles to see. Last Sunday afternoon a memorial service was held in commemoration of the Maryland men who have thus far laid down their lives in the service of their country. It was presided over by the Governor, and a memorial service was conducted and an address made by Bishop Murray. The names of the dead were inscribed upon the base of the great statue of liberty which forms the central feature of the cantonment. In most of the city churches the clergy urged upon their congregations their duty in regard to the Liberty Loan.

Work at Camp Meade—St. Joseph's church, Odenton, is passing through a remarkable experience, a great army cantonment, Camp Meade, having suddenly settled down in its midst. To a quiet country parish an unexpected accession of forty thousand men is somewhat exciting. St. Peter's has risen to the emergency and is doing its best to meet the needs of the situation. Its active and energetic rector, the Rev. A. J. Torrey, is devoting much of his time and attention to the soldiers, and the services are largely attended by men of all religious communions. A library of four hundred volumes has been accumulated by the help of the Church Periodical Club, and much is being done for the entertainment and comfort of the men. An open-air platform is being erected, which is to be used for services and entertainments during the Summer. Bishop Murray is taking an active interest in this work and it is believed that great good is being accomplished.

BETHLEHEM

Offering of $5,325—The Annual Service for the presentation of the Mite Box offerings of the Sunday schools of the Diocese was held in St. Luke's church, Scranton, Pennsylvania, on the 20th at 2 p. m. Eighty delegates with many of the clergy were entertained at luncheon, after which the service was held. Miss Helen Littell, recently returned from Wuchang, spoke on the work of the medical missionaries in China. The offerings presented amounted to $5,325 with fourteen more Sunday schools to hear from. If a like amount is received from these schools as in 1917 the total offering will reach $5,800.

The Annual Convention will be held by order of the Bishop and Standing Committee on May 28 and 29 in Trinity church, Pottsville. Following the precedent established several years ago there will be a series of pre-convention meetings for the clergy and the laity. A mass meeting is planned for Monday evening, the 27th. Among the speakers will be the Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady on the topic "The War, God's Will or Man's, Which Is to Prevail?" The Associate Alumni of the General Theological Seminary hold an annual supper on this Monday. Tuesday, the 28th, is to be devoted to conferences for the clergy, also meetings of the various committees and Boards in preparation for the Convention. Tuesday evening the Convention proper will open with a service and the Bishop's address. All of Wednesday will be devoted to the business of the Diocese.

Summer School—The Diocesan Summer School for Sunday school workers and teachers will be held in South Bethlehem the last week in June. Additional features this year will include conferences of the Woman's Auxiliary, Junior Auxiliary and the leaders of the Girls' Friendly Society. Dean Fosbroke of the General Seminary is expected for special conferences with the clergy. Bishop Talbot will also hold several meetings with his diocesan clergy.

Archdeaconry Meeting—The Archdeaconry of Scranton holds its Spring sessions at Tunkhannock with the Rev. W. R. Witmer on May 6 and 7.

EASTON

Summer School Plans—Plans are being formulated for a Summer School for Religious Education to be held at Ocean City, Maryland, June 24-28. A preliminary notice has been sent to the clergy of Delaware and Easton, asking their co-operation by the Rev. Thomas Getz Hill of Smyrna, Delaware. The school, according to the proposed plan, will include, besides the regular courses in Pedagogy, Bible, History, Missions, conferences for the clergy and the various parish organizations.

Deaconess Hart's Visit—Deaconess Hart of China spent four days in the Diocese, April 14-17, addressing the women of eight parishes in the Middle Convocation. She was enthusiastically received at each place and the offerings showed an increased interest in the Missionary work of the Church. This is the first of a series of Missionary tours planned for the Diocese. She made addresses in Wye, Parish, Centreville, Kent Island, Longwoods, Easton, Sudlersville and Church Hill.

Bishop Cancels Appointment—Owing to a slight indisposition Bishop Adams was forced to cancel his appointments for April 14. This was the first time in an episcopate of thirty years Bishop Adams has canceled an appointment.

MINNESOTA

Newspaper Supports Missions—The following taken from the Minneapolis Journal should prove interesting to the readers of THE CHURCHMAN. The Journal has had some splendid editorials on matters of religion lately and this is a good sample:

THE VITAL NEED OF MISSIONS

A study of the religious affiliations of the givers to army, Y. M. C. A. and Knights of Columbus support, and to other religious work in camp and field, as well as to other European war relief work, seems to show that almost all of these givers are members of religious denominations. The Red Cross has also among its supporting members nearly every church in America. These churches are hives of industry incessantly at work on material for the comfort of the fighters. . . . .

In addition the call for the support of the Liberty Loan issues is as liberally responded to by members of religious societies as though these war charity claims had not been met. The result of this double demand for gifts has been seen here and there in the increased difficulty in raising money for the regular activities of the church, and particularly for the support of missions at home and abroad.

But this neglect of missions is not logical; neither is it yet necessary. There are many economies that may yet be practiced to avoid infringing on mission funds. Mission work at home and abroad is the life of the church. The mission is not an appendage to the church. It is not a work of supererogation, a work to be supported with a surplus if any, and to be dropped in a lean year. Even the most cursory study of mission work in Africa and the Orient shows that it was this that awakened those people to an intelligent realization of the higher things in Western civilization. It was by the help of the missionaries that America obtained its splendid hold upon China. . . .

It is well established that the Christian Church that centres its activity in itself is doomed to decay. "There is that giveth and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty." . . . .

Home missions are considered by many more important than foreign missions. But this war is teaching the world that there is no such word in any tongue as "foreign". Not long ago Russia was none of our business. Today American boys are dying for Liberty because Russian mujiks want liberty without dying for it. Christian America is not safe with China heathen. There will be no peace on the whole earth until there is good will among men.

Service Flag—A service flag bearing five stars was dedicated at Grace Church last Sunday evening. The stars are in honor of five officers and one private. Two of the officers are members of the same family.

RHODE ISLAND

Church Dedicated—On Sunday morning, April 21, Bishop Perry dedicated the new Church of the Redeemer, Providence. The removal of the parish from its old site on North Main Street has been compelled by the change of its neighborhood to a Jewish quarter, and this led to the sale of its property over a year ago to Polish Catholics. The new edifice, in Gothic architecture, is of field stone, with bell cote, surmounted by a slender fleche. It is the first of a parochial group of buildings, which, when completed, will provide also a parish house and a rectory, in picturesque setting, with a quadrangle opening to the west. The new edifice represents so far an expenditure of $45,000; and its seating capacity is 346 in the nave and 35 in the choir.

In the service of dedication Bishop Perry included a number of memorial gifts. The baptistry is a memorial of Bishop William N. McVickar; while a silver baptismal shell commemorates Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Caffery, communicants for more than fifty years. A rood screen, of oak, the gift of a group of parishioners, commemorates many representatives of the older families. Built into the paneling on the north side of the chancel stands the bishop's chair and prie-dieu, with a chaplain's seat on either side, given in memory of Charles Morris Smith. The sedilia in the chancel are in memory of George Corlis Nightingale. The two brass altar lights are memorials of Stephen Mathewson Greene and Frederic Albert Greene, his son. The credence is in memory of Mr. and Mrs. Stephen Albert Greene. The altar rail is a gift in appreciation of the Rev. William G. Marsh, a young communicant, who founded a church in Australia and gave it the title name of his home parish.

A stained window, given by Edward T. Davis, of Springfield, Massachusetts, in memory of his wife, Margaret Ann Buckley Davis, was unveiled on the previous Sunday. A tablet in memory of the Rev. Charles H. Wheeler, founder and first rector, has been transferred from the old building to the south porch of the new church.

The offering at this dedicatory service was made the nucleus of a fund for a pipe organ, to be a memorial of Prof. Winslow Upton of Brown University, a prominent layman of the diocese and a long time vestryman of this parish. An interesting feature of the service was the presentation of a class for Confirmation by the rector, the Rev. Frederick J. Bassett, D.D., to whose wise leadership the new church is largely due.

Churchmen's Club Meeting—The mobilization of the intellectual and spiritual resources of America to win the war was the theme of three addresses at the twenty-eighth annual meeting of the Churchmen's Club of Rhode Island, on April 18, at the Narragansett Hotel. Prof. Edward B. Reed of Yale University declared that the men in colleges had stopped drifting and were working for one purpose: to get into the war. Col. H. Anthony Dyer urged the churches to adjust themselves to wartime conditions, and the clergy "not to be afraid to talk on present-day topics". Bishop Perry announced that seventy Episcopal clergymen were now serving as Army and Navy and Red Cross chaplains and Y. M. C. A. secretaries with the American forces. He urged the laymen to so administer their parishes that they will be ready for the broadened ministry of these clergymen when they return. At the election of officers Mr. William A. Viall was made president, and Mr. Henry H. Field secretary.

CHICAGO

cago Historical Society Exhibit—The week the Chicago Historical Society conducted at Orchestral Hall an exhibit an unusual nature, consisting of war ures and relics. Of especial interest is ase of "Civil War Dodgers", which in- les President Lincoln's "Call for 300,000 re". On Friday evening a patriotic eting was held at Orchestra Hall, Bishop derson being the speaker of the evening. e of the features was the singing of National Anthem by John Alden Car- ter, while Mrs. John Allen Haines held flag. Mrs. Haines is a direct descendant Francis Scott Key, the author of "The r Spangled Banner". A descendant of sey Ross was also present at the recep- n which followed the meeting.

ctor Celebrates Anniversary—The . Charles Herbert Young, M.A., the ctor of Christ church, Woodlawn, re- tly celebrated his fifteenth anniversary rector of that parish. The Rev. John Clurkin, M.D., the curate, has completed hteen years of active service in the ish. Mr. McClurkin was a practising sician and devoted Churchman in the ocese of Springfield, and in order to in- ase his usefulness received Deacon's Or- s. On his retirement from active work a physician he came to Chicago to live, l has done faithful service for the Mas- in Christ Church Parish.

The Christ Church Troop of the Boy outs won the Championship Trophy in recent efficiency competition between all Scout Troops in the Woodlawn District. e troop is rendering valuable service for Nation in its crisis. One boy, Scout lymond Guy, is averaging over two hun- ed dollars each week in the sale of Thrift Stamps. The Scouts assisted materially in the work of the Fifteenth District Exemption Board, which met at the Parish House. One Scout weighed the men, a second tested the hearing, a third checked the records, and two additional Scouts wrote figures for each physician.

Patriotic Meeting at St. Luke's, Evanston—An interesting meeting of a patriotic nature was held at St. Luke's Parish House, Evanston, during the past week under the auspices of the Men's Club. Samuel Insull of the National Council of Defense was the speaker of the evening. The Evanston Naval Training Corps were present in uniform as special guests of the Men's Club.

Gold Star at St. Simon's—Captain Henry N. Brooks, of the United States Engineers Reserve Corps, a son of the late Admiral Williams B. Brooks, U. S. N., died in France, of pneumonia. Captain Brooks went to France last December, and was located in a small French village as Engineer Depot Officer in charge of a large and important Engineer Supply Depot.

The Furber Memorial at St. George's Church—William E. Furber has presented St. George's Parish with a set of six candlesticks, a silver lavabo bowl, and a sanctuary lamp in memory of his mother, Elvira Furber. Easter Day, which this year fell on March 31, was the anniversary of Mrs. Furber's birth.

NEW JERSEY

Sunday School Annual Convention—The annual Sunday School Convention of the Diocese of New Jersey was held in Christ church, the Pro-Cathedral, Trenton, on April 20. The Bishop of the diocese officiated at noonday prayers and the afternoon service. The Archdeacon presided at business sessions. The Rev. Thomas A. Conover of Bernardsville was Secretary.

The attendance was larger than at any previous convention: over three hundred delegates representing approximately seventy-five schools.

A conference for superintendents was conducted by the Rev. Stewart U. Mitman, Secretary of the Third Province and Editor of the American Sunday School Magazine. Other conferences were conducted by Mrs. Loman of Philadelphia for Primary teachers, and the Rev. Thomas A. Hyde of Jersey City for Junior and Senior teachers. The address at the Presentation Service in the afternoon was by the Rev. Phillips E. Osgood of Philadelphia. Mr. William S. F. Pierce, Treasurer of the diocesan Sunday School fund, announced the amount of the offering, which was $5,335.28. This is larger than the offering of last year, with further remittances yet expected.

NORTH DAKOTA

Anniversary Service—An anniversary service was held in Gethsemane Cathedral on the evening of the seventh of April, commemorating the entrance of the United States into the war. It was a patriotic service full of the spirit of enthusiasm and thankfulness that we are in the war, since it is a war between the eternal principles of right and wrong. Live and virile addresses were made by two laymen, Mr. John S. Frame and Mr. Gordon B. Smith, also a message direct from the trenches in France was brought by Corporal Charles Rose, of the 35th Battalion, Canadian Infantry, who is here on a furlough, having been seriously wounded in going "over the top" about a year ago in France. Corporal Rose is a Churchman and told in a very natural and unaffected manner a story full of pathos and interest. He has an artificial knee cap and still has in his body parts of the shrapnel in such vital spots that the surgeon did not dare to remove them.

CONNECTICUT

Patriotic Service at Berkeley—An impressive service was held at Berkeley Divinity School on the afternoon of Friday, April 19, at which an American flag, given by Major Robert Frazier, formerly an undergraduate at Berkeley and now in the United States service in Texas, was dedicated by Bishop Brewster. In the congregation were commanding officers of the Home Guard, members of the faculty of Wesleyan University and civic officials. Professor William P. Ladd presided.

The flag was carried to the sanctuary by an undergraduate and was there received by Louis W. Pitt, president of the student body, who in turn presented it to Professor Ladd in behalf of Major Frazier. After the dedication by Bishop Brewster, the Rev. Dr. John McCook of the faculty of Trinity College, Hartford, made a most stirring address upon the flag. Dr. McCook was graduated from Berkeley in the early sixties, and served as a chaplain in the Civil War. Prof. Ladd introduced him as "One who has borne some of the burdens in a war which in some respects parallels the present one".

Battalion Confirmation—The Rev. Jos. Barnett, who enlisted in the 303d Machine Gun Battalion, prepared a class of 22 for Confirmation from members of his battalion. Bishop Lawrence in his visitation to Camp Devens most warmly commended Mr. Barnett's splendid work—not only in preparing these men for Confirmation, but also for his strong and effective Christian influence.

Large Offering—The offerings of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Hartford (Rev. Geo. T. Linsley, rector) were considerably over $1,000. A circular letter had been issued by the vestry asking for $800 on that day.

Windows Dedicated—With an impressive service the beautiful new windows placed in Christ church, Ansonia, in memory of the late Mrs. Charles F. Brooker were dedicated on Sunday morning, April 14, 1918.

Bishop Brewster said the prayers of dedication. The Rt. Rev. Chas. E. Woodcock, D. D., bishop of Kentucky, a former rector of the parish, preached the sermon.

The six windows form the beginning of a scheme which will finally include all the windows of the church. These windows, done in full color by the D'Ascenzo Studios of Philadelphia (who did the remarkable windows in the Valley Forge chapel), have been the objects of much thoughtfulness by the architects during their inception and manufacture and it is felt they are a very real contribution to art. Certainly they must rank with the finest stained glass in the country.

WASHINGTON

Board of Religious Education Meets—"One of the most vital and stimulating of the Board's meetings" was the characterization of the meeting at St. Alban's church, Washington, April 17. Excepting the president, Bishop Israel, who is in France, all were present. A great loss has been sustained in the death of the Rev. Frederic Gardiner, L.H.D., secretary for schools and colleges. Effort will be made through a committee to carry on the work he has so well begun. Co-operation was pledged in promoting the Wartime Educational Fund of the General Board, and the Teacher-training Drive to be made next fall with other Christian bodies. Observance of Education Sunday in every parish next October was again recommended, to be followed, where practicable, with a week-day or week-night conference of the educational forces of the parish. The following resolutions were passed on recommendation of the Sunday School Commission of the Board:

"WHEREAS, official statistics of the Church show a decrease in the Sunday school population of the Church, and

"WHEREAS, the work of religious education as a means of getting our citizens into right relations with God is a matter of supreme importance, if democracy is to continue a safe institution for America, and love, justice, and righteousness are to continue and grow among us; therefore, be it

"Resolved: This Provincial Board of Religious Education earnestly requests all our clergy, superintendents, and teachers to maintain the work of Sunday school instruction with unabated vigor during the war, and to permit none of the imperative needs of the hour to interfere with the tasks of religious education; and be it further

"Resolved: That the Secretary of the Provincial Board be authorized to transmit this resolution to the Secretary of each diocesan board of religious education in the Province, with the request that each diocesan board earnestly urge the officers of each Sunday school in each diocese to give active attention to this matter."

The Sunday School Commission met on the preceding afternoon, all dioceses except three being represented and submitting heartening reports. A digest of all diocesan reports will be prepared by a committee of the Commission for consideration by the Board at its fall meeting.

On the evening of the 16th a joint public meeting of the Provincial and Diocesan Boards and the Washington Sunday School Institute was held in the parish hall of the Church of the Epiphany, with addresses by the Rev. H. W. Diller on "The Plans and Projects of the Provincial Board" and by the Rev. E. P. Dandridge on "Religious Education in Wartime". ROLLA P. CURRIE.

MAINE

Convention Date—The ninety-ninth Convention of the Diocese of Maine will be convened in St. John's church, Bangor, Wednesday, May 15, in accordance with the vote taken at the last annual Convention. This will be the first time for twenty-five years that the annual Convention has been held outside of St. Luke's Cathedral, Portland. The meeting is to be held at St. John's church, Bangor, because of the beautiful new stone church which has just been dedicated there.

Memorial Pulpit—A handsome memorial pulpit was recently blessed by Bishop Benjamin Brewster, at St. Paul's church, Portland. The pulpit is the gift of Dr. Clarence A. Baker, for many years senior warden of the parish, and is given in memory of his wife, Mary Augustus Baker. Mrs. Baker was a devoted member of the parish and was actively engaged in its work.

Gift—St. Margaret's chapel, Belfast, has received a Carrara marble font. The inscription on the font is: In memory of Alma C. Field. Given by her daughter, Mrs. H. B. Pearson.

PITTSBURGH

A Patriotic Service—On a recent Sunday evening a rather unique patriotic service took place at Calvary church, Pittsburgh, in commemoration of the end of the first year's participation of the United States in the World's War. The rector, the Rev. E. J. Van Etten, made an address suitable to the occasion, and this was preceded and followed by colorful processions, composed of the Boys' Choir, the Girls' Choir, the Teachers of the Red Cross Work, and the Red Cross Workers of the parish, all suitably attired in their distinctive costume.

The church was decorated with the flags of the Allies, and the National Flag, the State Flag, and the Banner of the City were carried at the head of the procession, which marched to the music of trumpet and drum. Two gold stars were added to the parish Service Flag, which now contains one hundred and forty-five names. As part of the service, a bronze memorial tablet was unveiled in the corridor connecting the church and parish house, which bore the following inscription:

"In memory of James Pettigrew Waddell, Corporal Company M, 320th Regiment, aged twenty-two years, who died in the service of his country at Camp Lee, Virginia, January 4, 1918, he being the first from Calvary Parish in the world war to pass into the presence of his Lord. Erected to his memory by the Choristers of Calvary Church."

Both gold stars on the Service Flag are in memory of boys who were members of the Choir and the Sunday school.

NEVADA

Good Friday Observed for First Time—For the first time in the history of Fallon, Good Friday was observed from 12 till 3 o'clock. Early in the week the Archdeacon called upon every business place and saloon and asked for the closing of all business places, including stores, saloons, pool rooms, etc., for the Three Hours commemoration of our Blessed Lord's sufferings on the Cross. Every one asked was very willing to co-operate in Good Friday observance.

A Union Service was held in Trinity Church, Rev. M. Washob of the Methodist Church and Rev. M. Coates of the Baptist Church assisting in giving addresses on the "Seven Words from the Cross".

The Easter Day Services in Fallon were largely attended. The special offering more than met the general apportionment for Missions.

War Tells on Parish—The Church in Ely is beginning to realize somewhat the sacrifice which the war calls have laid upon us in the past year. About forty of young men who have in one way or other been under our pastoral care left us to join the Colors—eight of wh were Communicants and with their g we have lost probably fifteen per cent of gifts which we have depended upon the support of the Church. Our Ea Communions, which were 86 last Easter, to 65 this year; but our Easter offer this year have been larger than ever fore, amounting to over $200 to Our people are so scattered that often hear from some of our helpers a week so after the Easter envelopes are sent The general feeling about the Services year was that in real spiritual uplift were the best we had ever known in camp.

Chief of the Pah-utes on Easter—S entering the field the missionary to Indians has visited Nixon, Wadswo Stewart and Elko. On Easter Day t was a Celebration of the Holy Commu at Nixon, the agency of the Pyramid L Reservation. The high festival of Church began bright and joyous with fresh atmosphere of spring and the m of the birds. A significant sight was of old Captain Dave, Chief of all the I utes, kneeling side by side with the a at the Communion rail. The native p has been in Holy Orders and a missio among Indians for thirty-four years, this was the first time he ever saw an dian agent support, like a brother, an Indian, failing in strength, and lead hi gently to God's Altar.

hich Is the More Modern, Shake- are or Job?"—This is the title of the ress made by the Rev. Percy Stickney nt on Sunday afternoon at the Actors' Church Alliance Service at the cathedral—the fifth annual Shakespeare Service held by the society.

St. Stephen's College Meeting—On Thursday afternoon, April 11, in spite of the very inclement weather, the Woman's Guild of St. Stephen's College held a meeting and tea in the choir school in the cathedral close. Since the House of Bishops was still in session it was impossible for those of its members who had promised to be present and to speak to leave Synod House. The gathering was, however, very fortunate in having Dean Fosbroke, who made a splendid address supporting the principles and the work of St. Stephen's. He presented some interesting figures, the result of an inquiry extending over the last ten years, which showed that the average mark of St. Stephen's men in the General Theological Seminary was 84 per cent., which the Dean considered remarkably good. In the absence of Bishop Burch, President Rogers took the chair. He told the audience of the prospect of St. Stephen's being recognized by the Province and of the cooperation of the General Board of Religious Education and of the bishops. Announcement was made that at least five New York parishes, among them St. Thomas', have promised to provide scholarships for the college. Dean Treder, Dr. Reazer, Mrs. Harold Haddon and Mrs. Goodwin also spoke.

Junior Auxiliary and Board of Education Confer—A very significant conference was held on Tuesday, April 9, at Old Synod Hall. I have already referred to it in these columns, and given in advance the excellent program which was prepared by Dr. S. W. Patterson and his committee on arrangement. The topic was "Win the War—Win the World", and the total impression made, to quote one of the students from St. Faith's who was present, was "the greater responsibility for living the Christ life so that the rising generation might feel the power of God and be drawn to feel its privilege and responsibility. Consecration and sacrifice and the spiritual purification caused by sacrifice were two dominating notes of the conference, the fact that we must be soldiers winning the world to Christ". This was the theme of Bishop Perry's stirring address on "Reconstruction". "Instead of that baffling word reconstruction, if we could only take the divine point of view!" he said, "If we would take the mind of God, we would talk of simplification—simplification in the terms of religious life, directness and honesty and a new clarity". Miss Withers gave an outline of the New Junior Plan and Bishop Page spoke on the importance of missionary work in its relation to the war. "The brotherhood of man is the one thought we are proclaiming", he said. "What is missions but the brotherhood of man? . . . To do away with war, train men to love one another. Interest the boy at home in the boy in Japan."

In the evening Dr. Gardner issued the battle cry "The challenge to the Church is to produce leaders!" Bishop Thomas followed him on the topic, "Dominating our children's life with the thought 'The World for Christ'." The simultaneous conferences on various topics held immediately after supper were very helpful and stimulating, and the leaders fired their audiences with much enthusiasm. April 9 marked an important day in the history of Church school and Junior work in the diocese.

At the Church of Zion and St. Timothy—The Missionary Chapter lately closed its work for the season. The rector appointed Miss Elizabeth Hicks head of the chapter for the ensuing year and Mrs. James May Duane, vice-head. Miss Geer has given to the War Commission through the Altar Chapter of the parish a private Communion set, which was formerly the property of her father, the Rev. George Jarvis Geer, D.D., for thirty years rector of St. Timothy's church. In addition, the altar chapter is presenting to the commission a set of fair linen for the use of one of the chaplains.

ERIE

Convention to Meet—The eighth annual convention of the diocese will be held in the Cathedral of St. Paul, Erie, May 14 and 15. There will be a preliminary service and convention address on the 14th at 5 p. m.; the Church Club dinner at 7 p. m.; opening service of the convention on the 15th at 9 a. m., and it is expected to finish the business in one day.

W. A. Meeting—The Woman's Auxiliary of the diocese will hold its annual meeting in Trinity Memorial church, Warren, on May 2 and 3. Dr. Mary James will address the meeting on her work in connection with the Church General Hospital, Wuchang, China.

Largest Income in History—St. John's church, Sharon, Pennsylvania, received during 1917 the largest income in its history, $25,000, and only one-third of this amount was spent in the parish. St. John's maintains a kindergarten, a nursing service with three nurses, besides being generous in its social service and missionary contributions.

More Chaplains Needed—The Rev. E. J. Owen, rector of St. John's church, Sharon, Pennsylvania, recently visited Camp Lee, where many of the draftees of Northwestern Pennsylvania are sent. Mr. Owen reports that the Rev. C. H. Nelson, our civilian chaplain, needs at least four additional clergymen to work with him among the soldiers at Camp Lee. It is probable that a movement will be started in the diocese of Erie to supply funds for one or more chaplains.

ARTHUR L. SEITER.

LONG ISLAND

Meeting on Moral Welfare—A public meeting to consider the moral welfare of the girls of Long Island was held under the auspices of the Social Service Committee of the diocese on the evening of Monday, April 15, at the diocesan house.

The Bishop of Long Island presided and, as the evening went on, showed himself very much in favor of the plans decided upon.

Mrs. L. Frederic Pease, secretary of the Church Mission of Help, explained the work of that society, and made suggestions which undoubtedly will be adopted.

Miss Elizabeth Butler, sister of Dr. Nicholas Murray Butler, spoke on prevention work; she is one of the War Commission of the National Council of the Young Women's Christian Association, and made a strong and stirring plea for women to do their utmost to help in this.

It was shown that the services of a trained social worker to do the professional work that may arise would be needed, and this necessitated the raising of twelve hundred dollars; subscriptions were taken and a generous amount raised at once.

Steps are now being taken to form groups of women in each parish, who will work in conjunction with the social workers, and become associates of the Social Service Committee of the diocese.

Subscriptions are now being taken. President, the Rt. Rev. Frederick Burgess, D.D.; chairman, the Rev. Wm. Sheafe Chase, D.D.; field secretary, Mr. John Thomas.

Patriotic Service—The Sons and Daughters of St. George held an annual service in commemoration of the patron saint of England for whom their organization is named at the Church of the Redeemer, Sunday, April 21.

The rector, the Rev. Thomas J. Lacey, Ph. D., preached a most patriotic sermon on "St. George in Life and Legend", in which he said he read a parable of the world's life today. St. George represents the allied nations, fighting the fight of humanity, democracy and God.

The dragon represents the pitiless power of autocracy, blighting and crushing all that is most precious and sacred in the world's life.

The church was beautifully decorated, and many of the clergy and representatives of the Allies were present.

Anniversary Celebration—The Rev. Frank M. Townley, rector of St. Bartholomew's church, Brooklyn, on Tuesday, April 23, celebrated his tenth anniversary. With Mrs. Townley he was given a reception by his parishioners and friends under the auspices of St. Bartholomew's Men's Club. The festivities began with an address by Bishop Burgess, and there were many other speakers. Mr. Townley appeared for the first time in the State Guard uniform, as he has recently been appointed chaplain of the Twenty-third Regiment. The poem, "Our Chaplain As We Know Him", was read and before the close of the evening he was presented with a purse of one thousand dollars, composed of five one hundred dollar bills and five one hundred dollar Third Liberty Loan Bonds. The Woman's Auxiliary of the church also presented him with a separate purse of one hundred dollars. On Sunday morning Mr. Townley preached an historical sermon, and a fine musical program was rendered, under the direction of Mr. Bauman Lowe.

The Rev. Mr. Townley came to St. Bartholomew's, from Merrick, Long Island, in 1908. Since his coming the number of communicants has increased from 320 to 930. A $10,000 organ has been installed, the mortgage paid off, and the church consecrated.

Volunteers for Service—At a homecoming reception tendered to the Rev. Oscar F. R. Treder, dean of the Cathedral at Garden City, it was learned that Mr. Treder has volunteered for Masonic service overseas. This news has come as a big surprise; whether or not he will finally go will depend, it is understood, on the arrangements that can be made concerning the Cathedral.

Over five hundred men from all parts of Long Island were present at the reception, and the Dean was given a regular ovation.

Both he and Justice Scudder made unusually fine addresses.

English Church News

"Faith and Order"—It was your branch of the Church which started us with the phrase, and we on this side have taken up the matter seriously. The preliminary results of the conference on Faith and Order were doubtless recorded in THE CHURCHMAN at the time: I think it was before I was your correspondent. Now we have something much more definite than abstract resolutions. The sub-committee appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York has issued its second interim report. They are careful to point out that they are not making any proposals for the reunion of Christendom, but merely exploring the ground so as to discover ways of approach to the questions to be considered that seem most promising and hopeful. The first report dealt chiefly with Faith; the second is more concerned with Order. They are strongly convinced on two points: believers in our Lord should be one visible society, and this unity is essential for the purpose of Christ in the world. Mere co-operation for moral efforts is not enough.

Episcopacy is frankly seen to be the difficulty, but the committee are agreed that, as in the greater part of Christendom Episcopacy is the recognized organ of unity and continuity, members of the Episcopal churches ought not to be asked to abandon it in assenting to any basis of union. It is as strongly admitted that Christian churches which have not accepted the Episcopal order have been used by the Holy Spirit in His work of enlightening the world. The committee therefore desires a "willing acceptance for the common enrichment of the united Church of the wealth distinctive of each".

Constitutional Episcopacy—But if episcopacy is to commend itself to other churches, it should "reassume a constitutional form" both in the manner of election and in administering a diocese. Our very monarchical episcopate in England is not to be the form for the future. What exactly should be the bishop's functions the committee will not discuss: "this can be left to the future". But it points out that ministers of our Church are not required to accept any theory of the episcopate, but only the fact of it. No Christian community need disown its past, but each would bring its own distinctive contribution, not only to the common life of the Church, but also to its methods of organization.

It is interesting to notice that the report is signed by three Bishops, Bath and Wells, Winchester, and Oxford, by well-known Churchmen like the Rev. W. Temple and Mr. Eugene Stock, and that the Free Churchmen are represented by ministers of the caliber of the Revs. J. Scott Lidgett, W. B. Selbie, J. H. Shakespeare, besides others. The issue of the report has brought the Times religious contributor into the attitude of blessing the whole movement. "Is it not possible", he asks, "to devise some method by which Nonconformist bodies can secure the advar of Episcopacy without doing anythin the least to cast the faintest suspicio to the realities of Divine grace and which have been committed to them, of which they have shown themselves faithful guardians?"

Canon Adderley's Latest Move—I perhaps a trifle too enthusiastic some mo ago in recording the fact that the Rev Hon. J. G. Adderley, honorary Cano Birmingham, had thrown in his lot the Rev. R. J. Campbell at Christ ch Westminster. One ought to have all for his restlessness, for he never very long at one job. I do hope th will settle down in his latest appointn he is to succeed that much lamented I Moose, who was killed in heroic cir stances in an air raid, as Rector o Paul's, Covent Garden. It should suit well, though he has somewhat lost spring of his early days. He used an "out-and-outer" in Churchmanship socialism, but is now rather a puzzle t friends. The Church Times has given up: "where he now stands it might be ficult for either his friends or himse define. He has lately played the pa the candid friend, candor being some more evident than friendship". Bu might well reply to this rather acid con that such changes have been observ several others of the same school. for instance, is Dr. Percy Dearmer to do with himself? His present at is an equal puzzle.

Coquetting With Nonconformity—W so much attention is being paid to th union question, about which the C Times appeared so hopeful a short tim (at least, as regards the Wesleyan seems a pity that the same paper print things which add to our diffic unless it is conscientiously obliged to We owe so much to this paper: it h enormous power for good in this co But just occasionally it lets loos "heavies" when there is nothing mu shoot at. A paragraph which bracke Dean and Chapter of Windsor wit Bishop of Hereford in the matter o lessness strikes one as scarcely fai happen to have some personal acquain with the new Dean of Windsor, an own judgment may be thereby biased. I really cannot think that an act of tesy like asking a Baptist minister t a lesson on Good Friday in St. Ge Chapel compromised the Church's p on the Sacrament of Baptism. W told that the "people whom they g of our way to propitiate, even at th of offending their fellow-Churchmen, no signs of giving up their principle which the best answer is the Report o and Order, already alluded to. The pect of a sermon from the Bishop of ford, in a London Wesleyman Missio surely indicates an entirely different from that of the Dean of Windsor. the Dean is if anything more severe tigated than the Bishop.

JAMES CA

A Detective Story

VICKY VAN. By Carolyn Wells. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. 1918. $1.00.

This is a lively detective story by Carolyn Wells. In it Fleming Stone, the great detective, works out his solution of a puzzling murder mystery, after—and a long way after—the fashion of Sherlock Holmes. The only trouble is that the reader works out the mystery for himself some time before the detective does. Every author, of course, cannot be Sir Conan Doyle, but they might avoid calling up comparisons by choosing some other theme than that irresistibly connected with the hero of "The Hound of the Baskervilles". And Miss Wells has themes in which she is unrivaled. Even at that one can occupy an hour or two very pleasantly with Vicky Van, though the lady herself and the detective who is after her are likely to be very soon forgotten.

A Girl's Three Sums

THE APPLE TREE GIRL. By George Weston. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Company. 1918. $1.00.

This is quite one of the most charming stories we have read lately. It is the tale of a little girl living in an unattractive village, but the girl herself vividly alive, very attractive and tremendously ambitious.

She sets herself to do three sums:

First. How can I make everybody like me?

Second. How can I make myself famous?

Third. How can I marry a millionaire?

She solves the first problem by liking everybody; the second, by strenuous effort at overcoming her environment in a way which it would spoil the story for the reader if we were to tell in the book-review.

The third she finds that she does not care to solve when the opportunity comes to her, preferring, like the charming girl she was, to marry a man who was rich only in love.

The Apple Tree Girl is a lovely lady to become acquainted with.

Rejuvenation

SKINNER'S BIG IDEA. By Henry Irving Dodge. New York: Harper Brothers. 1918. 50 cents.

Skinner is again a hero! He worked out a big idea! He discovered some up-to-date psychology and rejuvenated an office full of "blue envelope men". Mr. Dodge tells all this with lots of humor and has compressed into an hour's reading a real message that will be welcomed in places where business efficiency is prized and in homes where the bread winner has the idea that he is growing old when he really is only entrenched in a "rut".

A Correction

In the review of the Rev. George Parkin Atwater's admirable new book, The Episcopal Church, the name of the publisher was given incorrectly and the address omitted. We are glad to supply the information here, for we feel sure many of our readers will wish to procure copies of the book. Those of the clergy who are preparing Confirmation classes will find it especially useful. It is published by the Parish Publishers, Akron, Ohio, and in paper costs fifty cents.—The Editors.

"I Bought It With My Candy Money"

Here are grain bubbles so nut-like and flavory that children will spend candy money for them. Perhaps you have known them, as we have, to do it.

Hungry children after school eat them like confections. Crisped and lightly buttered they are fascinating tidbits—far better than peanuts or popcorn.

They are used like nut meats in home candy making and as garnish on ice cream. They taste like nuts, and vastly excel them by their airy, flaky texture.

YET PREMIER FOODS

Mix with Berries

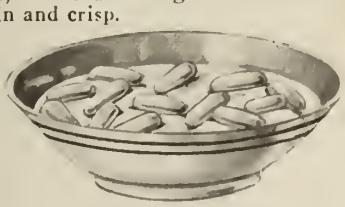
Yet they are foods—scientific foods, invented by a great food expert. They are the greatest foods made from rice, corn or wheat, because of their ease of digestion.

Two are whole grains steam exploded—puffed to eight times normal size. One is pellets of hominy puffed to raindrop size.

All get an hour of fearful heat, which gives that wondrous flavor. All are shot from guns, and thus changed into bubbles, flimsy, thin and crisp.

Every food cell is exploded, so digestion can instantly act. They do not tax the stomach, yet every atom feeds.

Remember these things. Puffed grains are superlative grain foods. Food experts wish that every grain could be prepared in this way. No other process ever known so fits a grain for food.



Float in Milk

Make them more than breakfast dainties. They are for luncheons, for suppers, for playtime and for bedtime. They are for eating dry, for mixing with fruits, for the bowl of milk, for soups, or for serving with sugar and cream. There are three of them, each with a different flavor, so Puffed Grains are ever new. Let no day pass without them.

The Spring Fiction

Two War Novels

THE TREE OF HEAVEN. By May Sinclair. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1918. $1.60.

We have read no novel on the war equal in power and artistic performance to Miss Sinclair's The Tree of Heaven. The author has her implement well in hand. Her previous novels have placed her in the upper rank of English novelists where we should place only two or three beside her. When she takes the war for the background of her theme, we expect great things of her. She does not disappoint us. It is unfair to compare her with Mr. Wells, unfair to her and cruel to him, but in reading The Tree of Heaven we constantly recall Mr. Britling. Mr. Wells' popular war novel contains perhaps only one character. Every character in The Tree of Heaven is throbbing with life. Nicky is as lovable as any person whom we have met in recent fiction. In the crucifixion of soul and temperament which Michael endures in bringing himself to enlist we have one of the keenest pieces of character analysis that we know of anywhere.

The book is not depressing as are so many of our war novels. One lays it down with spiritual exhilaration. The author inspires one to wish to be worthy of these fine-souled, undemonstrative English boys to whom has been given the task of saving the world's freedom. W. A. S.

THE WHITE MORNING. By Gertrude Atherton. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. 1918. $1.00.

Like the traditional woman's letter, the most important part of this book is the postscript. After completing the story, Miss Atherton wrote to the editor of The Bookman, giving her "authority for writing The White Morning; in other words, for daring to believe that a revolution, conceived and engineered by women, is possible in Germany".

Would that she might be correct; but while everything which she writes is interesting, this tale is not convincing. There is only one remedy for the criminal insanity of the Kaiser and his associates. To use the phrase of Horace Greeley in another connection, it is "a darn good licking". And that must come from the outside. Thank God it is on its way! G. T. D.

Three "Thrillers"

PAWNS COUNT. By E. Phillips Oppenheim. $1.50.

THE HOUSE OF WHISPERS. By Wm. Johnston. Boston: Little, Brown & Company. 1918. $1.40.

THE MOVING FINGER. By Natalie Sumner Lincoln. New York: Appleton's. 1918. $1.50.

I read these books during an attack of grippe, and I think that the fact that they made me forget my miseries is the highest praise that could be given them. Pawns Count held my attention by the characteristic Oppenheim style; he has pulled me through so many crises that I always open one of his books with a feeling of grateful expectancy and this is up to his best level. It is very different from any of his others as it centres around an American girl in New York. The setting seems a little bleak; an unreal New York lacks the glamour of an unreal London or Paris, but the story has all the compelling interest of a good plot.

The Moving Finger proved even more interesting. It is a superlatively good detective story in the ingenuity of its plot and the interweaving of clews and suspicions with the actions of the various characters. It is absolutely original, the situations are unusual and the denouement is totally unexpected. It has also the merit, unusual in this type of fiction, of being well written. It is a book to buy not only to read, but in order to lend it to all one's tired friends.

The House of Whispers was hard to judge fairly, coming after the other two stories, but taken by itself it would prove well worth reading. U. H.

In the Tokyo Embassy

THE BEST PEOPLE. By Anne Warwick. New York: John Lane Company. 1918. $1.50.

The Best People is an entertaining story of the prosaic pettiness of diplomatic life in the East, its artificiality thrown into strong relief by the fresh vivid personality of the heroine. She leaves home to escape being smothered by the trivialities of a small Western town and goes to visit an old school friend in the American Embassy in Japan. At first it is only the glamour that she feels, the beauty of Japan, which is described delightfully, and the stimulating cosmopolitan society with its gay parties and formal ceremonies, but she finds that the foreign colony, unrooted exotics, live only for their emotions and their personal rivalries. Her own experiences are peculiarly disillusionizing. As she is about to go home in disgust she learns from an older woman the real devotion and heroism that underlies the lives of these transplanted people and realizes that the "best people", whom she has always longed to know, are not a picked group of individuals, but are to be found only by hunting for the best in everyone. Sea and the Grocery Business

FLOOD TIDE. By Daniel Chase. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1918. $1.50.

Flood Tide is a story of the sea and the grocery business—the two are linked together from the hero's earliest memories, as he is the son of a storekeeper in a small New England coast town. As a psychological study it is typically American, and very original. Written in the first person, it sounds autobiographical—at least in part; the accounts of his childhood have touches of reality too convincing to be imaginary. One of the finest bits is a description of a torchlight procession, with the boy carrying his torch, proudly one of a rank of torch-bearers, but at the same time outside of it all, feeling the whole procession, seeing the town flooded with glory, transfigured by an almost epic poetry. That is the keynote of his character, he is always outside as well as inside of everything that he does, and he suffers from the virtues as well as the limitations of his temperament. He lives more in the future than in the present, with the result that the girl to whom he is engaged marries some one else. At the height of his success—he has worked out a chain of grocery stores—he suddenly realizes that he has made out of wealth and business power a terrible prison for his soul.

There is no escape until he buys a yacht and goes back to the sea. But that is only a palliative, he is not really free until his partner is caught in the war panic. As the result of the crash, the hero goes back to the home of his youth, and the love of his youth—we are mercifully spared the original grocery store. The very end is the weakest part of the book, but it is interesting.

It is a book of the failure of success, but it is not in the least sad, and leaves the impression of a series of questions rather than the finality of failure, questions that are vibrating in the air today when all our aims are being challenged. U. H.

A New Russian Novel

A FAMILY OF NOBLEMEN. By M. Y. Saltykov. New York: Boni & Liveright, Inc. 1918. $1.50.

The best way to understand Russia, in its present confusion, is through the revelation of Russian character in the national works of fiction. A Family of Noblemen is considered a great book by Russians themselves so, incredible as it seems, it must be a true picture of a certain phase of life, a phase of deterioration so ghastly that any upheaval is justified which would make such a family impossible. It draws a compelling picture of the loneliness of the country landowner, with the irresponsible despotism, petty meanness, and dissipation that are the almost inevitable results of generations following each other in the same groove. The main character is an elderly woman, dominant, narrow and avaricious, who sacrifices her family to her love of money. They rot away one after another until only one son is left. He is called the "Bloodsucker", because he is even worse than his mother; so cruel that his success stirs even her conscience, and she dies bitterly repenting. His cruelty drives both of his sons to disgrace and death, his nieces become prostitutes, but he is quite untouched, spending his days in elaborate religious devotions and endless accounts. At last he, too, dies, frozen to death on his mother's grave where he has gone in a half drunken fit of penitence. The book gives us the cumulative degeneracy of four generations of this family! U. H.

Dostoievsky Translations

THE GAMBLER AND OTHER STORIES. By Fyodor Dostoievsky. From the Russian by Constance Garnett. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1917. $1.50.

To the admirers of Russian literature another column of Dostoievsky translated into English is a welcome gift. Lovers of one of the world's greatest authors will be grateful for access to anything that he has written. The present volume, while typical of its author, is even more cryptic than "The Idiot", "The Brothers" and "Crime and Punishment". But here and there a blaze of light rewards our tolerance. The stories are all Dostoievskian, which is equivalent to saying sheer genius. W. A. S.

The Open Forum

Anachronistic Pews

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

When practically the whole world is fighting to the death for democracy, when the Church is taking so large a part in formulating thought, when men's hearts are failing them for fear, when to many souls faith itself is dependent on the outcome of this terrific struggle between light and darkness it seems strangely at variance with the spirit of the times that at any church edifice in his country one should feel embarrassed by the necessity of asking for a seat. And yet this is precisely what happens in any church that uses the autocratic, aristocratic, anachronistic system of owned, rented or assigned pews.

Can the imagination conceive of ushers at any of the services on the shore of the Galilean Lake? Does any one believe that the Publicans had all to be seated before the fisher folk could get a place? St. Peter said, "Use hospitality one to another without grudging". Did he mean one kind for our own homes and another kind for God's house? Is there a single person who reads this letter who would ask guests to his house and then say "You will please wait in the hall until my family arrives because each one of them wishes his accustomed chair. When they are all comfortably seated you may enter". Yet this is done, in effect, in every church that is not absolutely free. In my opinion a church should be so free that any individual of any stratum of society would feel at ease in any seat therein.

The functions of the ushers should change and they should be no more than a reception committee who should have power to say, with a wave of the hand, "This is God's house. You are welcome. Walk in and take any seat that meets your mood or suits your fancy". I know from years of experience just the effect on people's minds, particularly strangers, of a restricted sitting and I grieve to say that in this respect this Church of ours is one of the chiefest offenders and as a consequence one of the greatest sufferers. I have, however, seen great improvement in recent years. After this war is over there must follow general reconstruction, commercially, socially and religiously. Commercially we are going to be greater, socially we are going to be more democratic and religiously we are going to be more tolerant and charitable, and as I am convinced that one of the beneficent results is going to be a tremendous increase in real Christianity, so I hope that every church in this country will be as free as was the open air at the first sermons preached by Christ himself.

A Misstatement

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In relation to the statement in THE CHURCHMAN to the effect that a Red Cross booth was torn down by Christian Scientists at their Wednesday evening meeting in Aeolian Hall, please permit me to say the statement is unqualifiedly false. The booth placed in the lobby before the meeting remained there throughout the meeting and the woman in charge solicited and received members to the Red Cross among those in attendance without molestation, before and after. I have this upon the written statement of the First Reader, the Chief Usher, the assistant usher in charge of the hall, and an attendant at the meeting.

Equally false is any intimation that the Christian Science organization is opposed to the work of the Red Cross. A complete answer to this charge is found in the fact that the Red Cross helpers were invited to join the relief train sent by the Christian Science Board of Directors of the Mother Church in Boston to the Halifax sufferers, and accepted the invitation.

Among Christian Scientists membership in the Red Cross is wholly a matter of individual option. May I say for myself that I have been a member nearly three years.

Mobilize Now!

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Your editorial in regard to the deficiency of candidates for the ministry, apropos the startling statistics of the Rev. Paul Micou, strikes a welcome note, one ventures to suggest, in the minds of many who wish to see the Church play a real part in the present crisis. The proposed plan of training laymen and women for Church work, and thus relieve large numbers of the clergy from work which is not primarily their function, is worthy of every consideration. But the question arises, will the Church do it? Now is the time to act! Who knows how many we might have taking a course this Summer if the Church could call them. The Allies did a big thing when they put Foch in supreme command of the Allied armies. But it ought to have been done before. Is the Church, or her leaders, going to wait until dire necessity stares them in the face, or is she—or they—in truly statesmanlike fashion going to mobilize her forces now, and so be ready to meet the situation?

And while the Church is mobilizing her forces, what is she going to do with those seminaries, especially the smaller ones, which even now have only a handful of men and with every prospect for fewer students each year the war continues? Is the Church going to rise to the occasion and in some way combine some of them for the period of the war, pooling the respective faculties, and thus releasing some able clergy to man vacated posts, and at the same time cut down the needless expense of running separate expensive plants in war time? If the Church doesn't the State may! Of course, there are difficulties—but away with them! They are not insurmountable!

Truly, to go into some of our larger churches on a Sunday morning and see from one to four curates, who during the week for the most part do work laymen could do, while perhaps a Western bishop tells of how many thousand people and square miles there are to one priest in his diocese, to get things done, that we are showing, and must continue to show, as a nation.

New York City. J. EDWARD LITTLE.

etc.—well, the Church has not mobilized her forces! And how it makes one long and pray that the Church may be more worthy of her Divine Head and may show something of the statesmanship, of the leadership and the enthusiastic determination

OBITUARY

THE RT. REV. ALFRED M. RANDOLPH, D.D.

The vestry of Emmanuel church, Baltimore, places on its records this expression of the sorrow of the congregation at the death of the Rt. Rev. Alfred M. Randolph, D.D., bishop of Southern Virginia, who at the time of his consecration as bishop had been for more than sixteen years the rector of Emmanuel church.

His praise is in all the churches, but nowhere will his memory be more revered than in this church where he served so long and faithfully. After more than thirty-four years of separation the impression of his edifying preaching, of his genial and loving spirit, and of his saintly life still abides.

To his bereaved family and diocese the vestry extends heartfelt sympathy.

W. Williamson, the President of the Club, graciously acted as Toastmaster.

Three after dinner speeches were made, one by R. G. Tatum, who described in a simple tale well told, the ascent of Mt. McKinley in Alaska.

The Rev. G. Sherwood Whitney, the Rector of St. Paul's Church of Augusta, spoke about "After the War What of the Church—Carry On". He spoke most earnestly on the obligation in these critical times to public worship, of the effect that our missionary work should not lag—that our churches should be got in good financial order and that religion in the home is fundamental.

The last speaker was the Rev. R. W. Patton, who made a powerful appeal for the American Church Institute for Negroes.

The new officers were elected as follows: President, Hon. J. Randolph Anderson; Vice-President, O. T. McIntosh; Treasurer, M. M. Howkins; Secretary, Thomas Purse.

THE NINETY-SIXTH CONVENTION

The Convention itself began with the celebration of the Holy Communion in St. John's Church. In place of a sermon the Bishop read his annual address. He devoted a part to the progress of the Diocese, noting in particular St. Paul's, Augusta. The Church was destroyed by fire about two years ago and owing to the unremitting efforts of the rector, the Rev. Mr. Whitney, and the devotion of the congregation, the new St. Paul's is now completed.

The Bishop made thankful reference to the fact that this year is the decennial of his Episcopate. His address closed with earnest remarks upon the close of the great War.

The Convention was duly called to order when the Rev. S. J. French was re-elected Secretary, who appointed the Rev. William B. Sams, Assistant Secretary.

In the evening the Missionary meeting was held in St. John's Church. There were three addresses. The Rev. William Johnson, Rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Augusta, spoke on the subject: "Upon whom does the responsibility of missions rest?", his answer being "upon every baptized person". The second address was by Mr. R. G. Tatum on "Mission Work in Alaska". The third address by Rev. N B. Groton, who is civilian chaplain at Camp Hancock, Augusta, had for its subject "Our Church's responsibility to the boys in the camp".

On the morning of April 18 the Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop at half past seven. Later morning prayer was read by the Rev. R. P. Johnson and the Rev. William B. Sams.

The missionary reports were the order for the day. Hon. J. R. Anderson made a stirring address on diocesan missions. The patriotic resolution, offered by Mr. E. S Elliott, was passed.

At the election of the officers practically no changes were made. The Standing Committee are: The Rev. James B. Lawrence, Americus, the Rev. S. B. McGlohon, Savannah, the Rev. G. S. Whitney, Augusta the Rev. D. W. Winn, St. Simon's Island Mr. J. R. Anderson, Savannah, Mr. George T. Cann, Savannah, Mr. E. S. Elliott, Secretary, Savannah, Mr. A. B. Moore, Savannah.

The delegates to the Provincial Synod are: The Rev. F. W. B. Dorset, Augusta the Rev. S. J. French, Brunswick, the Rev William Johnson, Augusta, the Rev. W. H Higgins, Thomasville, the Rev. J. M. Walker, Albany, the Rev. P. T. Prentiss, Augusta.

The lay delegates to the Provincial Synod are: Mr. J. R. Anderson, Savannah, Mr George T. Cann, Savannah, Mr. M. M Hopkins, Savannah, Mr. William K. Miller Augusta, Mr. A. B. Moore, Savannah, Mr R. T. Waller, Savannah.

After singing a patriotic hymn, and prayers, the Convention adjourned to meet next year in St. Paul's Church, Augusta, on May 7.

Fancy Linens from Italy at McCutcheon's

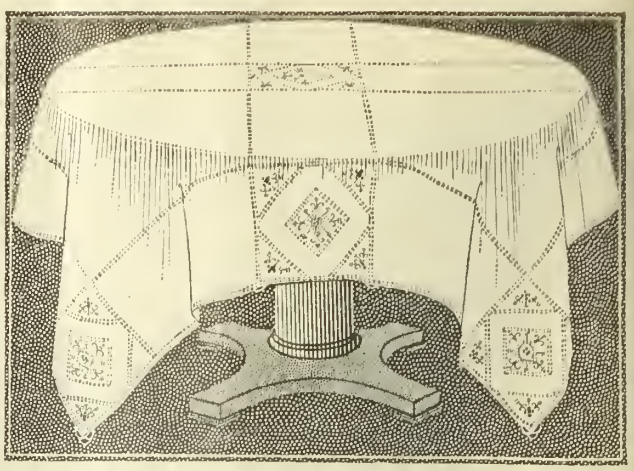
We are pleased to announce the recent arrival of several large shipments of Italian Art Embroidered Linens.

A notable feature of the goods is that they come largely from Art Needlework Schools which in normal times catered to an exclusive clientele, thus insuring originality of design and distinctiveness in workmanship. The following list will indicate some of the more popular sizes and prices:

Tea Cloths, 36x36 inches, 45x45 inches, and 54x54 inches. $8.50 to 47.50 each.

Tea Napkins, $17.50 to 42.50 dozen.

Luncheon Sets, square and oblong; 13 and 25 pieces. $25.00 to 57.50 set. Seven styles in the above sizes Embroidered in Tan and Blue at same price.



Tea Cloth of sheer Ecru Linen Embroidered in White, Blue, or Brown. 45 x 45 inches, $25.00. Napkins to match, 14 x 14 inches, $30.00 per dozen.

Sideboard Scarfs, Table Runners, Chiffonier, Dressing-table, Bureau Scarfs. $8.50 to 35.00 each.

Library Table Covers. Ecru Embroidery. $20.00 to 25.00 each.

Refectory Table Covers, 54 x 90 inches, and 54 x 108 inches. $35.00, 40.00, 47.50, 57.50 to 90.00 each.

Fascinating Reading for Sunday or Quiet Hours

OF recent years various expeditions, American and foreign, have been at work in Bible lands, unearthing all sorts of astonishing facts regarding the life of the early Christians. The result of their labors is now reported in an intensely interesting volume,

The New Archeological Discoveries

by Prof. Camden M. Cobern, who is not only an expert at unearthing buried treasure, but a master of fascinating narrative. His pages are as thrilling as romance and as readable as a novel and they bring you facts of the most surprising kind regarding the life and times of the primitive Church.

ASTONISHING PARALLELS BETWEEN ANCIENT AND MODERN LIFE

First and second century manuscripts found in Egypt, personal and business notes, love letters, contracts, mortgages, etc., reveal to us that

and conscription was advocated by many as being a better safeguard than reliance on a volunteer army.

Excess Profits and War Taxes Worried the Ancient Jews
Trusts flourished and made huge sums while taxation to carry on the imperial government was levied even on necessities.

The Servant Question a Burning One When Cleopatra Reigned
They demanded days off and other privileges or refused to work, and were quite as independent as the help of to-day.

Graft and Corruption Ran Riot Under Caesars and Ptolemies
Politics was a recognized road to wealth, and frauds of all kinds were constantly worked on the toiling masses.

The High Cost of Living Was Enormous in Biblical Times
Three days' earnings went for a bushel of beans, and a month's wages of a laborer would not purchase a small chicken.

Millionaires Dodged Their Taxes in Rome and Alexandria
by making false returns and got out of paying their inheritance duties by employing shrewd lawyers to prepare their wills.

Nero's Palace Had Elevators and Hot Air Heating
to say nothing of a revolving dining-room, a mechanical water-pump, and an elaborate organ with pipes, stops, etc.

Woman's Rights a Two-Thousand-Year-Old Problem
A newly discovered play of Euripides tells us how suffragettes of his day revolted against man, seized the government, and of the result.

Things in General

he melting down of the silver dollars the United States Treasury might be sed as an item of missionary news. The ard of Missions is facing the probable d of $190,000 more than last year to et the loss occasioned by the high price silver in the Orient. The Church Mis- nary Society of England has asked for 0,000 to cover this one item of war ex- se. If our Government succeeds in low- g and stabilizing the cost of silver, it do a great service to Boards of Mis- ns here and abroad.

In order that the United States may do part in this organization of the democ- ies, Congress should at once enact uni- sal military training and service on the iss plan, and provide for the replacement the present temporary army and navy by product of the annual levies under uni- sal service. Every American should n that the Swiss Military Constitution only provides a democratic, unprofes- al army always on call, but also improves health, education, and productiveness the Swiss people, and secures their free- n."—CHARLES W. ELIOT.

n his Convention address in Boston hop Lawrence, speaking of the death of ncis Welles Hunnewell, said:

For over twenty years many clergymen this Diocese have received through me Easter substantial checks from 'a gener- Churchman'. These beneficiaries have er known until this minute that these cks were from Mr. Hunnewell, who at ry Christmas sent me $1000, and at every ter $2000, to be given to clergymen of Diocese, especially, as he phrased it, ere there has been trouble or sick- s'."

he Presbyterian Board of Foreign Mis- ns has just closed its fiscal year with a plus of $5,000. Its total expenditures the year were just under $3,000,000; the s of congregations and individuals for ular work were $350,000 more than for 7.

t is just as easy to be a partisan in as- ing criticism as in criticism itself. The n who defends everything that is done by party or his party leaders is just as tisan as the man who assails everything t the opposing party does or plans. War hands fighting men who see straight shoot straight. It also demands fight- critics who see straight and are honest and candid in criticism. It is commonplace that a public officer learns more from his critics than he does from his admirers. He seldom learns from any one but his critics. If we had to choose between partisanship with criticism and the absence of both partisanship and criticism, I should unhesitatingly choose the former, for while the venomous shafts of partisan malice seldom hit the mark, the country cannot afford to turn its destiny over to any one who is guaranteed immunity from candid criticism. —CHARLES E. HUGHES.

"If the Germans should win this war, I should wish to die."—MYRON T. HERRICK.

The Churchman's contributors include not only the ablest thinkers among Churchmen but also the best secular writers.

Our Contributors

ARTHUR J. TODD, who contributes The Church and "Social Work", is professor of Sociology and director of the Training Course for Social and Civic Work in the University of Minnesota and a writer on questions of social and civic welfare.

The Rev. Carl E. Grammer, D.D., whose pen portrait of the late Bishop of Southern Virginia gives us a vivid realization of the loss the Church has sustained in his death, is the rector of St. Stephen's church, Philadelphia. As professor of Church history in the Theological Seminary of Virginia from 1887 to 1898, and as rector of Christ church, Norfolk, from 1898 to 1905, Dr. Grammer was closely associated with Bishop Randolph.

P. F. Grant (Mrs. Anthony V. Grant), whose verses Indifference appear in this issue, is the wife of the rector of St. John's church, Belize, British Honduras.

Mary H. Krout wrote Jesus of Nazareth Passeth By last Quinquagesima. "This poem," she writes, "was suggested by the Gospel for Quinquagesima, which was very beautifully read in our litle church here in Crawfordsville, Indiana."

James B. Kenyon, who is the author of Obedience, has often contributed to THE CHURCHMAN. The James T. White Co. recently issued a charming little volume called Reed Voices in which appear not only a number of Mr. Kenyon's poems that were first printed in THE CHURCHMAN, but a number of others that admirers of Mr. Kenyon's verse will be glad to see.

Frances Thornberry (Mrs. David W. Thornberry) has written a most interesting article on The Wyoming House of Churchwomen for us at the suggestion of Bishop Thomas. In an article in one of our Church papers the other day the statement was made that the California House of Churchwomen is the only one in existence. It therefore seems appropriate to contradict this impression. Mrs. Thornberry is a woman prominent in church and civic affairs in Laramie, Wyoming.

Robert H. Gardiner, who says that A Consistent Church must admit women to its diocesan councils, is too well known by those who follow the work of the Commission on Faith and Order to need any introduction.

Alanson B. Houghton is a vestryman of Christ church, Corning, New York. He is prominent in the diocese of Western New York, and a trustee of St. Stephen's College. His interesting paper on St. Stephen's College was originally read at the recent meeting of the Synod of the Second Province in New York city.

The Farmer and the Kaiser

One member of the Archbishop of York's party told this story to emphasize the difficulties with which the British Government had had to contend in arousing the empire to whip the kaiser.

A farmer who resided on the East Coast of England was summoned before a tribunal to be examined as to his fitness for military duty.

A Pastoral Message

THE following Pastoral Message, dated New York, April 15, 1918, was set forth by the House of Bishops:

The House of Bishops, meeting in the City of New York ıile the great battle which may determine the course of Christian ʼilization is in progress, declares the unwavering loyalty of the ıurch, and urges all the clergy and laity to continue to render ɛir entire and zealous obedience to the requests of the Gov-ıment.

In this war which has been forced upon us, and in which now ; are contending for the defense of our liberties and faith, the pport of those in authority is distinctly a religious duty. We e all called to fulfil that duty to the full extent of our power, d in so doing to manifest the highest sense of consecration, ıether in the army or navy, or in some of the manifold forms work for the support and comfort of those who are in active rvice.

The struggle is against the foes of righteousness and truth, liberty and mercy, in the only way open to us, and we must ither falter nor lose patience. With high courage and faith e Church must set itself to the service of the country and of e world, bringing to the support of our cause the moral and iritual resources of our people. The present conflict in the ɔrld makes a moral issue, and moral strength will determine it.

To our soldiers and sailors, and to all who are engaged in ngerous and difficult tasks in the nation's service, we send e assurance of our remembrance, and of our unceasing intercess-ɔn for their safety in body and soul. We make an earnest plea ith all our people to set their faces against those who, for gain, ke advantage of the necessities of the Government and of the tion's need of food. The common good, and the support of ose in authority upon whose action under God all depends, ust be the great consideration with all right-minded men and omen.

Wherefore, acknowledging the supreme sovereignty of Al-ighty God, praying that His will be done, and recognizing the oral and spiritual issues which are involved in this conflict, e bid our clergy and laity everywhere to pray without ceasing r the success of our armies and those of our Allies; and we rther exhort our people to dedicate their substance and conse-ate all their powers of body, mind and soul to the accomplish-ent of that for which they pray, to the end that liberty and a ghteous and enduring peace may speedily be established through-ut the world, to the glory of God, and for the wellbeing of all ankind, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

Statues and Ideals

THE removal of the bronze statue of Frederick the Great from its pedestal in front of the War College in Washington was not merely a concession on the art of the Government to excited public opinion. It as, we believe, no relation to the wave of hostility to verything German which is one of the unfortunate by-roducts of the war. Relegating the German war lord) the basement of the War College is, as it seems to us, highly symbolic act. It means that a democracy can-ot afford to be indifferent to the type of hero whom it olds up before its people for emulation. The dictum at one must not look a gift-horse in the mouth scarcely olds true as regards the statues to which we assign a lace in our parks, along our streets and in our public uildings. As the late Senator Bacon of Georgia pointed ut at the time the gift was received from the Kaiser, a tatue of Frederick the Great should never have been ccepted. He is not the type of hero whom a twentieth entury democracy should honor. There are scores of ermany's great men to whom it would have been fitting o erect a statue for the children of America to look upon, ut not Frederick. He represents everything in state-raft which during the past four years we have learned o loathe. His genius stamped upon Prussia the morals of the robber state. Cynical, crafty, sinister in his Machiavellian politics, he made might the arbiter of right for the state. Prussia as we see her today is the Prussia moulded after the ideal of this genius who till a few weeks ago was standing in a place of honor in the Capital of our democracy.

One wonders whether for purposes of diplomacy it will be thought advisable to restore Frederick to his place of honor on the bronze pedestal in Washington after peace has been declared. We hope not. There is reason for thinking that the peace which will finally terminate this war will be an altogether different peace from any that has hitherto restored to amicable relations two warring nations.

Nothing that the ruling class of Germany is likely to do in the way of expiating their sins will remove the loathing and disgust which the largest part of mankind feels for them today. They deserve to remain moral outcasts forever. Would that some one with the genius of Dante could make impressively picturesque the deserts of their turpitude. Whatever comes of the war, we shall not kiss and make up with Germany as a whole. A judgment unrelenting and stern deserves to follow that little group of junkers who had it in their power to consign to torture and death from ten to twenty millions of their fellow-beings.

Let us hope that we shall have no more German war lords gazing at us from our public squares.

Self-Interest and Liberty Bonds

WE wonder whether those who are in charge of the publicity for the Liberty Loans might not sell more bonds and do almost as much educational work in patriotism if they struck a little lower moral key. The sellers of these bonds, naturally, appeal to the patriot's conscience; but they make it appear that the buying of a 4¼ per cent. bond is in a way like dying for one's country. They try to persuade him that going home with a U. S. Government bond in his pocket is a piece of self-effacing sacrifice, as if he were laying his money upon the altar of his country without getting any material return.

We have no desire to rob any of the purchasers of these bonds of these virtuous consolations. If they believe that they have done a sacrificial deed in buying their country's bonds, well and good. So long as the bonds are sold it perhaps does not matter much if the purchaser carries away with his gilt-edge security a complacent sense of having done a noble deed. But "human nature being what it is," one wonders whether as many bonds might not be sold and some much-needed educational work be done in the ethics of saving and investment, if the business men who are giving their time to sell the bonds frankly appealed to people's self-interest.

Many people who buy these bonds never bought a bond before in their lives. But a good many of them, especially if they happen to be servants, clerks on small salaries, ministers, school teachers or doctors, have bought shares in Mexican gold mines, or South American diamond factories or a Central American Universal Co-operative Society for the turning of air into rubies. People who save only a little and have only small sums for investment, generally speaking, get the wrong kind of education in investment. The literature upon the subject which is left at their doors or presented by cunning agents appeals to the most dangerous human passion—that of getting from 16 per cent. to 25 per cent. on our investment. No one, perhaps, has ever explained to this class of investors that only very rich men can afford to indulge in such remunerative securities. The poor man's safety lies along the less dazzling fields of low interest-bearing bonds. We recall not long ago picking up a circular from a none too reputable brokerage house which offered (to a limited number of purchasers) a very attractive stock paying 16 per cent. and selling at less than par. The following little insidious item on how to invest was inserted for the instruction of the small investors: "Our big captains of industry did not make their fortunes investing their money at 5 and 6 per cent."

If less were said to people about the beauty of sacrifice in buying bonds and a word were added about the gilt-edge security, incidentally the rank and file of small investors might receive very valuable education upon the troublous subject of investment. We, of course, do not mean to urge that nothing be said about sacrifice and patriotism. Patriotism is after all the big asset in publicity in the Liberty Loans, but self-interest is a big asset also, and we venture to suggest that all too little has been made of this side of the question.

A Correction

THAT there is such a thing as having too much of a good thing was demonstrated last week in our editorial on the House of Bishops and Church Unity. The good thing that was overdone was the sentence "we have fully understood principles and essentials". The printer liked the sentiment so much that after the proof received the proof-reader's O. K. the printer removed one of the sentences quoted from Bishop Lawrence's convention address and put in its place the sentiment about principles and essentials. By so doing Bishop Lawrence was made to appear somewhat incoherent. Whether this was the work of German agents, we have not determined.

Bishop Lawrence is always worth quoting in his own words and in making our apologies to him, we are glad to give the passage from his address as he delivered it:

"We are entering a new world. While we will esteem reverently the past, we will allow the spirit to burst many shells and coverings of tradition: old bottles have got to give way."

The Training of the Clergy

THE men in the Church best fitted to deal with the problem of the training of ministers met last week in New York on the occasion of the fifth meeting of the Theological Council of the General Board of Religious Education. To read the names of the men who are taking counsel together upon this vital and troublesome problem inspires hope in the future of our seminaries. These men know the problem of the seminaries, they also know the problems of modern life. Nothing but good can come from such conferences.

Nearly anybody can tell us precisely what sort of person a minister ought to be and, if encouraged, everybody will express an opinion upon how best to train the minister. Personally we should like to see the problem left pretty much in the hands of the experts, the layman's share in the responsibility being merely an insistence that our theological professors be experts. The staunchest defenders of the seminaries as they are and have been would scarcely venture to affirm that theological education has heretofore always been entrusted to experts. Some of us recall taking courses in homiletics under a professor who received his appointment to the chair largely from the untoward circumstances of having his throat fail him early in his ministry. The surprising fact is that the system has succeeded as well as it has.

The theological seminary is, we believe, coming to its own. The Church is thoroughly awake to the importance of the right training for our ministers; everybody is interested in the subject and talking about it. A good deal that is being said is pretty impracticable, but that does not matter. The vital fact is that the whole subject is at last bathed in the warm atmosphere of enthusiasm and interest. Therefore we can count upon something getting done. The personnel of the committee who have met in New York for conference gives us confidence that all that is done will be sheer gain.

Dean Hart on Loving Our Enemies

"IT is, of course, true that our Lord dealt with prin ples and left each of us to apply them in the vari circumstances of our times and conditions. When H said, 'Thou shalt not kill'. He forbade the exhibition any bad temper. When He said, 'Love your enemie He forbade us to cherish any hatred, but He did n therefore command us to take them to our bosom as lo as they remained our enemies. He, Himself, wept ov Jerusalem because its people would not accept the salv tion He tendered them and because they persisted in th enmity. He, who was the personification of ineffable lo looked round about Him upon the men who were th the authorized Ministers of God, with anger, and h characterized them by the most scathing language h could find: 'O generation of Vipers, how can ye esca the damnation of hell?'

"It is no requirement of the Gospel that we should ta vipers to our bosom and love them. St. Paul shook the viper that had fastened on his hand, into the fi A day is coming (God grant it may be soon) when child shall play on the hole of his cockatrice's den', but that day the snake will be harmless—'They shall not hu nor destroy in all My Holy Mountain'—its nature will changed."

A Notable War Program

THERE is no State in the Union that responded mo promptly and splendidly to the President's call arms a year ago than South Carolina. Her quota for t regular and conscripted army and for the naval serv has been filled. She has sent forward her continge for ambulance, nursing, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. service. The men and women of the State Council National Defense, the farmers, the school children vying with each other in patriotic effort. Her churc and social organizations are enlisted in the work soldiers in the training camps. Saloons and haunts vice have been abolished. Under the leadership of war governor every possible force which can be utili for the service of the country is being brought into acti

But South Carolina has gone one step beyond th In order that the State may be prepared to continue supply army, navy, Red Cross and Y. M. C. A cont gents no matter to what length the war may drag and order that there may be a salvage at its close for the be fit of the civilian population, Governor Manning has c lined a war program for the State which, could it be er lated elsewhere, would make the war period one of exampled progress in civic development.

The first step in this program was to call upon Hastings H. Hart of the Russell Sage Foundation make a survey of the State similar to the survey he cently completed for Florida and West Virginia. Hart's findings and recommendations have just b published. He has found South Carolina deficient in h pital accommodation; he has found the prison syst greatly in need of revision; he has found much good some bad in the care of the insane; he finds inadequ provision for the prevention of tuberculosis; he finds adequate equipment for preventive and rescue work am girls; inadequate equipment in the orphanages, especi those for colored children; he has criticisms to make the reformatories, of the county jails, of the pu schools. That the care provided by the State for cr inals, dependents and non-competents should be pro unsatisfactory, and that the system of public educat should be open to severe criticism, does not come a surprise. Some of the Southern States have enjo an unenviable reputation in these matters. But any who picks up a stone had better make very sure t his own house is not constructed of glass. There very few States that will bear the close scrutiny wh South Carolina invited.

Nothing will be gained by having the rest of country fix its attention on certain lacks in South C lina's departments of charities, corrections and edu tion. South Carolina is attending to all that herself, apparently is going to attend to it very thoroughly. point is rather, are the other States going to limit th war program to the obvious and necessary but preliminary duties of raising their quotas of men for the present service, of subscribing their Liberty Loans, and looking out for the welfare of the soldiers in today's cantonments? Or are they also going to set their houses in order; make provision for the maimed, tubercular, and shell-shaken men that will soon begin to return from the western front, provide a food supply for the coming years, and make adequate provision for the health and education of the generation for which the men and women of today are fighting to secure democracy?

The Battle Hymn of the Republic

AT the many patriotic meetings which have been held all over the country since Good Friday, 1917, the men and women who have packed our great auditoriums have been stirred to the point where they had to give expression to their emotions, their hopes and their fears, and in numberless cases it is the Battle Hymn of the Republic that has given the outlet their pent-up feelings demanded. It has proved the most satisfactory of our patriotic songs because it is the most religious, and therefore the most timely. Had Julia Ward Howe, as her daughters tell us in their beautiful biography of their mother, lain awake during the anxious night hours of the past month while "line by line, stanza by stanza, the words came sweeping on with the rhythm of marching feet, pauseless, resistless as she saw the long lines swinging into place before her eyes and heard the voice of the nation speaking through her lips", had she risen in the gray twilight of Palm Sunday morning and "groping for her pen scrawled the Battle Hymn", she could not have written a marching song better suited to the present war. Her Hymn is of the genius of the American democracy; it breathes the strong, hopeful spirit of American Christianity; it is set to a tune which our people know and love and which they sing with a fervor and a sureness that the high notes of the Star-Spangled Banner make impossible. It is the hymn that was sung in the London streets a year ago when at last we took our place as England's ally. It is the hymn which has lifted the hearts and quickened the courage of thousands all over the United States during the long months of the past year. And it is the hymn which the Church Militant should sing before God's altar in dedication of herself to His righteous war.

Yet it is seldom used in our churches. It is an inspiring anthem when sung by the choir; it is even more inspiring when sung as a hymn by the whole congregation.

L'Entente Cordiale de la Souffrance

THE war correspondent of the New York Times told the other day of seeing two wounded men, English Tommy and French poilu, supporting each other as they limped together down a road in Picardy. As they passed a French officer said "C'est l'entente cordiale de la souffrance".

Another story told in the newspapers is that of a Roman Catholic priest who all the night before his regiment was to go over the top had heard the confessions of the men of his own communion. At dawn he finished. Then as he rose from his cramped position and looked about him at the men who stood waiting for the signal, he saw in the faces of some a dumb, wistful longing. These were the boys who did not belong to him, but his heart ached for them and he tried to interpret their inarticulate desire. "Is it that you don't want to carry any burden over the top?" he asked them. Something in their faces showed that he had voiced their need. Then the Roman chaplain stood up among the men where they waited to make, when necessary, the supreme sacrifice, and pronounced over them the healing words of the Absolution. "The look in their faces", he said quite simply, "was their confession". C'était l'entente cordiale de la souffrance.

In the great throng that gathered about the Cross on Good Friday afternoon in Hyde Park, London; in the groups of worshipers in trench and hut and hospital ward where priest and minister, yes, and even rabbi, mingle their service before God; and in the hearts of men and women in all the allied countries c'est l'entente cordiale de la souffrance that is doing what commissions on Faith and Order, federal councils of churches, and the House of Bishops itself are powerless to achieve.

Bishop Lloyd's Return

IT is with a distinct sense of relief that American Churchmen hear that Bishop Lloyd and Archdeacon Schofield have returned safely from their perilous journey to Liberia. Ever since, more than five months ago, they started on their circuitous voyage to Monrovia via England, the thoughts and prayers of men and women throughout the country have followed them.

It will be some time before the report of their mission is publicly made, and longer still before it can be acted upon. We are confident, however, of the great benefit this far-away missionary district will derive from Bishop Lloyd's visit. We are also of the opinion that the example set by the president of the Board of Missions, who in spite of his more than sixty years eagerly braved the dangers of submarines and fever and the discomforts and uncertainties of war-time travel, may have some effect on those near-sighted Christians whose decrease in missionary giving threatens to bring the Board's work to a standstill.

Conserving French Childhood

PERHAPS the most tragic figures in all of war darkened Europe are the old men and women, and the little children, who cling to their ruined homes in villages that have been swept by shells, made foul with gas, and plundered and burned by the enemy. The most brutal act of the Germans in the present dreadful battle has been the gassing of villages like Bethune, which they knew well were filled with civilians who had lived in comparative safety just behind the lines since the early days of the war. The thought of these helpless ones, victims of the agonizing gas poison, has stirred us to rage similar to that we felt when the Lusitania was sunk.

The Red Cross has issued its first report of the Children's Bureau which was organized last August by Dr. William Palmer Lucas, and which has been doing a magnificent piece of conservation and reconstruction work among the wretched civilians of the war zone. In cooperation with Prefect Mirman of the Meurthe-et-Moselle district, a medical and social welfare work centering in the A. F. F. W. Hospital for Children at Toule has been built up. Physicians and visiting nurses supply medical aid and supervision to the whole district by sending doctors to different towns to hold weekly or bi-weekly clinics; hospital cases are brought back to Toule; a trained kindergartner is trying to help the little frightened children of the devastated regions to laugh and play again; at Nancy refugee girls are taught to sew and design garments; the old men and boys learn carpentry and the furniture they make is stored away to be taken home to their beloved villages when the war is over. To draw his people away from the places of danger and to interest them in occupation that seems to offer permanency is the splendid work of Prefect Mirman, in which Dr. Lucas and his staff are co-operating.

At Evian-les-Bains, the little town on Lake Geneva through which the repatries from Belgium and Germany are being returned to France, there is another centre with a hospital for acute cases where the sick children are kept and cured instead of being passed on into France carrying contagion and disease with them. From Evian the children are sent to a convalescent hospital in Lyons. At Nesle, in the war zone, dispensary work similar to that centering at Toule is carried on. A dispensary service for children with six women physicians is maintained in Paris. Finally, beginning on January 6, an infant mortality campaign was launched which is meeting with enthusiastic response on the part of the French.

In all the beautiful work of the Red Cross, there seems to be none more worthy of the society's emblem than this for the babies and children of France.

SATURDAY NIGHT SERMON

The Temptations of Middle Life

By THE REV. GEORGE THOMAS DOWLING, D.D.

"Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not."—Psalms xvii, 5.

IT is well for us from time to time to speak words of warning to those who stand amid the perils of plasticity: the young men and the young women at that age, when, to receive impressions, they are like wax, and to hold them, are like steel. But I have been thinking a great deal recently of the temptations which come to people in that period of their pilgrimage when it would seem that they ought to be looking toward sunset; the period of mature years. I have been thinking of the temptations of middle life.

I wonder whether you have noticed amid the human wreckage of recent times, of how many it might have been said as it was of King Saul, when he himself went down beneath the tempestuous waves, "He began to be about forty years of age".

History is full of instances where men have sailed away from the harbor like a ship going to sea; every canvas set; a thing of pride and beauty to all who knew them; laden with great treasure of possibilities. Friends who, trembling, had watched them start, have dismissed their fear, and said with confidence, "They are safely launched now! The voyage is assured!" And then, mid-ocean there has come the tempest. Reputation, beautiful as the spreading sail, has been rent. Character, apparently firm as the towering mast, has fallen. And after that, the story of their life has been the story of a lost leader.

Many a man who reads this will recall the name of a certain financier, President of a great Trust in New York City, who for years had been a power among men. They will recall how he exchanged his magnificent offices in that metropolis for a lonely cell, and instead of the name which had once carried power and respect, became simply "Number 2,816" in Atlanta Prison. And he was over fifty years of age. They will remember the name of another in Chicago, who was taken to the Federal Prison at Leavenworth, because he, a banker and a trusted business man, had, like Samson, in bringing disaster upon himself, brought down the whole structure in the midst of which he stood, crushing in its ruin hundreds of others. And he was nearer seventy than forty.

If Henry the Eighth had died when he was thirty he would have left behind him the memory of one of the most popular kings of England. Shakespeare's villains are never young. Richard III, Iago, Macbeth, Lady Macbeth and the rest had each left their youth behind them.

It is true that John, the youngest of the Apostles, followed Jesus "afar off". But when we remember that it was Peter, next to the oldest, who denied Him three times; when we remember that the one who sold Him for thirty pieces of silver was Judas, the oldest of them all—which one of us is there, however clean his record, however wise his experience, who does not need, with humility, with fear and trembling, to breathe the prayer of David, "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not!" Verily it is a great thing to have gotten safely through life. So that what I have so often in these articles said unto young men and young women—now that, for the present at least, I am drawing near to the close of this series of Saturday Night Sermons—I want to say unto all—all: WATCH!

What are some of the peculiar temptations of mature life as distinguished from those of earlier years? I think that one of them is the danger of losing our faith in people.

When we start out with the enthusiasm and trustfulness of youth we have no doubt at all of anybody; or very little. Everybody seems good; at least we believe everyone to be honest until he is proven dishonest. But a man enters business life, and he finds himself deceived and perhaps betrayed and defrauded; and then again, and again, and again, until at last, in very self-defense, he is compelled to deal with men, as though every one were dishonest until he is proven honest.

And now he is in just the frame of mind for an attack of atheism; to believe neither in God nor man. And after that, there remains only one step more for him to arrive at the position of the Pessimist, who, secretly or openly, holds that there is really no such thing as nobility; that every man has his price if you only make it big enough; who, when he meets a good man, asks with a covert sneer the old, old query of Satan, "Doth Job serve God for naught?" Have you never had that temptation?

Well, now, what is the remedy?—for, thank God, there is a remedy. I think it is here: none of us ever need lose our faith in humanity, if we will reduce the field of our observation, from the generic to the specific; from the general to the concrete.

What I mean is this: Forget about the great world. We are much more likely to hear of its iniquities than its virtues; for its iniquities walk abroad, and its virtues dwell in quiet places. Wickedness is news. It is unusual. It is worth reporting in the daily press. But virtue is not news. It is too common. There is nothing to report. Let us just come down to our own little circle of friends and study them whom we know the best.

You have been more unfortunate in the circle of your friends than I think you have, if you cannot find there, some of whom you can say with absolute assurance, as the old Roman said of his city's pride,

> "While stands the Coliseum, Rome shall stand!
> When falls the Coliseum, Rome shall fall!
> And when Rome falls—the world!"

True, you will never find impeccability. "Who can understand his errors?" "Cleanse Thou me from secret faults"; the faults undiscovered, even by the man himself; for, after all, the best men are only men at their best. But if you can find five, or two, or only one, of whom you can say—I believe in him—or her—as I believe in God—then there is hope for you. You may perhaps lose your faith in men, but never in man. The unquestioned existence of such a character in one person shows its possibility in many, many others, of whom you do not know anything at all.

The world is not such a bad world as you think it is. There are more grasses than nettles, and it is overarched by more blue than clouds. Blessed is he who has one soul to whom he can anchor in perfect faith, without a thought of questioning. And blessed is that soul, who, by her sweet and pure and simple quiet life—perhaps all unknown to the great world—is saving a man to the best there is in him. The saddest hour which may come to us, the hour most fraught with danger, is when we lose our faith in people; because with that there goes the loss of our personal ideals. And when they are gone, the ship is on the rocks, with the wind blowing at sixty miles an hour.

Then in closing I want to say—Look out for your voluntary associations. Stick to your Church. You will find there the people who will help you most, to realize your best. It isn't time wasted: those seasons of Sunday song and prayer and meditation and counsel. You cannot keep the light burning without frequently renewing the oil.

And so I say again: To the very end, until your ascending and triumphant spirit shall be able to send back to earth the cry of victory: "At last it is all over and I have won! I have fought a good fight! I have kept the faith! I have finished my course!"—until then, look out for your voluntary associations; never lose your ideals of right and wrong; never lose your faith in people; and to the very end, forget not to offer the prayer of our text: "Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not!"

The Churches and "Social Work"

By ARTHUR J. TODD

THOUGHTFUL religious people are constantly asking how the spirit and the technique of organized philanthropy may be accommodated to church work. Their questions usually run somewhat this way: Is there any inherent opposition between scientific social work and religious activity? Can social work take the place of religious work? Should the Church attempt to do social work?

It is not a question of whether or not churches ought to do social work. They are doing it; they always have done it more or less; and they will continue to do it so long as their religion is vital. The early Christian Church and men like St. Francis, St. Vincent de Paul, and Chalmers paved the way for a good deal of what we call modern organized philanthropy, and many forward steps like the social settlement movement have been firmly grounded in the religious spirit. Hence the real question is simply whether churches shall do social work well, or shall do it badly. The question of whether it should be done directly or through co-operation between the churches and specialized agencies is subsidiary. Let me analyze a little this apparent dogmatism.

First, religion and social work are not synonymous terms. Spiritual experience can never be the result of mere well-meant activities. On the other hand, organized good works are the necessary flower and fruitage of vital religion. Religion or the doing-good impulse must have an outlet in order to maintain the flow of spiritual life forces steady and wholesome.

Second, mere wishing to do good is not enough. In order to produce real usable fruits of the spirit, the branches on which they are designed to grow must be sprayed and pruned. Modern social life is so complex that special training is necessary to handle its pathological problems intelligently. There is a zeal not according to knowledge which frequently makes good people throw themselves into causes and situations with no result but painful futility. Not long ago one of the leading ministers of a large Eastern city rose in a public meeting and said that his church spent $5,000 a year in charity, but he was convinced that this charity did more harm than good. While I know the word is overworked, still I am constrained to say that in this field efficiency is the final test of goodness, and efficiency means order and organization. It is good will guided by intelligence.

Third, in deciding whether a church that has the resources and the people who are either trained or who might be trained to do effective social work should enter the field, the first essential is to know intimately and organically the facts of the community in which it proposes to work. It must understand the resources and needs of the community. It must conduct a careful survey of its neighborhood. It must cast up a community balance sheet, showing the constructive forces on the one side and the destructive forces in the liability column. Such a balance sheet should show not only the definitely destructive agencies, but also should show whether existing welfare agencies are justifying themselves by their works; whether they are utilizing their plant to the fullest extent; whether they are wasting good will and energy. I simply mean by this that the Church should face the facts, the sometimes dreadful facts. I once made an investigation of community conditions for a religious body that wanted to embark upon a social center project. I pointed out the recreational and educational facilities already existing in the neighborhood; but in the printing of my report, most of the facts showing these existing resources were suppressed, in order, seemingly, to heighten the apparent need, to impress the prospective donor of an endowment fund. We are sometimes told that Darwin's great service to science was the resolute facing of facts, while Spencer's great tragedy was a fact that spoiled a pretty theory. Bias or fear of losing some strategic advantages incline many of us to delete the fact and cleave to the theory.

While the Church and all its communicants should be filled with divine discontent both with the social order as a whole and with other social agencies, they must not confine that discontent to mere emotional boiling over, but must originate a social idealism based on intimate knowledge of facts. Do not misunderstand my counseling the churches to a decent hesitation about engaging in social welfare work. I do not mean that they are to repress or discourage unrest, for if they did they would very likely fall into the attitude of complacency, and complacency is to me the "sin against the Holy Ghost". I am simply urging the harnessing of dissatisfaction. Discontent undisciplined leaves you in the hands of a mob or of Mr. Wells' "Gawdsakers"; disciplined and drilled it offers you a conquering army.

The next essential after having ascertained the facts is to work out a special objective. Community work must be definite, partly to protect the worker, partly to protect the community. The worker and the Church must not be allowed to get the feeling that they can play the social welfare game at random, hoping that an indulgent Providence will steer their little paper boats back to the shore laden with results. There is altogether too much vapid optimism expressed in the popular couplet, "I don't know where I'm going, but I'm happy on the way"; and this is particularly true of neighborhood work.

It is also equally necessary to protect the community against random experiments: people are something more than laboratory white mice, after all. We carefully safeguard health work, the law, and other professions by requiring certain tests of men before we qualify them to assume professional titles or responsibilities. Whether social work is yet a profession in the same sense as law or medicine or teaching, it still remains true that the community is entitled to the best of what we consider, at least at the present time, as being the marks of a profession in the making.

The next essential is to be careful not to duplicate or overlap organized social work already being done in the community. This means ordinarily that a new social institution will not be created in a community which is already maintaining similar organizations doing satisfactory work. It means also that, after having started, the organization will not arbitrarily branch out into a form of service which is already sufficiently developed in the community, simply for the sake of extended prestige. I have in mind a certain section of an American city where five different settlement houses or near-settlement houses, almost within a stone's throw of each other, are struggling for clients. Two of these are religious agencies. One is a public centre and two are private settlement houses. This of course is a gross waste and tends to breed the spirit of competition and to bring the whole idea of social work into disrepute in that community. As an illustration of this last point, I might say that in spite of all these five organizations a large mothers' club in the neighborhood chooses to hold its meetings in a moving picture theatre.

The final essential here is co-operation, not only in name but in fact; which means that if a church organizes a welfare department it must federate with all other agencies at work in that neighborhood—with the settlements, with the associated charities, the children's protective agencies, the visiting nurses, the juvenile court, the probation officers; or, if it simply confines itself to charitable relief work, it will likewise need to pool its information in some such agency as a Confidential Exchange or a Central Clearing House for Charitable Information, at least to the extent of finding out what other people are doing in a given case and of reporting its interest in the case of the central agency.

I do not believe that it is necessary to press further the question of whether the Church should do social work. Some churches are properly equipped to serve as social centres and to do skilled relief work. Such a church may be encouraged to maintain and even to extend the work if it would not hamper or duplicate work already under way.

If it is properly manned with skilled workers it may agree with other agencies to divide the field and specialize on some one form of social work. If it has not proper resources and has not in its membership or on its staff some skilled workers, it would be very much better and safer to turn over all such work to the agencies especially qualified. If the churches wish to emerge with credit after a campaign of social welfare they must order their strategy according to the best professional standards, remembering always that organized welfare work is not bowing to them nor begging them to do what is manifestly their duty. If the modern church wants to keep up with the march of social amelioration, it must go out and bring in the master strategists and technicians and learn of them.

Past experience, however, leads me to believe that only the exceptional church can be counted on now to do skilled social service. There is still a misunderstanding of two New Testament passages. A good many people still fail to see a challenge instead of a prophecy in the text "the poor always ye have with you". Likewise many people still take with too naive literalness that text about not letting the left hand know what the right hand is doing. The essence of co-operative effort is a plain, honest sharing of all the facts and all the resources at the disposal of all the agencies. When the churches learn this they will be taking the first step in good social work, whether acting through their own representatives or through supporting loyally the specialized and professional secular agencies.

This is far too pregnant an issue to be settled thus summarily with a wave of the hand. But at least enough has been said to indicate that organized Christianity cannot dodge the question. To the contrary, it must meet it squarely and study it profoundly lest it miss an unparalleled opportunity for applying its ministry of grace to a world in the throes of reconstruction.

Bishop Randolph: An Appreciation

By THE REV. CARL E. GRAMMER, D.D.

IN spite of his gradual loss of power and his sickness of some weeks' duration, the death of Bishop Randolph has come with something of a shock to his friends, especially to those whose friendship was measured by decades rather than by years. He had so long stood before them as a great preacher and philosopher, and so touched their imaginations by his unique personality, that a chill fell upon them at the realization that he had gone. To many in Virginia it must seem as if the pilot had been dropped.

But these emotions, though natural, and indeed inevitable in the case of those who have known him long and loved him well, are really only the surface feelings. Our deepest feeling is relief and gratitude. It had long been evident that he was slipping away from earth. For some time it had been difficult to keep his mind on sublunary things. He came back to earth's problems latterly with the partial and grudging attention with which a traveler who has embarked for Europe returns to land, just before the gang-plank is drawn up, to answer some question from his office or sign some official paper. We cannot but rejoice that he is at last freed from weakness and distraction, and that his splendid mind, no longer tenanted in the crumbling tabernacle of flesh, is gloriously clothed, and death is swallowed up in life.

Now that he is taken from us in the flesh, he is restored to us in memory and in the spirit. We forget the growing weakness of his closing years, and recall him once more with vividness, as he was in his strength and vigor. In these days, when the rector of a large church is called to so many administrative tasks, there are few opportunities for such growth in pulpit power as came to Bishop Randolph in his long rectorship at Emmanuel church, Baltimore, and still fewer men who have his rare combination of gifts. In his first years at Emmanuel the teacher and lecturer was more in evidence than the preacher, but he steadily grew in power and eloquence, and for many years was in the very first rank of our preachers. Indeed, in the judgment of many he was, after the death of Phillips Brooks, the foremost preacher of the Episcopal Church. In philosophical breadth, in withering scorn and in pathos he had, to my knowledge, no equal.

His range was wonderful. There is a large number of ministers who can beat a fairly moving rub-a-dub-dub on the drum for the army of the Lord to march by. Not a few can play a shrilling tune on the fife. Others have some skill on the bag-pipe, and give out a kind of wheezy music, that stirs the blood, not so much by its intrinsic merit, as by its skilful awakening of racial traditions and its treatment of tribal songs.

But Bishop Randolph was the master of an instrument of wide range, and handled themes and motifs of universal significance. He played on an organ of many stops, and knew how to handle them all, from the deepest diapason to the softest flute. In his later years the tenderness of his nature made him dwell more in the realm of compassion; but in the days of his vigor his logical and persuasive powers were equally manifest. He was a great master of irony. Who that heard it can ever forget the Convention address in which he discussed with telling gravity the generalization often heard in Virginia, that the Episcopal Church never flourished in a limestone section, and pointed out what an invaluable guide we should have for our missionary activities, if such a connection between Church polity and geology could be established. How skilfully he could expose a sophism or turn inside-out some pretentious fallacy! It is to be hoped that selections from his convention addresses may be published, particularly the address at Portsmouth in which he gave his reasons for not attending the Lambeth Conference, and pointed out that a bishop drew his power from his church, and had no authority apart from it. Not that the written page will ever do Bishop Randolph justice. Such a book of extracts will have the literary flavor and will be full of wisdom and learning. But Bishop Randolph was too much of a preacher to express himself for the reader; he addressed himself to the ear and moulded his sentences with the art of the orator—quite a different art from that of the writer. The message was always to be interpreted by the living voice.

Wonderful indeed was his skill in emphasis. It is sad to think that we shall never hear him read again with matchless tenderness and exquisite emphasis the admonition after the Gospel in the Ordering of Priests. Wonderful, too, was the sweetness and power of his voice. Spurgeon possessed a more powerful organ, and Beecher's inflections may have been more varied, but neither equaled Bishop Randolph in penetrating sweetness. Never have I heard a voice of such extraordinary sweetness and tenderness, and under such perfect control, too, as his voice at the wedding of his youngest daughter.

> "Chorus hymeneal,
> Or triumphal chaunt,
> Matched with thine would be all
> But an empty vaunt,
> A thing wherein we feel, there is some hidden want."

This stanza of Shelley's always seemed to me applicable to Bishop Randolph's voice on that occasion and at other moving episodes.

His chief equipment, however, lay of course deeper, in his great gifts of mind and heart. The witty counselor Mr. Pleydell, in Guy Mannering, says that a lawyer without literature or history is a mechanic, a mere working mason; but if he possesses some knowledge of these that he may venture to call himself an architect. Bishop Randolph always aspired to make a sermon that would belong to literature, like the sermons of Jeremy Taylor and South, and equipped himself for this purpose by wide eading and particularly by a profound study of philosphy. Never can I forget the impression he made upon ıe when I first heard him, while still an undergraduate t the Johns Hopkins, by the width of his reading, the rofundity of his philosophical reflections, and the poetic eauty of his style. What a master he was of amplificaon, how subtly he could expand and enlarge a theme! I love you," says the lover in Cyrano de Bergerac to his terary lady-love. "That's the theme," she replies. "Now ınbroider it." But the poor stupid fellow was done. He ad no passionate imagination able to fuse all the universe ıto fiery hopes. Bishop Randolph, however, could play whole fugue on such a motif. He could take a golden rain of thought and beat it out into a great gold leaf ıd then draw beautiful designs upon it.

All this rhetoric and imagination were supported not ıerely by feeling, but also by profound learning and ıtient thought. He had enriched his life by the study f great books; above all, of course, by the study of the ook of Books. Characteristically enough, in that sacred ɔlume the favorite portion for his texts was the Epistles f St. Paul, with their combination of Christian feeling ıd teaching with metaphysical theory. In this respect ; was a Pauline theologian, though no predestinarian.

I do not know any preacher in our Church who has ught in our generation with so much power and elo- ıence the philosophy of Christian theism. He had ought profoundly on fundamental questions, and had ached definite conclusions. He knew that spirit could ver be explained in terms of matter, and had a healthy ntempt for all efforts to explain mind by the anatomy the brain. He would as soon have expected to explain e differential calculus by a study of nerves as to meas- e the nature of right by the scale of expediency. He as convinced that thought and language are better guides the nature of mind than the studies of the comparative natomist or zoologist. No one can estimate the value to irginia of such a Christian philosopher in its pulpit—aveling up and down the wide extent of the Old Dominion with his profound and wholesome teaching. He as a perpetual fountain of healing and refreshing.

His power of analysis was supremely manifest in his ility to separate the gospel of Jesus Christ from all ter accumulations of ecclesiasticism, and proclaim it in s essential simplicity and universality. He possessed and ansmitted historic orders, he belonged by lineage and ining to the English stock, and to the Protestant Episcoıl Church, but he sounded forth no provincial nor deminational message. The pastoral chimes of embowed English churches did not ring out more clearly in his terances than the commission to preach the gospel to ery creature. No one thought of him first as a Churchan, and secondarily as a Christian preacher of the gospel the grace of God. With him first things came first. ith him the Prayer Book and the authority of the ırch did not end all discussion.

He was a Christian philosopher and profound theogian. His message was not illustrated by churchly inciıts nor fortified by churchly doctors. He addressed mself to the human heart, his illustrations were taken om life and letters, and his ultimate appeal was to the ɔrd of God, expressed indeed in the Bible, but ratified the verdict of our reason, our heart and our experience. ɔve was with him the ultimate explanation of the unirse, and love the only true motive of life.

Much of his power was due to the singular beauty d distinction of his personality. His soul was ever e a star, and dwelt apart. From his youth the purity d elevation of his character were generally recognized. is natural affinity was with things beautiful. He could t endure certain sordid and mean aspects of life. Whatever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, natsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, natsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of od report—he thought on these things. He was a true ealist and could not bear the literature of the so-called alistic school. "When I think of the splendid devotion d high character of the English civil service in India," once said to me, talking of Kipling's Plain Tales from e Hills, "I refuse to believe that his pictures are true to life." The smoke of the army tobacco in Mulvaney's pipe was far too coarse and acrid for his sensibilities.

Time will doubtless draw a veil over many of his delightful gifts, his quiet humor, his personal charm, his literary and scholarly acquirements, but it will be many, many years before the power of his example and teaching will be forgotten in Virginia, and eternity alone can tell the good that was wrought by such a life and such mighty preaching of the truth as it is in Jesus.

"Jesus Of Nazareth Passeth By"

By MARY H. KROUT

WHEN the Lord Christ journeyed to Jericho
A blind man, begging beside the way,
Besought the people that he might know
What priest, or prophet, were come that day.
Though hurrying fast where the Lord Christ led,
One, pitying, paused and heard his cry,
Nor dreamed of the power of his words, and said:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

So he, then, out of his anguished night,
Prayed that the Master would grant his plea,
That he, too, given the blessed light,
The joy and beauty of earth might see.
The prayer was granted: and ne'er in vain
Shall boundless Mercy such faith deny;
For us, too, fainting in bitter pain,
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

Today, when the tumult of war is heard,
And our legions have gathered in camp and field,
Their souls by the call of the bugles stirred
To dauntless courage that ne'er shall yield;
In the dismal trenches, and where the dead
Who have given their all in their last sleep lie,
Those words of comfort may still be heard:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

No pang is suffered He does not know;
No heart is broken He shall not heal;
Today, in the midst of the sad world's woe,
There is no sorrow He does not feel;
The widowed, the orphan—whose hearts are cold,
Who see no dawn in their darkened sky,—
His stricken children—this hope may hold:
"Jesus of Nazareth passeth by."

Obedience

By JAMES B. KENYON

THE orbs that through the vaults of night
Sweep on their noiseless way,
And the great sun whose glorious light
Pours round the realms of day;
The plenteous streams that seaward flow
To make the world rejoice,
And herbs that grow, and winds that blow,
Obey His sovereign voice.

The bird that braves the trackless deep
On homeward-faring wing;
And seeds that break their frosty sleep
At the warm breath of Spring;
The rolling earth that ever takes
Its blind way without pause;
The flower that into beauty wakes—
All heed their Maker's laws.

Lord, write thy statutes on each heart;
Give us the filial mind,
To make Thy Word our life's high chart;
Help us each day to bind
Between our brows Thy precepts wise,
That thus Thy holy will
May ever be before our eyes,
To guide our footsteps still.

The Wyoming House of Churchwomen

By FRANCES THORNBERRY

JUST at this time, when much serious consideration is being given to the question of women in the councils of the Church, it may be interesting to others to know how naturally and logically women have taken their place in the conduct of affairs in Wyoming, ever since the state was made a separate missionary district under the leadership of Bishop Thomas.

What is perhaps the greatest hardship of the work, in the average missionary district, that is, the isolation of the workers, was doubtless the first factor in the organization of the Churchwomen of Wyoming. It is, of course, almost impossible on account of the great distances and the expensive travel for groups of women from neighboring missions or parishes to meet together occasionally for mutual help and discussion, and so it seemed wise to plan an annual gathering of the women throughout the state (simultaneously with the meetings of the Convocation) as an opportunity for the discussion of common problems and the co-ordination of activities.

These meetings of the women, conducted apart from the meetings of the Convocation and covering a period of two days, represent through the delegates all women's organizations doing every type of Church work, and were at first entirely concerned with the activities in which only women had a part. At this time we have always heard reports from local organizations and taken time to discuss new ideas in ways and means, have held our annual thank-offering service and have listened to reports of the progress of various Church institutions in the state, such as the Cathedral Home for Children, the Bishop Randall Hospital, and the Indian schools. Occasionally it has been our privilege to have among us a speaker, coming from the very centre of things, who has aroused our enthusiasm and left us the inspiration that comes from the consciousness of a common purpose and fellowship. This feature of our programs is of particular benefit and goes far toward destroying the discouragement that results from a feeling of isolated work.

The arrangement of such programs and the conduct of the meetings have always been in the devoted and efficient hands of Mrs. Thomas.

As these annual gatherings continued, the women were frequently requested to meet with the Convocation to take part in the discussions of the problems of the district in which they were directly concerned. As an instance, the question of the missionary apportionment has always been one on which the women have been expected to express their opinions and to assume a share of the responsibility. In this plan of mutual discussion there seems to be a distinct advantage, inasmuch as many of our clergy depend in a large measure upon their women's organizations for backing and support in carrying out certain plans for each year's work.

Then again, individual women are frequently requested to address the Convocation, giving outlines of the progress of some particular institution or work vitally associated with the district at large. Such talks deal with the human rather than the statistical side of the Church's institutions in Wyoming and go far toward arousing both interest and sympathy. Perhaps in no other district or diocese are more women, proportionately, taking the leadership with marked success in organization and teaching in the small yet difficult mission stations, and are therefore entitled to an expression of opinion in the general conduct of Church affairs.

Then, too, according to the constitution and canons of the district of Wyoming, women may be elected as delegates from parishes or missions to the Convocation and have the same rights and privileges as the laymen delegates. This is but the natural and logical course in a state which granted equal suffrage at its entrance into the Union. However, up to the present time, comparatively few women have been elected to the Convocation as delegates, although the practice is one that will undoubtedly grow, as women's power of constructive thought makes itself more felt through the women's organization.

Bishop Thomas has graciously said that he attributes much of the progress of the Church work in Wyoming to the organization of its women workers, but after all the Churchwomen of Wyoming have yet to realize their full privilege and powers of service. We have been, so far, too much concerned with local and material considerations, and are only beginning to recognize our wider sphere of usefulness and influence. Such an organization as this presents an opportunity not alone for the exchange of ideas in working out the material problems which women are called upon to solve, but also an opportunity to develop spiritual leadership among ourselves. We are a pioneer work in a still pioneer field, but with earnestness of purpose and the right vision ahead, we may yet become a centre of inspiration whose influence may reach outside the limits of our own district.

A Consistent Church

By ROBERT H. GARDINER

ONE of the arguments against political suffrage for women used to be that women are illogical. That has long been exploded in secular affairs, and every year records a great advance toward equal suffrage, because that suffrage enables the State to avail itself of woman's whole power. But the argument remains, like some other exploded ideas, clogging the machinery of the Church. Men have always expected women to do the work of the Church. Is it strictly logical that they should continue to refuse to let women have a voice in the councils which decide what that work shall be? We do not greatly blame the man of education and capacity who declines to serve the Church because his rector has no greater thing for him to do than to help put up the greens at Christmas. Is it altogether logical to continue to say to women, no matter how intelligent and educated and efficient they may be, that putting up Christmas greens is all they are fit for?

But, on the other side, men have always been perfectly willing to let women do most of the teaching in Sunday schools and to provide most of the zeal and money for missions. Is it strictly logical to say that when a boy has grown to manhood, only he is fit to sit in the councils of the diocese, and that the woman from whom he gained, perhaps, all the zeal he has, can not sit beside him to help carry her lessons into action? The Church would not now have, and never would have had, any missions but for the compelling faith of women. If they were set free to serve to the utmost, would not the Church realize that the only Church which deserves to live is a missionary church?

Many of us men are going to occupy front seats in the coming diocesan conventions this spring. We shall listen to discussions as to the insertion or elision of a comma in the third line of the first paragraph of section seven of Canon fourteen. Could not women listen as well as we? But are we going always to be content with that? Can we not rouse ourselves to some vision of the opportunity and responsibility of the Church in our respective dioceses? Can we not plan for a great advance, a real effort to carry the Gospel to every soul in the diocese? And is it strictly logical to continue as if only men could understand the needs and natures of the women who form half the people to be reached? Let us, as a first step toward making the Church a power, take down our Constitution and Canons from the dusty attic and revise them so that into the organization of the diocese may be injected the energy and wisdom and zeal of women. If we are not willing to give our time and strength and thought for great plans for the advancement of the Kingdom, we might at least unshackle woman's devotion.

The Measurement of Pain

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

THE main point of the previous article on this subject appears to have been missed by some readers, and therefore will bear restating in other terms. Briefly put, it was that the magnitude of the problem was not quite what it seemed and that the range of the world's suffering could all be compressed within the single experience of the one being, whoever he might be, who was called upon to bear the most. That this is the truth about the matter, grave and important as it is, becomes apparent on reflection.

To begin with, we cannot help but recognize that the amount of pain to which any creature, whether human or sub-human, is liable, is determined by two factors, consciousness and nervous organization, and these may almost be held to imply each other. Our capacity for pain is thus the measure of our rank in the scale of being. A reptile has not the same capacity for pain as that exhibited by a highly-bred dog, for instance, nor has a savage anything like the physical sensitiveness of a refined and cultivated European or American. Vividness of imagination plays a great part in intensifying our awareness of pain, and there can be little imagination without a highly developed self-consciousness. The great distinction between ourselves and the lower animals consists in the fact that we are self-conscious and they are not, or, to put it another way, that we are able to take past and future into our calculations when estimating the significance of the present and they are not. This statement is made with caution and discrimination; it is undeniably true on the whole, but may require to be modified a little in respect to a few individual cases. There are brutish types of humanity, and there are wonderfully intelligent types among our humbler kinsfolk, the birds and beasts. The writer has owned dogs which appeared to him to be self-conscious in every sense in which that quality could be predicated of a human being, but perhaps their self-consciousness did not extend very far after all. Plainly they could reason up to a point; they had good moral qualities, and, so far as one could judge, the rudiments of a conscience. But, for all that, there was between them and the human family a great gulf fixed. The dog that lies on the hearth-rug at your feet, close though the friendship be between him and you, yet lives in a different world from you. He knows nothing of the issues that convulse civilization today; he can render you no counsel in times of stress and danger, though he be willing to stand by you to the death therein; he may sympathize with you in your sorrows, and is sad when you weep, but he does not know the causes of your troubles and cannot enter into an understanding of the truly vital problems affecting your existence from day to day. Henry Drummond points out in his Ascent of Man that the ratio in all higher capacity between man and the rest of creation is as ninety-nine and nine-tenths to a tenth. This is an overwhelming proportion and not to be accounted for by evolution or any other set of factors, but those of God's direct creative act and self-communication to the soul He has made in His own image. As Young has it in his "Night Thoughts":

> How poor, how rich, how abject, how august,
> How complicate, how wonderful is man!

But we have to pay a high price for our comparative eminence as over against the rest of the sentient creation. The higher we rise the more we can suffer; the fuller our psychic development the more are we exposed to the assaults of pain and evil, and the wider the range within which these ills can be felt and experienced. There is no truer saying than that of Holy Scripture that he that increaseth knowledge increaseth sorrow. Of necessity it must be so; it is a mark of our greatness in an un-ideal world and an evidence that we belong essentially to another. Shelley's haunting line accurately describes poor struggling humanity ever ill at ease between earth and heaven:

> We look before and after,
> And pine for what is not;
> Our sincerest laughter
> With some pain is fraught;
> Our sweetest songs are those that tell
> Of saddest thought.

The wounded horse whose scream rings over the battlefield—a truly terrible sound to those who have ever heard it—will begin to crop the grass in the hedgerow presently while yet he lies weltering in his blood. The sheep dies in patience under the butcher's knife, for the simple reason that he does not realize he is being slain. The tragedy of the lower creation is grim enough no doubt, but we need not assume it to be bigger than it is; fear plays a great part therein, but not fear as we should feel it; it never lasts long. It is an utter delusion to suppose that the denizens of the wild look upon the terrors of their lot as we should in like circumstances. When we commiserate their sufferings it is well to make allowance for the fact that these are not to them what they would be to us.

Moreover, the problem of the world's anguish is narrowed down very considerably when we realize that it is simply the problem of how much any one physical and mental organization is able to bear at any one time. There is a point beyond which merciful Nature interposes and refuses to allow us to bear any more. The tortured brain swoons; the burdened heart ceases to respond to the successive blows of fate with the same piercing intensity as at first. The agony is bad enough even then, but these are its limits. And we suffer one at once, not in the mass. If ten thousand men suffer today where only one suffered before, that does not mean that each suffers ten thousand times as much as he otherwise would; each bears his own share and no more. Many people are oppressed by the thought of the enormous total of the pain and sorrow that is being endured in the world today, but surely they are mistaken. The real problem is not one of numbers, but of individual capacity. The war has made it not one whit bigger than it was before. The question is not why so many should have to suffer, but why any does or ever did. If only one single human being out of all the millions that have ever lived on earth should be condemned to agonize somewhere on the far-off edge of things while the rest of us escaped, the problem of pain would still be here in all its force. We should still have to ask why this discordant fact was permitted in God's fair world.

So back we come to the contemplation of the mystery of the cross of Christ. That is central, vital, all-inclusive. If we can see any light on that we have seen to the heart of all the sorrow that ever has been or ever shall be till time shall be no more. In a future article we shall address ourselves to this solemn theme.

Indifference

By P. F. GRANT

I THINK there is on earth no gift so rare
As sympathy. Engrossed in care
For our own schemes, we inward turn our eyes,
Nor see there rise
To God a monument of pain.
'Tis not that we disdain
A cry for aid
One whit; but simply undismayed
And wrapped in self's concern
We keep our futile course:
And if at last we learn—
God help us while we burn
With cruel remorse!

The Knight of the Labyrinth

By FLORENCE CONVERSE

IX.

Now it befel as Sir Hugh fared up and down in the pride of his strength, within that gray web of the labyrinth, ere long he was come to a curtain of tapestry whereon was woven the wanton loves of Priam's son and the lady Helen, King Menelaus's wife, that was cause of strife aforetime. And behind the arras a lady's bower, silken and soft, and a lady therein that watched beside a sleeping knight. But when the lady beheld Sir Hugh she was fain of him, and she left the couch of her lord and beckoned him that he should come into her bower, wherefore he did her bidding for she was a marvelous fair lady. And she took his helmet that he bare in his hand, and set it to one side, and she made him to sit beside her on a cushion of green samite. And the lady did off his chain coat for the more ease of his body, and he might not say her nay, for he was fain of the touch of her little fingers.

Then said he unto her, but he spake in a whisper lest her lord waken, "I prythee tell me true, Madame, art thou human flesh and blood, or art thou some quaint engine of this labyrinth? Meseems thy loveliness surpasses nature's handiwork".

Thereupon that lady laughed aloud right merrily, and quoth she, "Wilt thou to discover if I be in all things like to other ladies"?

And when they had looked either on other for the space of a minute he made answer soft, "Madame, I will".

Then said she yet more soft, "What wilt thou"?

And Sir Hugh said, "First—thy lips". And he took her in his arms. And he was ware of the cool of her body through her silken gown, howbeit his own blood was hot. But when he would have bent his head to her kiss, on a sudden, as it had been a challenge, somewhat struck him across the mouth, that it stung. And behold that sleeping lord was awoke up out of his sleep, and it was he that struck Sir Hugh across the mouth. And he struck him with the little white glove of the King's daughter.

Then said Sir Hugh, "Sir, you did well. I thank you of your courtesy". And he picked up the glove where it had fallen, and kissed it, and made as he would depart. But that other knight that was very wroth cried out aloud, "Thou craven, thou! False coward! Art lost to honor and all chivalry? Draw, I command thee!" And he would have run upon him to slay him; but Sir Hugh avoided him, saying, "I am on quest, Sir Knight. I am under vow to stop not for no quarrels. But an it please you, after the King's daughter hath found her voice I will do battle with you, if she bid me". Nevertheless, he was hard put to it to escape out of the bower.

Neither was he free of that spell for a long time thereafter, for he came again to the curtain of tapestry, by reason of the bewilderment of the labyrinth, and the lady stood in the doorway looking forth as for one that should come. And when she saw Sir Hugh she lifted the curtain that he might look within; and lo, her lord was laid again to sleep. And she beckoned.

Thrice came Sir Hugh unaware to that place by divers paths, and ever the lady stood in the doorway and drew aside the arras. And ever the lady beckoned. But Sir Hugh would none of her, and instead of her red lips he kissed the little white glove of the King's daughter. And it befel that after a weary while he came no more to the bower, wherefore he gave God thanks. And while he was yet on his knees he drew forth his dagger and carved deep in the gray stone of the wall of the labyrinth a word. And this was the word Sir Hugh carved on the wall, to wit, Peccavi. And beneath it he set his name, which is to say, Sir Hugh called Lepenseur, and how he was Knight of the fellowship of the Table Round. And other knights passing by stood still to read that word; for he was not alone in the labyrinth.

Thereafter, when he was set down to rest in an angle of the wall, came one that spake unto him, saying, "Hast thou jousted in the lists"? And this was a puny wight, spindle-shanked and of a weazen countenance.

"Lists"? quoth Sir Hugh. "Whither and wherefore" quoth Sir Hugh.

And the feeble fellow saith, "Yonder, an thou tur thrice on thy right hand, a meadow, and many folk tha joust and wrestle, and shoot the long bow, and ride at th quintain. For that they do say there is a monster inhabit eth this labyrinth, lying in wait at the door of the secre place. And he who would overcome this monster mus strengthen his thews and his sinews. Some say it is th Minotaur's whelp—that harassed Duke Theseus. Othe will have it that this is of the progeny of that old drago slain of our English St. George."

Then said Sir Hugh to him, "How art thou mad ready, friend, to do battle with this monster? Meseem thou art in sorry sort, if it come upon thee unaware".

But that other, which was a common varlet and n esquire, grinned very impudent and tapped his noddl and saith he, "By St. Werburg's goose, I will trust to m wits to deliver me whole".

Whereupon Sir Hugh, being wroth out of measur dealt him a buffet that did send him spinning and howlin as far as the next turn of the pathway. And, "So muc for thy wits", quoth Sir Hugh. "Is it thus men serve th King's daughter"? And he left the fellow whimpering the while himself did go forward to discover the joustin lists.

And when he had turned thrice on his right hand, l a green field, wider and longer far than the lists of Cam lot, and knights and squires and common folk a-plent striving one with another in right amiable rivalry, som with the quarter staff and some with the long bow, som with lance a-horseback and some with sword afoot.

And immediately there accosted Sir Hugh Lepenseu a sturdy knight, would try a fall with him.

"And it please you, Sir", saith Sir Hugh.

Whereupon either clasped other close, and their arm were as they had been hoops of iron. And they wrestle to and fro a long while, and they sweat a quart measur And when it was plain to see that the knight might n overthrow Sir Hugh, neither might Sir Hugh overthro the knight, quoth Sir Hugh, "Fair sir, a truce, and a tie".

"Nay, then", made answer that other, and set hi free, "A truce an thou wilt, but I tie with no man".

"Sir", said Sir Hugh, and spake him fair, "Of wha avail to the King's daughter if I overcome thee in a wre tling bout, or if thou overcome me, and all the while th secret place is hid"?

But that other answered him, saying, "What know I c secret places, and what know I of King's daughters? Bu this my body I know. And I have taken a vow to wrest to a fall with every manner wight that cometh in hithe or if he will not wrestle with me he is a coward and cor demned of all this company. For this do I live".

"Sir", saith Sir Hugh, "I, too, have taken a vow, an it calleth me hence". And he would have departed. Bu there stood before him a knight with a drawn sword, sai "Have at thee, Sir Coward, and I will teach thee a twi whereby thou mayst slay the dragon".

But Sir Hugh saith, "I pray you linger not for me, have spitted dragons in my time; I have the knack".

And as he was turned about to depart from that plac lo, there was a fellow flung the hammer; and when h had flung it he groaned aloud and fell down at the feet c Sir Hugh, and all his arm was twisted wry and the muscle stripped off his ribs, and he cried out aloud, "Ah, woe i me, I shall never fling hammer again! For this did I liv but if I may not, then is life ended for me". And to Si Hugh he said, "Prythee put me yonder at the edge of th field with the others". And when Sir Hugh was come t the field's edge and laid him down, he found there a-man more in like plight, lamed and maimed and groaning a together. And Sir Hugh Lepenseur departed out of tha fair green meadow unmolested, for that all they that ha legs were run to the far end of the meadow to see ho far the hammer was flung. (To be continued

St. Stephen's College*

By ALANSON B. HOUGHTON

A YEAR ago, when asked to become a trustee, I had heard of St. Stephen's, of course. But as I had the place in mind, it was a shabby sort of college, somewhere up the river, dying slowly, but with gratifying certainty, because of its inability to conform to modern standards of education—a place where strange and obscure and mysterious religious rites were practiced and taught—a place it was wise to pass quickly lest the president dart out from behind a tree and fasten a degree upon you before you could get away. That, I say, roughly, was my notion of the institution, and, from what I have heard from time to time, I have a suspicion that pretty much the same notion is more or less widespread. When I went to Annandale, however, and looked the college over, I found the reality very different. I found a noble site—one of the most beautiful, perhaps, in the country; I found an entirely adequate set of buildings; I found a high standard of work—a competent faculty—a distinctly promising lot of students, and I found over and about and around the place a Church atmosphere—not extreme at all, but sane and beautiful. There was nothing shabby—nothing false—nothing amateurish about the place. On the contrary, there was dignity and competency and a proper reserve. I found poverty, of course. I found a need so bitter that it could be met, as it was met, only by personal sacrifice. And my first impression, which has been strengthened by further observation and study, was a sense of wonder that pretty much no one in authority or out was lifting a hand to save the institution literally from starving to death. If the institution is to be saved the Church must in some official way give it recognition and endorsement.

There are certain reasons, it seems to me, why St. Stephen's is entitled to look to the Church for recognition it so desperately needs. One practical reason, to put the matter plainly, is that the plant—the grounds and buildings—is altogether too valuable an asset to the Church to be thrown away. I have a horror of waste myself. That, I dare say, is because I am a manufacturer. And not to make use, and full use, of these facilities seems to me almost a crime. There are only two other purely Church colleges today in the country. I find it hard, as a business proposition, to understand how we can afford to neglect the splendid possibilities that center about this institution. A better reason, however, is that St. Stephen's has been loyal to the Church. During its sixty years of existence, some five hundred clergymen have received their education and inspiration there. Today, nearly four hundred men in holy orders owe to St. Stephen's their pre-seminary training. Surely that is a record of actual accomplishment.

But, even more, it is a promise and a pledge for the future. Today, as in the past, the spirit of the Church is dominating the college and its work, and education there is going hand in hand with religion. Whatever may have been the tendency elsewhere, religion at St. Stephen's has never been regarded as a negligible factor in education. Nor has it been permitted to make the intellectual training there either soft or narrow or cramped. Dr. Finley, Commissioner of Education of the State of New York, bears evidence to the "soundness of the course of study, the thoroughness of the instruction and the high morale of the student body".

Because of its history and tradition and environment, poor men can, and do, go there and live on equal terms with their more well-to-do fellows without a sense of social inferiority. There is no luxury at St. Stephen's—no waste—no extravagance of living. The essentials are there. That is all. But there, also, are the joy and happiness of honest work and achievement. St. Stephen's has no desire to change this. It has set a standard for itself. And to whatever stature it may grow, it will, I believe, continue to be an institution of plain living and high thinking.

The Church has recently raised a great pension fund. It was a great accomplishment. It had constructive imagination behind it. But it left untouched the fact that, although the cost of living has risen tremendously in the past ten years, clergymen's salaries have not risen in the same proportion, if, indeed, they have risen, on the average, at all. Some, I know personally, are less. Now, one of the uses of a clergyman's salary is the education of his children. Sometimes, as you know, it proves inadequate. Here and there, in small country parishes you will find a promising boy, the son of a clergyman, practically sentenced for life to remain in starved surroundings because no organized means exist to help him. Not always, of course. Some of these boys break through their environment and grow into places of power and importance. And with reason, for they come of the best stock in the world. But others do not. I have been wondering just how far we, as a Church, have any responsibility towards these occasional boys who are worth helping, and who cannot help themselves? We must admit responsibility in some degree—if only on the ground that while the fathers of these boys are being paid for parochial work, the service rendered by them must be measured in larger terms—in terms of moral and spiritual betterment of our national life. And I think, also, we may perhaps agree together that we have not met that responsibility with reckless generosity.

The failure touches us in many ways. Just now we are talking a great deal about our duty to America. We hang service flags over our altars. Let me give you a practical illustration of what we are doing today for America. Let me contrast two instances. Take, for instance, say, a Greek, who comes here to New York as an emigrant, who, living on a foreign standard, is able to save, who buys, say, a fruit stand, who marries, who has a son. That son is offered here, in this city, the very best primary and secondary education. He has the use and opportunity of free libraries, free lectures, free museums, free music. When he is ready, he can, almost without expense to his father, go to college here in New York, and qualify himself, by education, at least, to play a part in our national life. The case is familiar enough.

Take, on the other hand, a case not so evident. Take an American by birth and inheritance, who goes into Holy Orders, who is called to a small parish somewhere in rural New York or New Jersey, who depends entirely upon his salary, who marries and who has a son. That son, as he grows up, will get the educational advantages that village offers. He may even get the advantages of a high school if one is close at hand. But when the boy reaches the age of sixteen or eighteen years, you may find him a clerk in the village dry-goods store, or driving a butcher's cart. That is honorable enough. But, as a net result, America has, for certain purposes and kinds of life, lost an American, and in his place has put a Greek. We do not complain, of course, because the Greek is fortunate. We are glad. That is what America means. But, I ask again, was it necessary to lose that other boy—that American boy—the boy we have tacitly agreed to abandon because that boy's father, doing the Master's work, in some small isolated community, is unable to send him where the chance of a proper education can be had? Has that boy, I repeat, any claim on us? Has that boy's father any claim on us?

I believe that St. Stephen's is in a position to do more that is essential for these boys, for less money, than any other institution now available. For, approximately, $450 a year, St. Stephen's can board and lodge one of those boys comfortably; can, in a Churchly environment and atmosphere, give him a sound classical education; and can, at the same time, make him feel he is a man and not a pauper. Does such a sum of money seem excessive for such a purpose? I confess it does not seem so to me. And so I suggest (Continued on page 634)

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

PROHIBITION MOVEMENT MAKING RAPID STRIDES

Defunct Breweries Making More Money Out of Malted Milk

NEW YORK CITY.—While the progress of the National Prohibition Amendment is arrested for a time by the ending of the Winter legislative season, the progress of prohibition is in nowise stayed, according to Dr. Empringham of the Church Temperance Society. April 30 marked the passing of the legalized liquor traffic from the States of New Hampshire and Michigan, from the former in accordance with a prohibitory statute passed by the Legislature of 1917, and from the latter by reason of a constitutional amendment adopted November 7, 1916, by a more than 68,000 majority. New Hampshire returns to the prohibition status after fifteen years of re-experimenting with license in several of the State's municipalities under local option.

In Michigan more than three thousand saloons winked out and a number of breweries were placed under the necessity of closing down or busying themselves in more helpful ways. Many have already arranged news lines of production. How beneficially prohibition has affected one brewery by the enforced stopping of its beer-making is evidenced by recent news respecting what used to be the Coors Brewery in Colorado. The Denver Post is authority for the statement that, changed into a malted milk factory, the monthly business of this concern has grown from $60,000 as a brewery to $150,000 as a malted milk producer; from a sales force of one man to twenty-eight men; from a payroll of eighty persons to one of two hundred workers receiving twenty per cent. better pay. The Coors have also turned their attention to pottery-making and their pottery and porcelain products have already acquired a more than national reputation. Their pottery interests are not connected with the old brewery plant.

New Jersey, where the sort of military strategy called "the nibbling process" is now being applied to the traffic, reported four "dry" victories on April 30, out of five election attempts at aridity in townships and villages. The village of Montclair was one of the four.

BISHOP GAILOR DECLINES INVITATION OF Y. M. C. A.

Says Work in This Country Is Too Important to Leave

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.—Bishop Gailor, who was one of the five clergymen of the Episcopal church asked by the Y. M. C. A. in France to give six months to special work on the Western front, has decided not to go. His letter to the Y. M. C. A. follows:

Memphis, Tennessee, April 24, 1918.

Mr. Clarence A. Barbour,

Young Men's Christian Association,

New York City.

My Dear Mr. Barbour: Your letter of April 12, which I received last Saturday, moved me deeply, and I am very grateful for your request that I give my services to our boys "over there". The fact that I have an only son, who is with the Army in France, and a daughter doing war work in Paris, has increased the difficulty of my decision. However, I have prayed over it, any my judgment at present is clear, that I can do more for the cause here at home than I could in France or elsewhere. There is compelling need here to "strengthen the weak hands and confirm the feeble knees". I am the administrative officer of a large diocese, with a hundred or more congregations depending on my guidance; and my relation to all the people of this great State gives me unusual influence. Let a younger man, with plenty of magnetism and less responsibility, do the more conspicuous service, and I shall try my best to help to "keep the home fires burning", the hands working, and the prayers ascending, for the men, who are at the front, and I am

Gratefully and sincerely yours,

THOMAS F. GAILOR.

BALTIMORE CLERGYMAN ON SUBMARINED SHIP

The Rev. Philip Cook With Y. M. C. A. Workers on "Orissa"

BALTIMORE, MARYLAND—Amongst the survivors of the ship "Orissa", which was sunk by a submarine as she was approaching the coast of France on the morning of Sunday, April 28, was the Rev. Philip Cook, rector of the Church of St. Michael and All Angels, Baltimore. Mr. Cook had offered himself to the Y. M. C. A. for service in the war-zone, and had been granted a six months' leave of absence by his parish for this purpose. Immediately upon his arrival in London, after being rescued, he sent a cablegram to his people referring them to Acts xxvii, 41-44, for a resume of his experiences.

Church Red Cross Hospital

NEW YORK CITY.—The Hankow News Letter of March 4, 1918, states that Mrs. Lieo and Tsac, who have been sent up from Shanghai by the Red Cross, are planning to make the Church General Hospital their headquarters for the wounded as they come in from the front, and that the Wuchang Government is already using it for such sick and wounded as cannot be accommodated in camp.

The Red Cross in Tokyo

NEW YORK CITY.—The Board of Missions hears from Tokyo April 23:

"We meet twice a week at No. 1 Tsukiji, and sew, knit and roll bandages. There are other bandage clubs scattered around Tokyo. We are a regular branch of the Red Cross now. Not long age we sent out about twenty large boxes packed with supplies of all kinds."

DR. SLATTERY DECIDES NOT TO GO TO WESTERN FRONT

Feels That His Patriotic Duty Is t Remain in America

NEW YORK CITY.—The Rev. Charl Lewis Slattery, D.D., rector of Grac church, has decided not to accept the inv tation of the Overseas Headquarters of t Y. M. C. A. to go to France for speci work on the Western front. His reaso were given to the congregation of Gra church in the following statement:

"With much hesitation I am going to clo this sermon with telling you of a decisic which I have been forced to make this la week. I do so not for the sake of illustr tion, but because we are so bound togeth as parish and rector that I cannot help sha ing with you a difficult decision which a fects us both.

BISHOP'S VESSEL GETS 35 U-BOAT SHOTS OFF AFRICA

Service of Thanksgiving for Safe Return Held at Missions House

NEW YORK CITY.—On Tuesday of last week, at noon, a service of thanksgiving for the safe arrival of Bishop Lloyd and his party in America was held in the chapel of the Church Missions House.

As announced in THE CHURCHMAN last week, the ship on which Bishop Lloyd and his companions were traveling, the Eboe, was attacked off the coast of Sierra Leone on April 7 by a submarine. Archbishop Schofield told the following story of that experience to THE CHURCHMAN:

"It was 9.30 a. m. on the first Sunday after Easter. I was in my deck chair, when I saw a queer little boat with a black mast. As I watched it, suddenly I saw the flash of a gun. My boat was a submarine. The Eboe's whistle sounded, and we took our places by the life-boats. The captain turned the ship, and we kept a zigzag course toward shore. The submarine soon got the range, and shells began to fall rapidly on each side of the vessel. We wirelessed distress, asking Freetown to send out a cruiser. Then we covered our ship with a dense, yellow smoke screen. The submarine was about two miles off when we started. She must have thought we had a gun, for she kept at a safe distance.

"We forged ahead as fast as we could, but the vessel was heavily loaded. We who were Christians stood together praying softly for the ship. Thirty-five shots fell in forty minutes. Then the shrapnel began to burst. There was one explosion just behind us on the port side, near our life-boats, so near that even the Bishop, who had been very cool, jumped.

"At last out from Freetown came two ships. They looked like merchant ships. But the captain said they were decoy ships, and that guns were hidden behind the camouflage. And then a big battleship with a heavy smoke screen steamed by us flashing signals as she passed. By this time the submarine was four and a half miles away and had stopped firing on us.

"We put into Freetown harbor. Late that night we had a service of thanksgiving. We sang 'Hail to the Lord's Anointed', 'Eternal Father, Strong to Save' and 'Nearer My God to Thee'. The Bishop read the Gospel for the day and some collects. Then he and the Rev. Mr. Small, superintendent of the Presbyterian mission at Kameroon, each made an address. We waited for a day or two in Freetown harbor and then started again, making the rest of the journey without adventure."

In Bishop Lloyd's office one day last week a group was examining knives with skin-covered handles, cotton native cloth, nuts from the jungle, and other treasures from the episcopal luggage

"What is this?" said someone picking up a gorgeous gold cross on a many-colored ribbon.

"My decoration," said the Archdeacon, "I am a Knight Commander of the Order of the Redemption. The Bishop is—something much grander, I can't remember what. Those people were wonderfully good to us. They treated us like visitors from Mars." With this, he produced a picture of Bishop Lloyd arrayed in his decoration standing fraternally beside President Daniel Howard of Liberia.

"The republic of Liberia," he continued, "is as worthy of help and encouragement as our republic was in 1776. Its citizens have proved the worth of the Negro race. They need ten million dollars to put them on their feet. They have a splendid man in Harry F. Worley, who has been sent by our Government as a financial adviser. Dr. Wm. Jay Schiefflin's Christian mercantile campaign is doing wonders for the West coast. The Church's opportunity is to establish industrial schools. They need a new bishop, a man of their own race. But they also need white missionaries to act as advisers."

The Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D.D.

Bishop Lloyd and Archdeacon Schofield traveled up and down the coast and walked inland fifty miles through the jungle visiting the missions and the forty-seven schools with their 1,536 pupils. They found a native Church of 3,100 communicants who contributed $4,000 annually to their own support.

SEVEN MILLIONS INCREASE IN CHURCH MEMBERSHIP

Thirteen More Denominations Than Twelve Years Ago

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Church membership in the United States increased from 35,068,058 to 42,044,374 during the ten-year period which ended December 31, 1916, according to figures given out today by the Census Bureau. The number of churches increased from 212,230 to 228,007; ministers from 164,830 to 191,722; Sunday-school scholars from 15,337,811 to 20,569,831; Sunday-schools, from 192,722 to 207,789; Sunday-school officers and teachers, from 1,746,074 to 2,049,293.

The total number of denominations covered by the statistics was 201, thirteen more than reported in 1906. Of the total membership, 25,691,774, or 61.1 per cent., comprised members of the Protestant denominations, Latter Day Saints, Spiritualist and various other small groups; 15,742,262, or 37.4 per cent., were Roman Catholic and 250,340 members of the Greek or Russian church. The Jewish congregations comprised 359,998 persons.

DR. STIRES WILL PREACH TO BOYS AT THE FRONT

Accepts Invitation of Y. M. C. A. and Will Sail in June

NEW YORK CITY.—The Rev. Ernest M. Stires, D.D., rector of St. Thomas's church, will sail for France some time in June, to devote several months to addressing the American troops on the Western front. Dr. Stires was one of the list of twenty American clergymen who were invited by the Overseas Headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. to give six months' service to this special work. The four other clergymen of the Episcopal church included in the list were Bishop Gailor and Bishop Woodcock, Dr. Mann of Boston, and Dr. Slattery of New York.

According to the announcement of the Y. M. C. A., Dr. Stires and the other clergymen who accept will visit the various points on the front where American troops are stationed, speaking to the men in the Y. M. C. A. huts. They will wear the army uniform of the Y. M. C. A.

At a meeting of the vestry of St. Thomas's held last week it was decided by the vestry to relieve the Y. M. C. A. of any expense in connection with Dr. Stires's trip. All of his equipment and transportation, as well as all expenses in the field, will be met by the vestry.

WORK AT ST. THOMAS'

During the rectorship of Dr. Stires at St. Thomas's the parish has impressed itself on the life of New York City. People throughout the Church recall the quick action of Dr. Stires when he heard the news of the San Francisco earthquake. St. Thomas's had only recently begun its task of raising a building fund to replace the church building which had been destroyed by fire. When the news of the destruction of many church buildings in San Francisco was received, about $500,000 had been contributed to the building fund of St. Thomas's. Dr. Stires at once wired Bishop Nichols that he wished he might turn over the entire amount on hand to the work of reconstruction, and that the Bishop could depend upon receiving a certain sum, which was named. On the following Sunday Dr. Stires announced to his congregation the desire he had expressed to Bishop Nichols.

The response was immediate. While the building fund remained intact, a very large sum of money was sent to San Francisco. At a special meeting at St. Thomas's church during the General Convention of 1913, Bishop Nichols told of the great courage inspired in him, and in all Church people in San Francisco, by Dr. Stires' telegram, which had arrived while the city was still burning.

Among the many organizations of St. Thomas's one of the most interesting and effective is the Men's Association. Its committees on city administration, missions, city institutions, city improvements, industrial problems, social problems and legislation have in their personnel men of national and international standing. Their corrective influence has been brought to bear on the life of New York City in these various departments many times when the best interests of its citizens demanded such influence.

UNITY TO BE EFFECTED BY LAYMEN OF CHURCH

Bishop Williams Says House of Bishops Must Give Way

From the Detroit News

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.—The past week clergy and laymen of five of the great historic divisions of Protestantism represented in Detroit—the Presbyterian, the Baptist, the Episcopalian, the Congregational and the Methodist—together in mass meeting frankly faced the new problem of American Christianity in its relation to the changing world order. They met at Old St. John's church to discuss a proposed practical step in the direction of a reunion of the divided bodies of the Christian World advanced by Dr. Newman Smyth, a venerable Congregational clergyman of New Haven, Connecticut. Dr. Smyth proposes to get all the churches of the country back of a plan for a creation of a national commission representative of all the denominations that shall not only appoint but ordain all chaplains sent forth to the army and navy.

Dr. Newman Smyth was present and spoke on the necessity of church unity if Christianity is to play its necessary part in the changing world order. Dr. Smyth criticized the house of bishops of the Episcopal Church for "fumbling" the opportunity of its life in not getting behind the plan when it was presented to them. The pretext put forth by the house of bishops was that the proposal did not come before them from any authoritative national body of the Congregational churches. Dr. Smyth showed that he did have authority from the national council of Congregational churches to present the plan to the other denominations of the country.

Bishop Williams acquiesced in Dr. Smyth's criticism of the ecclesiastical body of which the bishop is a member. Bishop Williams declared that if the house of bishops of the Episcopal Church did not get behind church unity the laity of the denomination would brush the house of bishops aside.

The following nationally significant preamble and resolutions were adopted unanimously by a rising vote:

"Whereas, in the Providence of God, the great war is bringing home to the citizenship of our country the urgent need of co-operation in every department of the common life; and,

"Whereas, the preservation of the soul of the Nation is of paramount importance and is to be accomplished only by the maintenance of an exalted national purpose, of an effective morale in army and navy, of lofty standards of life and service among all classes of our people.

"Resolved, We hereby deeply deplore the fact of the present division and disorganization of the spiritual forces of the Nation. We confess to God and to one another the sins of narrowness, exclusiveness and intolerance in our present ecclesiastical relationships;

"Resolved, further, We welcome and endorse the proposals of Dr. Newman Smyth and his colleagues for co-operation in spiritual ministrations to our expeditionary forces;

"Resolved, further, We call on those in authority in our various communions to take practical measures for the carrying out of some such proposals;

"Resolved, further, We call on the men and women of good will throughout the country to express in mass meetings their similar convictions and resolutions."

Before these resolutions were put to vote each denominational representative rose to second them. The most forceful addresses were made by Dr. Vance and Dr. Villers, both of whom have spent months in the army camps, where they witnessed the sweeping away of all denominational fences by the use of a common religion of service.

Dr. Joseph A. Vance, pastor of the First Presbyterian church, expressed his earnest conviction that "the last prayer of Christ on earth for Christian unity will continue to fall still-born from His divine lips until the laymen of the churches take the leadership in the matter out of the hands of the ecclesiastics.

"The people who are blocking that unity of the Christian church for which Christ prayed with his dying lips are not in the pews but in the pulpits," said Dr. Vance. "We have magnified ecclesiasticism to such a point that we don't know how to get along without it.

"No ecclesiastic fed on the pap of ritual is apt to be the leader in this world movement. Like the disciples of old, they are too much occupied in controversy over who is to be the greatest in the kingdom.

"We will never cease our denominational rivalries and duplications of effort until the laymen who hold the pursestrings refuse to give financial support to new church enterprises that are not conceived in the broad spirit of the last petition of Christ to the Father: 'That they may all be one that the world may believe that Thou hast sent me.'"

CHURCH GIVEN LIBERTY BONDS

$5,000 in This Form Received by Scranton Parish

SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA.—Mrs. Everett Warren has presented to the rector, wardens and vestrymen of St. Luke's church a gift of $5,000 in bonds of the Third Liberty Loan, in memory of her husband, for many years a devoted vestryman of this parish. This gift will be known as "The Everett Warren Memorial Fund" to be kept as a perpetual endowed memorial, the interest of which will be applied specifically to the "Rector's Discretionary Fund" for relief, charitable work and such other objects as the rector may decide.

Holy Week Processions in Belize

BELIZE, BRITISH HONDURAS.—On the evening of Thursday in Holy Week a plain wooden cross bearing a picture of the Crucifixion was carried to the green and a mission service was held there. Bishop Dunn, standing on a packing case draped with the Canadian flag, preached to a huge and very reverent crowd.

On Good Friday evening there was an outdoor procession, which went through the streets singing Lenten hymns, and brought back to the cathedral a great and motley crowd for a mission service with two addresses. The Three Hour Service was attended by all the Church people, probably a thousand within besides those without. The Easter services after this preparation were especially beautiful.

BUNGALOW FOR SOLDIERS AT ST. LUKE'S, PHOENI

Church Tuberculosis Hospital Pr vides for Uncle Sam's Boys

PHOENIX, ARIZONA.—St. Luke's Home f the care of tuberculosis patients, found ten years ago, has just issued its annual r port, which shows that the whole numb of patients treated during 1917 has be 91, the average number 29, counting t Summer months. The number of fr patients has been 21; of those cared for reduced rates, 23; of those who have pa the total cost of maintenance, 47.

"Never was the work more widely know and appreciated, and never has it been mo effective than during the past year", writ Bishop Atwood. "A new bungalow, accor modating four to six men, will be erect and occupied by soldiers suffering wi tuberculosis free of charge for one yea This problem of caring for soldiers di charged on account of tuberculosis is o which this country will have to meet, a St. Luke's is ready and willing to do i little part in helping to meet it. Amo other soldiers now at St. Luke's is an Ame ican citizen who gave up his work in Sou America before the United States declar war, and made his way to Europe to join t French Foreign Legion. He was 'gasse twice, as well as wounded, and tuberculos then developed. But we hope for his fin recovery under the favorable climatic a restful conditions of the home. Never ha the demands for admission been so nume ous, and the home is overcrowded all t time. The patients themselves have sho a good and willing spirit in receiving in bungalows intended for a single occupa an additional person so that some valuab life may be saved".

Although it has been such a difficult ye for all institutions, the treasury shows small balance, and the endowment fund small increase.

JAPANESE LEPERS PRAY FOR MEN IN THE TRENCHES

Guild of Intercession Formed in Hospital of Resurrection of Hope

How the lepers of Southern Japan are daily praying systematically for the men in the trenches appears in the following description of the Guild of Intercession appearing in the 1918 Kalendar of the Hospital of the Resurrection of Hope, Kumamoto, Japan, which has just been issued by the foundress of the hospital, that devoted English Churchwoman, Miss Riddell:

Such members of this Guild as are well enough to do so meet in the chapel every Monday afternoon at four o'clock. The members of the Church Committee take it in turn to preside. Generally a hymn to the Holy Spirit is sung, then a litany compiled especially for the Guild is read. Some of the sentences in it are taken from the Liturgy of the Russian Church found as an appendix to the Bishop of London's Visit to the Front. During this litany the names of all those for whom we have been asked to intercede are read, and as each name is read comes the response, "Lord have mercy upon him". Then comes a short space of silent prayer, and then follow other special petitions which have been sent in for those who are ill or in trouble, or for friends. Then brief extemporary prayers are offered in connection with requests received, and the meeting closes with the Lord's Prayer and the benediction.

Every member of the Guild has some special petition committed to his or her care, and also each member possesses two "White Comrade" cards, on each of which is written the name of somebody at the front, and for these they pray not only in the chapel but at their own time.

Sometimes a name has to be changed. I was talking to one of the women patients recently as I met her in the gardens and when we had finished talking about herself, I asked her, For whom are you praying now? I wished the mother of the man she mentioned could have seen the joy in her face as she gave me his name, adding, I am always praying for him, night and day.

One mother sent a photograph of her son to the woman who intercedes for him. It gave the greatest pleasure, and forms for her a fresh link with the brotherhood of Christ and of humanity. That perhaps is the dearest thing to a leper's heart—so outcast are they.

SCHOOL OF ENGINEERING AT SEAMEN'S INSTITUTE

Coast Guard Men Now Quartered at New York Institute

New York City.—Exceptional opportunities for those desiring to qualify as engineers in the new merchant marine of the United States are offered according to the Seamen's Church Institute. In connection with the reorganization of the instruction in its School of Navigation and Marine Engineering, the Institute, by arrangement with the United States Shipping Board, will give free tuition to men of the requisite experience who wish to fit themselves to obtain licenses as engineers in the great transport fleet which is to convey men and munitions across the seas.

Day and night classes are provided, so that pupils may be able to support themselves during their preparation. The teaching staff represented every practical and theoretical phase of navigation and engineering.

The course in marine engineering is constantly supplemented by practical work on board the steamer J. Hooker Hamersley; she was launched in 1914 and has an engine room which has all the equipment which may be found on a larger scale in the ocean steamships.

The School of Navigation and Marine Engineering is in touch with many other branches of Government service. Among the students are the members of the Mine Sweeping Division of the Third District.

By special arrangement with the Government, many newly enlisted men for the United States Navy and also of the Coast Guard are quartered at the Institute until they can be transferred to various points along the Atlantic coast.

FOURTH SHELL NEVER CAME

Ambulance Driver Under Fire Revises Views on Religion

Cincinnati, Ohio.—At a meeting in the interest of the Third Liberty Loan campaign held here recently one of the speakers, Julian Bryan, a freshman of Princeton University, who has seen service at the front driving an ambulance, made a striking reference to the religious conviction instilled into a soldier under fire.

He told of meeting a young man "going over" on the boat and getting into a religious argument. "He didn't believe in religion", said Bryan, "and I, not being versed in details, could not argue very strenuously. Later on, however, I met this same fellow and he told me he had changed his mind. I asked him why. He said: 'Do you know "Kelly's Corner"? I said I certainly do. (Kelly's Corner is a bad place on the road near the front line near Verdun.) Well, my friend was driving an ambulance when a shell struck on one side of the road. Then another one struck on the road in front of the machine. Then a third one struck on the other side of the road. The last one threw dirt and gravel in my face; it was getting hot. I knew that the Germans always threw shells of that caliber in fours and I began to get pretty scared.'

"What did you do?" I asked.

"What did I do? What could I do but pray? And I prayed harder than I ever prayed before. I was saved—the fourth shell never came."

Bryan's description of the first news of America's entry into war, as received by "the boys" in France, brought forth enthusiastic applause. He said the few Americans who had been in the ambulance service prior to our entry into war were referred to in a facetious way as "crazy Americans".

"We were sitting with some soldiers", said young Bryan, "when a copy of a newspaper was received carrying the joyous news that the United States had declared war on Germany. We let out one yell and then all of us stood up and held hands and danced around wild with joy."

Annual Diocesan Meetings in Lexington

Ashland, Kentucky.—The Diocesan Council and the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the diocese of Lexington will be held on May 28, 29 and 30 in Calvary church here. There will be a special service each evening with a series of addresses on present-day Church problems. The corporate Communion will be celebrated on Wednesday morning. The men meet in the church and the women in the guild house.

DEAN BEEKMAN BELIEVES OFFENSIVE WILL FAIL

American Church in Paris Centre of Patriotic Work

Paris, March 30.—You may have already learned of it, but immediately following Dr. Watson's resignation as the rector of the American Church of the Holy Trinity, I was invited by the vestry to take charge of the Parish for a minimum period of six months beginning April 1. The vestry has made Dr. Watson rector emeritus, and he and Mrs. Watson are to sail for home very shortly for a well-earned rest.

Everything has changed in Paris since the war began, and the Church of the Holy Trinity is no exception. Especially is this true since America entered the conflict. In the early days of the war a great number of the American Colony and attendants of the Church left Paris, most of them for America, while during the past few months thousands of soldiers and sailors and war workers have taken their places. The result is that three-fourths of the congregations are in uniform and the problem which confronts Holy Trinity is one growing out of this condition. It is distinctly a war period, different from anything in the past.

I think that was one reason why the vestry turned to me, as I am a chaplain in uniform and have been, as you know, the head of the American Soldiers' and Sailors' Club, perhaps the largest centre for enlisted men in Paris. As this work is now thoroughly organized, under most competent heads, I felt that I could do both the club and church work; in fact, that one is closely related to the other. Because of the desire of parents of our English choir boys, they are leaving for home, which they have not seen in two years, and we are organizing a "war choir" to be composed exclusively of soldiers and war workers. In every way possible, we hope to make Holy Trinity a spiritual centre for those of the Army and Navy, Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. and other relief workers with headquarters in Paris or who find themselves here at any time.

It is a great source of strength that Bishops Brent, McCormick and Israel are frequently at call for the pulpit and altar, as well as other well-known American clergymen. I shall endeavor to keep our people at home well informed of things here and you may expect to hear from me from time to time.

Despite the bombardment of Paris, Holy Week, especially Good Friday, has been one of satisfaction to our arms, for at no period of the war have the British and the French fought with greater courage or success. Long before this reaches you, you will know that the great German offensive has failed, due to the morale of the Allied soldiers and the brilliancy of their leadership. As Clemenceau said yesterday: "We await the future with perfect confidence; the enemy shall not pass". That the United States will speed up to their highest possible efficiency in every department in which she is expected to contribute and under leadership the most able and chosen, irrespective of any test other than ability, is not only the prayer but the demand of the American soldier and sailor now engaged in this greatest war of all history

MRS. ZIMMERMAN LEAVES CHURCH BULK OF ESTATE

St. Michael's, Furniss Family's Summer Parish, Residuary Legatee

New York City.—Last week the daily newspapers had headlines to the effect that St. Michael's church was the recipient of a legacy of a million dollars from Mrs. Margaret Furniss Zimmerman. In point of fact, St. Michael's legacy is only $50,000, and although the parish is the residuary legatee of the Zimmerman estate, it is quite uncertain whether the residuary estate will be one or one million dollars.

"St. Michael's", Dr. Peters said on Sunday, "has suffered much in the past from the false idea of many that it is a rich church having no need, for the support of its work, of their gifts and contributions. . . . I beg you, therefore, to realize that so far as this church is concerned it is not a present beneficiary."

Margaret Furniss Zimmerman was a member of that Furniss family known throughout the diocese for their generosity. Her father, William Ponsonby Furniss, known as the "West Indian merchant prince", accumulated a fortune of $1,000,000 by trading with sailing vessels out of Portsmouth, New Hampshire. The greater part of this fortune he invested in that part of Manhattan known as Bloomingdale, now the upper west side. There for years he kept his country seat; in fact, the Furniss family were the last to have a country place on the Riverside. St. Michael's was their country parish. The organ was their gift. Their city parish was first Grace church and then the Incarnation. Mr. Furniss's widow and sons died some time ago, and to Sophia and Clementina Furniss and Mrs. Zimmerman was left the bulk of the estate. These three sisters gave the cathedral chapel of St. Martin of Tours, which, it will be remembered, was consecrated in connection with the funeral of Mrs. Zimmerman on March 19.

During the lifetime of Dr. Thomas Peters, the father of Dr. John P. Peters and his predecessor as rector of St. Michael's, Mrs. Zimmerman turned to him as her adviser in her many benefactions. That she always looked upon her fortune as a trust to be used for the benefit of others is shown by her will. Many of the diocesan institutions are legatees.

St. John's in the Wilderness at Haverstraw, where later in her life Mrs. Zimmerman and her husband had their Summer home, and where she first established the church, is recipient of $200,000 and sixty acres of land. Her wish was that the chapel and the work of the Diocesan Mission and Church Extension Society there be continued in her husband's name and memory. The Cathedral of St. John the Divine receives $140,000, which Mrs. Zimmerman suggests be used for a school for girls. Twenty-five thousand dollars was left to the Church Temperance Society. Mrs. Zimmerman was much interested in seamen; among other benefactions for seamen's societies is $10,000 for the Seamen's Church Institute which, according to the usual custom of the Institute, will probably go into the permanent fund. Some time ago Mrs. Zimmerman built the Furniss Cottage at the Sheltering Arms Home for children; to them she left $100,000 for the maintenance of a chapel in memory of her sister, Sophia Furniss. The American Church Institute for Negroes and the Church Mission of Help each received $10,000 as well as many other societies, the object of most of which is the care of the weak and helpless.

PROFESSOR LADD ELECTED BERKELEY SCHOOL DEAN

Has Been Coit Professor of Church History for Fourteen Years

Middletown, Connecticut.—The trustees of the Berkeley Divinity School met at Middletown on May 3, and elected Professor Ladd to be Dean of the School.

Dr. Ladd was born in Lancaster, New Hampshire, in May, 1870, his father being the late Judge Ladd of the New Hampshire Supreme Court. He graduated at Dartmouth with the degree of A.B. in 1891, and later received the degrees of A.M. from Harvard and B.D. from the General Theological Seminary, New York. Before entering the New York seminary he spent two years in study abroad at the Sorbonne in Paris, at Oxford and Leipzig Universities. He was ordained priest and deacon by Bishop Niles, and from 1897 to 1903 was in charge of the mission church at Berlin, New Hampshire. He is still canonically connected with the diocese of New Hampshire. For the past fourteen years he has been Coit Professor of Church History at Berkeley, and on the death of Dr. Hart in February of last year he was made acting dean. He has been a frequent visitor to England and is in close touch with Church life there. In 1916 he married Miss Ailsie Taylor of London (a daughter of Colonel Taylor of the British Army), who had taken the classical Tripos at Newnham College, Cambridge.

Professor Ladd has long been recognized among the alumni and students of the Berkeley Divinity School for his unusual gifts as a teacher and trainer of young men; and his imprint upon the character and ideals of Berkeley graduates for some years past has been one of the conspicuous elements in the School's service to the Church; and the months during which he has served the School as acting dean have abundantly demonstrated his capacities as an able administrator and executive.

In Professor Ladd Berkeley will gain a leader well qualified to maintain the traditions of her honored past and to adapt the School's work to the needs of the new day. It is earnestly hoped that he will accept the election.

GREAT DISSATISFACTION WITH THE PENSION FUND

Reflected by "Southern Churchman" and Diocesan Papers

Growing dissatisfaction with the Church Pension Fund, owing to the fact that the present aged and infirm clergy are not benefited by it, is reflected in various national and diocesan church papers. Prominent groups of clergymen and laymen are insisting that the fund was raised because givers supposed that the older men in the ministry would receive relief. The following is from the Texas Churchman:

Our Weekly News Letters

NEW YORK

Confirmation for Bronx Class at Cathedral—"It was tremendous", said the Bishop in describing the joint Confirmation service on the night of Sunday, April 28. "The cathedral was 'packed to the roof'; all the seats in the choir that were not occupied with choristers were filled. Each pastor brought his own sheep. We saw that there are many folds but only one flock." Altogether 280 were confirmed, representing fourteen or fifteen parishes and missions in the Bronx.

Children Give $10,800—The children of the city assembled with their Sunday school banners in the cathedral on Saturday, April 27, to make their Lenten offering for missions. This amounted to $10,800, which was between $300 and $400 more than in any previous year—a pretty good showing considering that the grown folks are allowing their share in the missionary giving to fall off. Calvary Sunday school again led off having the largest gift, $1,650. They won the banner thus for the third year, which means possession and much happiness for the children. They also won the banner for the largest per capita gift.

The Roll of Honor—William Drain who was killed in action in France last week, was the first parishioner of Grace chapel to die in the service. His parents had said goodbye to their younger son in the morning and he had gone to San Antonio to enter the aviation corps. In the afternoon came the telegram announcing the older boy's death. Moses Taylor, a parishioner of Grace church, has been reported missing.

Old Guard Veteran Battalion—The ninety-second anniversary service of the Old Guard Veteran Battalion was held in St. Thomas' church a fortnight ago. The preacher was the Rev. Dr. Wasson, chaplain of the Guard and director of the Strangers' Welfare Fellowship.

Odds and Ends of News—The congregation of Calvary church was recently photographed outside the church on Sunday morning. The picture was a war picture and will be sent to the parish's men at the front. The Rev. L. D. Edelblute has entered upon his duties as rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles; the vestry and congregation gave him a reception on St. Mark's Day.

The Cathedral League—The annual meeting was held on the afternoon of May 1. Dean Robbins, who has injured his leg, was unable to speak as had been expected, but Dr. Slattery very kindly took his place. The Hon. Franklin Roosevelt and Mr. Charles F. Hoffman were the other speakers. John S. Rogers was elected president in the place of J. Lawrence Aspinwall. Beverley Chew was elected treasurer and Henry L. Hobart secretary.

PHILADELPHIA

Convention to Meet May 7—The annual convention of the diocese will meet at the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany on Tuesday, May 7. A committee recently appointed has sent out an appeal to all delegates to make this convention a time of devotion rather than debate. The necessary reports and resolutions will be shortened and simplified as much as possible—that there may be an understanding and an undertaking of the serious service that is demanded of the Church in this time of strain.

Girls' Friendly Annual Service—There were some 1,200 young women of the diocese at the annual service of the Girls' Friendly Society recently held at Holy Trinity Church. The Rev. Gilbert Pember was the helpful preacher at this inspiring service.

Dr. Montgomery to Go to Camp Meade—The Rev. Dr. J. A. Montgomery is completing his teaching engagements at the Divinity School and the University of Pennsylvania, that he may the sooner go to Camp Meade. From the middle of May he will have charge of the three clergymen of the Church who are working in the great cantonment. A house has been finished and a chapel for the centre of the influence of our ministry.

Dr. Montgomery's constant and able work with the War Commission of the diocese has been most marked. The new trust was given him with the utmost confidence—and was received with the joy of one glad to combine religious and patriotic service.

Clergy Well Represented in Parade—More than a hundred of the clergy marched in the parade on the 27th. The enthusiasm of some of the oldest was marked all along the line. It was the fine spirit of these older men that made a long delay more bearable. Then, too, the wait gave a fine opportunity to see others in line; especially the splendid men from Dix, who showed the discipline of their training days. The Bishops were supported by the Rev. Messrs. Levis with the American flag, and Medary with that of the diocese. The careful instructions of Dr. Mockridge bore fruit in a sort of straight line, and a little uniformity in those who are not overapt to keep step.

Bishop Garland at Naval Academy—The sermon to the graduating class at the Naval Academy at Annapolis is to be preached this year by Bishop Garland.

Noon Day Prayers for the War—Several of the parishes in the city have for some time observed daily noon prayers for the men at the front. In the last few days a growing sentiment has shown itself all about for a general and larger use of this custom among all Christian bodies. St. James' church has for months past had such a service. Beginning on Monday, the 6th, all churches are urged to have such a service.

Dr. Grammer Working for Federation of Churches—The rector of St. Stephen's church, Dr. Carl Grammer, has been elected president of the Inter-Church Federation and has been encouraged by his parish to help to the utmost every effort for co-operation for social and civic service.

CHICAGO

Moral Aims of the War—The religious and welfare organizations of Chicago are looking forward with keen interest to the series of meetings to be held in the city, May 23-28, under the auspices of the National Council on the Churches and the Moral Aims of the War. The purpose of the five-day campaign is "to strengthen and direct public sentiment toward the stronger prosecution of the war, and to exalt the moral issues and aims that underlie the moral participation of America in the conflict". Among the participants in the discussions will be ex-President Taft, and the Rev. Sir George Adam Smith, principal of Aberdeen University, now in America as the representative of the British Foreign Office.

Dr. Birckhead Returns—Chicago was favored in having as one of the April speakers at the Sunday Evening Club the Rev. Dr. Hugh Birckhead, the rector of Emmanuel church, Baltimore. His subject was "The Challenge of the Present Crisis".

Dr. Fleetwood's Son Honored—George W. Fleetwood, the son of the Rev. Dr. Fleetwood, rector of Waterman Hall, the Diocesan School for Girls, is the recipient of a governmental appointment. He passed with distinction the examination as expert cost accountant in the account section of the Finance Department of the Equipment Division of the Signal Corps, War Department, and received Grade A, the highest rating. The position ranks with a major in the army. Mr. Fleetwood was a member of the First Regiment, I. N. G., and served through the Spanish-American war.

Curate in China Adopts Baby—The Rev. Frederick G. Deis, who is the curate of St. Luke's church, Evanston, detailed to work in China, and stationed at Shasi, is acquiring a family, as is witnessed by the following extract from a letter to his rector, Dr. Stewart: "Please give my love to your family and tell them we have adopted a little baby girl of two weeks dying of starvation and we couldn't do anything else really, and besides we haven't any of our own. So now we have two Chinese children". Mr. Deis writes further that the struggle between the government and the revolutionary troops at Shasi still continues, with the attendant danger to the Christians as well as the populace generally.

St. Barnabas' Guild in War Time—Twelve members of St. Luke's Chapter of the St. Barnabas' Guild for Nurses have responded to the call for nurses, most of the number being either in France or on the way. The secretary of the Guild sends each week a post card with a personal greeting to each member overseas. In addition the six copies of the week of the Evanston-News-Index and the Chicago Sunday Tribune are sent to Base Hospital No. 12.

St. Peter's Men's Club—In accordance with its announced policy, the April speaker at the St. Peter's Men's Club was Col. L. D. Wildman, U. S. A., whose topic was "The Signal Corps and Its Activities". Col. Wildman served in this branch of the service during the Spanish-American war. He has also seen service in the Philippines and Alaska. He is the officer who installed and put into operation the first wireless equipment between the States and Alaska. He was, therefore, able to give the club direct first-hand information concerning this interesting branch of the service.

St. Peter's Parish House has been much improved by the erection of a stage with a drop curtain and other necessary equipment in the auditorium. Especial care was taken to make provision for easy access to the fire escapes. This improvement fills a long felt want at St. Peter's, as the auditorium is now available for amateur dramatics and parish entertainments.

Cardinal Newman Prohibition Club—The first of a series of clubs to further the cause of prohibition has just been organized by members of the Roman Catholic Church interested in "Making Chicago Dry". The name adopted is "The Cardinal Newman Prohibition Club". Former Judge P. B. Flanagan is the president. The Rev. Father Joseph McNamee, pastor of St. David's church, an indefatigable worker for "The Cause", is the treasurer. Plans for the establishment of a Down-Town Headquarters of the club are under consideration.

Old "Christ Church"—Friends of the late Rt. Rev. Dr. Cheney, for more than half a century rector of "Old Christ Church", Reformed Episcopal, will be interested to know that the work of this parish is to be continued. The vestry has called the Rev. James Todd to the rectorship of the parish. Mr. Todd has accepted the call and assumed his duties.

ALBERT EDWARD SELCER.

BALTIMORE

Dr. Van Dyke at Christ Church—Our former minister at The Hague, Dr. Henry Van Dyke, was the special preacher at Christ church, Baltimore, on the Fourth Sunday after Easter and spoke to a crowded congregation upon the Peace of God. At night he delivered the closing address at the great cantonment exhibition, "Over There", which has produced such a profound impression upon all who have seen it. Over 300,000 people have visited it and many famous men have spoken to the crowds which have filled the Armory, amongst the most recent of these being Vice-President Marshall, Speaker Champ Clark and General Kuhn.

The Churchman's Club—The annual meeting of the Churchman's Club was held at the new Southern Hotel on the last night of April. The speakers were Major General Joseph E. Kuhn, commandant of Camp Meade, Lieutenant-Colonel Thomas B. Futcher, an eminent physician who has just returned from the war zone, and the Rev. Dr. Edwin B. Niver, chaplain of the U. S. Naval Reserves. All these spoke of the war from their various points of view and patriotic feeling ran high. General Kuhn suggested that the United States can hardly venture to boast until she has mobilized fifteen per cent. of her population for service in the field, as Belgium and Serbia did. He strongly urged that every citizen should loyally uphold our President in any policies which he may undertake. Officers were elected for the coming year as follows: Dr. Henry Barton Jacobs, president; Edward Guest Gibson, first vice-president; Richard C. Norris, second vice-president; Alexander Payson Knapp, secretary; John Glenn, Jr., treasurer.

Clergyman Retires—The Rev. Jesse R. Bicknell has announced that he will retire from active ministry about the first of June and become eligible for a pension. He has been for some years in active service at St. Paul's chapel as assistant to the vicar, the Rev. F. H. Staples.

Dinner at Garrison Forest—Many prominent men were in attendance at the annual dinner of the laymen of St. Thomas church, Garrison Forest, last week at the Green Spring Valley Hunt Club. Bishop Murray was present and the principal speaker was Mr. A. W. Thompson, vice-president of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad. St. Thomas' has an interesting history extending back to the year 1742, when a vast forest which sheltered many Indians lay just north of the church. WYLLYS REDE.

ATLANTA

Convention Held—The Eleventh Annual Council of the Diocese of Atlanta convened in St. Phillip's Cathedral, Atlanta, on Wednesday morning, April 17. The opening service took place at 10 o'clock. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. At the same time he made a report of his visitations and confirmations since his consecration.

A great deal was accomplished on the first day. In the evening the Missionary Meeting was held. The people were given an account of the stewardship of the Board of Missions, and a vision of the needs of the diocese in the field. The Board requested an increase of $1,500 in the apportionment for Diocesan Missions. On the following day the Council voted for this increased apportionment to be distributed among the parishes and missions.

The arrangement with the Church Pension Fund which had been made by the Officers of the Corporation was confirmed by the Council. This provides for the transferring to the Fund those funds of the diocese which had been held in trust for Clergy Relief. The Church Pension Fund undertakes to pay out of the income of these trust funds the assessment for the pensioning of the clergy of the diocese in parishes and missions, agreeing also to continue the payment of allowances to former beneficiaries of the diocesan fund.

The time for the meeting of the next Council was changed so that the Council year will correspond with the fiscal year or will meet in All Saints' church, Atlanta, January 22, 1919.

The Church appointed a committee of laymen to raise funds for securing a residence for the Bishop of the Diocese.

The Council accepted the apportionment suggested by the Provincial Board of Religious Education, and ordered it to be assessed against the parishes. The Provincial Field Secretary, the Rev. Gardner Tucker, addressed the Council on the subject of religious education.

The Bishop proposed to the Council the establishment of a diocesan paper in connection with The Witness. The Council gave its hearty approval, and all the clergy agreed to co-operate. The Rev. Randolph P. Claiborne was selected to be editor. It will begin with the May issue.

At the Missionary Meeting on Wednesday evening the speakers were the Rev. A. G. Richards, the Rev. H. F. Saumenig, and the Rev. R. T. Phillips.

The Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held on April 17. The Bishop addressed them at 9 o'clock. Their Corporate Communion was with the Council at 10 o'clock. Their business was then taken up and continued throughout the day. On Thursday morning they had a Corporate Communion and a Quiet Hour.

The attendance was splendid and the meeting enthusiastic. Their purposes during the year had been well carried out. A stirring address by the President, Mrs. C. L. Pettigrew, inspired them to new endeavor. This was echoed in larger financial undertakings, and in their unanimous agreement to co-operate in making the Diocesan paper a message-bearer to every home.

Thursday evening, from eight to ten, the Bishop and Mrs. Mikell gave a reception for the members of the Council and the Woman's Auxiliary. The visitors nearly all remained over in Atlanta to attend.

SPRINGFIELD

A Live Parish—The attendance and collection at the Easter service this year at Trinity church, Lawrenceburg, was the largest known in the history of the parish. A beautiful solid silver chalice and paten was blessed and used for the first time on Easter day. Nine persons were recently confirmed by the bishop of Southern Ohio, who has been making episcopal visitations in the diocese of Indianapolis during the absence of Bishop Francis. A Red Cross unit has been established in the parish hall and meetings are held three afternoons a week. The attendance at the regular Sunday services is increasing and the affairs of the parish seem to be in a very prosperous condition.

MEXICO

Meeting of Convocation—The annual Convocation of the District of Mexico was held in the City of Mexico April 10 and 11, 1918.

Owing to the serious illness of Mrs. Aves just at this time, the Bishop, who lives in the city of Guadalajara, was not able to attend the Convocation. The Bishop's address was read in Spanish by the secretary, the Rev. Efrain Salinas, and affectionate messages exchanged between the Convocation and the Bishop.

By appointment of the Bishop, the Rev. Mr. Carrion, one of the senior presbyters, took charge as presiding officer and the business of the Convocation went forward without delay. There are twelve Mexican clergymen, and of these ten were present at the opening service. At the roll call of the business session twelve lay delegates responded to their names, and presented credentials from their respective missions.

In view of the fact that half a dozen missions have been almost wiped out of existence during the last few years, a summary of the reports made to this Convocation is interesting.

Reports from eighteen missions were received, showing an aggregate of 321 families, 635 communicants and 1,062 baptized persons in the district. Aside from this is the report from the English-speaking congregation in the City of Mexico with over 200 communicants.

As part of the program several carefully-prepared essays were read dealing with some of the practical problems of the work, the different translations of the Bible in Spanish and the work of the Woman's Auxiliary. A. H. MELLEN.

LONG ISLAND

A Patriotic Archdeaconry—A meeting of the Archdeaconry of Queens and Nassau was held at the Cathedral of the Incarnation, Garden City, on the afternoon and evening of Wednesday, April 24. The Rev. Roy Farrell Duffield, Archdeacon of Queens and Nassau, presided.

Two interesting and patriotic matters were decided upon. First, the members agreed to undertake spiritual and material work along definite lines for the soldiers in the camps; second, to invest $3,000 in Liberty Bonds.

In the afternoon a sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry B. Wilson, of Boonton, New York, and a most interesting service was held in the evening, when many of the clergy present spoke briefly on "Spiritual feeling." Supper was served at St. Mary's school, the young women of the cathedral being the hostesses. About 200 were present. MARY E. SMYTH.

SOUTH DAKOTA

Work Progresses in College Town—The new church and rectory at Brookings are completed and were used for the first time on Easter Day. For a good many years the Church has been keeping clergymen in this town, which is the site of the South Dakota State College, with a small wooden building resembling a country school-house one mile from the college buildings as his equipment. Naturally the Church has not grown during the past 2 years, and its influence upon the students of the college has been pitifully small. It could not have been anything else. Seldom was the Episcopal Church mentioned among the boys and girls, and many did not even know of its existence. Unfortunately, Brookings is not the only college town that has suffered a similar neglect from the Church.

But now a new day has begun in the work at the State College. In place of the old and unattractive church and rectory a mile from the college there is now a beautiful brick church and brick rectory nearer the college than any other church building. Both of the buildings were planned by Cram and Ferguson. They are constructed of red brick, sand mold, laid up in Flemish bond which makes a beautiful wall. The nave of the final church has been completed and the chancel has been built of wood so that when the growth demands it the chancel can be easily and cheaply torn down to make way for the rest of the building. As it stands the church is about 60 feet long and 27 feet wide. It will seat comfortably about 125 persons.

The finest piece of furniture in the building is the lectern, which was a gift from Dr. R. L. Slagle, president of the University of South Dakota and was given in memory of his late wife, Anna Reimann Slagle. Dr. Slagle was for many years the president of the State College at Brookings, and his wife was a most faithful member of St. Paul's Guild. The lectern is of oak beautifully carved by Kirchmayer, of the firm of Wm. F. Ross & Co. It is the finest piece of good carving in this part of South Dakota. The lectern, also a gift from Dr. Slagle, is of carved oak from the same firm.

The altar and ridell posts were given by s. Natwick of Sioux Falls, and the dossal l ridell curtains of gold brocaded satin l red velvet were given by Bishop and s. Remington. The candle-sticks on the ar are an old Swedish type given a few rs before her death by Mrs. M. E. Wim-, for many years a faithful attendant l supporter of the Church in Brookings. e frontal and super-frontal were gifts m the architects and Mr. A. E. Hoyle l were made by Miss Barton of Cam-dge. They are of brocaded silk and are an exquisite texture. In fact the eye is once drawn to the beautiful altar on tering the Church and the hangings give it note of rich coloring so many churches k. A beautiful set of altar linen was en by the Altar Guild of Trinity Church, nox, Massachusetts.

The rectory is also a brick building on same lot with the church and was built harmonize with the church. It is a sub-ntial house of eleven rooms besides basement and attic. It is 40 x 24 feet th a small porch on the front and a good-ed piazza. The two buildings represent expenditure of about $10,000, and while ere will be no debt on the church there ll be a mortgage on the rectory of $2,500 ld by the American Church Building Fund mmission.

It is hoped to have the church conse-ated on Wednesday, June 19, by Bishop rleson, with Dean Woodruff of Calvary thedral, in Sioux Falls, the preacher.

nvocation Date—The Convocation of e Missionary District of South Dakota s been called by the Bishop to meet in oux Falls on Saturday, Sunday and Mon-y, June 15, 16 and 17. PAUL ROBERTS.

SOUTHERN FLORIDA

arines Help Build Church—St. Paul's, ey West, is now ministering to a larger mber of men in government employ than y other parish in this district, especially the numerous marines there stationed. a recent service held by the rector, the ev. C. R. D. Crittonton, 722 of these ma-nes attended, and one entire company, nsisting of eighty men, volunteered their rsonal labor on the new church now ilding for this parish. This kind offer as gladly accepted and forty-three of ese men were at work on one day shortly ter. It is hoped that this new church n soon be completed, the parishioners joicing that the work is again going for-rd, after being suspended for some time. . Paul's chimes of thirteen bells, silent r a dozen years, have been restored and e again regularly in use.

ecent Gifts—Recent gifts in Southern orida churches include a pair of hand-me candlesticks in St. Gabriel's church, tusville; a white dossal in Grace church, ew Smyrna; with vestments, altar hang-gs, large silk flags and a service flag at . Stephen's, Cocoanut Grove. This serv-e flag has thirty stars, one being of gold r a member of this mission who was lled in aviation service. It was the priest-charge of St. Stephen's, the Rev. B. W. pper, whose narrow escape from death by e bite of a rattlesnake was mentioned cently, the prompt "first aid" work given the moment by Bishop Mann and others ho were with him preventing the almost variably fatal result of such accident, and Mr. Soper escaped with only a very sore ankle.

Ford Car Given—While recently visiting the missions in charge of the Rev. F. A. Shore, at Arcadia and Ft. Myers, Bishop Mann included a trip to the aviation camp near Arcadia, where also Mr. Shore ministers. As this camp is located seven miles from Arcadia our Church War Commission, at the request of Bishop Mann, has supplied a Ford car to enable Mr. Shore to include this camp with his other work.

ALBANY

A Generous Gift—St. Mark's church, Hoosick Falls (the Rev. Harry E. Pike, rector), has received a gift of $5,000 from Mrs. W. A. Wood, as a memorial to her husband, the Hon. Walter A. Wood, Jr. The sum is to be made a part of the endowment fund and the income will be used for some special purpose to be designated later.

A Growing Church—Trinity church, Gloversville, which was recently created by the consolidation of Christ and St. Paul's churches, is going forward steadily under the leadership of the Rev. Donald W. Greene. St. Margaret's Guild of old Christ church has been reorganized. A parish chapter of the Junior Auxiliary is well under way. The Red Cross work of the parish, which was formerly done by the members of the Women's Bible Class, has been enlarged so as to include all the women who are connected with the church.

Special Patronal Festival—St. Mark's church, Green Island (the Rev. R. A. Forde, rector), marked its patronal festival with special services. St. Mark's Guild made a corporate communion in the morning, and in the evening there was a service with special music and a sermon by the rector. At the close of the service the congregation adjourned to the parish house for a social hour.

Confirmation—The Bishop made his annual visitation in St. Ann's church, Amsterdam (the Rev. E. T. Carroll, D.D., rector), on Sunday, May 5, and confirmed a class of thirty-five, of whom an unusually large proportion were adults.

CALIFORNIA

Convocation of San Jose—The Spring meeting of the Convocation of San Jose was held on April 16 and 17, at Calvary church, Santa Cruz, the Rev. E. T. Brown, rector. The new Dean of Convocation, the Very Rev. William A. Brewer, had made a special effort to interest the laity in the meetings and as a result there were thirty-four lay delegates and twenty-four clerical members in attendance. The Convocation being a scattered one, the delegates came long distances by auto and train. The friendly and spiritual gathering was very stimulating to all.

Bishop Nichols was present, taking an active part in the conferences, addressing the large missionary meeting on the first evening and giving the devotional address on the following morning at a notably large Communion service.

The Convocational dinner was served to seventy guests. One of the guests of honor was Mrs. E. C. Boston, a pioneer Church woman of the Diocese and of Calvary church, who gave delightful reminiscences of the early days of the Church in this region and of the first Convocation meetings under California's first Bishop, the Rt. Rev. William Ingraham Kip.

PORTO RICO

Patriotism at St. John's School—Shortly after the Thrift Stamps were issued, one of the leading churchmen and citizens of San Juan, Mr Henry Dooley, paid a visit to St. John's School and also to the Sunday School, giving a brief talk about this method of assisting the government. He then gave to each child and teacher a Thrift Card containing one stamp as an incentive. It was a thoughtful and generous gift. The children have shown their appreciation. On April 19 their united investments amounted to $306.73, not including the gift stamp. The school now numbers fifty-eight pupils and closes the third year of its infancy June 14, with three graduates from the eighth grade.

Spanish Work at St. Luke's, Puerta de Tierra—The Spanish work under the Rev. Harvey P. Walter is increasing in strength. At Christmas time the choir appeared in vestments and numbers several promising young men who manifest genuine interest in the Church's teaching. They were among the nineteen presented for confirmation the Sunday after Easter. A Sunday School steadily increasing in number has finally passed a hundred, the goal aimed at for months past. Mr. Walter offered them a treat of ice-cream if they could bring their numbers to a hundred. The day came, and by wise arrangement the ice-cream was delivered at the right moment and as each child passed out of Sunday School he was given a little paper pail containing his treat. There was no confusion, no discrimination, and all felt happy and justly rewarded.

On Good Friday this congregation and that of the English Blacks, who worship in the same building, had the privilege of sharing in a wonderfully inspiring Three Hours' service. Instead of meditating on the Seven Words, Mr. Walter's service dealt with the several groups of people in relation to our Lord and his Crucifixion. The alternate English and Spanish portions of the service were taken by the Bishop and Mr. Walter, as the Bishop speaks excellent Spanish. A patriotic service was held Sunday, April 28, in the interest of the Third Liberty Loan.

Death of a Prominent Churchwoman—The Church in San Juan and the city, especially the American colony, have sustained a great loss in the death of Mrs. Ralph Swiggett. She was a faithful member of the Woman's Auxiliary, foremost in all good works, and a leader in all the Red Cross work. She was a graduate of Wellesley College, when Miss Vera Loomis, and her sudden death is a great shock to a wide circle of friends.

MINNESOTA

Dr. Stewart Stirs Hearers—"We don't know when the war will end, but, by the Lord God, we know that it is going to end right", and when he had said this Dr. George Craig Stewart of St. Luke's church, Evanston, secretary of the War Commission of the Episcopal Church, went on to address the members of the Minnesota Church Club on the subject, "The Challenge of the Hour". Dr. Stewart brought round after round of applause when he spoke of the American Army and the part that it is to take in the world conflict. "The Reserves that they are waiting for over there are the American Reserves", and, said the speaker, "I want you to know that we have the cleanest army that any nation ever had and when the boys go over the top they will go over clean. But between victory and us there is a great gulf fixed and this gulf must be bridged by our wealth, our luxuries and by our boys. Everything we have must go for truth, for God and for native land".

"You men who are at home! What are you doing towards training the boys of today who will be the men of war next year and the year after? One of the chaplains in one of the cantonments charged me to lift up my voice and tell the men of the Church not to expect the army chaplains to do for a captain of twenty-seven that which should have been done for him when he was seven or seventeen. Take your part in the Sunday school; go to your rector, volunteer for work and do your share in training in spiritual things these boys who will be called upon to take their part in this struggle."

The rally was held under the auspices of the Minnesota Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and in telling of the work of the War Commission Dr. Stewart told of the work that the Brotherhood secretaries are doing in camp and cantonment and "over there".

War Activities in the Diocese—Sergt. Major Cowles of the Canadian Army told the people of St. Luke's church, Lynnhurst, about his experiences in the trenches during the early part of the war. The sergeant was at Ypres when the Germans made the first gas attack. A bullet finally stopped his activities, and after two and a half years in a hospital the bullet was removed in a few minutes by an American doctor in a little town in North Dakota.

The service flag at Christ church, Austin, the Rev. G. H. TenBroeck, rector, has a golden star. It is in honor of Private Malone, who was killed in action. Private Malone enlisted with the Canadians.

The clergy of Minneapolis have made plans to carry on a street preaching campaign this Summer. Last year this kind of work was done with great success.

The Guild of St. Luke's church have adopted a French orphan. The primary department of St. Clement's Sunday school, St. Paul, have also adopted a French war orphan.

Each member of the club was given a Thrift Stamp card containing one stamp, and the president, Mr. H. C. Theopold, suggested that the cards be filled and returned to the treasurer of the club to be turned over to the War Commission of the diocese.

Patriotic Rally—"Follow Me" was the text used by Bishop McElwain at "The Patriotic Rally for God and for Country" held at St. John's church on Wednesday evening, April 24. The Bishop urged the men of the congregation to take their full share in the diocese and made special mention of the need of more work in the rural parts of the diocese and also a great deal more work in the two large cities, Minneapolis and St. Paul.

CUBA

Large Congregations—Very large congregations attended the many services during Lent, Holy Week and Easter in Cuba, and on the Isle of Pines. Bishop Hulse conducted the Three Hours' Service at Holy Trinity cathedral, Havana, at which the attendance was greater than at any similar service during the present deanship.

Mystery Play Given—On Friday after Easter the Mystery play, "Conquering and to Conquer", by Mrs. Hobart of New York, was given in the Cathedral, under the auspices of the Bishop and the Dean, and under the direction of Mrs. R. R. Ellis and Mrs. C. C. Osborne, members of the Woman's Auxiliary of this parish.

A curtain concealed the altar and the Sanctuary, and the choir platform was extended to make a location for the play. The only scenery was that of a Cross and some potted plants. In one of the Havana papers the following notice relative to the presentation of this play appeared: "It was a profoundly solemn and impressive service, a real act of worship, and left its lesson of the power of the Christian religion upon the large congregation that filled the Cathedral to its capacity".

Chaplain Pro Tem.—It is likely that when these notes appear the Dean, the Very Rev. George B. Myers, will have taken up temporary duty among the American troops at Santiago de Cuba, as chaplain pro tem.

Mr. Decker's Work—The Rev. Mr. Decker has charge of all the work on the Island, which consists of five missions, widely scattered, to all of which he ministers at least twice every month. One of his Sunday trips necessitates a journey of about seventy miles, and there are three services and three sermons. He has also practically all the non-Roman baptisms, marriages and burials on the Island, as well as the ministrations to the sick, the needy and the afflicted.

Governor Pack, formerly of the Philippines, is living on the Isle of Pines, and he and Mr. Decker have held patriotic meetings at all the centres of population on the Island. Some time ago the Isle of Pines Appeal, a local paper, contained an item regarding conditions on the Island to the following effect: "The people on the Island have suffered in many ways; they have had their houses blown down by hurricanes, and they have had them burnt up by forest fires; they have spent days and nights in storm and stress of wind and water, and have been nearly drowned; they have lost many of their possessions, but as long as they have with them Governor Pack and the Rev. Mr. Decker, they will not worry".

In Service—About fifty young men have taken their places at the front in the great world war, and the Red Cross society of this little Island numbers more than that of Havana.

INDIANAPOLIS

Council to Meet—The Standing Committee has called the council of the diocese to assemble in the Cathedral, May 14 and 15. A diocesan dinner will follow the meetings on the night of the 15th.

German Language Unpopular—Evansville canceled the teaching of the German language in the public schools early in April; later the German language newspapers ceased to use the enemy language and on the last Sunday in April several Lutheran, Evangelical, Baptist, and Methodist Churches held their last services in the German language.

Service Flag Dedication—The Rev. A. Murray, rector of St. Paul's, Evansville, made the address at the dedication of a community service flag in Inglefield, at the Centenary Methodist church. Until about 20 years ago Trinity parish flourished in Englefield until the English colony moved to Evansville and sold their farms to the German immigrants. Since the entrance of America into the war many expressions of religious fellowship have been in evidence. Evansville has had several community services in their Coliseum. The rector of St. Paul's on a recent Sunday night preached in the General Baptist Church as an expression of sympathy for the pastor, whose wife had died suddenly a few days previous.

PITTSBURGH

All-Day Sewing—An All-Day Sewing under the auspices of the Ladies' Auxiliary of the St. Margaret Memorial Hospital took place on Tuesday, April 23, in the dispensary room. Women from most of the city and suburban parishes attended, and a great many garments were made for the use of the institution. A lunch was served by the hospital, for which visitors paid a small amount. The surplus from the luncheon and contributions from the various parishes represented by the workers paid for the material made. The Annual Commencement and Reception for the graduating nurses will take place on May 19.

Clerical Union Meets—The Pittsburgh Clerical Union held their regular monthly meeting Monday morning, April 22. There was a record attendance for the last two months. The place of meeting was Calvary Church. The essayist for the day was the Rev. R. E. Lee Strider, rector of St. Matthew's Church, Wheeling, West Virginia, who presented his essay that had already elsewhere aroused most favorable comment, the subject being "The Church, the Ministry and the New Age." Mr. Strider was received by the Clergy most enthusiastically, and his treatment of the vital subject was unusually able and created a remarkable discussion.

MONTANA

Church Consecrated—On the third Sunday after Easter Bishop Faber consecrated the Church of the Good Shepherd, Bridger, the Rev. Allen C. Prescott, missionary in charge. Through the untiring efforts of the Woman's Guild the indebtedness on the church was finally paid off.

ancellor Conducts Services—During vacancy in St. Peter's Church, Helena, services are being kept up by Mr. E. Day, chancellor of the diocese, acting lay-reader. Mr. Day is also superinding the Sunday School.

GEORGIA

ork for Soldiers—Christ church, icon, during the first part of the winter l the most enjoyable entertainments for soldiers from Camp Wheeler. These re held every Saturday night and took form of informal dancing, with light reshments. Then came the meningitis re at the camp, and the U. S. health horities closed up all meetings of this id, to avoid the threatened epidemic m the camp through the city. When the irch was allowed to resume these funcns Lent had arrived, so though the ish house was again thrown open to boys in khaki it was—at the suggestion the Rector—only to play games, hot fee and crackers being served. With ster came the dancing again, and now parish house is full every week end. e soldiers who do not dance are pertly happy and satisfied to look on and it with the church people, who bring a le touch of home to them.

At Easter a small fund was started by ne of the ladies of the parish to prole suitable cards of the season, which re given to each man who was sick in Base Hospital—between six and eight ndred. These were distributed by the fe of an officer, a Churchwoman spend; a few weeks in Macon during the time r husband was in camp. When a man sick, anything like a card, that is his n, personally, and can lie on his pillow side him, is more of a comfort than a ilian at home can possibly understand. ese souvenirs, the ladies felt, gave pleas- to the recipients far greater than their ney value and in some cases were also education, as in many of the small ces in Georgia, the Church with its cusns and traditions is hardly known. In ct the two dioceses of the state could nost be called missionary jurisdictions.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA

nvention Meets—The 102d Convention the Convocation of Southwestern Virnia was held at Amherst and Sweet Briar, ril 23-25. Twenty clergy were present. ie dean, Rev. F. H. Craighill, presided. The devotional meetings were conducted the Rev. G. Floyd Rogers. His general eme was "Religion in War Times." These etings were exceedingly helpful and nely. The congregation of Ascension urch with the visiting clergy enjoyed them eatly. Sermons were preached by Bishop icker, Tuesday, 8 p. m.; the Rev. J. B. inn, D.D., Wednesday, 8 p. m., and Misnary addresses, Thursday, 8 p. m., by r. E. C. Hughes of the Archdeaconry and e Rev. T. K. Nelson, formerly of China. On Wednesday at 11:15, the Rev. R. B. elson preached the convocation sermon, ting forth the necessity and activity of e voluntary chaplain in the camp. The actical essay was read by the Rev. W. G. cDowell, on church music. Many enred into the discussion. The theoretic say was read by the Rev. F. H. Craighill on "Psychic Evidences of Immortality." He showed much thought and reading and gave a clear exposition of the subject. Several entered into the debate.

Business meetings were held each morning and afternoon. The report of the Convocational Board of Religious Education through its chairman, the Rev. T. D. Lewis, lent special emphasis to the prospects and claims of the Summer School for Christian Workers, which is to be held in Lynchburg June 17-21. A strong faculty has been provided, and if the rectors of the Virginia parishes would co-operate, there would surely be a large attendance. The Diocesan Record, the official organ of the Diocesan Missionary Society, received cordial endorsement and commendation of the convocation.

The most important action of the convocation was a memorial to the next meeting of the Annual Council of the Diocese as to the division of the Diocese, in the following words: "Be it resolved that a committee of three, of whom the dean shall be chairman, present to next Council of Southern Virginia, a memorial from this Convocation of Southwestern Virginia, requesting that a committee be appointed to secure data and consider the feasibility and advisability of dividing the Diocese along such lines as the Council in its wisdom shall deem best." The Rev. F. H. Craighill, Wytheville; the Rev. J. B. Dunn, Lynchburg, and the Rev. J. W. C. Johnson, Roanoke, are the committee appointed.

The treasurer, the Rev. Thomas Howell, reported that with the balance at last report and receipts during the last six months his books showed $625.66, with expenditures of $455.38.

Christiansburg was chosen as the place of the next meeting. The Rev. T. G. Faulkner was chosen to preach the convocational sermon, the Rev. G. Otis Mead to read the practical essay on the subject chosen by the convocation, "Christian Unity as a Result of the War." Archdeacon E. A. Rich was appointed leader of the devotional meetings.

A most delightful event in the meeting was the visit to Sweetbriar. A business meeting was held in the college chapel. Then at 4 o'clock a reception was given the clergy at the home of the Rev. Prof. Lewis, but between the two the members of the convocation enjoyed luncheon with the faculty and students. The college looks fine and the girls happy and well. There is a delightful and wholesome atmosphere at Sweetbriar, and Miss McVea, the president, is already making a strong impression upon the general character of the institution. The members returned to Amherst late in the afternoon for the closing missionary service at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON

A Soldier's Letter—The following letter from a member of the 101st Engineers, written to his rector, the Rev. Alan McL. Taylor of the Church of the Holy Spirit, Mattapan, gives an unusually vivid account of the day-by-day life of the present members of the old "First Corps of Cadets":

"Dear Mr. Taylor: You have undoubtedly heard through some of the fellows that we are up at the front. We came up two weeks ago, and after two more weeks will go to our base for a rest. Every man is entitled to a seven-day furlough, and believe me, after five months it sure looks good to us. Am in hopes of obtaining special pass to England, and think the chances of getting it are good. The lines at this point run through a French village, or rather what used to be a village. A few walls standing grim and bare against the sky with piles of rock and debris blocking all passage is all there is left to mark the spot where there was once a thriving little village with its happy people. And looking from the hill over the valleys and hillsides one can see the fruit-trees lying as they were cut down by the enemy in his retreat. Entire orchards lying in neat rows, rotting in decay, like a regiment destroyed in formation. This is but an example of the devastation left by the invader, and coupled with things we hear makes our blood boil, and glad we are over here.

"This afternoon we had a few hours off and got a couple of teams together for a ball game. Found a dandy place for a diamond just under a battery and protected by hills and plenty of camouflage. True, there was an old trench running through it, and it had about ten good-sized shell-holes in it, but it was good enough in a pinch. It is rather disconcerting, when it is two and three on the batter, to have to run like the dickens for the dugouts, or stand still for three or four minutes until you can make out the markings on a plane, and it was rather hard on the players with two gas-masks hanging around their necks and having to duck every few minutes when we hear the whine of one of 'Fritzie's' little visitors, often just as some one had cracked out a two-bagger.

"We are living in dugouts well below the surface of the ground, and have cots and plenty of straw, so you see so far as quarters go the 'front' is not so bad. It is the first billet I've had so far in France, except one, that I've not bunked right on the floor or ground, as the case was.

"——— Must close now as my candle is almost gone. Good luck to you and best wishes to your sister and your parish.

"Sincerely,

"John Priestly."

A New Activity—The Cathedral Service Unit is establishing in the South End of Boston a "Milk Centre", where the Italian mothers who are so very numerous in this region may be taught by demonstration the value of milk as food. At present they use comparatively little and as a consequence large numbers of the children of the region are seriously undernourished. This activity will be carried on in co-operation with Lincoln House and under the general direction of the Child Welfare Department of the Boston Committee on Public Safety.

Messages From the Allies—The Boston pulpits have in the last few weeks been resounding with stirring narratives from the front and messages from well-known military and public men of the various allied nations. In the Cathedral, the latest of these speakers was an official representative of the French Government, M. Stephane Lauzanne, the editor of Le Matin, who spoke at Later Evensong in the Cathedral on the Fourth Sunday After Easter on "France Fighting for Liberty and Justice."

Sacrifice and Bravery—Trinity Church, Boston, reports that a member of the Honor Roll, Walter H. Allan, has died in France of wounds received in battle. In a letter to the rector his mother writes: "From 1639 to the present, Massachusetts has never called men to arms that my tribe has not responded. I have the memory of a boy clean, so fine, so straight, I truly believe from the day of his first Communion he sincerely tried to live a good life. Now he has given all for the right."

Nathan A. Farwell, another Trinity boy, has been awarded the "croix de guerre"

for bravery in pursuit of his duty as ambulance driver. He had been "gassed," and when he recovered consciousness in the dressing-station his first thought was of his car. Crawling on hands and knees over shell-craters he found it and, with shells falling all around him, drove it back to the French lines.

Church School Branch Meetings—The annual meetings of the various branches of the Church School Union of the diocese are now being held. An April 24 the "Norfolk Branch" met with St. John's church, Roxbury. The meeting began with a Round Table Conference led by the Diocesan Educational Secretary, the Rev. Carlton P. Mills, on "Teacher Training", laying especial emphasis on the correspondence-courses of the General Board. After supper there was a short service in the church followed by a business meeting and addresses by Miss Marian De C. Ward on the coming "Cambridge Conference" and by the Rev. John W. Suter, Jr., on "Practical Forms of Christian Service"—especially in connection with the use of the "Christian Nurture" curriculum of the General Board.

KENNETH RIPLEY FORBES.

LOS ANGELES

A Notable Dinner—A quite notable occasion in Los Angeles church circles was the 46th consecutive monthly dinner given in April by the Church Club of the diocese. At the dinner in the previous month Judge Benjamin F. Bledsoe of the United States District Court was the principal speaker, who gave a most inspiring address on "The War," the only fitting subject, at this time, in an assemblage of loyal Churchmen. His theme was "Individual Responsibility in Relation to the War"; and, after bringing this home most forcibly to his hearers, he concluded with these telling sentences:

"In this 'supreme moment of history' a few compelling questions press for immediate and satisfactory answers. Can the world live half-despotism and half-democracy? Shall mere 'blood and iron,' or shall the growing intelligence of men, direct the destinies of the race? Which shall it be—justice and right and life everlasting, or expediency and might and worse than death, as our portion?

"Are the aspirations of men to be permitted to fructify in the glorious sunlight of 'Liberty under Law,' or are they to be buried forever beneath an all-embracing avalanche of 'ruthlessness' and 'frightfulness'?

"At the fiat of so-called 'kultur' are honor and chivalry and adherence to age-old and almost world-wide canons of national and individual conduct to be consigned to the scrap heap?

"Did God Almighty create this world that it might be exploited by the few or that it might be enjoyed by the many?

"Shall we continue to worship the God of Abraham, of Isaac and of Jacob, or shall we deliberately determine to pay homage to the Moloch of Potsdam?"

Judge Bledsoe expressed the conviction that America would not fail to answer these questions as they should be answered, and with an emphasis that would permit no misunderstanding.

This was appropriately followed up, on the present occasion, by two addresses which gave luminous information as to what the Church is preparing to do, and as to what the Nation has done and is doing, in the endeavor to win the war and give the right answer to these questions.

Mr. B. F. Finney, Chief Secretary of the Army and Navy Department of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, was present and stated what the Brotherhood was undertaking to do in association with Y. M. C. A.

He mentioned the following as being in charge of the Brotherhood work in the various camps on the Pacific Coast: E. D. Williams at Camp Fremont, Palo Alto, California; W. C. Harvey at Camp Lewis, American Lake, Washington; Fred T. Foster in charge of camps around San Francisco Bay; J. A. Birmingham in charge of camps around San Diego, California; and Charles Miller as having offered his services, to be stationed at whatever point to which the Brotherhood shall assign him.

In these camps the most cordial co-operation exists between the Brotherhood and the Y. M. C. A., the former giving more especial attention to the spiritual, the latter to the social, needs and well-being of the enlisted men.

Dean MacCormack of St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, Los Angeles, gave the principal address and spoke on the subject, "The Churchman in Relation to the War".

He called attention to the large proportion of Churchmen, both in England and Canada, of those who had enlisted for the war, and stated his conviction that it was a signal honor even to be a member of the Anglican Communion at this great crisis in the history of the world. Loyalty, self-sacrifice and the determination to win—in the face of all obstacles, even of defeats—he instanced as typical of the vast armies of Churchmen who have been at the front waging the war for liberty and righteousness. He urged the necessity, on the part of the great "civilian army" of Churchmen who, back of the lines, are engaged in the war, of an equal exercise of these necessary traits; that we, too, must be characterized by the same spirit of loyalty, self-sacrifice and courage as are those who are fighting our battles for us at the front. Not only on the military armies but equally on the civilian armies which support them—of which we form a part—does the victory for liberty depend. Herein we must comport ourselves as Churchmen, full of loyalty, self-sacrifice and courage—that we, who "tarry by the staff," may not be unworthy of the assured fruits of victory.

As the hands of Moses were upheld by Aaron and Hur, the priesthood and the laity, and Israel prevailed; so let the whole Church unite, both clergy and people, in prayer for those, our vanguard, who are "going over the top"—the great civilian army of the Nation for the military army at the front, and the spiritual Israel will come out victorious and the faith of Christendom be saved.

The Rev. W. T. Allan, D. priest in charge, reports heavy losses both places from removals and going to war. At Coleman the loss amounted thirty-three percent. There is no mate in the church from which to draw can dates for Confirmation; and the unic feature of both these classes was that of the nine confirmed only one was fr a Church family. Eight were from Baptist, Methodist, Presbyterian and L theran churches, and six of them w heads of families. It should be stated h that for fifteen years both Coleman a Ballinger had only occasional Church m istrations, and whole families lapsed other religious bodies.

Why Not a Few Men?

To the Editor of The Churchman:

Are laymen wanted at the various Summer Conferences for Church Workers? This question is prompted by a perusal of the programs and registration blanks recently issued in connection with two such Conferences. The program of the Cambridge Conference includes six courses on "Missions", all of them adapted to and needed by laymen. Every one of them is taught by a woman. These women, it is true, are among the ablest leaders in the Church; but men simply will not, as a rule, attend classes led by women. The same is true of the Racine Conference—three courses on "Missions", all led by women. Incidentally, the secretary of each of these Conferences is a woman, and all correspondence is to be addressed to her. This seems to emphasize the apparently feminine personnel of the Conferences. More striking still, however, is the fact that in the case of both Conferences mentioned the registration slips accompanying the programs provide a blank space for the name of the registrant, with the direction "Given name (Prefix Rev., Miss, etc.)". Apparently no "Mr." need apply. All this is rather discouraging to a layman who spends much of his time in trying to induce other laymen to attend the Summer Conferences, and join in a study of the Church's Mission.

Mr. Urban's Resignation

To the Editor of The Churchman:

The newspapers have published such false reports about my dear friend, the Rev. Leigh R. Urban, rector of the Church of the Redeemer, Astoria, that I write to you in order to have the truth stated. Perhaps you will publish this letter the more readily since, much as I hate and deplore war, I am not a pacifist.

On the night of Saturday, April 13, some boys broke into the Church of the Redeemer and hung an American flag in the church. After the early service of the next day, Mr. Urban, in the presence of a vestryman and another man, took down the flag carefully and put it away. Both these men testify that there was not the slightest disrespect shown to the flag. As a matter of fact, to show that Mr. Urban has only honor and regard for the national standard, for some time past two flags have been and are now displayed in the parish house. If one of the Jackies on an American man-of-war displayed our flag where he thought it would "look nice", his commanding officer would order it down with scant ceremony and probably put the Jacky in solitary confinement for a while to meditate on "law and order" and "obedience". It is truly said in the Astoria parish now that such treatment would be exceedingly beneficial for those boys. The canons of our Church give the rector authority in his church such as the State gives a commanding officer on shipboard. And the Vestry of the Church of the Reedemer bore witness to that authority and upheld their rector in exercising it.

Now Mr. Urban is a sincere and convinced pacifist. He is not pro-German in his sympathies, he is not disloyal to the United States. But, unlike some pacifists, who are now hiding their light discreetly under a bushel, he sticks to his colors—without making a martyr of himself or rushing into print. Mischief-mongers, however, did rush into print with the result that the newspapers learned of the incident and made a regular penny-thriller of it for several days. Over these reports both the Vestry and the Parish were incensed. Mr. Urban renewed his offer to resign, an offer first made some months ago when he found that the Vestry did not sympathize with his position on the matter of pacifism. That offer they have now thought best to accept, although with genuine regret, realizing that their Rector is a hero of the moral and spiritual life.

Last Sunday (April 21) at the mid-day Celebration of the Holy Eucharist (a wonderfully beautiful and reverent service) the Clerk of the Parish read a statement in which the Vestry testified to their regard for Mr. Urban and bore witness to the facts (1) that never once since the Nation declared war had he spoken of the war controversially in the pulpit; (2) that he had not taken part in any pacifist propaganda; (3) that he had at every service read prayers for those at war and for peace; (4) that he had spoken with great sympathy and regard for one of the parish who had been killed in the service.

What then is the offense of the Rev. Mr. Urban? What indeed!

Another Tune for Battle Hymn

To the Editor of The Churchman:

Those desiring to promote the cause of good Church music in this country and also to raise the standard of our national music from its present condition of deplorable inanity can ill afford to disregard an "old new tune" to Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic". I refer to that melody which was sung at the last meeting of the Night Watchers' Association in New York some forty years ago; forgotten in the interim, resurrected recently by Mr. M. C. Coggeshall of Summit, N. J., and printed in the Outlook for Jan. 23 with an original harmonization.

The minor key in which this version is written emphasizes the dire earnestness of the "terrible swift sword" we are trying to draw in our present national crisis. One might well imagine our khaki-clad men steadily "marching — marching — marching" to the dogged rhythm of a tune partly McDowell-ish, partly plain song, wholly martial, with that indefinable touch of Heaven and hell, which always sends the shivers through one's spine and prompts one to shout exultingly: "O, Death, where is thy sting?"

To the composer who had the sense to read between the lines and write a fitting accompaniment to this melody is due a large share of praise. There is too much musical tinsel and pink drapery in our churches today, and most gratifying it is when one runs across the pure gold of the diapason tone amongst the gaudy dross.

Regarding this quite remarkable find I would plagiarize a well-known music store custom and say to every organist: "Try this over on your organ, your choir, and your congregation—and then see!"

Good Friday Collect

To the Editor of The Churchman:

I have read with great interest and hearty agreement your editorial note on the above subject, but I should like to inquire, owing to my ignorance, whether your Prayer Book has any other petition on behalf of the Jews. Our proposed Canadian Revised Prayer Book makes a suitable alteration in the wording of the Collect, but retains the reference to the Jews in this way:

> "Have mercy upon the Jews, thine ancient people, and upon all who reject and deny thy Son".

I venture to think, that either here or elsewhere we should still continue to pray for the Jews, although, as you rightly point out, avoiding any such association with "Turks" and "infidels" as our present Collect shows. Your proposed revision is also good in speaking of "one flock", rather than, as in our book, "one fold". The former is obviously truer both to Scripture and to actual fact.

Our Clumsy Methods

To the Editor of The Churchman:

There is a decidedly discouraging outlook in regard to an adequate supply of clergy in the near future. The subject is a very large one and has many sides to it. First, the Church must have a better method of handling her clergy. In this we can learn much from the Methodists, where no minister able to do work is without it and no congregations without a pastor. Our method is clumsy, ineffective and has disastrous results for the Church. One can well wonder that the Church grows at all. A bishop only rarely has a sense of responsibility for his clergy and when one does not meet his requirements "scraps" him and gets some one else—if he can.

I have no doubt that there are priests who are doing work as professors or instructors in colleges who would be glad to render service to the Church, but will not under our ineffective system.

Then again have our bishops done what they could to arouse the attention of the young men of the Church to a need of their consecrating themselves to that work? In a ministry of a quarter of a century I have heard many sermons by bishops and not one even touched upon this great need of the Church. There is not lacking a willingness, but it is latent. It is like patriotism. When there is no danger patriotism seems lacking, but when danger threatens there is a tremendous amount of it. If our chief pastors would lead in this matter men would volunteer for this great, heroic warfare.

New Books on the War

War Philosophy

THE SOUL OF DEMOCRACY. By Edward Howard Griggs. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1918. $1.25.

"The philosophy of the world war in relation to human liberty" is the subtitle of this study in twenty-two chapters of the respective values of democracy and paternalism, for efficiency, invention, endurance and welfare and progress of humanity. Written in popular style it is a book that will gratify the humanist and its ethical emphasis as far as it goes will add to the interest that the fine style of the work will create. But as a satisfactory interpretation of the philosophy of the war and as an exposition of the soul of democracy the book hardly reaches those realities that alone account for both democracy and soul. While holding that our slowness in applying to the social group the moral standards recognized as binding on the individual has retarded progress, and while regretting man's limited sympathy and imperfect application of principles, he holds that moral standards are absolute and unchangeable. For these reasons he calls for more education and seems to think that the most praiseworthy education is not creative but applied ability. He urges education for humanity, but does not say why for humanity. Sometimes Dr. Griggs grows dogmatic as when he says that the war has created a reversion to the narrower creeds. Perhaps after all the fault is in the title and not in the book, for if the title had promised less we would have enjoyed the essays immensely and not asked of them a clear philosophy of the war and a revelation of the soul of democracy. Serbia Crucified

SERBIA CRUCIFIED. By Lieutenant Milutin Krunich. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Company. 1918. $1.50.

We have been accustomed, we who do not know, to think of Serbia as a land of stubborn peasants, men who live harshly and fight fiercely. The author of this striking book reveals another Serbia—a country of romance, poetry and song, blessed abundantly in resources both of the heart and nature. The story of Serbia's terrible suffering is so moving as to stir afresh our sympathies for the agony which Germany has brought upon this innocent people. It is indeed a heart-rending tale to hear, but we have no right to spare ourselves such knowledge, especially if it can impel us to new efforts towards alleviating the suffering of our brothers across the sea.

We quote only one of the many stirring narratives of this powerful book: "While I was lying on this height of Dobra-Glava, in a sea of sunshine and air, I looked around me, and the objects aroused my thoughts. Strange thing, this life. There is something wrong in it! These hills and valleys are quite the same as those over the boundary. The chain of Strashna-Chooka, which reaches far, far into Bulgaria, is just the same as here. This valley runs toward the blue horizon, like a river, always the same: the same air, the same houses, the same men who speak quite the same language, the same sun, the same sky, the same God, and yet there, as here, the trenches are growing with strange rapidity. Man before man, neighbor and brother, are standing and looking upon each other shivering with hatred. From that side there, which is the same as this side here, death is coming! Why? Because there is a German nobleman 'Tsar'. Because he is a member of a certain group of men (with a sounding name, nobility or aristocracy) who, through the centuries, have held the nations in slavery and have 'ruled'." W. A. S.

Religion Over There

VISIONS AND VIGNETTES OF WAR. By Maurice Ponsonby. New York: Longmans Green & Company. 1918. $1.00.

CHRIST AND THE WORLD AT WAR. Edited by Basil Mathews. James Clark & Company and Pilgrim Press. 1918. $1.00.

Chaplain Ponsonby reflects the visions and impressions of life and glimpses of reality that a man has "over there" under the war banners and in the thick of battling lines.

Mr. Mathews offers twelve sermons by great English preachers who reflect the effect of the war on the religious thought and feeling of those of a warring nation who are doing "their bit" at home.

What Ponsonby says about charms, myths, church unity and division, discipline and the religion of cowards are like flashes of light that will show the paths of faith to the man groping in darkness or feeling for light.

What the noted preachers say will perhaps please Dr. Odell though the sermons are a little heavier and more theological and some may say more religious than our American war sermons as reported in the Eagle and other metropolitan papers.

Both books get behind the issues and bring into prominence those fundamentals that lie at the base of the citadel of the true Christian civilization that we all hope will be the outcome of this day of world remaking. A. L. M.

For Soldiers' Mothers

LETTERS TO THE MOTHER OF A SOLDIER. By Richardson Wright. New York: Frederick A. Stokes Company. 1918. $1.00.

You read these Letters of an elder brother to a sister with a boy in the service, then you read them again. After which you immediately send this hand book of courage to some mother for whom you are quite sure it was especially written. Whoever can bring the million of mothers in the country to see just what are the actual conditions amid which their boys are living and what they must do at home to help those who are at the front, will place us all under deep obligation. Multitudes of mothers are craving the comfort and assurance that all is well with their boys. They long also for the companionship and courage which comes from bearing a common burden for a common cause. Fears and doubts are clutching at their hearts. They need the stimulus of an unfailing belief in the righteousness of our cause. All this and more Mr. Wright's Letters combine, making a veritable "mother's manual of arms". He has done a clever bit of writing, bringing into a small compass a variety of things, practical advice, homely comfort and useful information. The temptation is strong to freely quote phrases and paragraphs, for there are some, unusually striking and original, which linger long after the first reading because of their tonic effect. R. P. K.

Chivalry in the 20th Century

WONDERFUL STORIES: WINNING THE V. C. IN THE GREAT WAR. New York: E. P. Dutton & Company. 1918. $2.50.

If the daily reports of the Great Drive do not seem to bring home what the American troops are passing through, here are tales of heroism that match and even outthrill the stories of early pioneer days of our own history. No longer need there be any question of the modern brand of heroism and bravery. The English soldiers have exhibited in the past month both to an exalted degree. They did the same in the first year of the war.

The Victoria Cross, that much coveted piece of metal, no doubt came to many a man as a great surprise. "Most conspicuous bravery" was not in his calculations. Incident after incident, taken from official reports, unvarnished by unnecessary description, speak loudly of an extraordinary endurance and loftiness of spirit.

Fifty-six full page illustrations, especially painted by selected artists, give a vivid realism to the tales which cover all fronts, East and West, and exploits on both land and sea. R. P. K.

An American Over There

OVER THERE AND BACK. By Lieutenant J. S. Smith, U. S. A. E. P. Dutton & Company. 1918. $1.50.

When a man's soul is really touched by some great truth he gives his soul to it and sinks his personality that the larger thing may have his best. Lieutenant Smith saw the larger meaning of the war and has written a story that is different from most of the war narratives. He has fought the Boche in three uniforms, the Canadian, the English and now the American. Though he has seen so much he keeps himself in the background of his captivating story. He succeeds in this, perhaps, because he has seen so much that he has caught the larger vision of things. His imagination is like a camera and his intuition flashes forth the significance of events with a realism that rings true. When J. S. Smith wrote Trench Warfare he gave promise of writing the kind of book we have all been looking for—a book that would feel the sweep of the larger things and still be personal enough to be real without being too autobiographical—and here it is. When you read it you will wish your boy had read it before he went "over there" and you will be glad you have read it because your boy is "over there".

German Atrocities

GERMAN ATROCITIES. By Newell Dwight Hillis. New York: Fleming H. Revell, $1.00 net.

"Heinous crime" is the dictionary's definition of atrocity and heinous is from the German and so are these brutal, devilish, cruel horrors perpetrated against fair France and brave Belgium, described here by a great artist of language whose incisive statement of the nature and philosophy of German atrocities is supported by affidavits, photographs and diaries that stir the reader to patriotic action in the name of humanity.

The Leadership of the Church

The opportunity before the Christian churches in this country is almost startlingly plain. The allied nations are rapidly subordinating their individual policies to the necessity of defeating the Teutonic powers. There is now a Generalissimo on the front, a brilliant French General. All the armies are one army under his direction. We can no longer speak of the front as British, French or Italian. From the Adriatic to the Channel runs the front of the free nations united as one nation. This is the greatest event of the year in the war. To recognize this and to interpret it is the duty of the Church today. We are called as Christians not simply to exhort our men to fight for their country or their parents to give their sons willingly in our country's defense. We must make plain the unity of the nations in a spiritual purpose. We must rally our people to toil and give and sacrifice for the end toward which all free peoples are struggling. We must let our Allies speak from our pulpits of their own interpretation of the common purpose and their own contribution to the victory that must come. We must remember in our public prayer the soldiers of the nations with whom we are allied as well as our own men, the sorrow of those at home in our sister nations as in our own land. If the Churches will take this God-given opportunity to make evident the common purpose, to weld the nations into a spiritual unity behind and beneath the unity of military command, they will hasten the coming of a better world, not only after the war but even now in the midst of war. The order of our ecclesiastical procession will then be a true symbol. The Cross will lead the allied flags to the victory of righteousness.—Dean Rousmaniere.

Books for Women Citizens

Never was the responsibility of women to safeguard the interests of women wage-earners so great as at this critical hour. Because not only women in industry, but the whole woman life of the country is being affected by the world war, industrial problems are of vital importance to womankind everywhere.

The following excellent list of books, a number of which have been from time to time reviewed in these columns, has been compiled by the Y. W. C. A. for the use of women citizens:

Women and War Work, Fraser; Young Woman Worker, Laselle; American Labor Unions, Marot; Woman in Modern Society, Barnes; Women's Work in Municipalities, Beard; Woman and Labor, Shreiner; Every Day Business for Women, Wilbur; The Future of the Working Classes, Babson; New Industrial Day, Redfield; Women Workers and Society, Maclean; Trade Union Woman, Henry; American Women and the World War, Clark; The Ambitious Woman in Business, Gilbert; Women and the Trades, Butler; The Middle West Side and Mothers Who Must Earn, Cartwright; Women in the Bookbinding Trade, Van Kleeck; Artificial Flower Makers, Van Kleeck; Welfare Work, Proud; Fatigue and Efficiency, Goldmark; Modern Industry, Kelley; Women in Modern Industry, Hutchins; New Ideals in Business, Tarbell; A Seasonal Industry (Millinery Trade in N. Y.), Van Kleeck; Women as Munition Makers, Hewes; Munition Workers in England and France, Walter; The Great Society, Wallas; The Labor Movement, Ward; Christianizing the Social Order, Rauschenbusch.

Remarkable Linen Chest for Cuban Palace

Persons who live in New York City are fortunate in having an opportunity to observe a wonderful display of linens in the windows of James McCutcheon & Company on Fifth Avenue, a truly impressive display of the principal items in the Cuban "Linen Chest".

The Cuban Coat-of-Arms Reproduced in Embroidery

It consists of over 5,000 pieces, the tonal value of which is considerably enhanced by the present very critical conditions in the linen trade. The linens are intended for the new Palacio Presidencial at Havana, for the complete furnishing of which the Tiffany Studios have the contract. This presidential palace is to be the "White House" of the Cuban Republic, and has, in all, seventy-five rooms.

The most important room in which linens are required is the State dining-room. On state occasions a table five and a half feet wide and fifty feet long is used. Between meals it is covered with a beautiful lace set consisting of two scarfs, each fifty-two by eighty inches, and a centrepiece to match, fifty-two inches in diameter. At one end of each scarf, and at opposite edges of the centrepiece, the full Cuban Coat of Arms is to be embroidered. This lace set is being made to order in Italy.

All dinner-cloths for the private dining-room, with napkins in dinner-size and a good many in the smaller breakfast-sizes in designs to match, are to be embroidered with the full Cuban Arms.

Incidental to the main linen supplies for the two dining-rooms there are included in the assortment doilies, hemstitched napkins fifteen inches square, fifteen-inch lace napkins, and two beautiful lace luncheon sets made in Italy, consisting of two dozen six-inch finger-bowl doilies, two dozen oblong plate-doilies, two dozen twenty-inch napkins, and three twenty-eight by sixty-seven-inch oblong runners—a total of seventy-five pieces in each set.

The dinner-cloths and the napkins are of the finest hand-made Irish damask. The designs for the State dining-room include plain satin, satin stripes, and Louis XV. For the Private dining-room the designs include plain satin striped, Pompeian scroll and vase, and a very handsome poppy design in which the poppies grow up from the border and spread out on the table, the centre being plain. The supplies for other parts of the palace are equally elaborate.

Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co.

Atlantic Building 51 Wall Street New York

Insures against Marine and Inland Transportation Risk and will issue policies making loss payable in Europe and Oriental countries.

Chartered by the State of New York in 1842, was preceded by a stock company of a similar name. The latter company was liquidated and part of its capital, to the extent of $100,000, was used, with consent of the stockholders, by the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and repaid with a bonus and interest at the expiration of two years.

During its existence the company has insured property to the value of $30,949,773,989.00. Received premiums thereon to the extent of $312,671,550.90. Paid losses during that period $152,928,388.68. Issued certificates of profits to dealers $96,523,710.00. Of which there have been redeemed $90,801,110.00. Leaving outstanding at present time $5,722,600,00. Interest paid on certificates amounts to $24,494,668.95. On December 31, 1917, the assets of the company amounted to $18,041,890.25.

The profits of the company revert to the assured and are divided annually upon the premiums terminated during the year, thereby reducing the cost of insurance.

For such dividends, certificates are issued subject to dividends or interest until ordered to be redeemed, in accordance with the charter.

"And with the morn those angel faces smile,
Which I have loved long since, and lost awhile."

The Rev. Dr. Frank Page, formerly rector of St. John's Church, Brooklyn, and more recently rector of Zion Church, Fairfax, Virginia, died there in the early morning of April 18.

Dr. Page was a son of the late Major and Mrs. John Page of Hanover County, Virginia, and was a brother of Thomas Nelson Page, United States Ambassador to Italy, and Rosewell Page, second auditor of Virginia. He graduated from Washington College at Lexington, Virginia, when General Robert E. Lee was its president, and later entered the Theological Seminary of Virginia, from which he graduated in 1878. While in Brooklyn he became a close friend of the late William L. Gaynor, Mayor of New York.

Dr. Page was a man of rugged strength, of fine sincerity, of wide sympathies and generous impulses. He loved to preach and was always interesting and fresh and unconventional as a preacher, but his best sermon was ever his own sincere, consistent and godly Christian life.

Washington and Lee University, where he had sat at the feet of the immortal Lee, made him a Doctor of Divinity. To his friends he remained always the same simple, loyal and lovable man. In many ways his life was an ideal life of devoted, unself-seeking ministry, commending ever the Master who in early manhood had said to him, "Feed my sheep, tend my lambs", and drawing men to goodness and to Christ by the compulsion of his own fine character.

ORDINATION

Mr. Harry E. Rahming, who has finishe a post-graduate year at the General Theo logical Seminary, was ordained to the Diac onate by the Bishop of Rhode Island a the Church of the Epiphany, Providenc R. I., on St. Mark's Day. The preache was the Rev. Frank T. Hallett. The pre senter was the Rev. Henry Bassett, recto of the parish, where the candidate ha grown up. Mr. Rahming is the second co ored clergyman to be ordained in the dio cese, the first of whom, the Rev. P. G Moore-Browne, read the litany on this oc casion. He is to take charge of St. Augus tine's church, Kansas City, Missouri.

GREAT DISSATISFACTION WITH THE PENSION FUN

the aged and disabled clergy and their dependents, who became such before March 1, 1917.

Inasmuch as it declared $5,000,000 to be sufficient to provide for the accrued liabilities of the then active clergy and did so after figuring on the problem for the space of two years with the assistance of the best actuarial brains in this country, and inasmuch as it actually received $3,750,000 in excess of the $5,000,000 asked for, an explanation at least is in order and is the just right of contributors to the fund.

We gave our money with the understanding that all dependent clergy of the Church would be provided for; and if all of them are not provided for by this Pension Fund Commission, there is no other source from which any of them can look for relief.

DR. SLATTERY DECIDES NOT TO GO TO WESTERN FRON

town three times, but only to do duties which I was pledged and then to return h the first and quickest train. There was n virtue in this. It is what any man wou have done under the circumstances. I ha wondered whether it would be the best u of material to take a man from a task whe he is trained to work rapidly (so long as th work he is doing must be done in some wa by some one), and use up two or three be ter men in learning to cover the san ground, while he goes to a new task. It w a question I had to answer for myself.

"Then there was something more. Ne month, having lost (by his call to a lar Western parish) the Vicar, we begin a ne order at Grace Chapel. The Italian work growing, and the work among the peop from Germany and their descendants is st strong. Of the 139 men from the Chap gregation now in the National Service represent the older German congregan. The families of these men are loyal l true, and we show them day by day w deeply we believe in their heroism l fidelity. One German mother came to last week to tell me that her son was the American army, her two nephews in German army. The tears were streamdown her cheeks. When we are thinkof the people who need our best serv, I am inclined to think the patriotic ed is greater in our East Side homes than the trenches where the sons of these mes are fighting. In the trenches there the relief of action; here there is the ony of the unceasing anxiety and grim agination. The sons must get letters om home which give them confidence and rage. I wondered whether I had the ht to go thousands of miles away from se members of my parish when they re adjusting themselves to new condins in the parochial life. At best I can only a fraction of what as their rector ught to do for them.

'Then in the Parish Church there is the storal relationship which has grown up in se eight years of our life and work to-her. Dr. Huntington bequeathed to me old-fashioned parish. Someone said ce, 'Dr. Huntington goes up and down w York as if it were the village of Had-: he goes to see the people.' I have ed to keep the parish what he left it, with close pastoral relationship. You have lped and guided me more than I have er helped and guided you. I have cut self up into very small fragments in my orts to serve you, and for each I have en able to do only a very little. But you ve at least known that I care. And now om almost every pew there has gone a , a brother, a husband. If I could serve m best by going to France I should go. But ave a sacred memory of a certain charge ich has come from one and another these men, sometimes definitely spoken, metimes only intimated by a glance: it is charge that I look out for the one who es most and who must stay at home. I ow the anxiety that is in your hearts. I ve said again and again that the greatest roes are those who send with an unutterle love from their homes those who go. have wondered if I appeared in France fore one of these men, I should not find ook of reproach with the question, 'When l you last see my mother, my father, my fe?' It is not that one is anyone in parular, but in a parish like this a pastor is owed to bring in one way or another the niliar sense of ownership; a pastor can least try to follow in the steps of the od Shepherd, whose sheep know His ice.

'And so I knew that for the present at st I must stay here. This summer we all be scattered, but, whether I am in w York or not, at all times I shall be thin easy call of you, and if I can serve u in any way you need only tell me, and shall come as quickly as I may. It is a rd summer that is before us all, and you make my decision seem the more necesy and the more right because you let do what I can.

'I have never spoken so personally in a mon before, and I think I never shall ain. You will forgive me."

WE OBJECT TO CONFISCATION

By IRVIN S. COBB

IN writing this brief statement I am actuated, I confess, in part by personal, and therefore selfish motives. Practically to an exclusive extent I earn my living by writing for magazines. If the increase in second class postal rates provided by Congress is permitted to stand without modification or amendment, a very considerable number of the magazines printed in the United States will be put out of business—and incidentally I shall be put out of business.

Aside, however, from the purely personal view of the proposition, I wish to set forth the following facts:

To begin with, the writers of America as individuals, and as a class, are doing as much as any other group of citizens of similar size, and similar scope of influence, to uphold the hands of our Government and to strengthen the arms of our soldiers and sailors in the present crisis. The same, I maintain, is true of the owners and publishers of American periodicals. All of us, writers and publishers alike, are willing, and more than willing, to bear our fair share of the burden—financial and otherwise—necessitated by a condition of war.

But a law which increases second class postal rates from FIFTY TO NINE HUNDRED PER CENT. through a "zone" system on national periodicals circulated in this country and its possessions amounts to confiscation and destruction. A Commission appointed by Congress has already pronounced against such a policy. The allied printing trades and organized labor, of which the printing trades are a part, have protested, along with the publishers themselves, against a regulation which not only will cripple one of the greatest industries in America—and certainly the greatest force for popular education and entertainment that we have—but will, in the case of a vast number of worthy and patriotic periodicals, result in absolute ruin to their properties. As an individual writer, and as a member of The Authors' League of America, I desire to join in this chorus of protest.

Surely, never before in the history of our country has there been a time when the need for a widespread dissemination of information regarding the motives which have prompted the United States to enter the war, was greater than at this moment! The bulk of the American people depend upon the periodical for knowledge of current events.

I maintain that neither publishers nor writers will object to legislation which will put upon the periodical publishers, and incidentally the writers, an equitable share of the burden of taxation necessary to carry the war to a successful conclusion. What we do object to is confiscation. This postal "zone" law must be repealed—every reader should write to the Congressman and Senator of his State in protest.

The Churchman's contributors include not only the ablest thinkers among Churchmen but also the best secular writers.

Our Contributors

The Rev. George Herbert Toop, D.D., the first part of whose paper Together appears this week, is the rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Philadelphia.

Margaretta Byrde is an English Churchwoman who has been introduced to THE CHURCHMAN through Bishop Thomas of Wyoming. London's Passiontide is the first of the occasional papers we hope to receive from her.

Arthur Wallace Peach, a frequent contributor, has a quatrain called Pathways in this issue.

The Rev. Selden Peabody Delany, D.D., the author of A Plea for Tolerance, is the editor of The American Church Monthly and one of the staff of the Church of St. Mary the Virgin, New York City.

Things in General

THE Forum at the Church of the Ascension, New York City, is pretty sure not to have any interference from the Committee on Public Information. Mr. Creel, during his lively three hours at the Forum last Sunday night, said: "I consider Dr. Grant's Forum one of the most constructive forces of democracy we have in this country."

It looks as though we were reverting to a good old custom observed by the English Church. Sunday, May 12, was appointed "Mother Sunday" by the Federal Council of Churches. Signs in the florist's windows reminded the passerby that a white flower shows regard for the absent mother, and the publisher of The Mother of a Soldier gently insinuated that the parson would find therein an excellent text for his Mother Sunday sermon.

To observe this festival is a beautiful custom and one well worth reviving. But why change the date? Mid-Lent Sunday has been Mothering-Sunday since the days when apprentices went "a-mothering" and brought home the posy the modern youth is asked to wear in his button-hole.

Bishop Hunting, writing to a friend, April 24, says: "I start on my annual auto trip to the out-of-the-way places tomorrow. So out of the way, some of them, that I have never been to them, nor have any of my Episcopal predecessors. If you never hear from me again you might send a miner to dig me out of the sand, or a diver to find me in some river I will try to cross. I will cover about 2,000 miles, and over Nevada roads that is 'going some, believe me'."

The Gift of Tongues

THERE is only one way in which, as it seems to us, the Church can go far wrong either in its eagerness to keep pace with the spirit of the age or in its solicitude for conserving the best of the past—it can fail of the spirit of love and fellowship in attacking the problems of our common life today. Each age, under the guidance of the Spirit, can do only its own work and that, at best, only partially. Men with love in their hearts, the love of God and the love of their neighbors, can carry with confidence both the heritage handed on from other ages and their responsibility to the present. If we have that love we shall not be very anxious about our inability to express the whole mind of God, and we need not worry about making irreparable mistakes. The grave danger is not that we do something hasty in our loving zeal but that in our callousness and coldness of spirit we do nothing at all.

The ecclesiastical mind usually errs by substituting police duty for religion. He is so afraid that if he isn't on his guard something will happen to his precious heritage that he has little energy and enthusiasm left for adding his mite to the growing Kingdom. This temperament has made its valuable contributions. It is never flighty or impulsive; neither is it inspiring or creative. There are times, however, when daring imagination is needed more than timid counsel and restraint.

In all our programs of reconstruction we shall be pretty certain that we are working under the guidance of the Holy Spirit if our consciences are inspired by generous sympathies, humility and love. We are not in a mood to begin our program and we shall never find the implements to carry it through unless there is pulsing through our hearts a genuine Christlike love and an understanding of our fellowmen. Without that fellowship the Holy Spirit can find no common tongue in which to guide our counsels.

Whatever else the gift of tongues may have meant, it did mean this loving commerce of the spirit. Religion is the only universal tongue because its language is the language of love. Does not this suggest the cause of the cold individualism and leanness of spirit of the age terminated by the beginning of the great war? No group of men seemed to understand any other group. It was difficult for members of the same family to speak a common tongue. They were divided in their thoughts and sympathies. Even in the Church the sordidness of our industrial age destroyed by class distinctions any community of spirit. What happened was not unlike the catastrophe of Babel. We builded and builded with brick and mortar under the delusion that we could get to heaven by our cleverness. But instead of getting near to God, we got so far away from one another that no one could understand anybody else. Our brilliant programs ended in confusion and anarchy.

If after the war we are to make this world a fit place for Christians to live in it will not be an added measure of brain power that we shall need but more fellowship. The Church must pray for the gift of speaking in a common tongue so that all sorts and conditions of men may tell their wants and yearnings and know that they will be understood. How many more generations will the Church be given in which to learn this essential of Christianity? It is the most evident requirement of the Gospel. The distressing thing is that men and women today disavowing any Church allegiance see this and are receiving of God the gift to speak in a common tongue to the heart of the race. They are dreaming the dreams that ought long ago have been ours. They are speaking words that win their way into the troubled heart of the world at this hour. This is sure evidence that the Holy Spirit has given them the gift of tongues.

More and more the signs of the times point to the fact that the language of the Christianity of the new era is being learned and spoken today among the seething masses of common people throughout the world. The Russian peasant is uttering its first syllables; plain folk everywhere are finding communion in a common hope. We must not forget that the speech of Christianity was first learned by the disfranchised of earth; it was artisans, fishermen and peasants of a dying civilization who taught the world the language of Christ. Is it unlikely that they will restore to us the gift of tongues?

But before we can win the world to the lordship of Christ, we ourselves must learn the language of democracy. We have not yet learned that tongue. We speak the language of a class. The anxious problem for Churchmen is whether in the soil that is ready the good seed shall be sown by alien hands. God, we suspect, has other means of looking after his own than apostolic succession. Narrow Churchmen have too often erred in thinking that the gift of tongues meant merely inspiration to an infallible theology and an ecclesiastical endowment of privileged grace. It was, we suspect, a gift to the Christian heart. The Holy Spirit is doing His work at this hour hither and yon among groups of eager men. We see His working in politics, industrialism and in international brotherhoods. The Church of Christ must learn this new tongue that is being spoken in the streets of the world. There are signs that again Christianity will be revealed to the world not by theologians and prelates and rulers, but by babes and sucklings, the untutored and the poor. Christ, not the pharisee or scribe or priest of His time, spoke the universal language of the Spirit. His Church has need at this hour fervently to pray for this gift.

Towards Christian Unity

WE are publishing in full in this number of THE CHURCHMAN the Second Ad Interim Report of a sub-committee appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York's committee and by representatives of the English Free Church Committee in connection with the proposed world conference on Faith and Order.

It is a long report but it is well worth a conscientious reading here in America because of the spirit of humility and Christian love in which it is conceived.

We have not been prepared from our knowledge hitherto of the stiff Anglican attitude toward nonconformity for the conciliatory and hopeful mood of this report. Our own Church in this country has something to learn of the language of courtesy if it is to enter into any constructive fellowship with sister Churches.

We had not looked to the prelates of the English Church to teach us that language. The report of the subcommittee appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York's committee reveals by contrast our lack. We hope that our readers will give the report a careful reading.

A Leakage In Man Power

ONE way to conserve our man power is to let our Eastern parishes create their own missionary enthusiasm and thereby permit the missionary to spend more of his time in his jurisdiction. Every missionary bishop is short of men. His missionaries need his help; his jurisdiction needs his leadership. He can be saved the fatigue and loss of time which he now undergoes in traveling about the East to stir up our churches to do their utmost for missions. He has done this with great financial profit to his work. But preaching the cause of missions in a parish is, after all, the rector's business.

Generally speaking, the rector of a parish, if he has the missionary facts at his tongue's end, can preach as good a missionary sermon to his people as can a visiting missionary. Because the rector knows his people the missionary sermon becomes an integral part of his whole teaching. The chief reason, we believe, that the rector so often urges the visit of a missionary to make the annual appeal for missions is that the rector's program is so congested with work that he welcomes the assistance of a missionary expert in meeting the apportionments. Our Episcopal churches from Advent to Easter are getting pretty much into the condition of the railroads when the Fuel Administrator bade us pause for five days to give the necessaries right of way. It is natural that the rector should ask the specialist, armed with facts, to come into his parish to stir up interest in missions. No one can blame the rector and surely no one can blame the missionary; but the system is wasteful. The Church Missions House can furnish missionary information. It has such information ready for mailing to any church at a moment's notice. Such information ought to be ready for use so that no time of a busy rector need be lost in cutting out from a mass of unimportant material the salient facts for a convincing presentation of the cause of missions. The Church Missions House is admirably equipped for this kind of service.

The wastefulness of the present method of raising money for missions is that it removes from the missionary field the leaders and compels them to spend precious months away from their work. Missionary bishops are appointed to be missionaries. They receive their commission from the Church because they possess gifts for the organizing of Christianity in the mission field. Missionaries ought not to be required to spend several months every year or two away from their dioceses. Some missionaries have a genius for raising money, but they also have genius for doing missionary work.

In saying this we are fully conscious of the debt of gratitude that the rector feels toward the missionary who has known how to present the cause of missions in his church. All honor to the man who can raise money! His lot is not an easy one. He is not shirking a hard task for an easy one. But we question whether it is in the end wise economy to invite the absence from our poorly equipped missionary dioceses of their leaders for months at a time in order that our Eastern city parishes may be prodded to generosity. We believe that the rector, if properly assisted by the Board of Missions, can preach the gospel of missions; if the responsibility were left to him, he would rise to the emergency. Our missionary bishops could then devote their time and energy to the task for which they were commissioned. There is many a missionary and country rector in the far West whose life would not be so lonely and cheerless as it is if his bishop could be at his side. We believe that these men need the constant encouragement and leadership of their bishop more than our city parishes require an annual visit from these bishops to remind their people of the privilege and duty of supporting the missionary work of the Church. The cause of missions might perhaps lose some much-needed dollars, but our missionary dioceses would gain in leadership. The present system is, increasingly, encouraging a non-resident missionary episcopate. This is not the fault of the missionary, but of the Church at large. If every self-supporting parish felt, as it ought so to do, the obligation of giving generously to missions, we should not be compelled to wear out our missionaries by compelling them to journey through the country raising money.

THE WEEK

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

League for National Unity

THE American temperament is not unlike that of the English. We like to tell ourselves and everybody else the worst there is to know. There have been some disheartening moments during the past few months when things seemed to go badly both at home and abroad. We were fully informed of all the disappointments; we were not always told the enheartening news. The League for National Unity, composed of representatives of various elements that make our national life, issued on May 6 a declaration that ought to bring cheer to every American home. We quote two passages from this official bulletin.

The members of the League for National Unity, as the tides of battle ebb and flow, have a right, as citizens, to know how the army of the Republic is represented on the firing line. At length it is possible to make a general statement without periling the cause by giving the enemy detailed information. This is the more necessary because the secret enemies of the Republic are still declaring that only a small force of 100,000 or 200,000 men has crossed the Atlantic.

It can be authoritatively announced that the American force across the seas today musters hundreds of thousands strong. Of this array, several hundred thousand American soldiers are on the main battle line in Flanders. Daily more troops are pouring across, as well as adequate supplies and munitions for the great army we are sending.

Hitherto the activities of our soldiers have been confined to holding sectors of the great trench across France. But now at last they are in the fighting zone where the whole available force of the German army has been thrown in a colossal attempt to break the Allied line and thus bring the war to an end before autocracy can be defeated with the aid of our arms.

We have now more shipyards than Great Britain, the greatest of shipbuilding nations. Our navy is building more submarine destroyers than there were in any two of the world's navies when the war broke out. Our regular navy has more men in it than the British navy had in July, 1914, when it was the world's largest naval force. Next year, we shall fully make up the loss caused by submarines. The year after, it is planned that 10,000,000 more tons will be produced and the tonnage afloat will be greater than when the war began.

Dr. Vincent's Report

THE opening paragraph of the review of the work of the Rockefeller Foundation for 1917 by the president, Dr. George E. Vincent, reveals an interesting fact. We are accustomed to think that our great charitable endowments are pretty nearly capable of shouldering the nation's philanthropic tasks. The names they carry, Rockefeller, Russell Sage, Carnegie, suggest bigness and lavish resources. As a matter of fact they are less than a drop in the bucket. We quote from Dr. Vincent's report:

The income of the Rockefeller Foundation would pay the current expenses of the United States Government for only seven hours; if the principal were used this would be exhausted in five days. The public functions of the city of New York could be supported for twelve days out of income, and for six months and twenty-six days out of endowment. At the present rate of expenditure the American Red Cross would consume the total income of the Foundation in seventeen days, and the principal in less than ten months. It has been estimated that $207,000,000 are disbursed annually for private charity in the United States. If the Rockefeller Foundation were called upon to assume this burden its income would carry the budget for twelve and one half days; its invested funds for about seven months.

In the light of these facts it is obvious that the resources of the Foundation, measured by the needs of governments and large social undertakings, are relatively limited. Widely disbursed in aid of a large number of existing agencies, the income would have little appreciable effect; it might even chiefly replace rather than supplement gifts from other sources.

If the $207,000,000 disbursed annually for private charity in the United States were as economically and scientifically expended as is the income of the Rockefeller Foundation, our country would have gone a long way towards eradicating and preventing disease and erasing from the map many of the moral pest spots which now afflict us.

Liberty Chimes

MANY of us are familiar with the beautiful custom of the noonday prayer for missions. In parishes all over the country the bells ring at twelve o'clock to remind the faithful to lift up their hearts to God and pray "Thy Kingdom come." In the mission towns of Southern California the Angelus rings at sunset. As in Brittany farm hands cease their work and drop upon their knees while even the less simplehearted involuntarily raise their thoughts heavenward.

In many cities throughout the West the war has brought a revival of the custom of a daily community call to prayer. Eastern cities, too, are considering it. Last Sunday the "Liberty Prayer Movement" was started in Syracuse. School and church bells will ring every day at noon; the children in the schools and the workers in factory and shop and office will halt their tasks for a moment; the whole city will lift up its voice to God and pray for the victory of the United States and her Allies.

The daily noonday prayer for victory is an added war-time petition in the noon prayers of many Church people. The prayer for missions in the Prayer Book is in some respects the most satisfactory war prayer available, unless it be the Lord's Prayer itself.

We recall the fact that Lord Kitchener began his war duties each anxious day at the altar. General Pershing, who was confirmed by Bishop Brent in the Philippines, urges his men to pray. General Haig is a devout Christian; General Joffre is a man of prayer. But those of us who stay at home, are we doing this part of our war work faithfully and systematically? From the little handful that gather for the "war intercessions" in the parish churches, it looks as though it were being left to the very few.

Let the churches set an example in this matter. Let the bells in every parish in the country ring out each day at noon, calling every man and woman in the community to this universal service.

Competing with the Government

IN April the sale of War Savings Stamps amounted to $60,972,000. This was $7,000,000 more than in March. Not only did the Government gather into its war treasury nearly sixty-one millions of dollars through the transformation of twenty-five cent pieces into little green Thrift Stamps, but the competition of the people of the United States with Uncle Sam was materially reduced.

Every person who spends ten cents on an ice-cream soda or a quarter on a piece of ribbon enters into competition with the Government. It takes raw materials to manufacture soda-water and ribbons and kid gloves and toys and the thousand and one unnecessary luxuries that use up our small change. The Government needs raw materials. It takes man-power to manufacture everything we buy. The Government needs man-power. It takes railroads to get the articles from the factory to the spot we invest our dimes and quarters in them; and it takes railroads to carry us on the unnecessary journeys we restless Americans love to take. The Government needs railroads.

Every time that we spend a dime unnecessarily we handicap the Government in the prosecution of the big job we so loudly call upon the same Government to perform quickly, efficiently and successfully.

This is why the Government is encouraging the sale of Thrift Stamps. This is why every church in the country should see to it that within each parish organization is formed a War Savings Society. The plan is simply to make it easy and possible to do without during the period of the war. Members promise to avoid competing with the Government for labor, materials and transportation by buying only what they need and when they need it, and by investing their weekly savings in Thrift or War Savings Stamps or in Liberty Bonds. By writing to the National War Savings Committee, 51 Chambers Street, New York City, information and applications for membership may be secured.

In this way we can divert nickels, dimes and quarters from a channel in which they do direct harm to the cause of the Allies into a channel where they do direct good. Spendthrift America can learn the value of thrift.

Pushing Forward

THAT was a notable meeting of the Board of Missions in New York last week. While recognizing to the full the seriousness of the financial situation, the Board was brave enough to plan for the future. Though the total appropriation for 1919 fell short by $6,000 of the 1918 appropriation, plans for increases in many parts of the world were discussed with perfect confidence. There was a complete absence of the hour-long debates over dollars and cents that have often characterized the May meeting and the discussion of appropriations. Not that money was appropriated without due consideration, but that the members were confident enough to legislate for the maintenance of all present activities. Moreover, after hesitating since December, 1917, whether or not to spend the undesignated legacies that accumulated during 1916-17, the Board voted to do what the committee recommended seven months ago.

The provision for a loan fund of $100,000 shows good statesmanship. It will enable the missionary to take advantage of opportunities for the purchase of property as they present themselves without waiting to raise a fund only to find that the opportunity has slipped by in the interim. There has been need of such a fund for many years. There is hardly a missionary bishop who does not point out in his district the gravestones of lost opportunities, sites that "could have been purchased for a fraction of their present value if only the money had been in hand."

The Report of the Theological Council

IN our news pages this week appears the substance of a most significant report. Though it may look dry and technical, it is, nevertheless, a document that gives hope. It is the majority report of the Theological Council of the General Board of Religious Education, adopted at their fifth meeting held a fortnight ago in Chelsea Square. It will form the basis of a new or revised canon on theological training to be submitted to General Convention in 1919.

The question of theological training has been in a fluid state for a considerable time. Yet there has been a real desire for a generally accepted norm. Some have strongly advocated the liberty of the individual bishop and his examining chaplains; others have insisted that since a priest was transferred from diocese to diocese it was only just that a certain standard of theological education should obtain throughout the Church. It was the old question of state rights.

The present report meets both difficulties. The emphasis is on liberty. The report looks for a wealth of interpretation. Responsibility is placed upon the bishops and the examining chaplains. But protection is afforded the diocese with high standards against the influx of clergy ordained in a diocese where for perfectly legitimate and practical reasons a lower standard is maintained. This unshackling of the bishops from the necessity of insisting on standards that often debar a man from ordination who is well fitted in ways other than those specified by the canon, may release sources of energy not yet tapped by the Church.

The Normal Standard, on the other hand, sets up a practical and well-rounded ideal for the average candidate's training. The relegation of Hebrew to the place of an elective will win the approval of most people. Greek will ultimately go the same way. The place given to electives in the Normal Standard is especially worthy of comment, inasmuch as it will allow the candidate to specialize according to his inclination.

Professor Rauschenbusch on Sects

EUROPEANS always assume that our one hundred and fifty-five varieties of religion are due to American freakishness and unbridled individualism. Europeans do too much honor to our creative intellect. It is Europe which has created the vast majority of American sects. Most of them are direct importations, like the dandelion, the brown-tailed moth, the Russian thistle, and the English sparrow. They were national churches in their native countries; they have become sects here. . . . Most of them are the spent survivals of a past age.

The Great Consummation

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

THE Christian doctrine of the resurrection of the body occasions much perplexity to many people at the present day and is widely misunderstood. Even persons of culture often fail to apprehend its true significance and reasonableness, and in their criticisms of it are apt to state it in crude and misleading terms. To say that the Christian hope is that we shall one day rise again from our graves wearing the very bodies that are ours now and that these bodies will then be quickened and rendered immortal is of course to affirm the impossible. Our physical bodies are changing hour by hour; in a few years at most not a particle of the elements composing them at this moment will remain therein; to all intents and purposes we shall have new bodies, though the change is so gradual that we do not perceive it. Knowing this, as every schoolboy does, it seems the most obvious thing in the world to conclude that that clause in the creed which affirms belief in the resurrection of the body is a mistaken declaration based on ignorance of physiological facts. Hence the modern way of looking at things, which inclines to the view that once soul and body are severed they have done with each other forever, that the former passes on to new and higher experiences which have nothing to do with those of earth, that spirit and matter are disparate and fall apart; the latter sees corruption, the former does not.

But deeper reflection should serve to convince anyone that this rough and ready judgment is built on hasty and inadequate assumptions. There is an ancient heresy lurking within it, namely, the Manichaean insistence on the error that matter is the seat of evil or, perhaps we should say, the sphere of evil and the prison of the soul. Christianity has always and rightly insisted that there is no such antinomy between matter and spirit.

> Let us not always say
> "Spite of this flesh today
> "I strove, made head, gained ground upon the whole!"
> As the bird wings and sings,
> Let us cry "All good things
> "Are ours, nor soul helps flesh more, now, than flesh helps soul!"

Spirit needs matter for its own expression within due limits; what in fact is matter but a mode of spirit, spirit operating within given conditions? Science tells us that the phenomenal universe reveals itself to our senses by means of etheric vibration. The underlying, all-pervading ether—a convenient term to cover our ignorance, for no one has ever yet gone right down to the ether which we thus postulate as the basis of existence—is in a constant state of vibration and these vibrations produce upon us the impression of a world of form and color. Let something happen to double the rate of vibration and, lo, our world is gone as though it had never been; and yet it cannot be really gone; the substance of which it is built is here as fully as before but hidden to our perceptions. It is more than probable that a world of worlds lies thus concealed about us because we have no sense apparatus wherewith to detect its presence. Visible and invisible are one.

This is where science steps in to the vindication of what the Christian faith has all along affirmed. Nothing is lost by changing its mode of being. You throw a piece of paper into the fire and watch it burn, and presently you say it is consumed. But has it ceased to exist? As paper, yes; as substance, no; it exists as truly and fully as before, but in another mode. Is it reasonable then to suppose that the matter of which the visible universe is composed, including our bodies, will ever pass out of existence? Certainly not. Somehow, somewhere, somewhen all that now makes up the world in which we live and the very stuff of our mortal nature will be wanted in another mode, still be used of God to wondrous ends. As matter it may cease to be, but as that out of which matter arises it will be God's instrument to other and higher ends.

Thank you for nothing, someone may exclaim at this point. We do not need such an hypothesis; we know already that matter is never destroyed, but only changes its form. What is grass today is wool on the back of a sheep tomorrow; there is a continual commerce between ourselves and the vegetable kingdom; the disintegration of one organism means the upbuilding of the same atoms into the structure of another.

> Imperious Caesar, dead and turned to clay
> May stop a hole to keep the wind away.

Just so, but this process will not go on ad infinitum. There must come a term to it. This present world will not last forever. The day of its disruption may be far distant, but it is surely coming. The succession of organic life on this planet will cease and the very foundations thereof be dissolved. Not forever will generations of human beings go on being born one after another, growing up, marrying and giving in marriage, struggling, suffering, decaying, dying. Not forever will human society continue to reproduce itself on earth and make towards an ever-receding goal of happiness and stability. Not forever shall we dream our pathetic dreams of a perfection to be realized within the bounds of sense and time. It will all come to an end; every pupil of science knows that.

And what then? Then the whole scheme of things to which we are now accustomed will be gathered back and lifted up to another plane, not a particle missing, not an atom unused. Good Christianity is good science, too, only the former began first. What the New Testament calls the end of the world, or more literally the "Consummation of the Age," is exactly what science now bids us anticipate, only the former looks farther than the latter, and sees more deeply into the nature of the change. It declares nothing earthly will perish save in its earthly form. The resurrection, the ingathering, the lifting up of matter to the spiritual plane, is that to which we are bidden to look forward at the second coming of our Lord. It is in this that the second coming mainly consists, this rising up of creation to that out of which it came, not to perish but to be fulfilled. There is no greater marvel in history than the marvel of the Christian revelation which for ages has been tracing this as the hope of the future, a hope which antedated by many centuries that view of existence which is today its justification. Seen and unseen are all of a piece. Evolution proceeds on both sides of the veil. The first generation needs the last, the last needs the first; redeemed humanity is one as its temporal home is one; natural completes itself in spiritual, spiritual will absorb and assimilate natural. "The creation itself also shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the glorious liberty of the children of God."

A Prayer for the Army and Navy

O LORD OF HOSTS, our almighty and most merciful Father, we commend to Thy holy and gracious keeping our soldiers and sailors and all those who are their helpers in the service of our country. Preserve them from sickness, from treachery and wrong, and from every other evil to which they may be exposed. Endue them with righteousness, courage and devotion to their duty, and give to their commanders wisdom and firmness. Visit with the comforts of Thy grace such of them as may be sick, wounded, or in captivity, and be the support and stay of all those who miss them or mourn for them. Bless all their doings and sufferings to the advancement of Thy glory, the safety and honor of our country, and the welfare of all the peoples of the earth.

All this we ask through the merits of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace. Amen.

Together. I

By THE REV. GEORGE HERBERT TOOP. D.D.

In the World

ONE of the arresting by-products of the war is the drawing together of the world. To casual thought it would seem that the nations of the earth were never so irreconcilably separated and determinedly apart as now.

Quite the reverse is, however, the fact. Scarcely a decade ago the Balkans was a vague term to most of us, almost a terra-incognito. Today we are almost if not quite as familiar with them as with some of our own states. With some of the Balkan States we are fighting in practical if not actual alliance.

Before Elihu Root made his epoch-making journey through South America the United States knew and cared little about that vast neighboring continent. Our first and most constant thought about South America expressed itself in terms indicative of political foment and revolution. On the other hand South America regarded the United States with jealous and distrustful eye, and looked to Europe for business relationships and cultural influences.

Today North and South America are opening wide avenues for inter-trade alliances, political fraternities, and social amenities.

But yesterday it was a rallying cry of American politics that there should be no entangling alliances with Europe. Today our troops march through the streets of London and Paris on the way to the battle line, where they stand shoulder to shoulder with the armies of England and France.

Never before did America have alliance with any nation. Today she is in actual alliance with more than half the world and in practical alliance with more than three-quarters of it.

For a decade there have been malign and underground influences at work to force America and Japan to a rupture. Now we find a new set of influences at work making toward understanding and friendship.

Two great nations, Russia and China, are being reborn before our eyes, and both look confidently toward America in and for friendship. The enmity between Russia and Japan is largely past.

England and her colonies, embracing the tremendous population of India, Egypt, Canada and Australia among the rest, were never so united. And this is a fact of enormous significance for the unity of the world.

The United States and Canada know only physical boundaries, so closely have the vital life streams of the two people intermingled.

Turkey is in process of being extirpated as an important factor in world affairs. With the passing of its sinister influence there will disappear one of the most fertile sources of European unrest and estrangement.

Could anyone, in the wildest flights of fancy, have imagined that our day would see the ancient peoples of India, Egypt and Japan, of Rome and Greece, of the younger and yet old peoples of England, France, and Russia, and of the young, vigorous, national giants of North and South America, brought together by any conceivable world crisis? Yet they are one today in a great common cause.

Only Germany and her practically negligible allies are outside the new world fold—outside in a bitterness of hate without parallel, to be sure, but a hatred entirely susceptible of solution after the coming years of peace have brought a right perspective to Germany's vision, and the generous treatment from her former foes, which is to be confidently expected, has eased the first smart of her defeat.

There shall then be in that new world no isolated islands of the sea, no unknown foreign lands, no unintelligible peoples, for a world-sense and a world relationship shall have taken the place of the old national insularities and provincialisms. On the anvil of war the nations are being beaten into a world people. In the fiery furnace of conflict the peoples of the earth are being moulded into brotherhood. The very bitterness of the world's wrath presages the coming of a world peace, a real and lasting peace.

In the Church

When the war caught the world in its mad and swirling horror, the Church, divided and impotent, stayed it by not so much as the drooping of a lash. Its counsel was not sought, its dictates not so much disregarded as simply unconsidered. It was as if she were not; as if for nineteen centuries she had not taught peace and brotherhood.

No eminent Christian, as such, whether pope, cardinal, archbishop, bishop, priest, minister or layman, was called into the councils of state, to help find the right solutions of the mightiest issues that ever confronted the human race.

No national church availed to stay or even affect the crisis. The sum total of all the churches counted not at all in the face and hour of the world's direst need. When the peoples of the warring nations turned for help to some group or association of men to control the mad spirit of the times it was to Socialism they turned, not to the Church. That Socialism proved to be a rope of sand does not affect the fact. And in that hour, for many, was verified the taunts of the Church's detractors; the taunts that she was not free, not disinterested, not the peoples' friend. So little free that she had submitted to political control and feared the face of man; so little disinterested that she had yoked herself with the rich and mighty; so little the friend of the people that she had whined for charity to meet the needs of her children, instead of demanding justice for them from those who ground the faces of the poor.

That this was not wholly or even in large part true does not affect the fact that there were many who believed it to be wholly true and justly descriptive of the situation in which the Church had either placed or allowed herself to be placed.

Nor was the Church united and so able even if she had been entirely free to bring to bear a great world pressure upon the problems confronting the nations of the earth. Into many parts had she broken, parts which knew a disseverance almost as great as that displayed by the torn and divided nations.

Beyond the shadow of a doubt the Church, because of the war, has lost something even of what prestige she had.

She stands today before the bar of the world's opinion to answer for her past. There is no use playing with facts. Before the war began the thoughtful within the Church knew sleepless nights and troubled days. The Church had demonstrated that she was not the vital and controlling force in human affairs. And given the premise of the Church there is something badly wrong, not only with human life, but with her, if she be not, after nineteen centuries of existence, that vital and controlling force.

The reasons for her failure are not far to seek. She, God's Body on earth, had allowed herself to be forced into the position of suppliant for favors at the hand of man. She had allowed states to formulate their policies without regard to her. Failed to make, or even seriously try to make, the law of the land conform to the law of God. She did not possess the puissance for the task of leading the people of the world out of the Egyptian darkness of their political and industrial slavery to the promised land of light and liberty, to which her great standard, the Sermon on the Mount, committed her.

We are asked to believe today that because a man in England is writing some aberrational religious books, and soldiers kneel for prayer before going into battle, and tortured parents and wives back home go more frequently to church than was their wont, that the religious life of the world is being new-born.

Look beneath the surface; study the alarming statistics of illegitimate births; see the increase in juvenile delinquency; look at the environs of the camps; talk to the doctors and regimental chaplains; ask the priests and ministers at home how conversions compare with other times. The results are disquieting beyond cavil.

Besides the liberty for which the world travails in agony, the spirit of sacrifice is the one great good which is being born out of this frightful carnival of blood.

That the world is able to answer to the thrilling call of self-sacrifice—that millions of the sons of men offer to lay down their lives that other sons of men may live and know a freedom dearer than life, that is the great, potent, saving factor of these times of distorted fratricidal madness.

That is the peg on which the Church, if she be wise, will hang her hope for the future. That is the thought upon which she will concentrate with all intensity. The time of peace, when it comes, will be more fateful for her than even the time of war. Political liberty is being fought for on earth's battlefields and being won at the cost of the world's best manhood. And over the door leading to the spiritual liberty of the Church is written in indelible and eternal letters the word sacrifice, and it is not less essential to the world's welfare than the other.

The world's political liberty is being won because men are laying down their all in willing and complete sacrifice to attain it.

Is it too much to ask that the Church of God shall understand? Too much to expect that she, too, shall know sacrifice in order to win spiritual freedom?

To fulfil her mission she must be free to tell the truth to any man at any cost. Free to fight for the right, even if, by doing so, she sacrifice a patronage for which in the past she has too much debased herself in fawning. Free to say again, when need shall be, in prophet's tones and a courage which counts not cost—"Thou art the man." Only so can she fulfil her mission to the world.

A great task lies ahead, a great challenge! "Old things are passed away; behold, all things are become new!"

New times are at hand, a new world, new questions, new international relationships and intimacies, new and insistent demands for candor and simplicity. A new humanity will be the Church's to deal with after the war—a humanity which has looked ultimate things in the face and been unafraid.

This new humanity will be impatient with mere dialectics and verbal subtleties when it asks for truth. A new man will come back to our homes from the foreign trench and field. He will have rubbed shoulders with his brothers of other lands and speech, traditions and religion. He will be a new type cosmopolitan, one who not only knows the people of the world, but loves them because he has fought with them in a great and common cause.

That new man, seen in our United States, in England, France, where you will, will no longer be able to breathe the air of petty provincialisms whether in State or Church.

Wise were it if the Church could greet the dawning day with full comprehension of its significance for herself.

The world is coming out of political darkness into light—the clear light of liberty for all mankind. Not into the full light of that day of liberty all at once, but this war is the sunrise of that day. So much at least seems clear.

Shall the Church stay bound in the dark prison house of her self-imposed limitations? She was meant to be a glorious thing! The instrument of God for the world's highest, holiest good.

More, she was to be the "Bride of the Lamb", and so instinct with all the spiritual vitality and moral majesty of the Christ. But, divided and torn asunder by petty party shibboleths, and compromising her honor for the sake of expediency, she will prove worthless for that new day, greatly fateful, about to dawn, of which the first streaks of light begin already to show.

An increase in democracy for the world is both an invitation and a challenge to the Church.

Political autocracy is a waning system, an outgrown phase of government. Necessary mayhap in a nation's period of adolescence, but unsuited to its maturity. Men have proved themselves capable of self-government, and now not anywhere for long will they trust their lives and welfare to the selfishness and whims of autocracy.

Blind is the Church if she heed not the forces at work, and insensately yield herself to an opposite tendency. Democratic she must be if she is to be suited to the new day's need. Democratic not alone in system, but in life and habit. Responsive to every vital need of man and adaptable to every right spiritual impulse of his nature.

In high guidance and fearless challenge, "Thus saith the Lord", must be her word to diplomat and banker, to governor and merchant. She must know men not as rich and poor, as high and low, but only as sons of God, and wield a law and counsel equal for all.

To have value for the new day the Church must in very truth be all right things to all true men. She must be sympathetic with the yearning of the soul for righteousness and the passionate love of justice which lies at the base of all that is true and lasting in Socialism. She must enter understandingly and gladly with her children into their pitiable search for health, and help them find the truth in Christian Science, Our Lady of Lourdes, or wherever their search takes them. With open arms must she welcome the scientist's search for truth, and glory in his findings of it.

The philosopher and historian, the geologist and physicist must be accounted as among her chosen sons. She must see in every honest life and every moral act a gleam divine, a broken light of God. Formal membership should be the least of all her insistences and the last of all her challenges.

To make herself one with life, in all man's endeavors for good, his search for beauty, his demand for justice, his passionate yearning for happiness, should be her aim.

For the accomplishment of this so great a task she must be one Church, not many churches. Not one in drab physical uniformity and dead doctrinal conformity, but one in purpose and action, in spirit and sympathy, in thought and prayer, in moral desires and determinations.

An American Soldier

By BISHOP LAWRENCE

WHEN I was at Camp Devens three or four weeks ago, there stood before me for Confirmation a stalwart boy from Georgia, six feet, three, who had been under military discipline, and who later had asked for Confirmation. My talk with him revealed such a simple, ingenuous and attractive character as one might hope to find in an American boy who has been brought up in a religious home, and who because of his ingenuousness had upon getting into camp fallen into trouble. A few days later I received a letter from him thanking me for confirming him and asking me to write to his father and mother.

In response, I wrote immediately, and from them received the letter which follows:

"Mch. 10th, 1918.

"Mr. William Lawrence: Yours of Mch 4th to hand glad indeed to hear from you and that so much interest is taking by you in Boys in uniform. May God bless you! as you prescribe wee shall rite often to our son which you confirm our only child and you no well prided him and gave him all techings wee could Wee will pray for his return and ask the Christian People to pray with us May God bless you is my prayer Rite to mee" ***

Later on the Chaplain at Camp Devens, the Rev. Howard K. Bartow, sent me this letter:

"Camp Devens, Feb. 21st, '18.

"Dear Rev. Bartow: I may not be with you again and I have some things I want you to do for me, and that is I want you to write Mother the day I leave Camp and all so my Sweet Hart.

"And I want you to pray for me and I will pray with you that I may be strong in the spirit of God.

"Sincerely yours," ***

The boy is now in France. The simplicity, piety and loyalty of this correspondence is as admirable as it is in some respects pathetic. That this boy should be in the trenches for us stimulates those of us who are more privileged—to be grateful and quick to do our bit.

The Knight of the Labyrinth

X

Now was Sir Hugh a-weary of all this wandering to and fro, and his heart was sore troubled for that everywhere men forsook the quest. Nevertheless, it befel as he journeyed that he was comforted, for he came by chance into a part of the labyrinth where dwelt an echo, and this part of the labyrinth was like unto those other narrow lanes, gray and white, but the echo spake in them, divers voices. Anon it was as the voice of his old nurse that sang the lullaby she was used to sing what time he was as yet a tiny child. Anon it was as the voice of his mother, that day she bade farewell to his father; for his father rode to the crusade and fell fighting in the land of the Paynim. And it was as the voice of Queen Guinevere that said he was a comely child and he should be her own page. And albeit Sir Hugh had much solace of this echo, nevertheless was he sad, and he said, within himself, "When shall I hear my lady's voice? When shall I hear the voice of the King's daughter"?

And within a while he came again to the great hall of a castle, but this was not that hall where the table was laid, but another hall, and a great fire in the chimney, and torches that flared about the walls; and on the dais players and mummers, for there was a morality toward.

And because he was a-weary Sir Hugh sat him down in a great chair with a cushion behind his head to see this morality. And there were many other knights likewise sitting in the hall, and the mummers played their parts.

And it came to pass as Sir Hugh watched the mummers, that he was ware as how they played a play that he knew right well, and he saw that this morality was none other than the true history of his life from the day that he was born. Whereupon Sir Hugh Lepenseur marveled greatly within himself, saying, "Who so wise and who so cunning as the old King that invented this labyrinth? Who hath revealed this thing unto him"?

And it befel within a while that a knight laughed that sat on Sir Hugh's right hand, the which seemed unto Sir Hugh passing strange, for that here was no matter for mirth. And he said unto this knight—that sat upon his right hand, "Sir, it pleaseth you to be merry".

"Sir", said that knight then, "Shall I not laugh at mine own antics, an I will"? And again he laughed.

Now there sat upon Sir Hugh's left hand a ruddy man of middle age, and the while that other laughed this one had much ado to hide his tears, for he suddenly fell a-weeping.

Then said Sir Hugh to this other knight, "Sir, may it please you tell me, do you know this child that is hero in this morality, and how he is called"?

"Fair sir, right well do I know him", saith that other, "for he is my very self, and at that time I was twelve years old or thereabout, and it is my mother who lies a-dying".

Then did Sir Hugh marvel greatly, for there was none lay a-dying. Nevertheless, he held his peace.

And within a while he that had laughed gave a great sigh, and saith he, "How think you they compass this marvel, to set the semblance of the abbey church of Glastonbury on yon dais"?

Whereupon Sir Hugh spake, saying, "Prythee, fair friend, what is it thou seest"?

And the knight made answer, "Of a truth I see the nave of the abbey church of Glastonbury, and the tall pillars of the nave, and at the end the choir; and I am in the choir, for this is my vigil that I keep on the eve of my knighthood; and it is I that kneel at the high altar. What seest thou else"?

And Sir Hugh answered him, "Is this Glastonbury? For methinks 'tis Winchester. And who should know better than I, for 'twas I that was made knight in Winchester, and 'twas there I kept my vigil. 'Tis I that kneel yonder beside the high altar, and 'tis Winchester's high altar I kneel beside".

Then spake that knight on his left hand, saying, "What is this pother of Winchester and Glastonbury? Yon is Salisbury Plain, and Merlin's stones that he brought from Ireland. And 'tis I that keep my vigil yonder, 'twas on St. John's eve, these twenty years agone. And I was sore tempted of a devil. Shall I not remember"?

But those others that sat in the hall and looked on the Morality cried out, "Hush! Be still!—Ye do disturb the players".

Wherefore they three fell silent. And presently when Sir Hugh had forgot his weariness, he saith, "Of a surety this is a marvel and a diversion, but it is not the quest". And he arose and went out of the hall a-tiptoe, very courteous; but for the most part those others sat as they were in a dream.

And ever and anon the gray ways echoed, as Sir Hugh walked therein, and he heard many voices that were known to him aforetime. But ever he sighed to hear the voice of his lady that was dumb.

Now, the while the echo still rang in his ears, came Sir Hugh to a low portal. So low it was that who would enter must needs bend his head, and that did Sir Hugh. But within was a lofty chamber, and pillars midmost of the chamber in a row, and arches springing from the pillars, and the ceiling was vaulted. And there were other vaulted chambers opening upon this one, and an oriel window, and other windows rich with tracery of stone and jeweled glass. And Sir Hugh was minded of the chamber called Scriptorium, that was in the abbey of Tintern in the valley of the river Wye; but this chamber was larger far, and there were carven chests a great many, filled with parchments and all manner of books in Latin and French, and some few there were writ in the English tongue. And there were desks where men might read or write, and men sitting thereat, or standing.

"Now, would God this were the secret place", sighed Sir Hugh, "for I am fain of this place. It likes me very well", quoth Sir Hugh.

And as he lingered looking on the parchments, and over the shoulders of them that copied manuscripts, he came to certain men that stood about a table whereon was spread a map, or the part of a map, for it was not as yet finished. And when he had questioned them concerning this thing, they told him as how they sought the clew to the labyrinth, and to that end they made this map; howbeit they were not agreed together as to the whereabout of the one thing and the other the which they would set down on the map.

"Moreover, be thou advised", quoth they, "that the height of the labyrinth is as high as the Emperor Trajan's pillar which standeth in Rome unto this day. And the length and the breadth of the labyrinth are thrice as long and twice as high as King Arthur's castle of Camelot. And these things are well known, for here is one hath made a pilgrimage to Rome, or ever he came hither; and here is one went round about the labyrinth without the wall, or ever he entered in, and girded it with a hempen cord, and his mathematics is true. And within this height and this length and this breadth abide all these marvels that thou and I have seen, and haply many more beside; but where"?

"Verily", said Sir Hugh, "Here is the most marvel of all, for how shall this thing be that is against all logic and mathematic and overturneth all philosophies"? And he bent his thought upon the map that was spread upon the table, to learn therefrom as much as he might.

London's Passiontide

By MARGARETTA BYRDE

NEVER, perhaps, in the history of Christendom and certainly not in the history of England, has there been such a Holy Week as this of 1918, in which the solemn events commemorated so synchronize with those which are moving the nation that each explains the other. Never has the Divine Tragedy come so home to human hearts; never has the tragedy through which we are passing been seen in such a real yet glorious light. There is no mistaking the spirit of London, however unconsciously it has reflected the Passion of the Redeemer during these first awful days of the great push, while England stands in the breach between all that Christianity means and all that paganism would destroy. England is saving the world. Whatever comes through the belated help of America—and England has no reproach for a delay she understands so well—and whether or not she herself is bled to death in her glorious stand for all that makes this world worth living in, she has done for America and for all nations of the world that which shall crown her with immortal glory. The people of England, and of all the British lands who are with her in her agony, are willing it should be so.

There have been many notable Sundays in this war, but Palm Sunday was unlike any of them. It had that same strange, spiritual, awed expectancy that all who remember the Sunday before the momentous choice was made can never forget, but it had no element of vague anticipation in it, for we have suffered too much not to know now what war means. It held the same fervor of resolution as did the first Sunday after the declaration of war, but with a chastened and more tragic note. It had the same mournful and oppressive gloom that swept over us that terrible Sunday in the same Autumn when we realized that the battle was going against us and that the flower of our armies was mown down; but it also held the hope which our cruel reverses have not shaken, and London, though still and subdued, was firm. She has her great history behind her and her great purpose in front, and around her myriads of resolute and faithful fellow-countrymen, and across the channel a noble and enduring ally, and across the ocean (she knows it well!) an invincible people of the same original stock, and the same spirit, arming with inflexible determination to carry on the crusade of freedom to its triumphant end.

But Holy Week, the time of her greatest agony, brought a deeper and more sustaining courage. There can be no doubt of this. The Churches have failed and are seeing their failure: the old complacent attitude of Britain—may we not say of Christendom?—is broken up. And yet a quite impartial observer, one who has been among the critics for years, has no doubt of the spiritual revival in London, at least, after sharing in the present Passiontide.

Our foes talk much of God—"their terrible God", as the Bishop of London said on Good Friday—but it is "Christ with us" Who convinces us of the Father, Christ the Sacrifice with whom our tortured hearts have dwelt. The typical pious Englishmen in their history have been men who clung to Christ, like that great representative Londoner, Dr. Johnson, whose spirit seems to hover over the city church it was my lot to attend on Palm Sunday. The gallery where he always sat was empty, for the old congregations have fled to the suburbs, but it was a fervent service for those in the nave, and for one emotional moment it did seem as if that brave and loyal figure leaned against his pillar, absorbed once more in the fate of his loved city and in the Lord of its glory. His London he would not have known today. In the constant flow along Fleet street (as ever "fullest at the Strand") were figures he never dreamed to see, sons of Empire, come to defend her from all parts of the earth, and mingled with their khaki-clad forms those of allied nations, gazing curiously around on the Sunday solemnity they had so often heard of, but which today, to judge from the expression on many of those mobile faces, even they felt appropriate.

The stress of the crisis lessened a little as the week went on, but the spirit deepened: never have Holy Week services been so well attended. Two services seem to the writer to mark most vividly the English characteristics as well as the mighty change that is coming over her—the Maundy Thursday service in Westminster Abbey and the united open air service in Hyde Park on Good Friday afternoon.

The former has probably been described before in these pages—it is an epitome of the love in English hearts for the past, of their intense conservatism. Nothing else can explain its archaic appeal both of form and spirit. To one out of sympathy with England the pageantry would be theatrical and the symbolism puerile, if not repellent. One hundred and six old people, half men, half women, to correspond with the years of the monarch's age, were ranged along the front benches of the choir of this stately and venerable fane, there to furnish the basis of an object lesson of humility. Could anything be less like that scene in Jerusalem which was meant to be typified, the washing of the disciples' feet by Christ?—the privacy of it contrasted with this congregation that packed the choir and transepts of the great abbey, amongst them were about a dozen of the royal family including Queen Mary and Queen Alexandra; the plainness of that humble room remembered in such a scene of beauty, architecture and adornments of the noblest, grand music exquisitely rendered, the royal stalls decked with lovely flowers, the Yeomen of the Guard arranged at intervals along the choir in their quaint and splendid dress, the Church dignitaries arrayed in gorgeous copes which see the light only on such state occasions! This is not humility, one thought, it is pride incarnate that makes a show of these poor folk and the charity of a monarch. But then came wiser thoughts and kindlier. It is so like England to go on with what she has done for ages, go on calmly and of course, while her life is threatened, while the hearts of those who were taking part in this venerable function were thrilling with suspense or aching with an anguish already fulfilled. So like her: one felt it more and more as the service progressed and ended with a verse of the national anthem, and the quaint procession with obeisances towards royalty went back, slowly disintegrating in the empty nave into its component parts as the royalties departed and the crowd slowly dispersed, casting long, lingering looks at the monuments by the way. The continuity of England was there, a threefold cord of past, present and future that cannot be quickly broken. As I once heard an American say, "the English are such a decent people", and what word can more aptly designate that habit of calm and orderly procedure, that considerate and humane relationship between people, between creed and conduct, between what might so easily be servility but is not, and what might be oppression but is not. In the nave mothers were saying good-by to the little scarlet-coated and beruffed lads of the Chapel Royal, seen for this brief moment, and admiring friends were interviewing the ancients with their gaudy purses of leading, their tottering forms away. There was no sense of humiliation in any of these, rather a pride of place, what each conceived to be his or her proper place, and of being in it, and a real spirit of gratitude and loyalty that the most democratic must respect.

But yet it was the other England, and the one with which one has most sympathy, that met in Hyde Park on Good Friday afternoon, and little as one would have liked to miss the ancient service in the Abbey, still less would one have missed this, the very first service in the new spirit which the war has hastened rapidly, though it has long been leavening the religious and social life of the conservative land. It was an historic occasion, that thrilled another part of nature, untouched by pageantry, uninfluenced by tradition, unmoved by form. It was the crowning hour of this eventful week then, which saw thousands of Londoners gathering round a roughly improvised platform in the city's famous spot for free speech, gathering there to voice in harmony its cry to Christ on the Cross, its love and faith in Him, its union in diversity of forms to the one Head, its agony of sacrificial pain with Him, and its determination to endure. It was the first time in England that such a service had been held, but no one present could have believed it, for there was nothing strained or crude or jarring from first to last. It might have been rehearsed a hundred times, so melted were differences of temperament and taste—those trivial differences which do more to divide us than anything else. The writer, there very early, was at first afraid that the Church element was not going to be sufficiently represented, for the nonconformists were soonest on the field in rapidly increasing numbers. But as the hour approached, and the procession of London bishops came in sight their flocks too assembled. And then there was but one flock, one spirit, one emotion, as led by the Salvation Army band—that band whose blatancy one had so often condemned, but which now seemed to discourse as sweetly as the Abbey organ!—we sang the first of the familiar hymns. Think of it, brother-churchmen over the sea, as I cannot speak of such a moment in adequate terms. The first time in English history that her diverse and often hostile religious elements have met together around their common symbol, the Cross, and lifted their praise in harmony under the influence of a common danger and a common yearning for fellowship! There was but one abstention, and the Bishop of London, whose loving nature is such a help to unity, conveyed the impression (with utmost tact) that Roman Catholic England was not apart in spirit. How much we found, in that too brief hour, of Christian unity. Together we repeated the Apostles' Creed—a great moment! Together we interceded for our brave and suffering friends, and said the Lord's Prayer and General Thanksgiving. Together we sang, again and again, and the hymns witnessed to Catholicity by their varied authorship, from Cardinal Newman to Toplady. There were three addresses, each without a jarring note. The Bishop of London rejoiced in the new day opening to England, and emotional nonconformists near by responded with fervent amens. Mr. Shakespeare reminded us that it is a human infirmity that leads us to dwell more on differences than on likeness and pleaded for a future charity in thought as the foundation of a real unity. Dr. Fleming, perfervid Scot that he is, spoke last, and with passionate intensity, of the approaching ordeal when the casualty lists come in. "With this touching but inspiring message", said the Bishop of London, "we shall go home". So he gave the blessing; we sang "God Save the King" and the thousands melted away across the park, a long train following the band, playing "Onward Christian Soldiers" till sight and sound were lost in the hazy twilight distance.

There were two notes struck that hour which, passed over though they have been in all reports, seem to the writer most significant. One was that from a leader of the most rigid nonconformity came a plea for charity towards those who, members of none of the churches, yet follow Christ in their inmost souls. It is by love and sympathy these can be won. The other was that in the prayers recited by another nonconformist and responded to fervently by the crowd was a commendation of the souls of the fallen heroes to the love and mercy of God. Prayers for the dead by the most protestant of English people! Truly we are on our way to a catholicity of faith that the world can accept to its salvation!

So London kept its greatest Holy Week in its history and Easter dawned on a tried, tested, devoted and enduring people. And so, onwards in the war, and in the conflict that the war but typifies and brings home to us all, the war against sin, won by that which presses on us so terribly—the Cross!

A Plea for Tolerance

By THE REV. SELDEN P. DELANY, D.D.

THE Protestant Episcopal Church is losing from time to time some of her most enthusiastic members,—both clerical and lay. She is losing them because she is driving them out.

Is there not a danger that we may become a stiff and dry and sapless branch of the tree, whose end is to be burned?

Father Dolling used to say that the Church of England had a genius for killing enthusiasm. Is not the American daughter of the Church of England inclined to follow in her mother's footsteps?

There are three different classes of men whom we are gradually squeezing out.

First, there is the class of men who have a burning enthusiasm for social justice. They are fond of interpreting the Gospel as a tract on social reform. They feel keenly the cruel injustices of our present social and industrial order: and they wish to see that order supplanted by a new order, based not on competition, but on co-operation; not on selfishness, but on love. They regret that the working-classes are so conspicuously absent from our churches; and they insist that the Church make some effort to regain them by understanding them.

One of our clergy has given expression to this conviction as follows:

> "Multitudes come to this country believing it to be a land flowing with milk and honey, but find that the milk is skimmed and that others have run off with the honey. The Church has long emphasized the seed, but she has forgotten the soil. Nothing is to be gained by the Church telling the worker to be honest, avoid violence, and be temperate. The workers in Calumet, in Lawrence, and Colorado know that their wages are determined by the number of available laborers. Our competitive system is morally and socially bankrupt. It is a stony ground full of thorns and thistles. The workers know it and ask for soil where the seed of real human and social life may bring forth abundant fruit.
> "When the Church works for the new creation the workers will become interested in the Church. The Church now recognizes the rich as the class by which its missions and philanthropies are conducted. In the same way, why should it not recognize the wage-earners as the instrumentality under God by which the new economic era is to come? They come with new truths, new spiritualities, new ideas, and yet these are the basic ideas of the religion of Jesus. The Church should recognize the new spirit and rejoice in it and do its part to be obedient unto the principles and purposes of Christ."

Now, whatever we may think of these ideals of social reform, at any rate we must admit that any man, priest or layman, has an unquestioned right to hold them. A congregation or a vestry may rightly object to a rector who preaches political Socialism from the pulpit; just as they might object to one who preached the tenets of the Republican or Democratic parties, but they have no right to object to a man for preaching social righteousness; and it is doubtful if any of our clergy would be so foolish as to preach the tenets of the present Socialist party in America. Moreover, it is much to be regretted that the priest who is thus attacked by his vestry or congregation, or the bishop who is opposed by powerful interests in his diocese, should ever feel it his duty to resign under fire. Would it not be better to stand by his guns and fight for the faith that is in him? If necessary let the matter be brought to the attention of the higher authorities, to see whether priest or bishop is rightly fulfilling his commission to preach the Word of God.

At any rate we can ill afford to lose any of our clergy who are earnestly attempting to carry out the divine injunction to preach the Gospel to the poor. The Episcopal Church is as present too much the church of the rich and respectable to be true to the Master's command. Let us try to retain all of our preachers of social righteousness, even if we have to organize Church armies to enable them to preach on soap-boxes in the streets and public squares. The Gospel is many-sided, and one side that needs to be emphasized today is the love of the Saviour for the poor and heavy-laden.

In the second place there are the clergy and laity who find the ordinary traditional religion of Protestant Episcopalians too narrow and cold. They long for a richer and more Catholic devotional life. They want all the power they can get through the sacraments; therefore, they insist on having access to all seven sacraments of our Catholic inheritance. They will pray for their beloved dead as well as for the living, for they really believe that the Holy Catholic Church is the Communion of Saints, and that we and the faithful departed are in communion one with another in the mystical Body of Christ, and that we may pray for them and they for us.

Moreover, it would seem very little to ask of any of our clergy that they should be willing to have an early celebration of the Holy Communion in their churches if a layman express a desire to have such a service; or that they should consent to hear the confession of anyone whose conscience was burdened by sin. Unfortunately, however, not all of our clergy are broad-minded enough for that; and consequently not a few of the laity are driven out and forced to take refuge in other communions of the Church where they think their spiritual needs will be better met.

Then, too, it often happens that some of the clergy who are going beyond the strict letter of the Prayer Book in the extra devotions they offer to their people,—although they are acting in harmony with the greater mind of the Catholic Church,—are harassed by their bishop, until they too are forced to look elsewhere for a commission to preach and practise what they assume to be the whole Christian religion.

Why should we drive them out? There might conceivably be some justification for driving out those who are less religious than the Prayer Book requires; though such action could hardly be expected from a wise and loving mother. But what possible justification can there be for driving out earnest Christian priests and laymen just because they appear to be a little more religious than the Prayer Book demands? The Anglican Communion is not the whole Church, and has never claimed to be. Therefore, our Prayer Book cannot be treated from the Roman point of view—as if it were a complete liturgical hand-book for the whole Catholic Church. The Prayer Book sets forth statements of Catholic faith and practice, having in mind always the larger background of the Catholic Church. Rome may deny that other sections of Christendom are parts of the Catholic Church; we may not.

The Anglican Episcopate both in England and America has been altogether too much given to discourage anything which is a little in advance of their previous practice. Fear of "what it may lead to" is an absurd theological motive. What about the leading of the Holy Spirit? If, as we believe, He is working in our part of the Church, to correct our defects and restore our ruins, and lead us into all the truth, is it not rather presumptuous for any bishop to put obstacles in the way of our becoming more in harmony with the rest of the Catholic Church?

There is one other class whom we often feel called upon to persecute: those who have become restless and impatient under the doctrinal limitations of the Prayer Book. For one reason or another they have for the time found it difficult to hold a particular article of the Creed or to submit to the Church's disciplinary requirements. They have been momentarily upset by the last book of a clever heretic, or troubled by the Church's attitude to contemporary social or political conditions. Or perhaps their studies have led them tentatively to accept a theological position clearly inconsistent with the Church's faith.

Sometimes these men voluntarily withdraw from the ministry of the Church; or, if laymen, from her communion. They feel that they are no longer in sympathy with the formularies of the Church, and that therefore it would be insincere in them to remain. However much we may regret that they have come to reject the teachings of the Church, yet it cannot be said we have driven them out. If they regard their inability to accept the faith and discipline of the Church as permanent, they have taken the honorable course. If, however, they do not withdraw of their own free will, what is to be done? Of course the simplest and quickest remedy is to arrange a heresy trial and rid ourselves of these tares that are endangering the wheat, although it is just possible that we may have some hesitation in taking such measures when we remember our Lord's advice in the parable of the tares to "let both grow together until the harvest".

Aside from the wisdom of obeying our Lord's command, is there not much to be said in favor of His method on the ground of expediency? Even supposing that a priest might by his heretical teaching lead astray a whole congregation, is it not better to give him free rein for the moment than to make a martyr of him by a heresy trial? If we convict him of heresy and drive him out of the Church, there is a real danger that many of the faithful in his congregation will remain fervent believers in his heresy to the end of their lives. Would it not be wiser for the authorities to permit him to go on teaching and writing, and in the meantime call upon scholars who hold the old faith to defend it and make all men see that it is rational and true while the heresy in question is irrational and false? It would not be many years before the influence of this particular heretic would be forgotten. "Truth is might and will prevail." If any part of the Church cannot produce orthodox scholars in sufficient numbers to defend her faith against all heretical attacks her candlestick ought soon to be removed from her. A continuous controversy between different schools of theology betokens a far healthier ecclesiastical life than a rigid uniformity on the surface with heretical influences burrowing underground and out of sight.

It ought to be reassuring to timid souls to read what the late Henry Scott Holland had to say on this subject in his paper on The Nineteenth Century in that valuable symposium entitled Our Place in Christendom. Speaking of the failure of the Court of Appeal to settle the "Essays and Reviews" controversy, he continues thus:

> "The way of law and repression was thus blocked for those especially who held most strongly the authoritative rights of the Church to speak on such dogmatic issues. And we fell back, perforce, on the purgative methods of open debate. This was not due to a deliberate choice. Owing to the accident of the Court of Appeal being out of gear, there was really no alternative. But perhaps now, looking back on our troubled passage, and comparing its results with the piteous wreckage that has accompanied the counter method of repression as it has been brought to bear by Rome on its modernist priests, we can better afford to put up with all the tangles and disturbances and perplexities which are inevitably involved in our own way of treating the crisis by loose, public, irregular debate. The cruel and stupid mishandling of Cardinal Newman by the Curia, the distressing disclosures made in the autobiographies of Loisy and Tyrrell, are but samples of what has happened but too often in France and Italy. These records have all left a very dismal impression. Here in England one great heroic Roman Catholic layman holds on in a precarious way, and profoundly influences our religious and philosophical thinking. It is difficult to exaggerate our intellectual debt to Baron Von Hügel. But the priesthood on which the repression tells is sadly sterilized, and from it, at present here in England, we get hardly any contribution to our critical and speculative problems. There is a singular dearth of men of distinction. Oddly enough, the supreme weapon that authority had forged for itself is kept studiously idle, in spite of all the obvious opportunities offered for its exercise. There can hardly have ever been a time in which intellectual and moral disturbance more strenuously demanded the help of an infallible judgment than the forty-five years that have elapsed since the Vatican Coun> cil of 1870. Yet not once in all the troubles has the Infallible Voice actually spoken. . . . After all, whatever the legitimate forms through which the authority of the Church should find expression, it is the whole body of believers who have, finally, to determine the decision for themselves. For the judgment of the strongest council has to win its way to ratification by gaining general assent. There is no easy royal road by which to arrive at ultimate certainty in disputed verities. It involves bitter travail of soul. And we will not be afraid to go through the pains that our fathers bore before us."

"God hath not given us the spirit of fear; but of power, and of love, and of a sound mind". The life of the American Episcopal Church today contains too many evidences of the spirit of fear. On the other hand, we are in grave danger of expelling the spirit of power, when we persecute strong sacramentarians who are inclined to be more religious than the Prayer Book requires. We are in danger of expelling the spirit of love, when we drive out all who are fighting for social justice and trying to apply the healing remedies of the Gospel to our diseased social conditions. We are in danger of expelling the spirit of a sound mind, when we rely upon excommunication rather than upon sound scholarship in contending against heretics. We need all the sacramentarians we have, we need all the Christian Socialists we have, and while we may not need the heretics, we do need scholars who can confute their heresy. Unless we can learn to be more kindly and loving and tolerant we shall rapidly degenerate into a hopelessly provincial, narrow-minded and cold-hearted branch of the Church.

A Great Step Toward Reunion

By ROBERT H. GARDINER

THE second Ad Interim Report of the Sub-Committee of the Archbishops' Committee and the Free Church Commissions in England on the World Conference on Faith and Order is a remarkable and valuable document. It is insular, for even the war has not yet given England, except perhaps the Labor Party, a world-wide horizon, but, though this report is local, it deals with one of the great issues between Protestants and Anglicans and so will be of value to the English-speaking countries of the world. From the point of view of the original plan of the World Conference, this remarkable statement of agreement on a point which has been sharply and bitterly divisive may be premature, but an agreement on such a question in a country where that division has been acute, embittered also by distinctions of class and politics, should have great influence elsewhere. The whole Anglican Communion looks with deference to the Mother Church in England, and so, though not to the same extent, do the Non-Anglican Protestant Communions in English-speaking countries, even in the United States, to the Free Churches in England. If after centuries of bitter hostility and mutual oppression the Churches in England can agree on the question which has been their chief casus belli, surely that agreement can be reached in the rest of the world where the controversy, not accentuated as in England by other considerations, has not been so bitter.

Speaking broadly, and therefore of course not accurately, Protestantism stands for the individualistic, Catholicism for the corporate, conception of the Christian religion. Each is needed to complete the other, for without individuals the Body has no members and without the Body individuals have no common life. Though not in terms, yet in substance, this report, adopted unanimously after three or four years of careful, prayerful thought and discussion, by five leading Anglicans, of different schools of thought, and by five distinguished Free Churchmen of the Baptist, Congregational, Presbyterian and Wesleyan Communions, restores the primitive and simple historic Episcopate to its proper place as a co-ordination of the individualistic and corporate conceptions of the Church. For the bishop stands, as an individual, for the preacher, the teacher, the leader, that is, for the Protestant conception of the minister as the officer chosen by the local congregation, but, on the other hand, he is only the organ through which the whole Body of the Church speaks and acts locally. The Sacraments were entrusted to the whole Church, and it is the whole Church, preserved and perpetuated among men by an orderly succession of officers, which acts, not the individuals who from time to time comprise that succession. So in the Episcopate, as this committee sees it, will be preserved all the value of the great prophets and scholars and leaders whom God has inspired to reveal Him to the world, and the Body of the Church, undivided, will be the custodian of the special Sacramental grace.

But more important than the agreement as to the Episcopate is the statement by the committee of the two convictions by which they were guided. The divisions of Christianity have been perpetuated by despair of visible unity, and that despair has been the inevitable outgrowth of the idea, shared alike by Catholics and Protestants, that reunion is a matter for human arrangement and ecclesiastical concordats. Because the committee were convinced that "the visible unity of believers which answers to our Lord's purpose must have its source and sanction, not in any human arrangements, but in the will of the One Father, manifested in the Son, and effected through the operation of the Spirit," they had faith in the possibility of the accomplishment of our Lord's purpose that believers in Him should be one visible society, and vision to perceive that this unity is essential to His purpose for His Church and for its effective witness and work in the world. It marks a great advance that God's will, not man's, should be put first.

Having thus submitted themselves to God's will and therefore seeing the possibility of visible unity, they could understand and appreciate each the value of the other's position and so they could admit the value of Episcopacy in the greater part of Christendom as the recognized organ of the unity and continuity of the Church, while also acknowledging that Churches not accepting the Episcopal order have been used by the Holy Spirit and that the acceptance of Episcopacy on the terms suggested should not involve any Christian community in the necessity of disowning its past.

The underlying note of the report is its deep humility, its Christian love and earnest desire to lay aside all partisanship. The "faults of pride and self-sufficiency," for which our General Convention in 1910 apologized so amply in suggesting the World Conference, have been overcome in this report, and its spirit should be emulated by the other commissions in preparing their statements for the World Conference. If it is taken as seriously as it should be, it may affect deeply the preparations for the Conference. It has always been manifest that if the Churches would take up seriously the effort to understand and appreciate each other in the preparations for the Conference, the need for the Conference might pass away. The road to reunion is the way of love, the only way for Christ's men.

The form of the report leaves something to be desired. It is too much in the form of an ecclesiastical concordat without appeal to the great numbers of men and women from whose eyes the vision of the King in His beauty has been hidden by the smoke and dust of sectarian controversies. Our Lord's prayer for unity was intensely practical and full of common sense. Statements with regard to reunion should be the positive, evangelistic proclamations of a living faith, and not merely ecclesiastical concordats to adjust past controversies. They should be composed for the world, not only for ecclesiastics. They should be based on theology, for true theology is the profoundest exercise of sound, though finite, reason, but we must translate our formal theology into terms of life.

Towards Christian Unity

A MOVEMENT has been initiated in America by the Protestant Episcopal Church, which has been widely taken up by the Christian churches in the United States, to prepare for a world-wide conference on Faith and Order with the view of promoting the visible unity of the Body of Christ on earth. In response to an appeal from those who are co-operating in America a committee was appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York and commissions by the Free Churches to promote the same movement in England.

This Joint Conference has already issued a First Interim Report prepared by a Joint Sub-Committee, consisting of:—(1) A statement of agreement on matters of Faith; (2) A statement of agreement on matters relating to Order; (3) A statement of differences in relation to matters of Order which require further study and discussion.

In further pursuit of the main purpose the sub-committee was reappointed and enlarged. After mature and prolonged consideration it is hereby issuing its Second Interim Report under the direction of the Conference as a whole, but on the understanding that the members of the sub-committee alone are to be held responsible for the substance of the document.

* * * *

In issuing our Second Interim Report we desire to prevent possible misconceptions regarding our intentions. We are engaged, not in formulating any basis of reunion for Christendom, but in preparing for the consideration of such a basis at the projected Conference on Faith and Order. We are exploring the ground in order to discover the ways of approach to the questions to be considered that seem most promising and hopeful. In our first report we were not attempting to draw up a creed for subscription, but desired to affirm our agreement upon certain foundation truths as the basis of a spiritual and rational creed and life for all mankind in Christ Jesus the Lord. It was a matter of profound gratitude to God that we found ourselves so far in agreement. No less grateful were we that even as regards matters relating to Order we were able to hold certain common convictions, though in regard to these we were forced to recognize differences of interpretation. We felt deeply, however, that we could not let the matter rest there; but that we must in conference seek to understand one another better, in order to discover if even on the questions on which we seemed to differ most we might not come to one another.

1. In all our discussions we were guided by two convictions from which we could not escape, and would not, even if we could.

> It is the purpose of our Lord that believers in Him should be one visible society, and this unity is essential to the purpose of Christ for His Church and for its effective witness and work in the world. The conflict among Christian nations has brought home to us with a greater poignancy the disastrous results of the divisions which prevail among Christians, inasmuch as they have hindered that growth of mutual understanding which it should be the function of the Church to foster, and because a Church which is itself divided cannot speak effectively to a divided world.

This is the Second Interim Report of a Sub-Committee appointed by the Archbishops of Canterbury and York's Committee and by Representatives of the English Free Churches' Commissions, in connection with the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order.

The visible unity of believers which answers to our Lord's purpose must have its source and sanction, not in any human arrangements, but in the will of the One Father, manifested in the Son, and effected through the operation of the Spirit; and it must express and maintain the fellowship of His people with one another in Him. Thus the visible unity of the Body of Christ is not adequately expressed in the co-operation of the Christian Churches for moral influence and social service, though such co-operation might with great advantage be carried much further than it is at present; it could only be fully realized through community of worship, faith and order, including common participation in the Lord's Supper. This would be quite compatible with a rich diversity in life and worship.

2. In suggesting the conditions under which this visible unity might be realized we desire to set aside for the present the abstract discussion of the origin of the Episcopate historically, or its authority doctrinally; and to secure for that discussion when it comes, as it must come, at the conference, an atmosphere congenial not to controversy, but to agreement. This can be done only by facing the actual situation in order to discover if any practical proposals could be made that would bring the Episcopal and Non-Episcopal Communions nearer to one another. Further, the proposals are offered not as a basis for immediate action, but for the sympathetic and generous consideration of all the Churches.

The first fact which we agree to acknowledge is that the position of Episcopacy in the greater part of Christendom as the recognized organ of the unity and continuity of the Church, is such that the members of the Episcopal Churches ought not to be expected to abandon it in assenting to any basis of reunion.

The second fact which we agree to acknowledge is that there are a number of Christian Churches not accepting the Episcopal order which have been used by the Holy Spirit in His work of enlightening the world, converting sinners, and perfecting saints. They came into being through reaction from grave abuses in the Church at the time of their origin, and were led in response to fresh apprehensions of divine truth to give expression to certain types of Christian experience, aspiration and fellowship, and to secure rights of the Christian people which had been neglected or denied.

In view of these two facts, if the visibl unity so much desired within the Church and so necessary for the testimony an influence of the Church in the world i ever to be realized, it is imperative tha the Episcopal and Non-Episcopal Com munions shall approach one another no by the method of human compromise, bu in correspondence with God's own way o reconciling differences in Christ Jesus What we desire to see is not grudging con cession, but a willing acceptance for th common enrichment of the united Churc of the wealth distinctive of each.

Looking as frankly and as widely as pos sible at the whole situation, we desire wit a due sense of responsibility to submit fo the serious consideration of all the part of a divided Christendom what seem t us the necessary conditions of any possi bility of reunion:

1. That continuity with the historic Episcopate should be effectively preserved.

2. That in order that the rights and responsibilities of the whole Christian community in the government of the Church may be adequately recognized, the Episcopate should reassume a constitutional form, both as regards the method of the election of the bishop as by clergy and people, and the method of government after election. It is perhaps necessary that we should call to mind that such was the primitive ideal and practice of Episcopacy and it so remains in many Episcopal communions today.

3. That acceptance of the fact of Episcopacy and not any theory as to its character should be all that is asked for. We think that this may be the more easily taken for granted as the acceptance of any such theory is not now required of ministers of the Church of England. It would no doubt be necessary before any arrangement for corporate reunion could be made to discuss the exact functions which it may be agreed to recognize as belonging to the Episcopate, but we think this can be left to the future.

The acceptance of Episcopacy on thes terms should not involve any Christia community in the necessity of disownin its past, but should enable all to maintai the continuity of their witness and influenc as heirs and trustees of types of Christia thought, life and order, not only of valu to themselves but of value to the Churc as a whole. Accordingly we hope and de sire that each of these Communions woul bring its own distinctive contribution, nc only to the common life of the Churc but also to its methods of organizatio and that all that is true in the experienc and testimony of the uniting Communion would be conserved to the Church. Withi such a recovered unity we should agre in claiming that the legitimate freedom o prophetic ministry should be carefully pre served; and in anticipating that many cus toms and institutions which have been de veloped in separate communities may b preserved within the larger unity of whic they have come to form a part.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

BOARD OF MISSIONS TAKES FINANCIAL FORWARD STEP

Mr. Roberts Resigns; Dean White Appointed Domestic Secretary

New York City.—Matters of unusual importance were acted on by the Board of Missions at their meeting here last week both in regard to the financial end of the administration and the personnel of the executive force.

In the first place the Board had the satisfaction of welcoming Bishop Lloyd on his return from Liberia and of hearing his report. This report has been promised to The Churchman for later publication. By a resolution unanimously carried the President of the Board was urged to present the call and claim of the Church in Liberia as widely as possible.

Apparently the only difference which Bishop Lloyd could find between the Liberians and the citizens of the United States was that their skins are darker than ours. The striking development of the Negro in this little West African republic Bishop Lloyd attributes to the fact that here he is not nursed by any benevolent despotism but is economically and intellectually independent. The Bishop feels that the Church has never wasted a penny in his mission and that, while wonderful results have been attained, the future holds larger possibilities in store if only the American Church will rise to her opportunity. He recommends a native bishop with a white missionary as adviser.

To the great surprise of all the members of the Board, Mr. E. Walter Roberts, who for forty-two years has been on the official staff, offered his resignation. The following expression of regret and appreciation was presented by a special committee of which the Bishop of New York was chairman, and was unanimously adopted:

In accepting the resignation of Mr. E. Walter Roberts as Assistant Treasurer of the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, the Board of Missions desires to express and place on record its grateful appreciation of the long-continued, faithful and intelligent service which he has rendered during the forty-two years of his official connection with the missionary work of the Church. Mr. Roberts came into the service of the Society in December, 1876, as cashier of the Foreign Committee and Assistant to the Treasurer, and was shortly thereafter elected Assistant Treasurer of the Foreign Committee. When the Domestic and Foreign Committees were merged in 1885, Mr. Roberts was elected Assistant Treasurer of the Society, which position he has since held covering a period of thirty-three years. During this time Mr. Roberts has been associated with six Treasurers. In addition to the fidelity and efficiency with which he has discharged his official duties, he has contributed in many ways to the inauguration of improved methods, in furtherance of the missionary work. The suggestion of an apportionment plan was advocated by him many years before it was adopted by the General Convention in 1901. It was he who devised the popular pyramid and keystone Lenten Offering boxes and also introduced the present Letter of Credit System of the Society, instead of Bankers Letters of Credit by which "Dollar Exchange" was first established wherever we have mission work, and the credit of the Society thus proved to be good on both sides of the globe. In thus expressing its keen appreciation of the services of Mr. Roberts, the Board indulges the earnest hope that God will spare him many years in which he may still render useful service in the work of the Church, in the extension of the Master's Kingdom.

Mr. Charles A. Tompkins, Treasurer of the Diocese of Rhode Island, was appointed Assistant Treasurer to succeed Mr. Roberts.

Since the last meeting of the Board Mr. Henry Lewis Morris, Mr. William R. Stirling and Mr. Charles G. Saunders have died, all of whom served for many years as valuable members of the Board. Suitable memorials were adopted. Mr. Robert S. Brewster of New York was appointed in place of Mr. Saunders.

Undesignated Legacies Distributed

Among the important matters recommended by the Executive Committee to the Board was the distribution of the Undesignated Legacy Fund accumulated during the year 1916-17. This fund amounted to over $268,000, $100,000 of which was set aside as a permanent fund from the principal of which loans may be made to the various mission fields. Fifty thousand dollars was held for the present to be added to the Undesignated Legacies received during the present fiscal year for disbursement in whole or in part in January, 1919. The balance was distributed in various sums both to the foreign and domestic field—about $65,000 in the domestic field and about $40,000 in the foreign.

The appropriations for the fiscal year beginning January 1, 1919, were made at this meeting, amounting in all to $1,873,673; a decrease of about $6,000 over the present appropriations. Owing to the larger number of students in St. Augustine's School, Raleigh, North Carolina, and the greatly increased cost of running the school, an appropriation of $5,000 was added to that already made towards its running expenses.

An important proposition from the Bishop in charge of Haiti to extend our work there and to secure additional property was presented and cordially approved.

The salaries of missionary bishops have remained static for a long time. This matter was taken into consideration at the last General Convention and has been the subject of considerable thought by the Board. A resolution was adopted making an increase of $600 per annum in the salary of each of the continental domestic missionary bishops beginning July 1, 1918. The question of making an increase in the salaries of those in Latin-America, the Philippines, Honolulu and Alaska was taken under consideration.

A very important communication from the Woman's Auxiliary concerning their plan for war work was considered and accepted with the following resolution:

Resolved: That the Board of Missions has heard with profound gratitude the plan of the Woman's Auxiliary for war work. It feels that such an effort is of vital importance at this time. It respectfully urges the bishops and clergy to co-operate in every way in their power to make it effective in their respective dioceses and parishes."

REQUIRED GREEK, ELECTIVE HEBREW, COUNCIL DECIDES

Bishop May Ordain Any Man If He Stays In Diocese

New York City.—All ministers in full standing must have Greek. The study of Hebrew is to be one of many electives. A bishop may ordain any man at any time, but he must remain in his diocese until he has passed all examinations of a Normal Standard.

These and many other important conclusions were determined at the fifth meeting of the Council on the Education of Postulants and Candidates for the Ministry, held at the General Seminary May 1 and 2. Twenty-six of the thirty-four members were present. The Rev. Dr. Harry P. Nichols, Examining Chaplain of the Diocese of New York, was chairman, and eleven seminaries, eight provinces and various interests within the Church were represented.

The sessions of the Council were enlivened by many amusing situations. Mr. Zabriskie in his first remarks to the Council gave a semi-apology for a layman speaking among so many theological experts. He said: "I think we must all allow that when even eminent physicians are in consultation, they are glad to receive suggestions from any source, even from the patient."

At another time one of the members, speaking of the seminaries vehemently urged that certain ideas were maintained in every standard cemetery of the country.

The recent meeting was the end of the first stage of the Council's work. Dean Bartlett, Chairman of the Committee on Normal Standards, presented a report embodying the results of the Council's discussions to date. This report received final amendments and suggestions and in the end was adopted as representing the majority opinion of the Council.

This report will now go to the Council's Committee on Formulation of a Canon.

The report contains five principles as follows:

1. There shall be a full Normal Standard, formulated by Canon, mandatory in character, put to the fore as descriptive of the Church's mind, and expressed in simple and general terms intended to indicate subjects only.

Before ordination to the Priesthood the candidate must pass examinations in the following subjects:

1. Holy Scripture: The Bible in English; the New Testament in Greek; History of the Canon; Introduction to and Contents of the various Books; Biblical History; Exegesis. 2. Church History: from the beginning to the present time; together with special knowledge of a chosen period. 3. Doctrine: The Contents of the Christian Faith, with the Evidences therefor. 4. Christian Ethics: including Practical Psychology and Practical Sociology. 5. Liturgics: The History and Principles of Christian Worship; the Contents and Use of the Book of Common Prayer. 6. Ecclesiastical Polity and Canon Law, with special knowledge of the Constitution and Canons of the General Convention and of the diocese to which the candidate belongs. 7. Ministration: (a) Conduct of Public

Worship, with the proper use of the voice therein. (b) Preaching. (c) Pastoral Care. (d) Parish Organization and Administration, including the keeping of accounts. (e) Religious Education. (f) The Missionary Work of the Church: its claim, its extent, and its methods.

Before admission to the Diaconate it shall suffice if the candidate shall pass examinations in the following portions of the requirements set forth for admission to the Priesthood; and, if advanced to the Priesthood, he shall not be re-examined in these subjects or portions of subjects:

1. Holy Scripture. The Bible in English: Contents and Interpretation of the various Books; Biblical History. 2. Church History: a general outline, together with the history of this American Church. 3. Doctrine: the Elements of Christian Doctrine. 4. Liturgics: the Contents and Use of the Book of Common Prayer. 5. Constitution and Canons of the General Convention and of the diocese to which the candidate belongs. 6. Ministration: (a) Conduct of Public Worship, with the proper use of the voice therein. (b) Preaching. (c) Religious Education.

2. To the above Normal Standard one more requirement should be made: That the candidate must offer at least one elective, and if dispensed from Greek, two electives. The following subjects were suggested and accepted:

Old Testament in Hebrew; Advanced Exegesis of Greek New Testament; Biblical Criticism; Biblical Theology; History of Religion; Sociology; Psychology; Christian Archaeology; Christian Biography; Church Music: its History, Theory and Practice; and as a concluding elective, "Work of a specialized and advanced character in any recognized field of study."

This provision of electives makes possible some degree of specialization in the preparation for the Ministry.

3. There shall be a Minimum Standard which shall be sufficiently low and elastic to meet all proper actual needs and conditions. This Standard shall be reached by a process of obvious subtraction and departure from the full Normal Standard, and shall be strictly limited to well-defined classes of cases. These classes are suggested as follows:

4. (a) Men of thirty years or over may be admitted candidates if they satisfy the bishop and the examining chaplains that they possess good mental ability and a sufficient mastery of the usual branches of secondary learning. They may be ordained to the Diaconate upon satisfactorily passing the examinations prescribed for the Diaconate, provided they shall have been candidates for at least one year. They may be advanced to the Priesthood without further examination—provided they shall have served two years in the Diaconate with repute and success.

(b) Men of other race or speech may be admitted as candidates, ordained deacon and advanced to the Priesthood, under similar provisions with the further condition that they pass a special examination in the history and government of the United States.

(c) The bishop of any diocese or missionary district, subject to the usual consent and approval of the Standing Committee or Council of Advice, may, at his discretion, ordain to the Diaconate any candidate who shall have satisfied the examining chaplains that he possesses sufficient knowledge of (a) the Contents and Interpretation of the Books of Holy Scripture, (b) the Doctrines of this Church, and (c) the Contents and Use of the Book of Common Prayer; and he may also advance a deacon, so ordained, to the Priesthood, without further examination, if the said deacon shall have served with repute and success at least two years in the Diaconate: Provided only, that no deacon or priest so ordained shall be permitted to exercise his ministry outside of the diocese or district in which he was ordained, until and unless he shall have passed in full the examinations required under the Normal Standard.

5. That the detailed recognition of the range and extent of subjects of examinations which will be necessary to make the Canon workable should, as hitherto, be left to the bishops and examining chaplains, subject to three provisos:

(a) That the office, duties, appointment and tenure of examining chaplains shall be defined and standardized by Canon.

(b) That dioceses or districts composing a province may appoint representatives from Boards of Examining Chaplains to form a Provincial Board of Examining Chaplains, and that it shall be competent for such Provincial Board to prepare a syllabus indicating the range and character of the attainments required in the several subjects, and also to prepare question papers for written examinations. This syllabus and these papers may be adopted, subject to the approval of the bishop, by diocesan examining chaplains.

(c) That the Theological Department of the General Board of Religious Education may be authorized to advise and counsel with the Boards of Examining Chaplains and assist them in making more effective the required examinations for entrance to the Ministry.

One of the outstanding events in the meeting of the Council was the Minority Report submitted by Dr. Dickinson Miller of the General Theological Seminary. The substance of this report appeared two weeks ago in an article by Dr. Miller in THE CHURCHMAN. After discussion the Council voted to include Practical Psychology and Practical Sociology under the topic of Christian Ethics.

The Council attended Evensong in the chapel on Wednesday, and a Corporate Communion on Thursday morning.

Prayer Services in Philadelphia

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.—Women's organizations have indorsed the project of midday prayers for soldiers, sailors and war workers, and a largely attended prayer service was held from 12:30 to 1 o'clock last Friday in the Church of the Holy Trinity. Bishop Rhinelander officiated at this service of prayer and intercession for women war workers. Prayers were offered for the soldiers and sailors, the President of the United States and Congress and a petition made for victory for the United States and her Allies.

Members of the American Red Cross, women's committee of the Council of National Defense, National League for Women's Service, Navy League and Emergency Aid of Pennsylvania attended. It was the most notable prayer service for women ever held in this city.

The Rev. Dr. William Henry Roberts, stated clerk of the Presbyterian General Assembly, represented the Presbyterian Church.

Missionaries Appointed by Board

NEW YORK CITY.—At the meeting of the Executive Committee on May 7 preceding the meeting of the Board of Missions, the following appointments were made:

For St. Luke's Hospital, Ponce, Porto Rico, Mrs. Edward H. Rafter; for the Diocese of West Texas, the Rev. L. W. Heaton; for St. Andrew's Priory School, Honolulu, Miss Nina Ledbetter (who graduated from St. Faith's last Thursday); for Ketchikan, Alaska, Mr. Richard C. Jenkins; for St. Luke's Hospital, Tokyo, Dr. Peer M. Lund. An appropriation was made for training Miss Pauline Flint at the New York Training School for Deaconesses.

"KEEP BURNING FLAME OF WRATH," SAYS DR. MANNIN

Trinity Rector Preaches Stirrin Lusitania Day Sermon

NEW YORK CITY.—On Lusitania Day, great service under the auspices of vario patriotic societies was held in Trini Church. In the chancel with the rect were the chaplains of these societies. Tl Rev. Howard Duffield, D.D., pastor of t Old First Presbyterian Church, read t lesson. The choral service was based on t Burial Office.

Dr. Manning in his sermon said in par

"On the third anniversary of this crin on this day, which we should ever remer ber as Lusitania Day, we consecrate ou selves anew to the great task which is la upon us.

"We pledge ourselves afresh to give o time, our strength, our money, all that w are and have, to crush and destroy this fo and monstrous Thing which has arisen the earth, which bears the name of Pru sianism and to put an end to it forever.

"We pledge ourselves that we will n stay nor rest nor fail, we will have no fal ing short, nor abatement, nor compromi until this task is done.

"We will keep these vile deeds and brut wrongs plainly before our minds. We w not allow them to fall out of sight nor l forgotten. We will keep burning in o hearts the flame of fierce and righteo wrath against them and against those wh still continue to commit and exult in then a wrath which nothing shall be allowed t dull or dampen until these deeds have be atoned for so far as may be, and their pe petrators have been made incapable of co tinuing or repeating them."

Dr. Manning spoke with considerab scorn of those who think we must not dwe on the wrongs which Germany has don and who say we must carry on the w "without moral passion." "These people he said, "will bear watching."

"In reality this vapid sentimentality a spurious charity is as far off from Chri tianity as light is from darkness. It essentially unrighteous and thoroughly in moral. . . . . .

"As true Americans, as true men a women and as true Christians we have r right to be tolerant of the things whic Germany has done. We must keep the flam of our moral indignation hot and burnin We owe this to the world, to ourselves a to those who have so deeply suffered f the right. We owe this also to Germa herself. It is the stern condemnation her acts by the moral judgment of t world as well as our combined force arms which will at last bring Germany realization and repentance."

Dr. Manning dwelt at length on the fa that "those who represent Prussianism ca not be trusted."

"There can be no peace in this world unt the Prussian power is broken. And th power can be broken only by decisive d feat on the field of battle. Until that accomplished all talk of peace is either da gerous fanaticism or thinly disguised tre son. It breaks down the morale and weal ens the spirit of our people. Until Pru sianism is overthrown no treaty und heaven is worth the paper it is written on

50 PROTESTANT CHURCHES BOMBARDED IN FRANCE

Letter Reveals High Courage of Those in Charge

About fifty of the Protestant churches of Northern France have been under bombardment since the beginning of the war. The following letter written from Nancy, early in March, 1918, is characteristic of the deep religious faith of the Protestant people of France and their devotion to liberty and justice:

My Dear Friend:

The bombardment of ——— has been terrific; it lasted from half past six p. m. till midnight, and has been of surpassing violence after all the previous bombings. No quarters of the town have been spared, with the fortunate exception of the quarter in which ——— is living. We had, so far as we are concerned, to account for a new disaster in our church.

You know that, thanks to the generous gifts from the General Committee and the Protestant Rehousing Committee, to which other gifts had been added by generous friends, we had been able approximately to secure the most urgent repairs of the roofing.

An aerial torpedo fell into the manse garden and the Assembly Halls, making an excavation twelve or fifteen feet wide, and destroyed everything again. The shutters, the windows, outer and inner doors were torn down with an incredible violence and practically smashed; the cupboards are emptied of their contents and broken, the ceilings are pitifully hanging and the roof is again widely torn open. In the church, the remnants of the stained glass have been reduced to atoms, and nothing remains save shapeless wrecks and pieces of mortar, covering the soil, mixed with the tiles and all kinds of rubbish.

You can understand how I was upset by that new trial; it resulted in seventeen dead and an unknown number of wounded. Among the victims is a member of our church, an engineer of the electric station, killed with his wife. There have been dramatic scenes it would be too long to tell here.

Our poor town is now in a dreary condition. The Germans warned us they would destroy it.

At any rate they will not be able to destroy France, which will remain as alive as ever after such a hard trial. "Fluctuat; nec mergitur."

Our faith is our support, with the assurance that after having ploughed us so deeply God will grant us better days.

STEWARDSHIP CAMPAIGN

War Program of Movement Launched This Year by L. M. M.

New York City.—The Laymen's Missionary Movement is planning to emphasize this year the principles and need for the practice of Christian Stewardship. A special committee has made a thorough investigation and report on the whole question, and there is general agreement that the time is ripe for this special emphasis. This statement of principles is made by the committee:

1. God is the owner of all things.
2. Man is a steward and must account for all that is entrusted to him.
3. God's ownership and man's stewardship ought to be acknowledged.
4. This acknowledgment involves the setting apart, for the extension of the Kingdom of Christ, of such a definite portion of income as is recognized by the individual to be the will of the Divine Owner.

Today marks the churches' opportunity to reach the hearts of men, but no work is possible without funds to back it. Seeing its opportunity, therefore, the church is faced with the twofold problem of first inaugurating a general stewardship movement to increase giving, and then of wisely administering those funds.

Present methods have proved their inefficiency. Systematic habits of proportionate giving are the solution for lax church finances and for lax principles of giving on the part of the individual church member.

This movement is taking in all communions with varying rapidity. It is incorporated in the Men and Missions Movement, the Five Year Program, and in the Million Dollar Campaign of the Northern Baptist Convention, the Southern Presbyterian Stewardship Campaign, the Methodist Centennial Campaign for Eighty Million Dollars, etc.

C. T. S. OWL LUNCH CAR FEEDS BATTERY GUARD

Red Cross Director Sends Letter of Thanks to Society

New York City.—Here is another instance of how the lunch wagons of the Church Temperance Society are called upon in emergencies. Captain Keener with a detachment of soldiers is guarding the Red Cross pier and warehouses in Battery Place. The matter of feeding the men properly was a serious problem. So Captain Keener sent an S. O. S. call up to the Woman's Auxiliary of the Church Temperance Society at the Diocesan House on Lafayette Street. Within a few hours one of the lunch wagons was turned over to serve as a canteen for the men on guard.

Miss Graham, the secretary, received the following letter of acknowledgment from the director:

THE AMERICAN RED CROSS
National Clearing House
New York
New York City, April 29, 1918.

Miss H. K. Graham, Secretary, Woman's Auxiliary Church Temperance Society.

My Dear Miss Graham:

I want to thank you and your society for your great kindness in allowing your Owl Lunch Car in Battery Place to be used by the company of soldiers under Captain Keener, guarding our Red Cross pier and warehouses.

The matter of properly feeding these soldiers under the best conditions seemed to be a difficult problem with us, but you have come to the rescue and the men are now happy and being well taken care of.

Again assuring you of our great appreciation of your kindness in assisting us, I beg to remain,

Very sincerely yours,
Clyde A. Pratt,
Director.

GIFTS AND MEMORIALS

On Easter Day a handsome altar book was presented to Trinity church, Asbury Park, New Jersey, as a memorial to the Rev. Dr. Scott Kidder, by his parents, the Rev. and Mrs. Charles Holland Kidder. An inside page was beautifully illuminated by his sister, Martha A. Kidder. It was blessed and used for the first time by the rector, the Rev. Francis H. Richey, at the early Easter Celebration of the Holy Communion.

SEND YOUR MAGAZINES TO OUR MEN AT THE FRONT

But Don't Do it in the Lazy Fashion, Says C. P. C.

New York City.—The following quotations are from mail received at the office of the Church Periodical Club during the past week:

"I hope that you will be able to render me much-needed aid in the way of reading matter. The men, especially those in hospital, are starved for magazines."

"There is so much to be done and very little to do with here, that at times one becomes discouraged."

"The soldiers in the hospitals are almost entirely without reading matter, and will be exceedingly grateful for any magazines of interest to them."

"The magazines are appreciated and enjoyed, they have done full service in the wards. The eternal cry is, 'Have you any magazines?'"

"We always need and appreciate any literature we can get. That is one thing which we have not very much of."

"A spare copy of Judge or Life would pave the way for a little comedy on these rainy days and would surely be acceptable."

"Any good literature that you may send us will be eagerly sought for by the fellows."

"These words are a definite challenge to every man and woman in the Church and there is exactly one way in which they can meet it, the way of personal service," said Miss Mary E. Thomas. "Do not give your magazines to any general agency. Do not send them unaddressed with a one-cent stamp. These methods may serve for those who have no other, but they are not good enough for you, who have an organization that can put you in direct touch with the definite needs of your fellow Churchmen who are serving their country. Do not hoard your magazines until they are a year, or even three months, old. Transportation is slow, and they will be none too fresh, at best, when they reach their destination. Ask your C. P. C. officer, or failing her, the Church Periodical Club, 2 West Forty-seventh Street, New York City, for an address, telling what periodicals you will forward, and remember that our men in camp and at the Front have as wide a range of intellectual interests as those at home. They will care for any magazine that you care for.

"Forward magazines as soon as read, wrapped, addressed and with full postage, the same at the Front as in this country, four ounces for a cent. Write a friendly note to the one to whom you are sending. You may receive an acknowledgment and you may not. This is unimportant compared with the fact that as the mails come in the man to whom you are sending has tangible proof that the Church at home is taking thought for him and backing his work.

"If your magazines are already going to relatives or friends, or if they are pledged to the regular C. P. C. recipients—and we do not want those given up—try to afford one more subscription. We cannot all enlist for direct service, but everyone of us can send a magazine."

MISSIONARY CAN'T ATTEMPT TO HUSTLE HISPANIOLA

But School of Nineteen Children Grows Overnight

Everybody has heard about the dire penalty that results from hustling the East. The result of trying to hustle Hispaniola would evidently be just as serious if one can judge from the letter received last week at the Church Missions from the newly appointed missionary to Santo Domingo, the Rev. William Wyllie. This is what he says:

On Easter Day I made arrangements to leave here 12:15 noon, and stood on the corner of a street quietly nursing patience until 3:15 p. m., when the carriage arrived. The driver informed me that he was now out of gasoline but would be all ready poco tempo. Monday morning got up at 5 a. m. to leave San Isido sharp 5:30. We actually did leave at 10 a. m. and we came like the wind over nature's own thoroughfare. I made my appointments on time. I believe that if a fellow does not lose his patience and keeps on lifting his hat and looking pleasant he will make his mark. I only hope I'm the fellow. But it certainly does try the temper. This country is a good ground in which to exercise common Christian patience, and it certainly does demand fortitude. We are forging ahead and if we don't starve or wear out we will have something in the way of an establishment before long.

However, when they really want to do things with a rush, it can be done. Bishop Colmore has just sent Miss McCollough, whose splendid work in Porto Rico is known throughout the American Church, down to Santo Domingo. She arrived on Thursday. Mr. Wyllie succeeded in renting an unfurnished and unfinished house. This is what happened:

There was no time for arrangements or advertisements, but on Monday evening nineteen children arrived—all ages. After three days' hard work I made desks out of packing boxes and bought chairs, and now part of my day goes to help out teaching. We simply cannot take any more. And if we could take in the submerged tenth we would be swamped.

The need for schools and teachers is very great. The attendance at the services is very satisfactory. During Holy Week services were held daily; on Good Friday sixteen people stayed throughout the Three Hour Service. On Easter at 7 a. m. twenty white and two colored persons received the Holy Communion; at 10 a. m. eight more white people, and "the place was full of officers and men, women and children and there was one baptism."

WOMEN IN HANKOW SYNOD

Diocesan Council at Recent Meeting Votes to Admit Women Delegates

HANKOW, CHINA.—The diocesan synod met in Hankow on February 20 and adjourned on February 25 after an unusually profitable session. Delegates, about fifty altogether, were present from all the stations except those of the Shasi circuit; even the Rev. James Tsang of Shihnan arrived after a journey of sixteen days through the war zone. The principal topics considered were: the work of the Archdeacon (vote: that he should be released as soon as possible from school duties); the advisability of electing a Chinese assistant bishop (referred to special committee, to report at next synod); principles of comity, set forth in the report adopted at last meeting of the China Continuation Committee (general approval of this report and report itself referred to committee to report at next synod); representation of women in the synod and standing committee (canons were passed providing that one delegate to synod may be elected by each ten appointed foreign workers, one by each ten licensed Biblewomen, one by each ten qualified school teachers; also that women shall have night to vote for delegates to synod in parochial elections).

MISSIONS GLISTEN LIKE JEWELS

Bishop Brent Says War Emphasizes Strength of Constructive Work

NEW YORK CITY.—Bishop Brent, writing to a friend in this country, says:

"I suppose it will become public that I have been given the colossal task of organizing and administering the Chaplains' Service in the A. E. D. God knows how little I have wanted it. I had hoped and expected to get things going and then slip out. This now looks impossible. I know you will say a prayer for me occasionally.

"This furnace of destruction in which we are living burns away the flimsy things. One sees from here the strength and beauty of constructive work as never before. Missions, being super-national and built on the secure foundations of Christ's largest principles and promises, glisten like jewels."

Red-Blooded Resolutions

SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA.—In adopting vigorous resolutions of loyalty and approval of the war aims of the country, the Lackawanna Presbytery in annual session here last week gave expression to sentiment and determination that sets an example for all men, sects and societies.

The resolutions said in part:

"The presbytery of Lackawanna county renews its pledge of absolute and unreserved loyalty to the Government of the United States", say the resolutions. "It believes absolutely in the righteousness of the cause for which America is fighting and that the ideals which have been proclaimed by the President are the fundamentals necessary for the safety of the world."

"The presbytery declares its steadfast belief that there is no possible inconsistency between its sincere profession of faith in the Christian religion and its advocacy of force to the utmost in this war, and it declares also that it can not tolerate within its bounds anything but unswerving and eager loyalty."

In regard to loyalty the resolution declares:

"There is no room for two opinions in this matter. It is not possible any longer for any true American citizen, no matter what may be the country of his birth, to stand aloof from decision. Either he must be for America or against America, and unless he declares himself to be entirely for America and proves it by his deeds, the presbytery can not do otherwise than to assume that he is against America."

Church Year Mystery Plays in Rome

ROME, NEW YORK.—The Gifts of the Ascension, a mystery play by the Rev. Carroll Lund Bates, one of the series of pageants on the Church year which have been presented in Zion Church here this Winter, was given by twenty-four young men and women on the Sunday afternoon after the Ascension. The Light of the Spirit, Mr Bates' Whitsuntide pageant, is already in leaflet form, and will be presented later here.

MISSIONARY PREVENTS FIRE

Cool-Headed Bravery of the Rev Philip Williams Commended

NEW YORK CITY.—The United State Deputy Marshal at Hot Springs, Alaska, i his monthly report to the Marshal's offic at Fairbanks, says:

"While the gasoline lamp was bein lighted at the Hot Springs Roadhouse o the evening of February 13, some flamin alcohol dropped from the generating torc onto the floor, igniting a can of gasolin standing there, and a serious fire wa averted only by the cool-headed bravery o the Rev. Philip Williams, who immediatel seized the can of the blazing gasoline an carried it into the road."

The Rev. Philip Williams is our mission ary at Tanana. He was probably makin Winter visitations to the small white com munity at Hot Springs for holding service when the incident reported by the Marsha occurred.

ORDINATION

The Rev. Roman Liberato Harding wa ordained to the priesthood at St. Paul church, Washington, District of Columbi on April 18, by the Rt. Rev. Irving J Johnson, D.D., bishop coadjutor of Col rado. Mr. Harding served his diacona under the Rev. F. W. Oakes of Denve He went to Sterling, Colorado, on th first Sunday in May to become rector o All Saints' church.

SUBSTITUTES FOR SALOONS FOUND NOT NECESSARY

Prohibition Measure Strongly Supported by Convention of Pennsylvania

NEW YORK CITY.—On Monday and Tuesday, May 6 and 7, municipalities comprising a population of 51,871 voted "dry" in the State of New Jersey under the new Local Option Law. Two of the places voting "dry" on Tuesday were Milford and East Orange. So far there have been twenty-seven contests in New Jersey this Spring, of which the prohibition forces have won twenty. The total population so far voting to shift to the "dry" basis is 112,054 and the total population of the communities voting to retain saloons is 14,150. There will be six additional elections on the 14th of May.

Because of the extent to which the question has been raised as to what communities should do toward providing substitutes for saloons when the saloons are voted out, a communication setting forth the experience of Portland, Oregon, in this matter is timely. This communication states:

"Experience shows that substitutes for the saloon are not necessary. Coffee clubs and similar institutions, organized to combat saloons, fail when prohibition comes. The former habitues of the saloons congregate in the lobbies of second and third class hotels where they stop."

Portland, Oregon, made considerable preparation toward providing saloon substitutes, but it was found they were not needed. The First Presbyterian Church of this city, which maintains a men's resort in the nature of a Rescue Mission, states that it is almost impossible to keep it going since prohibition came, because the former "resorters" are so prosperous that they have no need of cheap lodgings and they find all the companionship they want in the hotel lobbies.

The Diocese of Pennsylvania at its Annual Convention last week passed a resolution urging the State Legislature of Pennsylvania to ratify the Constitutional Amendment—127 for ratification, 37 against.

Miss Helen Robertson Croes

YONKERS, NEW YORK.—Miss Helen Robertson Croes, who died recently at her home here, was the last surviving member of the family who bore the name of the first Bishop of New Jersey, the Rt. Rev. John Croes, D.D.

When Miss Croes unveiled the tablet erected to the memory of Bishop Croes by his old church in New Brunswick in 1915, THE CHURCHMAN published an outline of the life of that great man. Nor have accounts of her distinguished father and brother been wanting. No tribute would be more pleasing to her than the statement that she was worthy of her distinguished family.

Her activities were broad and varied. As a member of the Scenic and Historic Preservation Society, her intelligent enthusiasm led to her being appointed on the original committee in charge of Manor Hall, Yonkers, the famous old Phillipse Mansion, now the possession of New York State. As regent of the Keskeskick Chapter of the Daughters of the American Revolution from 1906 to 1908, she was known to many outside her immediate circle. As a communicant of St. Paul's church in Yonkers for over forty years, she was a part of the life of that parish, even after sickness had forced her to forego its services.

CURZON PAYS TRIBUTE TO CHAPLAINS IN SERVICE

Many Have Been Killed and Wounded, Many Decorated

The Army and Navy Register of April 12 quotes the following from the speech of Earl Curzon of Kedleston, delivered at the time of the British Parliament's vote of thanks to the forces:

But there are one or two more other debts of honor which you would wish to pay this afternoon. May I say one word about the chaplains of every church and denomination, 2,200 of whom are serving with the armies in the field, giving consolations of religion to the living and performing the last rites of the Church over the dead? How gallant and perilous their service has been may be shown by the fact that over seventy have been killed, many wounded, and many others have died from disease, two have won the Victoria Cross, 130 have been decorated, and many more have been mentioned in dispatches.

United Intercession Service

MONTCLAIR, NEW JERSEY.—On the evening of Rogation Sunday the four churches of the north end of Montclair gathered in St. James' Episcopal Church for a united service of prayer and intercession.

The music was rendered by the joint choirs and the ministers of participating churches took part in the service.

The lesson was read by the Rev. Dr. Milliken of the Reformed Church; the Roll of Honor (comprising those in service from all the churches of the community) was read by the Rev. Mr. Adair of the Presbyterian Church; the sermon, a wonderfully inspiring setting forth of the spiritual aspirations of the war, was preached by the Rev. Dr. Stocking of the Congregational Church, and the Intercessions were led by the rector, the Rev. R. W. Trenbath.

The Church was crowded and the whole community seemed to share in the devotional petitions of the Rogation Sunday. St. James' has sixty-six men in the service of the country.

DEPOSITION

Notice is hereby given that on April 25, 1918, being the feast of St. Mark the Evangelist, in St. Mary's Cathedral, Memphis, Tennessee, in the presence of the Rev. Arthur H. Noll, LL.D., and the Rev. George L. Neide, I did pronounce and record the deposition from the Ministry of this Church of Reginald Irving Raymond, presbyter, at his own request and for causes not affecting his moral character.

THOS. F. GAILOR,
April 25, 1918. Bishop of Tennessee.

The Rev. Mr. Raymond has become pastor of Plymouth Church (Congregational), Chicago.

LABOR ASSOCIATION HAS ITS ANNUAL DINNER

"Slacker Among the Workers Is a Marked Man," Says Bishop Burch

NEW YORK CITY.—An important annual dinner and meeting of the Church Association for the Advancement of the Interests of Labor was held at Zinn's restaurant on the evening of May 6. At the beginning "Our Father's God to Thee" was sung and toward the close of the meeting Mr. Whiting of All Soul's choir sang very effectively "The Battle Hymn of the Republic," all joining in the chorus. A number of Thrift Stamps were sold.

Bishop Burch in his address of welcome said:

"We have omitted our annual dinner since our country entered the great conflict. We resume it this year rejoicing that labor has come into the conflict with full force and spirit so that a slacker among the workers is a marked man. To me a most inspiring sight was in the Liberty Loan parade miles of laboring folk of every trade. There is so much for this society to do and I hope and pray that during my life the time will never come when C. A. I. L. will say 'I am no more use.'"

Miss Lawrance, assistant secretary, reported a number of Bishops from Canada and the United States accepting election as honorary vice-presidents. The chairman of the Legislative Committee, Miss Foster, recounted bills in different States which the society has endorsed, or protested against, and added "It is necessary to keep a watchful eye during the war on all States."

Dr. Floyd S. Leach, chairman of Organized Labor Committee, told of his appointment by the Central Union Labor Council to further the use of the union label and that if he had not been a fraternal delegate—a fraternal delegate not having a vote—he would have been elected president of the Council. He referred to the appreciation of C. A. I. L.'s work shown by union labor.

Dr. Daniel, chairman of the Tenement House Committee, described the privations of the East Side during the food and coal famine of the Winter, but through it all was the spirit of patience and helpfulness with the realization that it was not a trouble confined to the poor. There was a greater equality than usual.

The chairman of Church and State Committee stated that the New York Chapter of the Actors' Church Alliance had been curbed in its energies by the war, but referred to the late Shakespeare Anniversary Service in St. John the Divine as an evidence of vitality.

The executive secretary, Miss Keyser, said that C. A. I. L. had always engaged in the work of conservation and in 1887 began to help conserve organized labor. We have the American Federation of Labor with that splendid patriot, Samuel Gompers, at its head. If labor were all unorganized, we would have men of different races and different opinions all pulling different ways—confusion worse confounded, anarchy.

Liberty Bonds for School

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.—The latest bulletin of the progress of the Anniversary Fund shows that on April 25 $10,040.86 had been contributed in cash and $1,300.00 in Liberty Bonds, making a total of $11,340.86.

SPRING CONVENTIONS REFLECT WAR

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.—The 134th Annual Convention of Dioceses of Pennsylvania was held at the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany here on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 7 and 8.

After an inspiring address by Bishop Rhinelander the Convention organized by electing the Rev. C. L. Fulforth secretary. Mr. Fulforth appointed the Rev. C. S. Lyons as his assistant. Other elections during the course of the Convention were: Treasurer of Diocese, Mr. Ewing L. Miller; Chancellor, J. W. Bayard; Lay Deputy to Synod of Washington, C. E. Beury; Trustees of Diocese, the Rev. Messrs. L. C. Washburn, J. R. Nording, A. J. Arnold; Standing Committee, the Rev. Messrs. J. DeW. Perry, E. M. Jefferys, L. M. Robinson, L. C. Washburn, F. M. Tait.

Bishop Rhinelander reported that 15 chaplains had gone to France, 3 chaplains were to go to France, 8 chaplains were at camps; 13,000 men, or 20 per cent. of the community, had enlisted. Also that the Divinity School had sold its old site and acquired a new one near the University of Pennsylvania.

The Standing Committee reported that $4,651 had been expended on the Richmond trial. The Treasurer of the Diocese reported a bequest of some $15,000 for the Convention Fund from the estate of the late Penelope Shepherd. The Social Service Commission asked $600 from Convention for diocesan and general work. This was granted. The Rev. Elliot White of this commission introduced a resolution urging clergy to recommend registration and balloting of Churchmen in civil elections.

The Rev. Percy Stockman introduced a resolution on Prohibition which said:

"Resolved: That it is the belief and the desire of the Convention of the Diocese of Pennsylvania that the State of Pennsylvania should take its place with those States which have already ratified the amendment; and to that end Churchmen are urged to enter earnestly into the campaign to nominate and elect legislators pledged to work and vote for its ratification; and, be it further

"Resolved: That this Convention once more urges like earnestness and interest in securing immediate emergency prohibition by act of Congress for the duration of the war."

The second resolution passed without much discussion, as the Convention was agreed on the pressing of emergency war prohibition.

Debate was allowed on the question of the proposed national amendment looking to permanent prohibition. The Rev. Dr. Nodge, Mr. R. F. Wood, Mr. Edward Biddle spoke against the resolution. The Rev. Mr. Noll, Mr. F. A. Lewis, Mr. C. R. Woodruff and the Rev. Mr. Stockman in favor of it. The vote resulted in its adoption by 178 yes to 37 no.

An increase of $10,000 was voted to be apportioned for missions in the diocese for the next year ($50,000 in all). The increase was voted in order that the salaries of missionaries might be increased $150 each, that work at Hog Island and like growing places might be cared for, and that one-half of the salary of the Rev. John Nort, at the University of Pennsylvania, might be cared for. The Board of Missions of the diocese was authorized to take steps for incorporation. $1,500 in Liberty Bonds were given at Convention to meet missionary work deficit.

The Rev. Dr. Washburn for his committee moved that the Christmas Fund of the diocese be merged with the Church Pension Fund; this was laid on the table after debate.

The Rev. Dr. Robinson introduced new canons for the diocese, which were adopted with little debate. The changes were: The Commissary rather than Chancellor in the trial of clergy. A new form of information or charge to be filed (1) with the Bishop, (2) Standing Committee, (3) the Ecclesiastical Court.

Dean Bartlett submitted a report for the Committee on Candidates for the Ministry and the Convention moved that it be read in every parish at a Sunday morning service.

Resolutions were adopted urging (1) the parents and people of the Church to realize and meet the needs of recruits for ministry; (2) a committee of three clergymen and three laymen to recruit; (3) recruiting of older men (especially those who have been in the war) and special preparation for their entering the ministry; (4) parochial scholarships for those who intend studying for Orders; (5) help that men studying may work under direction.

Bishop Garland went to Camp Dix on Thursday, May 9, to confirm a large class of soldiers in the camp there. Quite a party of Churchmen from the diocese accompanied him. IRVING A. MCGREW.

ALBANY, NEW YORK.—The fiftieth annual convention of the Diocese of Albany was opened on Tuesday evening, May 7, with an address by Bishop Nelson dealing with the subject of Christian Unity in the light of present-day events. "There are two human dispositions," said the Bishop, "upon which we must fix our attention if we are to grasp the fundamental issue of the world war, and if we are to perceive the necessary conditions of peace. The first of these is that instinctive desire for liberty, which is the fruitful stimulus of investigation, progress and creative activity. The second is the disposition toward social organization for the well-being of those who live together. A right conception of law and liberty must lie at the foundation of every theory which aims at the happiness and harmony of human beings."

The report of the Committee on the State of the Church given Wednesday showed that eight clergymen of the diocese are now engaged in war work. The Convention went on record as favoring increases in the salaries of clergymen because of the increased cost of living.

William Gorham Rice, the retiring treasurer of the diocesan mission funds, presented a report showing that the permanent fund amounted to about $100,000 and that the aggregate receipts during his term of office were well over a half million dollars. Mr. DeLancey M. Ellis of St. Andrew's Church, Albany, has been chosen as Mr. Rice's successor. The annual report of the Diocesan Board of Missions recommended the creation of a mission at Chazy, Clinton County, where th communicants have been heretofore unde the charge of the rector at Champlain, an at Chatham, Columbia County, where the have been under the care of the rector a Philmont.

The Standing Committee for the comin year is composed of the following: Cler ical, James Caird, Charles M. Nickerson D.D., Edward T. Carroll, D.D., Henry F Freeman, D.D.; Lay, H. W. Thompson Robert C. Pruyn, Elias P. Mann, Samue B. Coffin. RUSSELL CARTER.

LINCOLN, ILLINOIS.—One of the brightes happiest, and most successful meetings th Diocese of Springfield has ever held cam to a close with the adjournment of th Forty-first Annual Synod, May 1 and 2, i Trinity Church, in Lincoln, Illinois, the Ver John C. White, Rector.

The weather seemed to have been mad to order for the occasion. There was not hitch or a dull moment from the arrival o the delegates on Tuesday afternoon an evening to the close of the business sessio on Thursday, the second day of the meet ing, at 1 P. M. The Synod made recor time in transacting its business and wa through so quickly that when the motio was made to adjourn scarcely half the dele gates realized that the Synod was reall over and had adjourned sine die. Trinit Church just freshly decorated in time fo the meeting was beautiful in her new dres and was greatly admired by the delegate

The Bishop's address was delivered be fore a large congregation on Wednesda afternoon. It dealt with the war, the cele bration of the one hundredth anniversar of the admission of Illinois into the Unior the progress of the Diocese during the yea and his plans and expectations for the de velopment of the work in the future.

The report of the treasurer showed th Diocese to have all debts paid and abou $800 cash in hand. Almost $1,000 of th apportionment for General Missions hav already been sent the General Board. Th Sunday School Lenten offerings almost dou bled that of last year and the Woman' Auxiliary offering was increased consider ably.

A Joint Missionary Meeting of the Syno and the Woman's Auxiliary was held i Trinity Church on Wednesday evening, a which addresses were made by the Rev John T. Lillard, the Rev. A. J. Keuhn an the Ven. John C. White.

This meeting was followed by a receptio tendered the Synod and the Woman's Aux iliary and others at the delightful home o the Misses Latham.

The Synod accepted the invitation of Im manuel Champaign to hold its next meetin there in 1919.

It was ordered by the Synod that th Treasurer of the Diocese and the Treasure of the Endowment Fund be required to b bonded by some reliable Bonding Company

The proposed Amendment to the Consti tution admitting women to be delegates t the Synod and the proposed amendment t the Canons allowing women to be elected t the Vestry was rejected, and the propositio to do away with the Canon providing for a House of Church Women in the Diocese was also vetoed.

SPIRIT OF PATRIOTISM RUNS HIGH

A resolution looking towards making "Osborne Hall" at the University of Illinois a regular Diocesan institution was adopted.

The Standing Committee, Board of Trustees and other Boards of Finance and Church Extension were re-elected. Delegates to the Provincial Synod which meets in Gambier, Ohio, next October were the Rev. Wm. Baker, the Rev. J. M. Page, the Rev. L. L. Riley and the Rev. F. D. Butler, Mr. C. C. Carroll, Mr. F. W. Potter, Mr. H. F. Gilbert, Mr. Bluford Wilson.

J. C. White.

Phoenix, Arizona.—The twenty-sixth annual Convocation of the diocese was held in Trinity pro-cathedral here April 23-25. The Bishop's address and the reports of the various committees showed the excellent condition of the diocese, in spite of the war, specially marked progress having been made in the work of the Tubercular Hospitals.

On the evening of the first day the new Bishop's House was dedicated, followed by a general reception. At luncheon in the Cathedral House on the second day the Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis was the special guest and gave a thrilling address on the war situation. At a public meeting Wednesday evening addresses were made by the Rev. F. M. Johnson of Globe, a Major in the Officers' Reserve, and by two prominent laymen. One of these, Mr. Dan Tillet, a large cattle owner and a vestryman of the pro-cathedral parish, gave an excellent definition of "Morale." "Morale," he said, "is the spirit in an individual or a nation that holds the individual or nation steadfast, and drives it on to the accomplishment of a desired end."

On Thursday, St. Mark's Day, the Convocation adjourned to St. Mark's Church, Mesa, eighteen miles east of Phoenix, in the heart of the wonderful Salt River Valley, where luncheon was served by the guild in the parish house. After luncheon the new rectory was dedicated. Convocation closed with a special service of intercession for the war, held in the church. The next meeting will be held at Tucson in January, at which time the Diocesan canons will probably be amended to permit of all parish meetings being held the first Monday in January, instead of after Easter. The holding of such meetings, as well as of Convocation, near the beginning of the fiscal year will undoubtedly be of great advantage to the work of the Church in this part of the country.

J. R. Jenkins.

Westhampton, Virginia.—The Richmond Convocation held its seventieth session on April 23-25, in St. Stephen's Church here. On Tuesday after Morning Prayer and a sermon by the new city missionary, the Rev. R. Cary Montague, luncheon was served at the new Ellett Country School for Girls, after which a business session was held. A service was held in the evening in the interest of religious education, when interesting addresses were made by Mrs. E. E. Osgood of Brook Hill, and Mrs. Randolph Watkins of Holy Trinity Church.

On Wednesday luncheon was served by the ladies of the congregation in the rectory, after which a business meeting was held. Convocation decided, for the time being, that it endeavor to raise no funds for missionary and other work of the Church. While apparently expressing the consensus of opinion of the members, this action does not commit them to a final policy of entirely doing away with missionary work supported as heretofore by the convocation. It does give time, however, for the thought of the men to crystallize before another meeting and to determine whether or not in this day of efficiency in the Church as well as the business world the time has not come for the doing away of unnecessary machinery in the raising of the Church's funds.

An interesting essay was read by the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt of Grace Church, the speakers for the essay being the Rev. G. Freeland Peter and the Rev. Dr. W. R. Bowie. The Rev. R. Cary Montague was the speaker at the missionary meeting in the evening. On Thursday the preacher was the Rev. G. Freeland Peter of St. James' Church. Luncheon was tendered by the vestry at the Country Club of Virginia.

Fenton Williamson.

Macon, Missouri.—The spring meeting of the Northern Convocation was held in St. James' church, Macon, April 23-25. The Rev. Dr. John Davis of Hannibal presided as Dean. The Bishop of the diocese preached the sermon on the opening evening on Christianity and the War. The visitors at the Convocation were entertained with real Macon hospitality at the hands of the Rev. Charles F. Edwards, rector, and the people of the parish.

By vote of the Convocation, the Rev. George E. Wharton, rector of Mexico and Moberly, was nominated to the Bishop for the office of Dean. The Bishop Coadjutor was absent on official visitations in the southern part of the diocese and sent his regrets at being absent from the deliberations of the Convocation. Miss Henrietta F. Scheetz of Kirkwood, traveling secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, visited Macon at the time of the Convocation and conferred with the ladies on matters relating to the Auxiliary.

Harrington Rogers.

Boydton, Virginia.—The spring meeting of the Central Convocation was held in St. James' Church here April 23-25. There was a notable increase in attendance, owing to the good work of a committee appointed at the last meeting charged with the duty of arousing interest. The afternoon sessions were of particular interest. On Tuesday the Rev. J. Lewis Gibbs gave a review of recent books relating to the war. He showed a remarkable familiarity with current publications and fine discrimination. Many joined in comment and discussion.

On Wednesday the Rev. G. Wallace Ribble read a paper on War and Missions, which was of such distinct merit that it was ordered printed. Bishop Thompson and others entered into the discussion of this paper, dwelling on the possible ways of securing fit men for the ministry. On Thursday Dr. Jesse M. Jones, of the Virginia Polytechnic Institute, gave an address on "The Church, the Clergy and the War," showing the rare opportunity of the clergy as leaders in activities to help win the war.

Large congregations gathered at all meetings.

On Thursday night the Convocation met at Christ Chapel, Kimono, where Bishop Tucker preached and confirmed a class prepared and presented by his son, the Rev. H. N. Tucker, rector of the parish.

A loving memorial was adopted by the congregation in testimony of their esteem and gratitude for the life and work of the late Bishop Randolph and assurances of devotion and loyalty to the present Diocesan who so wisely and ably has been serving as Coadjutor.

G. Otis Mead.

New Orleans, Louisiana.—The eightieth annual session of the Diocesan Council of Louisiana was opened in Christ Church Cathedral here April 17 and lasted three days. At the night session the Bishop delivered his annual address. It was ordered printed and a copy sent to the state, as an argument for Liberty bonds. To quote only one passage, the Bishop said:

"Christianity seeks the abolition of war and will achieve it. But when a government deliberately plans to enslave the world, relapses into barbarism, scorns the ideal of a permanent peace, shows itself inaccessible to any argument except force, threatens the world with immeasurable suffering of recurrent wars and itself proceeds in war on a plan of absolute ruthlessness and ferocity, nothing remains but for other governments and nations, even by war, to take from it the power to dominate and afflict humanity."

The diocese this year has been apportioned $10,100 for general missions and, contrary to the custom heretofore, the full amount will be assumed.

A resolution was adopted to merge the widows and orphans of clergy fund with the fund for aged and infirm clergy. The financial system of the diocese was changed by a resolution to separate the functions of the treasurer and give the finance committee power to appoint a custodian of funds who shall handle the trust and endowment moneys of the diocese and devote full time to the work. R. P. Mead was elected treasurer. The finance committee announced it would name Edwin Belknap, treasurer, retiring after twenty-six years of service, custodian.

The date of council meeting was changed from the third Wednesday after Easter to the third Wednesday after the Feast of the Epiphany. Another change in the canons allows churches to pick vestrymen and wardens as the parish vestry chooses.

At request of the Bishop, on account of present conditions, the usual luncheon served at the noon hour during the council by committees of ladies from the various New Orleans parishes was abandoned.

The Clergy Pension fund has been heartily endorsed and responded to in this diocese and its quota for the War Commission oversubscribed.

A well-attended missionary service Sunday night, at which many of the clergy were present, closed the sessions of the council.

J. Orson Miller.

"Right Will Prevail"—Pershing

NEW YORK CITY.—"Right sure to prevail" was a cable message received recently in this city by Bishop Darlington of Harrisburg from General Pershing. The message was in reply to one of greeting sent to the commander of the American expeditionary forces in France by Bishop Darlington at the conclusion of the recent meeting of the House of Bishops.

As fifteen members of the family of Bishop Darlington, including two brothers and three sons, are with the colors, he was selected as the one most eligible in the House of Bishops to send a message of greeting to General Pershing, who is a communicant of the Episcopal Church.

Bishop Darlington's cable was as follows: "Greetings from the House of Bishops of the Episcopal Church, with prayers and best wishes for victory and for safety of all."

The reply came back: "Our forces appreciate your message. Right sure to prevail. Pershing."

Albany Summer School Plans for 1918

ALBANY, NEW YORK.—The Albany Summer School for the Clergy has issued a most alluring leaflet with plans for the 1918 session of the school. The various possible questions are answered as follows: Where? In the Cathedral of All Saints', Albany. When? June 24 to June 28. Who is it for? All the clergy. How many come? Upwards of sixty. How much? Ten dollars for all expenses. When and where register? Any time before June 10, with the Rev. G. H. Purdy, Warrensburgh, New York. The lecturers announced for this summer are the Rev. W. E. Johnson, M.A., the Rev. H B. Washburn, M.A., the Rev. Dickinson S. Miller, D.Sc., the Rev. Stuart Tyson, D.D., Chaplain Howard K. Bartow, the Rev. Winfred Douglas, Mus.Doc.

Dean Johnston Granted Leave

ATLANTA, GEORGIA.—Dean Thomas Henry Johnston has been granted an indefinite leave of absence by the Chapter of St. Phillips Cathedral, Atlanta. Dean Johnston announced to the Chapter his decision to join the forces of the Army Y. M. C. A. in France.

Mr. Johnston is a pure-bred Irishman, untouched by the Roman Catholic anti-English taint found in certain parts of Ireland.

The Dean is an able man, and has done a splendid work in Atlanta.

Dean Gresham Declines the Philippines

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.—The Very Rev. J. Wilmer Gresham, dean of Grace Cathedral here, has telegraphed to the Presiding Bishop his declination of his election as missionary bishop of the Philippine Islands.

A Patriotic Farewell Service

IRVINGTON, NEW YORK.—A Patriotic Service was held on Sunday evening, May 12, at St. Barnabas' Church here on the occasion of the departure for France of the rector, the Rev. William Neely Colton, as a Red Cross chaplain. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Theodore Sedgwick, rector of Calvary Church, New York, and the Rev. W. Francis Irwin, D.D., of the Irvington Presbyterian Church.

Our Weekly News Letter

BOSTON

Annual G. F. S. Service—The annual "May Tea" and diocesan service of the Girls' Friendly Society was held this year on May 13. The May Tea was in the great Main Hall of the Mechanics' Building on Huntington Avenue. From 1,500 to 2,000 girls and women were present. There are few, if any, other Church organizations which would be obliged to seek such immense quarters once a year for a gathering of members from all over the diocese.

For the first time in a number of years the Massachusetts Girls' Friendly Society welcomed its own diocesan as preacher at the Annual Service in Trinity Church. Bishop Lawrence gave a direct and ringing message, singularly applicable to his great congregation of girls and women and stressing the specific duties and opportunities that come to such a Society and to its individual members in a world at war.

Belgium at the Cathedral—On the second Sunday in May there was a "Public Meeting" in the Cathedral which was addressed by Dr. J. B. de Ville, special representative of the "Belgio-American Alliance," on "Belgium's Message to the United States." Dr. de Ville has already made five trips between Belgium and America, bringing over with him some 1,500 refugees and searching out and reuniting scattered families.

Dr. de Ville's address was given to a great gathering of sympathetic listeners, which included the Belgian Consul at Boston and several officers of the New England Belgium Relief Fund.

The collection at this meeting and all the offerings at the Cathedral services on this day were given to the New England Belgium Relief Fund for the suffering babies of Belgium.

The "Silent Mission"—The congregation of Deaf-mute Church people which has its own impressive silent services regularly in Trinity, Boston, gathered, over 100 strong, on the Fifth Sunday After Easter at a Confirmation visitation by Bishop Lawrence. They welcomed back for the first time at this service their devoted deaf-mute missionary, the Rev. George F. Hefflon, who has been seriously ill with pneumonia for some time past.

The Patriotic Motor-Car—The "Boston War Camp Community Service Committee" makes the practical suggestion to Church people of Boston and vicinity that those who are owners of automobiles can render practical patriotic service by inviting enlisted men of the army and navy to take Sunday afternoon rides to the many points of interest in and around Boston. We have thousands of young men now quartered in and near Boston who come from distant parts of the country and to whom our so-familiar objects of patriotic interest here in New England have been hitherto almost as sacred fables to them.

Massachusetts Clerical Association—The Massachusetts Clerical Association, the general Clericus of the clergy of the diocese, held its annual meeting on May 6. Professor William Roscoe Thayer, whose Life of Cavour has brilliantly interpret the ideals and accomplishments of the Ita ian people to so many Americans, spo to the Association on "Italy's Aims in Th War." He was greeted by a goodly nur ber of the clergy and their guests and h speech aroused much enthusiasm.

Officers of the Association for the fo lowing year were elected as follow President, the Rev. Daniel D. Addiso D.D.; Vice-President, the Rev. Emilius V Smith; Secretary-Treasurer, the Rev. Fra cis L. Beal, D.D.; Executive Committee, t Rev. Dr. John H. Cabot, Ph.D., the Re Messrs. Harry Beal. W. Appleton Lawren Ernest M. Paddock, James A. Thomps and Edward Tillotson.

Y. M. C. A. Furlough Work—A litt known, but highly important and very e tensive project of the Y. M. C. A. in Fran is the founding and equipping of numero recreation centres in districts where soldie will come in large numbers to spend th furloughs.

Seven or eight "leave areas", as they a called, have already been planned whi will accommodate some 30,000 men. A when the American forces in France rea the million mark, "leave areas" for at le 60,000 men will be needed.

A large part of the responsible and acti preparation of this department is in t hands of the Rev. Karl S. Cate, a pri brought up in this diocese, but canonica resident in Rhode Island, where he was a sistant at All Saints' church, Providen A recent letter from Mr. Cate gives a viv description of some of his work:

"The day I got back I found that the Arr had decided and I left that night for A to complete my preliminary work, begun November and carried on mostly by lette and telegrams after that from Paris a Brest. You understand that when c travels in France these days, or rath nights, one never sleeps, for there are sleepers, there are things they call couche —which means that you control three sea on one side of a compartment and c stretch out there covered with your coat a blanket—if you provide it yourself, and you pay for this rare privilege is 20 fran ($5.00), a jolly little figure, so as a r we get a seat and sit up, or, if you ca find a seat you stand in the corridor, a the next day you have to work as hard ever.

"Well, anyway, I went to Aix and w there for two weeks getting all the milli details arranged, contracts signed, circ lars published, signs printed, buying pian hiring orchestras, engaging cooks, renti cold storage vaults for extra supplies, s tling price lists, surveying each hotel a classifying it, drawing regulations for t police, etc., etc., ad inf. till my he buzzed. . . ."

Church Schools in Summer—There h been some discussion lately of the pos bility of Summer sessions of Church Scho and of the methods necessary for th successful working. There have been f years a number of our parish schools whi have held continuous successful Sund sessions throughout the year. Their expe ence may now prove of value to others w seeking out a similar path of service the children of our parishes. St. John's, xbury, and nearly all the schools of the urch in Fall River and New Bedford we lerstand have long conducted such Sum- r sessions.

Faith's Commencement—On Thurs- , May 16, five young women graduated m the New York Training School for aconesses. The students and faculty, the ending deaconesses and the clergy rched in procession from St. Faith's use to the Chapel of St. Ansgarius, the ntington Memorial Chapel, in the cathe- l. Dr. Gardner, Warden of St. Faith's, de an address on the "Enlarged Con- tion of the Deaconess Order." Bishop rch presented diplomas to Ethel M. nce, Mabel C. Hicks, Vivian H. Johnson, ia M. Ledbetter, Marian Miller.

e Diocesan Convention—Last Autumn vas determined to hold the diocesan con- tion hereafter in the Spring. Accord- ly it is called for Tuesday, May 14. It probable that the session will be very rt. The Diocesan Missionary Commit- is planning a dinner that night.

nity Closes Schools—Announcement just been made that Trinity Parish will se all the parochial schools this Spring. t Summer the decision was made to close nity Chapel School, a fact recently com- nted on in THE CHURCHMAN. For a g time the parish has been running be- d very seriously; the vestry have there- e adopted a policy of retrenchment ch is affecting the work in the various pels. The kindergarten and primary ool at St. Agnes' Chapel has been a well- wn institution for many years, and has ays been full to overflowing. At St. gustine's Chapel, where a successful ian work was built up by Dr. Anthony, weekday work centred about the school. Anthony left St. Augustine's a few ks ago to take up work in the Diocese Pennsylvania.

Contrary to the usual cus- there was neither orchestra nor flowers. service, however, was unusually beauti- and solemn and the church as crowded in the years when its accompaniments e more brilliant.

xiliary Votes for Women on the ard—At the annual meeting of the man's Auxiliary which was held last k at the Church of Zion and St. Tim- , the matter of chief interest was the on the recommendations submitted by committee on a national organization the Woman's Auxiliary. Interest of se centred on Recommendation No. 6, ch suggests that eight women be added he Board of Missions. The other rec- nendations were passed with little dis- sion, although No. 5, providing for an cutive Committee with quarterly meet- ings, will affect the work of the Auxiliary more fundamentally than No. 6. Miss M. J. Hobart opened the debate on No. 6 for the affirmative and Miss Helen Mahan for the negative. A lively discussion ensued. The final vote was 2 to 1 in favor of recommending No. 6 to the 1919 Triennial. Miss Lindley was present at the meeting and told the women of the war time plan for an evangelistic campaign. Her plan was enthusiastically accepted.

Three Presbyterian Churches Unite—The amalgamation of the Old First, the University Place and the Madison Square Presbyterian Churches has been accomplished. The certificate of incorporation has been filed with the county clerk, and the three pastors have laid their resignations on the table awaiting the election of a younger man as pastor of the new Old First Church.

Bishop Lloyd at Calvary—On Sunday morning after his arrival Bishop Lloyd held the Calvary congregation spellbound with an account of his recent experiences in Liberia. It is almost impossible to find the Bishop at the Church Missions House at present, so busy is he with appointments to speak of his trip. He expects to go to Washington this week to confer with the State Department.

New Kempe Windows at the Cathedral—Some beautiful Kempe windows have been placed in the Chapel of St. Ansgarius (the Huntington Memorial Chapel) in the cathedral. The deep, rich, mellow tones of the antique glass and their wealth of symbolic detail recall the famous windows of York and Chartres. The subjects of the two great windows are taken from both the Old and the New Testaments. Their keynote is "Thy Will be done on earth as it is in Heaven." The three minor windows high up in the apse show representative figures associated with the early history of Sweden and Norway.

Liberty Loan Meeting at St. Paul's—At Old St. Paul's Chapel at the last of the Liberty Loan meetings two hundred army nurses from California, Philadelphia, Minnesota and Wisconsin, the famous Shell Shock Unit No. 117, Unit "O" and nurses of the British Expeditionary Forces, headed by U. S. soldiers, marines and sailors, marched across the churchyard from the parish hall. With them were Red Cross workers, young women who give time after business hours to the work, and women with service flags. Trumpeters from the National Army led the singing, which consisted of hymns and popular war songs. Dr. Geer and the Rev. Christian Reisner were the speakers. Australian Anzacs were present, and one of them sang a solo.

Women Meet in Phoenix—I want to tell a little about what was accomplished at the annual meeting of the representatives of the Woman's Auxiliary and the Girls' Friendly Society in Phoenix on April 22, 23 and 24. According to our usual custom this meeting, which means so much to the women of the parishes and missions scattered over this Diocese, was held at the same time as the Diocesan Convocation.

The Woman's Auxiliary had really two meetings, one on April 22, and another on Wednesday morning, as well as a shorter adjourned meeting on Thursday morning, besides the joint session of Convocation, the Woman's Auxiliary and the Girls' Friendly Society. One-half of the twelve W. A. branches were represented; and an endeavor was made at each session to give the spiritual touch and suggestion.

Tuesday afternoon's meeting was introduced by a half-hour class in "Personal Religion," conducted by the Rev. Harold S. Brewster of Winslow. Wednesday morning's meeting was preceded by a wonderfully spiritual quiet hour held by Mr. Shires of Prescott. Tuesday numerous reports from the officers and branches followed immediately the president's annual address.

It seems to me the adoption for the coming year of a watchword, an aim and a prayer was the thing of supreme importance accomplished. These are they: Our aim—"Christ for us, and we for Christ." Our watchword—"Day by Day." Our prayer—That well-known one beginning "O Eternal God, Who hast committed unto us the swift and solemn trust of life."

A well worth-while discussion followed the reading of Miss Lindley's "War Suggestion" for a house-to-house visitation for instruction in prayer of individuals and of families and for the deepening of the spiritual life thereby.

It was the sense of the meeting that this plan, exactly as outlined, was hardly adapted to our Western life. We, however, agreed to join in it if some laxity would be allowed in the method of its fulfilment. We would, for instance, be willing to gather groups of Church people or of the un-Churched—not those of the third suggested class, viz., those of other Churches—in our homes for prayer.

We created one new office, a second vice-president, whose duty it will be to further the spread of the Church Missionary Calendar.

The Woman's Auxiliary here in Arizona is, I think, growing in interest in the deeper things. Let me illustrate by telling of the effect of our gatherings upon one of the representatives of our mining camps. She came to the president and said: "I enjoyed the meetings as I have never done before, because no time was wasted. It was the deeper, more spiritual side of the Auxiliary life which came to the fore; and it I should like to adopt in our mining camp. I think it would help in this time of stress and strain in bringing to us the underlying devotion we perhaps most need." This mining camp has never before had any branch of the Auxiliary at all.

The Girls' Friendly Society met upon the afternoon of the second day. The reports from its branches gave an interesting insight into the life of the Society. It has indeed spread its roots strongly and deeply in Arizona, and under Miss Freeland's capable leadership it promises much power for the future.

A small mining centre with as yet no church, only an occasional service from a visiting minister, brought through a representative a hundred dollar check for the ambulance work of the G. F. S. An interesting story was told of the different ways in which the money was earned. The meeting was followed by an exhibition of G. F. S. training, viz., the serving of a delicious buffet supper in orderly fashion by the Girl Scouts, who in Phoenix were formed under the leadership of the G. F. S.

Preceding this meeting was our Joint Session with Convocation, when inspiring talks were given by Miss Freeland, the district president of the G. F. S., and Miss Jacobs, the provincial secretary. The president and secretary-treasurer of the Woman's Auxiliary also gave reports at the Joint Session.

WASHINGTON

Canons Installed—On Rogation Tuesday in his Cathedral at 11 a. m., the Bishop of Washington installed formally in office two new canons, the Rev. Walden Myer, M.A., and the Rev. J. Townsend Russell, M.A. The service consisted of a special office followed by the Holy Communion. The office was modeled on the lines of the spiritual and essential features of the English Cathedral offices, omitting the elements due to the union of Church and State, and the mediaeval controversies as to temporal and spiritual rights in the investitures of Church dignitaries. And at Washington the oath of office taken by the Canons is expanded so as to include the service of the diocese and the nation and the general Church as well as the Cathedral, and is deepened so as to cover the most sacred ministries of the priesthood. Bishop Harding preached a strong and suggestive sermon on the Church, the Cathedral, and the Canon's office. The Bishop was assisted in the service by Dean Bratenahl, Canon De Vries, Canon Nelms, the Rev. C. S. Abbott, and the Rev. Edward Drown, and many of the clergy of the diocese were in the congregation.

Canon Myer has been a priest of the Diocese of Washington for his entire ministry of some twenty years, and Canon Russell, formerly Archdeacon of Brooklyn, Long Island, has been resident in this diocese for about ten years, and serving the Cathedral and the diocese in numerous helpful ways.

CHICAGO

Annual Meeting—The annual meeting of the Diocesan Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew was held at the Church Club Rooms, in the Heyworth Building Saturday afternoon, May 4. Mr. Courtenay Barber gave interesting reports of the National Council meeting and the National Convention meeting. Henry Lawrence Choat, Brotherhood secretary at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station, spoke of his work at that point, and E. C. Swigert spoke of the work at Camp Zachary Taylor. After the business meeting all present adjourned to a nearby restaurant for supper. The Assembly then attended the "Billy Sunday" services at the Tabernacle on the North Side.

Free Tuberculosis Lectures—The Theodore B. Sachs Tuberculosis Study Class has just completed a series of five lectures and discussions on the general subject "Tuberculosis in Relation to Modern Problems," which were held weekly under the auspices of the Chicago Tuberculosis Institute.

Free Dressmaking Shop—One of Chicago's newest and most helpful charities is that recently established under the auspices of the Washington Park Business Women's Association and known as the "Free Dressmaking Shop." Clothing given for distribution among the needy is usually of a nondescript character and not available for use. This organization overcomes the difficulty by remodeling and repairing the garments given for distribution to needy families and individuals.

The Webster Memorial at Trinity—The wardens and vestrymen of Trinity Church, Chicago, have placed a beautiful brass tablet in the Church in memory of George Huntington Webster, Jr., many years senior warden of the parish.

BUFFALO

Sir George Adam Smith Visits Buffalo—The outstanding event of the month in Buffalo, in the writer's mind, was the visit of this great scholar and patriot; and never in my thirty years' residence in town have I seen a speaker receive such an ovation as Sir George received at Convention Hall on the evening of April 26. The audience stood and cheered and cheered and cheered and waved handkerchiefs and flags until one wondered when the guest would be allowed to speak. When he did do so it was with characteristic modesty. He thanked the audience for the warmth of its welcome, which he said he knew was meant for his country and his nation and not for him personally. Such a message followed as will not soon be forgotten by those who listened to it. Sir George spoke three times the day he was in town, at a men's luncheon, at a women's meeting in the afternoon and the big mass meeting at night. Needless to say I trailed about to everything where women were admitted and had many undeserved favors because of the old Aberdeen tie, and I found that not a few who had never seen Sir George before turned up at every meeting and the dinner given in his and his daughter's honor, and that of the other speakers. Hearing the Archbishop of York in Toronto and Sir George in Buffalo, the same month, brought deep satisfaction to the soul of a Scot!

Geneva Summer Conference Rally—The officers of Section 3 of the Woman's Auxiliary, Buffalo district, were fortunate in having as their guests at the Spring meeting Bishop Stearly and Miss Margaret Jefferys Hobart, who spoke at a supper of the Geneva alumni and a rally in St. John's Church on the evening of April 17. The faculties of all Church Schools, workers in the Junior Auxiliary and everyone interested in Geneva were invited to come and hear about the 1918 Conference, and a goodly number responded. Miss Hobart spoke at supper to the group of Buffalo alumni, and they decided to send a young man or young woman to Geneva this year, providing a scholarship and selecting someone who had not before been at Geneva. Bishop Stearly's address before the evening audience was listened to with much interest, and we feel that a distinct impetus was given to the subject both by the President and Secretary of the Conference. Miss Lucy Arnold, head of all Junior work of the diocese, and Mrs. B. B. Chace, head of the work of Section 3, both came to Buffalo for the meeting

Inter-Church Missionary Conference—For the past nine or ten years we have had this women's affiliation, and a meeting is held annually at which the work of two denominations is presented. This year the Baptists and Congregationalists reported. Miss Lucile Foreman, Principal of the Girls' Seminary at Aintab, Turkey, gave a stro and moving address. With great restra —and hence more potency—she descrit the terrible conditions in Turkey as she h seen them. It was gratifying to notice goodly number of Churchwomen in gathering, as we are not very "obviou in inter-church groups, and Miss Arn and Mrs. Chace found the conference abu dantly worth staying another day to tend. I am hoping that our turn may co soon, and that perhaps Bishop Brent m be willing to tell of our work in the Ph ippines.

Annual Diocesan Meeting of the G. F.—This was held on May 1 in Grace Chu and Mrs. Atwater tells me it was one the most successful ever held. Mrs. Rob Matthews of Rochester presided, and w again re-elected president, which office s has held since 1907. Mrs. William T. A water of Buffalo was re-elected the fi vice-president. The chief speaker was M Cornelia Marshall of New York, who ga two addresses that rang with patriotis In the course of one address she spoke some length upon the advantage of Chu workers attending the Geneva Conferen so surely this year Buffalo ought to be w represented there. On the afternoon April 30 the branch secretaries held th annual meeting in St. Paul's parish ho and in the evening the annual service the members and associates was held St. Paul's Church, Dr. Jessup giving address. Miss Campbell of Toronto, Canadian G. F. S. Secretary, attended t twenty-sixth annual meeting of West New York.

St. Philip's Church Celebrates Its Fif seventh Anniversary—On St. Phili Day the parish rounded out its fifty-seve year and the occasion was suitably c brated. A service was held in the eveni very largely attended, at which the preac was the Rev. Chas. A. Jessup, D.D. number of the Buffalo rectors were in processional and several took part in service. After the service a reception s held in the church parlors and the sh reports given there by members of the v try, the Church school, the Woman's A iliary, the Brotherhood of St. Andrew a the Boy Scouts showed a most encourag condition in the parish. The work th has been greatly stimulated by the pres rector, the Rev. Edmund Bennett, who been in charge for the past two years. the following Sunday evening Mr. Benn gave an historical sketch of the par since its formation. At both these servi a number of men and women of ot parishes were present to offer their fel tations, men of the Churchmen's Club a the Laymen's League, members of Brotherhood and of the Woman's Auxili being prominent. It was announced t every boy in the Scout troop at St. Phil was either buying Thrift Stamps or a L erty Bond.

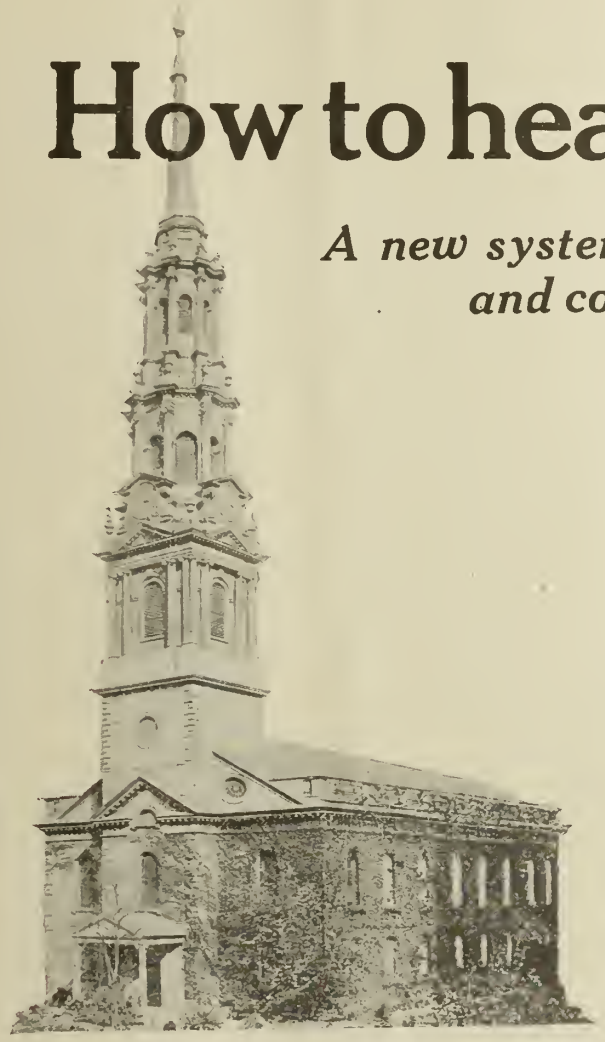
How to heat a church

A new system, cheaper to begin with and costs less to operate



A CHURCH is the most extravagant, wasteful building in town to heat.

One room in use; others silent, and unused. Wasteful low fire, wasteful forced draft, wasteful banked fire! Simply operating the furnace the worst way possible nearly all the week!

The trouble is that no furnace is built to heat different parts of a building intermittently.

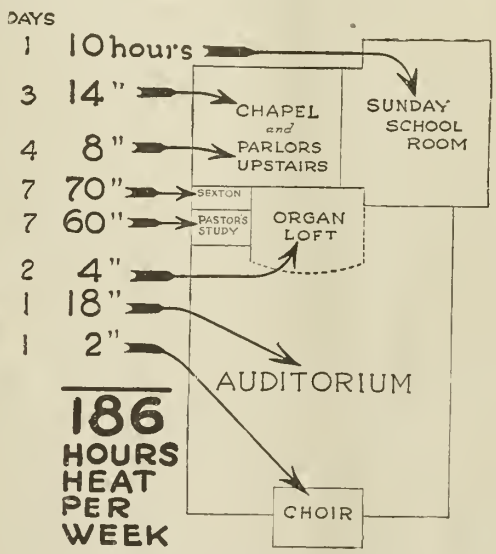
When the trustees are hard-headed business men, they see that a furnace expressly planned to supply heat constantly and evenly, day and night, cannot be operated intermittently and jerkily, without fearful waste. Therefore they demand a radically different type for heating their church.

The Grinnell Ready-Heat System uses gas in self-regulating and self-ventilating radiators.

Grinnell Ready-Heat turns itself on only in the room or rooms to be used. By thermostatic control it heats the room quickly to any desired temperature and holds it there, without any further attention.

MARK THIS: Grinnell Ready-Heat is not like any other form of gas-heating. As a matter of fact, it is the most hygienic of any form of heating, because all the products of combustion are drawn into a central flue and carried away. The pastor's residence, church-house, etc., at a distance, can be connected to the same duct.

Its ease of operation, its cleanliness, the fact it releases basements for other uses than the storage of coal and ashes, makes it an ideal system for many business-buildings and residences.



A net saving

1. Grinnell Ready-Heat is cheaper to install because expensive boilers and furnaces are not required.
2. Cheaper to operate since even an unskilled person can run the system; no ashes to dispose of.
3. Gas bills are generally less than coal bills.

Let our experts submit you a heating-plan. Write for booklet and give us kind and size of your present heating system, size of building, with full information as to number of hours per week the different rooms are used.

Address the General Fire Extinguisher Company, 280 West Exchange Street, Providence, R. I.

others in the neighborhood are giving timber, and a neat church will shortly be built by volunteer labor. The Rev. W. W. Webster has visited the place a number of times, and had large and interested congregations from the farms and mills around. So by the zeal of this family a splendid rural mission will soon be developed. Mr. Webster is the missionary at Hawkinsville and Dublin, but tries to cover a much wider area.

In a Camp for 60,000—At Camp Hancock, Augusta, the Rev. N. B. Groton, who has been civilian chaplain for the past six months, has returned to his parish at Whitemarsh, Pennsylvania, and the Rev. Cyril B. Harris, of Ann Arbor, Michigan, has been appointed by the General War Commission. The troops of the 28th Division, which have been here since last August, are being rapidly moved, and ordnance and machine gun men are taking their places. If reports are true, the camp will soon contain nearly 60,000 men and very many of them of a very high type. So far there seems to be a large proportion of Churchmen and the local churches are busy giving them a welcome.

Archdeacon Leaves—The Rev. Jas. B. Lawrence, for the past twelve years rector of Calvary Church, Americus, has resigned his charge and accepted the rectorship of St. Mark's, Brunswick, in the same diocese. Mr. Lawrence is also Archdeacon of Albany. He is greatly beloved, not only by his own parish, but by every one in Americus, and he will be surrendered with heartfelt regret. As Archdeacon he has done a remarkable work in developing the Church in rural districts and in searching for scattered communicants. At St. Mark's, Brunswick, he will have a beautiful new church and fine rectory and a devoted congregation in a rapidly growing Southern seaport. Mr. Lawrence is a member of the Standing Committee and Board of Missions and has spent his entire ministry in the Diocese of Georgia. G. Sherwood Whitney.

VIRGINIA

Dr. William C. Sturgis Visits Richmond—Dr. William C. Sturgis, General Secretary of the Missions Board, spent two very strenuous days in Richmond April 14 and 15. On Sunday afternoon he was the principal speaker at the mass meeting of the twenty Episcopal Sunday Schools of Richmond, when the Lenten Offering, amounting to $3,317.09, was made. On Monday he made an address to the Richmond Clericus, and was tendered a reception at the Soldiers', Sailors' and Marine Club, where he addressed the men of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew; at All Saints' Parish House he addressed the Woman's Auxiliary and Mission Study Class leaders in the afternoon, and later spoke to the Junior Auxiliaries and Brotherhood of St. Paul. He made the principal address at Grace Church Monday evening, when certificates for Sunday School study classes were awarded by Bishop Gibson. Every service he was greeted by large congregations and his earnest addresses left a deep impression.

Virginia Seminary Commencement—On account of war conditions the exercises at the Virginia Theological Seminary were greatly abridged last year. This year the usual commencement exercises will be held and the customary program will be followed. Fenton Williamson.

UTAH

Boy Scouts Active for Loan—The Boy Scouts of Salt Lake City met in a large rally on the eve of their drive for the Third Liberty Loan. The Rev. H. E. Henriques opened the program with prayer, and during the course of the evening Mrs. Mont Ferry, chairwoman of the Utah Woman's Loan Committee, presented President Wilson's flag to the Cathedral troop No. 51 for securing the greatest number of subscriptions to the Second Liberty Loan. Dean Fleetwood accepted the flag. The Scouts of Utah are predominantly Mormon, but no thought of religious differences entered the minds of the seven hundred boys present, as they stood at salute and afterward wildly cheered the Cathedral lads.

Nurses Graduate—St. Mark's Training School for Nurses graduated a class of fifteen young women on St. Mark's Day. The exercises were held in the Cathedral, where the service was read by the hospital chaplain, the diplomas were presented by Dean Fleetwood, in the absence of a bishop, and the address to the class was delivered by Dr. John L. Critchlow, representing the staff of the hospital. St. Mark's Training School accommodates fifty pupil nurses and ten graduate nurses.

Sunday School Offerings Presented—The Sunday School Lenten and Easter offerings were presented on the third Sunday after Easter at a special rally service at the Cathedral. Offerings from thirteen schools totaled nearly $300, including the sums sent in by three Indian Sunday Schools. This sum won't put us "over the top," but compares favorably with past years. The largest per capita ($1.80) was sent in by a small town mission, while the smallest (20 cents) per capita was sent in by a large town parish.

"Plant a Garden"—"One Million Dollars from Our Gardens" is the rallying cry of the people of Salt Lake City. Competent instructors have been placed in charge of the various districts to see that the gardens are properly planted and cared for, and the city has offered free water to all war gardens. Plenty of free water is a big item in the arid West, where water depends upon the storage of the melted snows. The garden bureau will give a diploma to every family producing its entire supply of vegetables, which should rank along with the Liberty Loan button and the Red Cross service badge.

Thrift Stamps in Sunday Schools—Many of the Sunday Schools are furthering the sale of Thrift Stamps by weekly reminders to the children. Some schools report every child a regular buyer.

RHODE ISLAND

Missionaries' Salaries—At the annual meeting of the Convocation of Pawtucket, April 23, a chief topic of interest was a proposed increase of the salaries of the missionaries, on account of the increased cost of living. It was voted to ask the board of managers to offer to each missionary parish an increase of salary equal to whatever increase the parish shall make. The Convocation of Providence, at its annual meeting on the following day, took similar action, without, however, suggesting any ratio of increase.

Gifts—The new missionary parish at Coventry, Christ Church, has received from Grace Church, Providence, a paten, to match the chalice already given, together with cruets and altar linen. Grace Church has also given to the diocesan deaconesses a folding organ for their traveling services around the diocese.

Debt Paid by G. F. S.—The Girls' Friendly Society of the diocese have paid the mortgage on the property at Plum Beach, purchased a year ago for a Holiday House. Funds will now be raised to make extensive additions to the house on the premises, plans and specifications for which have been prepared by Clarke & Howe, architects. Joseph M. Hobbs.

NORFOLK

War Work—A very interesting service was held in St. Peter's church on a recent Sunday night when a service flag containing twenty-six stars was unveiled and also an Honor Roll placed in the vestibule.

The special preacher for the occasion was the Senior chaplain of the Naval District, the Rev. R. B. Patrick. He preached from the text "Lay hold on life". It was an inspiring and helpful sermon.

The flag was unfurled by the President of St. Peter's Chapter, Daughters of the King, through whose instrumentality the organization had obtained the flag.

The Rector of St. Peter's, the Rev. W. E. Callender, began Sunday at St. Helen's Training Station early celebration of the Holy Communion for a number of boy members of the Episcopal Church, who were desirous of having that service.

OHIO

Mrs. Abbott Dies—Mrs. Ada Downman Butler Abbott, wife of Archdeacon Abbott of Cleveland, while visiting at the home of her friends, Mrs. A. G. Torian, at Evansville, Indiana, was taken suddenly ill with pneumonia on Wednesday, April 24, and died the following Monday night, April 29. Her husband was called to Evansville at once and was with Mrs. Abbott when she passed away. After a brief service at the home of Mrs. Torian Tuesday afternoon, April 30, conducted by Archdeacon Plummer, of Southern Indiana, and the Rev. Albert Leonard Murray, rector of St. Paul's, Evansville, the body, attended by Archdeacon Abbott, was taken for interment to Shepherdstown, West Virginia, and buried from Trinity Church, the rector of the parish, the Rev. Josiah W. Ware, and the Rev. John S. Alfriend, rector of Zion Church, Charles Town, officiating.

Mrs. Abbott, born and reared at Shepherdstown, was the eldest daughter of Vincent Moore Butler, M.D., Captain in the Stonewall Brigade, and Mrs. Matilda Wickham Berry Butler. She and Archdeacon Abbott began their married life in Evansville in 1889, at the same time that the Archdeacon entered upon a six years' rectorship of Holy Innocents Memorial Church, that city. Mrs. Abbott was a member of the Daughters of the Confederacy of Shepherdstown, and affiliated with the Cleveland branch. She is survived by two sisters, Mrs. Joseph S. Bragonier, of Shepherdstown, and Mrs. George W. Moore, of Charles Town.

For Country

A MEMORIAL SERVICE for the Rev. Walter Handley, who was killed in France, was held in Christ church, Springfield, Massachusetts, Wednesday morning, May 1. Sections of Christ church choir and St. Peter's choir sang under the direction of Mr. Thomas Maxom.

THE REV. J. PHILLIP ANSHUTZ of St. Luke's church, Billings, Montana, is attending a school for chaplains at Louisville, Kentucky.

THE REV. W. E. CALLENDER will be glad to have the names of any boys who are in the service at the Naval Base of St. Helena and it will give him much pleasure to call on them and be of any assistance. His address is St. Peter's Rectory, 832 Park Avenue, Norfolk, Va.

THE FIRST AMERICAN women to be mentioned in the dispatches from the battle front are Gladys and Irene McIntyre of Mount Vernon, New York, who kept the men in battle with the Germans supplied with food as they fought. They were constantly under fire as they went about their duties, quitting their posts only when they were ordered to and then reluctantly. The sisters are daughters of a Salvation Army colonel and are themselves in France in the service and the uniform of the army. They are college women.

THE REV. GEO. A. ALCOTT has resigned as rector of Grace church, New Haven, Connecticut, to become rector of St. Stephen's church, East Haddam.

THE REV. D. CAMPBELL MAYERS, rector of Emmanuel Church, Greenwood, Virginia, has arrived safely in France and taken up his work with the Y. M. C. A.

THE REV. W. D. SMITH, D.D., rector of Christ Church, Winchester, Virginia, has been appointed by the Bishop of Maryland to have charge of all the work of the Church at Camp Meade, Maryland, and took charge on May 1. Dr. Smith will, however, retain charge of his parish.

THE REV. W. H. COMPSTON, who resigned Trinity Church, Fredericksburg, Virginia, to take up war work with the Y. M. C. A., has arrived safely in France.

DR. BERRYMAN GREEN, JR., son of the Rev. Dr. Berryman Green of the Theological Seminary in Virginia, is with the University of Virginia Hospital Unit, now awaiting orders.

THE ALL SAINTS SISTERS at Orange Grove, Ilchester P. O., Maryland, have joined the Women's Land Army. One of them recently wrote to the Editors of THE CHURCHMAN: "Through the Summer I can only write on Sundays and wet days. We are afflicted like everybody else by shortage of out-of-door help, to say nothing of shortness of money, and I have had to join the Women's Land Army at an age usually thought ineligible."

LIEUTENANT CHARLES BAKER, familiarly known as "Hoby Baker" in his Princeton days, the son of Mr. Stephen Baker, a well-known Churchman of New York, has been decorated with the Croix de Guerre for gallant action on the Western Front.

THE REV. W. BERTRAND STEVENS, rector of St. Mark's church, San Antonio, has taken charge of the field work of the American Red Cross at the Base Hospital, Fort Sam Houston, Texas. Under a recent order of the War Department, the scope of the Red Cross activities in all base hospitals has been greatly enlarged. The work at Fort Sam Houston is of a particular importance because of the fact that the hospital there has recently been designated by the Surgeon-General as one of the fourteen to do "reconstruction" work on men invalided home from overseas duty. The Rev. Dr. Stevens will be glad to give his personal attention to any men whose names are sent him by the clergy and others. He can be addressed for this purpose, in care of the American Red Cross, Base Hospital, Fort Sam Houston, Texas.

CHAPLAIN WALTER MARVINE, U. S. A., has been transferred from Fort DuPont, Delaware City, Delaware, to Fortress Monroe, Virginia. For three years he has taken charge of Christ church, Delaware City, where his services have been highly appreciated

GREAT NUMBERS OF men chosen under the selective draft law are coming daily to A. and M. College, College Station, Bryan, Texas. In order that St. Andrew's church, Bryan, may get in touch with newly arrived churchmen, the Rev. H. B. McC. Jamison, rector St. Andrew's church, Bryan, earnestly requests rectors of parishes to send the names of men coming to A. and M. College.

THE VERY REV. BERNARD IDDINGS BELL, dean of St. Paul's cathedral church, Fond du Lac, Wisconsin, has resigned his office, to take effect June 1, and will devote his time to the service of the War Commission, particularly at the constantly growing naval station at Great Lakes, Illinois.

The Dean has been on a leave of absence for this work during the past six months. The Fond du Lac people insisted that he return to his parish and he found himself impelled to resign rather than tie himself down to parochial administration when he felt he was needed more in camp work.

Dean Bell may be addressed at Building 903, Detention Chaplain's Office, Great Lakes, Illinois, until further notice.

THE REV. JAS. M. OWENS, rector of St. Mark's church, Shreveport, Louisiana, has gone into Red Cross work to be absent from his parish for six months, beginning May 1. He has been appointed as Associate Camp Director for Home Service and his duties will be to act as a clearing-house agency between the enlisted men and their home problems. His initial work will be in New Orleans in connection with Camp Nichols, Jackson barracks and the Algiers Naval Station. Mr. Owens was the prime mover of Red Cross work in Shreveport. Both the Men's Club of St. Mark's and the Lions' Club of the city have tendered him a farewell luncheon, the latter presenting him with a handsome comfort kit to take with him.

FROM THE CHAIRMAN of the Speakers' Division of the Third Liberty Loan of Phillips County, Arkansas, Bishop Winchester has received a letter from which the following is quoted:

Please pardon the liberty I am taking in writing you upon a subject in which I thought you might have an interest, but I feel so grateful to Dr. D. E. Johnson, the colored minister now engaged in Y. M. C. A. work at Camp Pike, for his tremendously valuable assistance in the Liberty Loan work in Helena and Phillips County that I cannot resist the temptation to tell you about it. To begin with, the population of this county is 768 percent Negroes, and Mr. Hunter at some happy moment, in response for our request for speakers, sent us Dr. Johnson, who spent five days with us, touring the county and cities in the interest of the Liberty Loan. We had speakers of national reputation with us on the campaign, but I tell you frankly that Dr. Johnson did not suffer and will not suffer in comparison with the best. We found him to be simply wonderful, and I cannot begin to tell you how much real, actual assistance he was in the work. Always practical, always logical, and yet with the fire and spirit that carried his audiences with him.

A Y. W. C. A. WORKER in the restaurant in Feyzin for French women munition workers writes: "A visitor at the Mess Feminin ejaculated only yesterday: 'But the girls are so old!'

"As a fact, many of these girls are aged in appearance though they may be actually not more than eighteen years old. A few months in the strenuous poison atmosphere of their munition work has done it.

"The women in the bureaus or offices have to get up at five o'clock to be at their posts at six-thirty and they often do not reach home until nine o'clock at night. Girls who work on powder rarely last more than a year. An officer said that he would rather risk his life at the front than in some of the work that women are doing in the factories."

THE REV. JAMES P CONOVER, of St. Luke's Church, East Greenwich, Rhode Island, has accepted an appointment as Red Cross chaplain, and sails immediately for France. His long experience with young men during his previous years of service as master at St. Paul's School makes his appointment of great value.

The candidate was presented by his father, the Rev. Frank J. Mallett, rector of the parish, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. Lewis Brown of Indianapolis. Other clergy present were Dean R. L. McCready and Canon F. W. Hardy of Christ Church Cathedral, Louisville, and the Rev. E. C. McAllister.

MUCH COURTESY EXPRESSED, VERY LITTLE EXHIBITED

Action of House of Bishops "Beats All Analysis," Says Periodical

In the current number of The Continent, of the Presbyterian Church, under the heading "Want to Absorb, Not to Unite," appears the following:

The House of Bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church at its recent session found on its docket of business two communications from non-Episcopalian sources offering practical suggestions to facilitate unity of Christians in this time when unity in every other aspect of national life makes Christian disunity look worse than ever. As everybody knows, the bishops of the Episcopalian organization without exception advertise themselves as apostles and engineers of Christian union. The propositions laid before them had both been constructed on the idea of at least compromising with them on a number of points which they talk of as essential to Christian union. But they turned down both propositions—with much courtesy expressed and very little exhibited.

The first document was signed by eighty or ninety ministers and laymen in other churches proposing that chaplains in the army should receive a series of ordinations, Episcopalian, Congregational and Presbyterian, in order that they might think of themselves and be thought of by the public as representing all denominations alike. The second was the proposal from New Brunswick, New Jersey, asking permission for local Episcopalian, Reformed and Presbyterian churches to commingle their membership by having the communicants of each congregation join the other two. An added suggestion hinted that perhaps Episcopalian ordination also might be granted to any pastor who desired it in either of the other denominations.

In response, the first idea was criticized as "denying that any truth, including the triune being of God or the incarnation of the eternal Son, is of real importance or necessity." How on earth they could read into such an innocent proposal this portentous meaning, beats all analysis. The New Brunswick suggestions were thrown out just as summarily. The reasons alleged were that "confirmation cannot be treated as an optional alternative to any other form of reception to full church membership, and also "ordination cannot be given to a minister who would exercise his ministry in partial independence of the body which gave his commission." Here too the deductions fail to honor the bishops' candor. Indeed, these responses scarcely say at all what they mean. Yet what they mean is quite apparent—that the bishops of the Protestant Episcopal Church in America really have no idea of church union whatever on any give-and-take basis, but when they talk church union, desire and mean only that all other Protestant Christians in the United States shall become Episcopalians. Of course not all Episcopalian bishops are of this spirit, but the dominating majority is. Like the Roman hierarchy, the Anglican hierarchy manages mostly to keep its liberal clergy from reaching the bishopric.

REV. C. GEORGE CURRIE, D.D.

When some years ago the Rev. Dr. Hall of Holy Trinity, Brooklyn, passed away, a paper made the announcement in these words: "On such and such a night the Rev. Dr. Hall 'exchanged worlds.'" "Exchanged worlds"—so we think of one who has recently left us—the Rev. C. George Currie, D.D., who on Easter Sunday closed his eyes upon this world to open them, as we believe, upon another. It is not easy to associate with him the thought of death; he was so alive through all his days, so fairly throbbing and thrilling with mental and spiritual life. Up to the last his mind was busy facing and solving in his own inimitable way the problems of existence. To catch his thought about the present and the future was simply fascinating. His own faith in immortality was so strong that in his company it was easy to believe. He endured as seeing Him who is invisible—as seeing not only Him but the life eternal with Him. So to the last it was given him to do what Peter was charged to do—strengthen his brethren.

His was a long and brilliant ministry. In Covington, in Providence, in Philadelphia, in Baltimore men and women thronged to listen to his stimulating words. He thought largely in pictures—and the pictures were so vivid that they told their story so plainly that it could not be mistaken. Original in thought, profuse and happy in illustration, and effective in delivery his sermons were intensely interesting and greatly illuminating. That his congregations were large and enthusiastic goes without saying.

Matthew Arnold's desiderata for character were "sweetness and light." To know Dr. Currie well was to learn something of what Arnold meant. If by sweetness is meant tenderness of feeling, kindliness in judgment, regard for the rights and the happiness of others, the love that thinketh evil, speaketh no evil, hopeth all things, eveth all things—then sweetness belonged an unusual degree to Dr. Currie. And o have a mind open—opened wide on all es to new thought, new knowledge, if meet all problems fearlessly confident t truth is truth and will prevail, if thus face the sun is the condition of being ded with his beams, then may we say t not only sweetness but light also rked the man we have lost. To meet was always a pleasure, to talk with a stimulation, to know him well a high ilege. There was a charm about him ch brightened a whole company. None w him but to love him. Now that he gone the world seems poorer by his s. One who loved him brings this wreath lay upon his tomb. REESE F. ALSOP.

OWARDS CHRISTIAN UNITY

Ve have carefully avoided any discus- n of the merits of any polity, or any ocacy of one form in preference to an- er. All we have attempted is to show reunion might be brought about, the ditions of the existing churches and the victions held regarding these questions their members being what they are. As are persuaded that it is on these lines l these alone that the subject can be roached with any prospect of any asure of agreement, we do earnestly ask members of the churches to which we ong to examine carefully our conclusions l the facts on which they are based, and give them all the weight that they de- ve.

n putting forward these proposals we so because it must be felt by all good- rted Christians as an intolerable bur- n to find themselves permanently sepa- ed in respect of religious worship and nmunion from those in whose characters l lives they recognize the surest evi- nces of the indwelling Spirit; and be- se, as becomes increasingly evident, it only as a body, praying, taking counsel, l acting together, that the Church can e to appeal to men as the Body of rist, that is, Christ's visible organ and trument in the world, in which the Spirit brotherhood and of love as wide as manity finds effective expression.

Fascinating Reading for Sunday or Quiet Hours

OF recent years various expeditions, American and foreign, have been at work in Bible lands, unearthing all sorts of astonishing facts regarding the life of the early Christians. The result of their labors is now reported in an intensely interesting volume, by Prof. Camden M. Cobern, who is not only an expert at unearthing buried treasure, but a master of fascinating narrative. His pages are as thrilling as romance and as readable as a novel and they bring you facts of the most surprising kind regarding the life and times of the primitive Church.

The New Archeological Discoveries

ASTONISHING PARALLELS BETWEEN ANCIENT AND MODERN LIFE

First and second century manuscripts found in Egypt, personal and business notes, love letters, contracts, mortgages, etc., reveal to us that

Preparedness Was a Slogan in Pharaoh's Day
and conscription was advocated by many as being a better safeguard than reliance on a voluntcer army.

Excess Profits and War Taxes Worried the Ancient Jews
Trusts flourished and made huge sums while taxation to carry on the Imperial governnuent was levied even on necessities.

The Servant Question a Burning One When Cleopatra Reigned
They demanded days off and other privileges or refused to work, and were quite as independent as the help of to-day.

Graft and Corruption Ran Riot Under Caesars and Ptolemies
Polltics was a recognized road to wealth, and frauds of all kinds were constantly worked on the toiling masses.

The High Cost of Living Was Enormous in Biblical Times
Three days' earnings went for a bushel of beans, and a month's wages of a laborer would not purchase a small chicken.

Millionaires Dodged Their Taxes in Rome and Alexandria
by making false returns and got out of paying their inheritance duties by employing shrewd lawyers to prepare their wills.

The GREATEST MOTHER in the WORLD

Stretching forth her hands to all in need; to Jew or Gentile, black or white; knowing no favorite, yet favoring all.

Ready and eager to comfort at a time when comfort is most needed. Helping the little home that's crushed beneath an iron hand by showing mercy in a healthy, human way; rebuilding it, in fact, with stone on stone; replenishing empty bins and empty cupboards; bringing warmth to hearts and hearths too long neglected.

Seeing all things with a mother's sixth sense that's blind to jealousy and meanness; seeing men in their true light, as naughty children—snatching, biting, bitter—but with a hidden side that's quickest touched by mercy.

Reaching out her hands across the sea to No Man's Land; to cheer with warmer comforts thousands who must stand and wait in stenched and crawling holes and water-soaked entrenchments where cold and wet bite deeper, so they write, than Boche steel or lead.

She's warming thousands, feeding thousands, healing thousands from her store; the Greatest Mother in the World—the RED CROSS.

For Country

The Rev. Jas. Craik Morris, D.D., Rector of Grace Church, Madison, Wisconsin, has been given leave of absence and has accepted an appointment of the War Commission of the Church as Episcopal Pastor at Camp Greenleaf, Fort Oglethorpe. His address is Post Library, Fort Oglethorpe, Georgia. Camp Greenleaf is the principal training camp in the army for medical officers, containing at present eleven thousand physicians and enlisted men. There are no attached chaplains and the office of Camp Pastor has been given an official status by the Government. Many thousand more men are expected within the next month, and Dr. Morris asks that names be sent him by the clergy as early as possible.

The Rev. N. Matthews has been given leave of absence from his parish in Rock Hill, South Carolina, and has succeeded the Rev. Mr. Grebbin as the Church's volunteer chaplain at Camp Sevier. He wishes the name, regiment and company of any one whom he may visit at the camp. Address, care Y. M. C. A., Headquarters, Camp Sevier, Greenville, South Carolina.

Miss Elisabeth R. Delafield, President of the Woman's Auxiliary in the Diocese of New York, expects to sail for France early in June. She is to do office work in Paris in connection with Miss Anne Morgan's relief work. Miss Delafield expects to return to New York next December.

Corporal Milo H. Plant, who is among the "Pershing Veterans" now in New York, is a member of the Chapel of the Intercession, Trinity Parish. He was decorated with the Croix de Guerre and the Divisional Cross for extreme gallantry in action. He rescued a French officer under heavy shrapnel fire and was afterwards wounded. Now that the Liberty Loan drive is over, he will spend the rest of his leave working for the Red Cross. The congregation of the Intercession are planning to give him a special testimonial.

The Chapel of the Intercession, Trinity Parish, New York, is raising an ambulance fund. When enough is in hand to purchase and equip an ambulance, the congregation expects to do so and to name it the Milo Hudson Gates Ambulance after the vicar.

The Rev. B. J. Osborn of Calvary Church, New York, spent his furlough after completing the work in the Ground School at the parish house. He has now gone to one of the Texas aviation camps.

Miss Healy of the staff of Calvary Church, New York, has gone to France to do secretarial work for the Red Cross.

Lieutenant Wm. Dwight Crane of the 165th Infantry was reported recently among those wounded in action on the battle front in France. After some considerable delay, the good news has been received that he is progressing satisfactorily. Lieutenant Crane is the son of Mr. Geo. F. Crane, a member of the vestry and comptroller Trinity Parish.

The Rev. R. W. Baxter has resigned position at Grace Church, Brookl Heights, and taken army work under t War Commission.

The Rev. Herbert C. Corell, Rector the Church of the Epiphany, Ozone Pa has been granted a year's leave of abse and sails for France this month to take duty in the French army.

Things in General

The Right Rev. Dr. Gore, the Bishop of Oxford, writing in his Diocesan Magazine, says:

"May I give notice that I propose to eat my portion of meat, etc., at home, so that when I visit parishes I shall neither want nor be permitted to eat meat or any other rationed food? I only say this that kind hosts may not try to provide me with any such food."

A little girl in a "CHURCHMAN family" sends us the following advertisement for a lost doll: "Lost, strayed or stolen! Reward will be given for any information concerning a black curly-haired, brown-eyed child two years old." It is nice to have the confidence of the young!

Chaplains are having multitudes of interesting experiences these days. The Rev. Herbert P. Tyler, on duty at Camp Merritt, tells this one:

"A boy from the West, on the eve of sailing for France, came to be baptized. He brought three husky Westerners with him to act as sponsors. At the close of the service one of them turned to the boy who had just been baptized and said: 'Well, old man, now you're camouflaged so the devil can't see you!'"

A layman from the Pacific Coast who has been a lay reader and locum tenens as well as everything else in a Western parish and who is now in the East holding down a war job, was talking recently about the lack of real use to which many rectors put their laymen.

"It reminds me," he said, "of the story of the little boy who was questioning his mother. 'Did God make lions?' he said. 'Yes, sonnie, God made the lions.' 'Did God make ephelants?' 'Yes, God made the ephants.' 'Did He make flies,' the boy persisted. 'Yes, dear, God made the flies.' 'Well, mother,' he commented, 'I think making flies is a pretty fiddling thing to do.'"

MRS. HOUGHTON, DAUGHTER OF MINUTE MAN, DIES

DENVER, COLORADO.—Mrs. Julia A. Houghton, one of the last of those early daughters of the American Revolution, who are only once removed from a soldier of Washington, died here last week. She was born in Cambridge, New York, in 1823, and passed her ninety-fifth birthday on February 3. Her father was a Minute Man in the Revolution and she was the descendant of some of the earliest settlers of America. For many years she made her home in Denver with her son, the late Rev. John H. Houghton, rector of St. Mark's Church, who died on December 8 last year.

The Churchman's contributors include not only the ablest thinkers among Churchmen but also the best secular writers.

Our Contributors

The Rev. John P. Peters, D.D., the Rector of St. Michael's Church, New York City, and a frequent contributor to THE CHURCHMAN, at the Editor's request answers in article Essentials of the Faith a letter in Open Forum on The Church of Rome.

The Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D.D., Bishop of New York, whose address is our leading article this week, needs no introduction to our Church people.

The Rev. George Herbert Toop, D.D., the Rector of the Church of the Holy Apostles, Philadelphia, finishes his stimulating essay on unity, Together, this week.

Florence Converse's spiritual romance, The Knight of the Labyrinth, is also concluded this week.

Miss Grace Lindley, Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, at the request of the Editor, has outlined the war plan of the Woman's Auxiliary, The Advent Call.

The Rev. Percy Trafford Olton is the rector of Christ Church, Towanda, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Arthur Chase, whose Trinity-tide Latin verses, Deo Optimo Maximo, we are glad to publish this week, is the Rector of Trinity Church, Ware, Massachusetts.

The Art News for April 13 published a cut of THE CHURCHMAN Easter cover design with the following gratifying statement:

Among the special covers for the Easter season, one of the most original was that of THE CHURCHMAN, which portrayed an angel passing through the stricken fields of France and Belgium and leaving behind her Easter lilies. The design is by the daughter of Mrs. Ella Condie Lamb, who modestly signs herself K. S. Lamb. Miss Lamb shows distinct decorative sense.

The Merciful Hand

From the Red Cross Magazine

Your fine white hand is Heaven's gift
To cure the wide world, stricken sore,
Bleeding at the breast and head,
Tearing at its wounds once more.

Your white hand is a prophecy,
A living hope that Christ shall come
And make the nations merciful,
Hating the bayonet and drum.

Each desperate burning brain you soothe,
Or ghastly broken frame you bind,
Brings one day nearer our bright goal,
The love-alliance of mankind.

—By VACHEL LINDSAY.

A Bit from Billy Sunday

"Never bring anybody to church with you", said Billy Sunday the other day in Chicago to an audience of fifteen thousand people. "Let the pastor do all the work. The general does all the fighting, while the privates sit around under the shade, smelling the coffee boil and the bacon fry. See that his salary is always behind time. He can work down here and board up in heaven.

Theology and Life

PROFESSOR ALLEN used to trace the connection between the Arian controversy and the Declaration of Independence. The triumph of Athanasius over ius was a victory for democracy. This is not imme-tely patent to busy people, but we should do well to on our guard against the popular fallacy that theology s nothing to do with life. Such a statement discredits reason. Thinking men are bound to go on thinking out religion and to codify their thoughts. Ultimately man thinks so he acts. We do not mean that the duct of the man holding a trinitarian view of God l be perceptibly different from that of his brother o holds another conception. Too many elements ect conduct to make it safe to dogmatize upon which ment controls. But in the long run what the philos-her thinks the man in the street will reflect in his ly life. It takes about twenty-five years for the ory of the philosopher to get to the man in the street. etzsche got there quicker. Maeterlinck said that the l of the peasant would not be what it is today had to and Plotinus, of whom he had never heard, not ed, and Shelley once said that poets are the unacknowl-ged legislators of the world.

No one would dare prophesy what effect upon the-gy the war will have. The testimony of writers l chaplains at the front is contradictory and con-ing. The witness of men like Donald Hankey uld lead us to expect a re-examination of the funda-ntal truths of religion and an attempt to express them language which may be understood of the people. ain comes the testimony that the war has given im-us to superstition. If that be true, we shall expect no did scrutiny of Christian theology. On these matters man's prophecy is about as valid as another's.

But one fact seems to stand out clear and rugged inst the background of the war—the whole Christian rld is eager to acknowledge the absoluteness of the rist. His lordship over the whole of life is the only ution men can now see for the cruel and tragic prob-s of existence. We are likely to have in the coming rs a more earnest and conscientious endeavor on the t of Christians to apply the teachings of the Christ very department of living—personal, social, national international. Such a universal Christian ethic has yet been tried; in that ethic alone can we find any e for making an end of war. Other devices have n tried. We know the result. Everywhere we now r the cry: "Let us trust Christ and make the Chris-experiment." The Church will lamentably fail of its nifest opportunity and duty unless it makes a domi-t issue of the insistence that the way of Christ be at-pted as the solution of our industrial and international fare. The Christian world has not yet acknowledged practice the absoluteness of the Christ. We acknowl-e Him in the Creeds; we recite our Creeds in the rches; we have not practised them in the workshops the world and the council chambers of the nations. s is to be the issue in the period of reconstruction.

Pastor Wagner

N the midst of the noise, the hate and tumult of a world at war, the author of the Simple Life dies in Paris. It was less than fifteen years ago that Pastor Wagner ted our country as a guest at the White House of the nor of the cult of the strenuous life. One wonders t were the thoughts during these latter months of his of this Alsatian preacher of the serene and quiet d. During these last four troubled years he has been ost constantly within sound of the destroying guns. he was drawing to the end of his days, he must have rd the bursting of the shells in the streets of Paris, hurled by the monster gun sixty miles away. The world which his eyes closed upon must have seemed to him a very different world from that which he had struggled to organize in the hearts of men.

"It is not enough to believe in God," he once said, "one must believe in man . . . in humanity and its future." Did he despair of civilization, of progress and of the race, as he saw man's cleverness and might working agony and ruin around him? Not if we have read aright his sermons on the simple life. In diagnosing the restlessness, the hunger and anguish of the human heart, he also laid bare the primary causes of this great war. Individuals, nations, our whole civilization were seeking happiness and prosperity in precipitous paths. Nothing but evil could come from the false and foolish quest. With winning spirit he pointed this out to the individual. The war has written the moral in ruined cities and the sacrifice of ten million youths. Pastor Wagner, like the true Christian prophet, tried to tell his brothers what is worth while in life. Is it too much to hope that after this war nations, too, will seek in the Gospel a knowledge of the abundant life?

We wonder, too, whether it was not somewhat disquieting to this discerning Christian pastor to see, during the war, an increasing tendency to identify Christianity with nationalism. As we turn again the pages of his sermons, we see a more spacious temple of the spirit than any which the State can supply. We feel that had he lived he would have been the first after the war to warn allies and enemies against the unchristian precept that the Christian's City of God can be confined to race or country.

The closing paragraph of his essay on "The Essence of Simplicity" is worth recalling:

"All the strength of the world and all its beauty, all true joy, everything that consoles, that feeds hope, or throws a ray of light along our dark paths, everything that makes us see across our poor lives a splendid goal and a boundless future, comes to us from people of simplicity, those who have made another object of their desires than the passing satisfaction of selfishness and vanity, and have understood that the art of living is to know how to give one's life."

Balanced Councils

THIS is the time of year when diocesan conventions flourish. Annual meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary are the usual accompaniment. The question which is occupying the centre of interest in both gatherings in many dioceses is Shall women sit with men in the councils of the Church? Or shall they occupy the guild house in non-legislative conference about the work of the diocese while the men occupy the church in legislative sessions and define the conditions of that work? The question of whether the Woman's Auxiliary shall recommend to the Board of Missions the admission of eight women members, which is occupying the attention of the women this Spring, and the question of whether women delegates shall be admitted to the diocesan conventions, which is confronting the men, is in its essence the same. We are divided. Massachusetts, in conservative spirit, has voted against the admission of women into its councils. Hankow has voted to give them equal representation with the men.

The most appealing and plausible argument presented by those who oppose women in the councils of the Church is that such action would deprive men of their privilege of government. In support of this argument the instance of women in the diocesan councils of California and of Eastern Oklahoma is cited. "We are just discovering the layman; don't let's discourage him by taking away from him any work he is willing to do."

That argument looks to us like a boomerang. How can men effectively legislate in matters of which, because they are not doing the work, they can not have first-hand information? The question we take it is not one of advantage to the laymen, but of advantage to the Church's mission. Clearly it is of advantage to the Church's mission to have in her councils those who can represent every phase of activity in the mission field and the home church.

In the cases of Eastern Oklahoma and California there was no provision for proportionate representation of men and women. In the matter of women on the Board of Missions the question of depriving men of the privilege does not exist at all. There has been no thought there of substituting women for men on the Board. What is proposed is to add eight women to the already existing number of forty-nine men. It is hardly to be thought that men of the character of the members of the Board of Missions, who have accepted their office in full realization of the responsibility it entails, will lightly hand over their duties to eight women, however brilliant and devoted those women might prove themselves.

In the realms of social welfare and civic philanthropy, in the war programs of city, state and nation, we find men and women working side by side without friction or jealousy or loss of the sense of responsibility on the part of the men. The women on those boards are not taking the place of men, they are supplementing the knowledge, the experience and the limitations of the men, just as the men are supplementing the knowledge and experience and limitations of the women.

It is just exactly because men and women are different, because the sexes can not be identified, that it is impossible to segregate any question of social and civic and religious welfare and say "this is a man's question" and "this is a woman's question" that it is imperative for any effective work for the community that men and women think, confer and act together. What is needed is the women's point of view on every question that arises.

That is what the eight women on the Board of Missions would do. That is what women delegates in diocesan conventions would do. Conference committees can not do it. The whole point is to have a judgment embracing every point of view.

When women ask to have their voices heard in the councils of the Church it is not because they wish to assert identity with men. If men and women were exactly alike there would be no special hardship in excluding women from places where they were so adequately represented. The broad distinction that is sometimes made that men are more interested in the general and women in the particular has much truth in it. The two sexes are intended to be complementary.

Take the concrete instance of women on the Board of Missions. The work of that Board touches at every point the needs and interests of women as closely as it does those of men. The problems affecting the education of boys and of girls are so closely related that a policy directing one independently of the other is practically impossible. Women teachers, Bible women, deaconesses, women physicians, are affected by the same conditions as are men.

Corporate life is of the essence of the Church. We glory, and rightly, that in this country we have a single missionary society, the Church; a single board of strategy, the Board of Missions. If we fail to knit up into an indissoluble unit the work of parish, diocese, province and Church by admitting women to the councils of the Church, we impoverish the life, impair the judgment and lessen the effectiveness of all that is done.

There is another and a real danger. We hear a good deal about "losing our young women." In the West and Southwest not only the young women, but the older women as well, are accustomed to taking an active part in the direction of affairs that concern them. The war is simply hastening a development which all whose eyes have not been closed have realized If women feel that work in the Church is hampered and rendered ineffective through lack of co-ordination and co-operation between men and women, they will do their work outside of the Church. Many Churchwomen are already doing this; and many more women communicants will be lo to the Church's working force unless these restrictio are removed and women are able to make their contrib tion and do their work in the Church as effectively they are doing it in the spheres of social and civic li

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

Memorial Day

MEMORIAL DAY must not be let pass this year as mere Summer holiday. The President's proclam tion sets forth the appropriate spirit of its observanc Had the call come from the Church it could ha sounded no deeper and finer spiritual note. It is si nificant and perplexing that the head of the State shou call our people to penitence and prayer, while the Hou of Bishops in their recent pastoral remind us "that t support of those in authority is a religious duty," and th "we are to pray without ceasing for the success of o armies," but not a word is said about self-examinati and penitence. Is the State to show more spiritual d cernment than the Church? Is victory in this war mean nothing more than conquering our enemies a the preservation of our freedom? Some who are drea ing dreams of a better tomorrow for the children of m throughout the world know that there is a good d yet to be done in the way of converting Christians b fore the peace of God can come into the councils nations.

Among the prayers which we Churchmen utter in c churches on Memorial Day, let us ask God for the gra to know what things we ought to do and for the streng faithfully to fulfil the same.

Our Saturday Night Sermons

A NUMBER of our contributors have written to kn if Dr. Dowling's sermons are no longer to appear the columns of THE CHURCHMAN. His announcem a fortnight ago that the series is approaching the e aroused anxiety among those who have looked forwa week by week to these Saturday Night talks. The edi shares with Dr. Dowling's many parishioners regret t Dr. Dowling feels unequal to the task of contribut to THE CHURCHMAN during the Summer months. I physician has urged him to take a complete rest, but hope that with the coming of Autumn he will return his old place in our columns. It is gratifying to him a to us that he should have this quick response of app ciation and affection on the announcement of his tem rary withdrawal from THE CHURCHMAN staff.

For Law and Order

THE State and national officials in Illinois have indict sixteen persons for the lynching of Robert Prager Collinsville and a plan has been set on foot for cru ing at the outset any similar outbreak of lawlessness. also read the encouraging news that twenty-one pers in Bisbee, Arizona, implicated in the business of depo ing strikers have been indicted. If now the Governm will show interest in the Negro atrocities in the Sou we shall begin to take on the appearance of a law-ab ing people.

Another Element Mastered

THE horrors and devastation of war are so persi ently before our minds that we must not let pass u noticed any of its creative forces. Wars not only destr the products of man's labor, they also stimulate his ventive energies. The Napoleonic wars gave impetus the utilization of steam for transportation. The pres world war is likely to see electricity harnessed to do t world's work. But undoubtedly the new marvel will airplane service.

Events have so stimulated the imagination of t reading public that it takes a good deal of a thrill make a noticeable headline in our daily papers. The was very little excitement over that first trip of airplane bearing mail between New York and Washington. But it was one of the events that will stand out symbolically in the twentieth century. Men have at last mastered the air.

We recall hearing Dr. Huntington say at a Church Congress just before his death: "The twentieth century will be marked by three great triumphs, the mastery of the air, the abolishing of wars and church unity." We have mastered the air. Now for peace and unity!

As Others See Us

"WHEN war is for the common weal, then war is worship, war is prayer." Treitschke? No, this came from Boston and was spoken at the meeting in Philadelphia of the League to Enforce Peace. Virile and statesmanlike utterances were made at this great meeting where nearly 4,000 of America's best citizens gathered to discuss the issues of the war. We believe that every peace-loving American is heartily in sympathy with the "war to the finish" attitude of this fine organization of which Mr. Taft is the president.

But does America need to be goaded on to see her duty and get it done by ecstatic exaggerations such as that of Mr. Filene's which we have quoted above? It really does not help to make war more effective by identifying it with worship. The soldier himself in the trenches has no such illusions. He is far more sane and a good deal more reverent. War is a necessary but a horrible business. Prayer and worship are words not to be loosely uttered. Is there to be no holy of holies in life left unsmeared by the temporary passions of war? The men who see war at its worst and best, we are sure, would have us show a little more reticence in our patriotic fervor.

Professor Foerster on Belgium

THERE is at least one high-souled and peace-loving professor in Germany.

Professor Foerster pleads eagerly that Germans should endeavor to comprehend the passionate determination of the allies to carry on the war. He frankly admits the ever-growing desire in England and America for the superseding of war by the methods of arbitration, and boldly proclaims that the enemies of Germany are fighting to remove the menace of war out of the world. On the question of Belgium the Professor is splendidly outspoken. But let us hear his own words:

"In the Belgian question also the more advanced section of our people must at last pass from ambiguous generalities to concrete (action) before it can stand before the throne of justice of . . . inner truth and talk about the hand of peace which has been thrust aside. . . . Only if we see in the restoration of Belgium an affair of national honor and not a matter for bargaining, only if we return to the word of the Chancellor regarding a wrong which has been done, only if the sense of justice of the German nation comes so strongly into the foreground that it sees through the futility of the so-called proofs with which certain professors of national law have tried to cast suspicion on the neutrality of the Belgian Government and absolve us from all wrong doing—only then shall we find the right decisions and the right words to convince the remainder of the world of the existence of a new Germany."—The Commonwealth.

The Auxiliary War Plans

ELSEWHERE in this issue appears Miss Lindley's account of the war plan of the Woman's Auxiliary. To our mind this is one of the most significant forward steps the Auxiliary has taken in many years. The trouble with the Woman's Auxiliary, to quote the criticism of one faithful Churchwoman, is that "it is so far away from the heathen." Its members have been occupied with raising money, packing boxes and learning about the work others are doing. It has its splendid body of representatives in the United Offering missionaries, but the rank and file of the Auxiliary have never been given opportunity to do direct evangelistic work.

Opportunities for the very same kind of work that the missionary and the Bible woman do among the "not-yet-Christians" of China and Japan and India present themselves here in half-Christian America. A great part of the time of these women we send across the seas is occupied with visiting and talking and reading with those who have never heard or understood the Gospel. Now at last there comes a call to the women at home. It is a magnificent vision that the Auxiliary leaders have conceived, and the time is ripe.

The English Pilgrimage of Prayer had much the same purpose. The Pilgrims went from town to town and village to village holding cottage prayer services. The English Pilgrims with whom we have talked feel that their work was well worth while.

The Messengers that the Auxiliary plan calls for must be well prepared. That is part of the plan. The success of it lies, however, in the hands of the clergy. It will be due largely to the leadership of the individual rectors and to the use to which they wish to put the women who present themselves as Messengers, whether the "Advent Call" proves of value in the parish.

A Proclamation by the President

WHEREAS, The Congress of the United States, on the second day of April last, passed the following resolution:

"RESOLVED by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That it being a duty peculiarly incumbent in a time of war humbly and devoutly to acknowledge our dependence on Almighty God and to implore His aid and protection, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully requested to commend a day of public humiliation, prayer, and fasting, to be observed by the people of the United States with religious solemnity and the offering of fervent supplications to Almighty God for the safety and welfare of our cause, His blessings on our arms, and a speedy restoration of an honorable and lasting peace to the nations of the earth";

AND WHEREAS, It has always been the reverent habit of the people of the United States to turn in humble appeal to Almighty God for His guidance in the affairs of their common life;

NOW, THEREFORE, I, Woodrow Wilson, President of the United States of America, do hereby proclaim Thursday, the thirtieth of May, a day already freighted with sacred and stimulating memories, a day of public humiliation, prayer, and fasting, and do exhort my fellow-citizens of all faiths and creeds to assemble on that day in their several places of worship and there, as well as in their homes, to pray Almighty God that He may forgive our sins and shortcomings as a people and purify our hearts to see and love the truth, to accept and defend all things that are just and right, and to purpose only those righteous acts and judgments which are in conformity with His will; beseeching Him that He will give victory to our armies as they fight for freedom, wisdom to those who take counsel on our behalf in these days of dark struggle and perplexity, and steadfastness to our people to make sacrifice to the utmost in support of what is just and true, bringing us at last the peace in which men's hearts can be at rest because it is founded upon mercy, justice, and good-will.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done in the District of Columbia this eleventh day of May, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and eighteen, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and forty-second.

WOODROW WILSON.

By the President,
Robert Lansing,
Secretary of State.

SATURDAY NIGHT SERMON

"Full Steam Ahead!"

By THE REV. GEORGE THOMAS DOWLING, D.D

"Who is this uncircumcised Philistine that he should defy the armies of the living God?" 1 Samuel xvii—26.

I HAVE never in my life been so proud of being an American as I am today. And I have never in my life been so ashamed of being an American as I was two years ago. Not in the history of mankind has there been, in so short a time, so great a transformation in any people.

Then, the whole world was ablaze—except ourselves. And while the fire leaped from home to home and city to city and nation to nation, and the very heavens were red, we sat, looking on, limbs crossed, and saying that we were too proud to fight the flames.

All that, however, is now in the past, to be forgotten if possible; though it can never be forgiven. Never! not when we realize, as we shall more and more, the firesides which must become desolate and the untold treasure which must be poured into the sea, because, with the years of warning behind us, when the hour struck, we were not ready.

But, thank God, at last we have awakened; not at the eleventh hour. No! it was far past eleven and nearly twelve. But it is not twelve yet. There still remains time to save the world, if we hurry up. But we must hurry!

And we are hurrying now. If that is not your spirit with all your heart, whether in the conscientious conservation of food, or the purchase of bonds, or the cheering of husband or brother or lover or son to go across the sea, or the casting of your ballot for a 100 per cent. American, then you have been left behind by your countrymen. Realize it well. You have been left behind. You are helping the Kaiser. Every man and woman today is either for this nation or against it. There is not a neutral alive.

In the moment when President Wilson sounded that wonderful call to war, the voice of the great God was heard, as in olden time, "This People is not dead but sleepeth. Come forth!" And the dead came forth. At first we made mistakes; we stumbled and fell; for we were "bound hand and foot with grave-clothes, and our face was bound about with a napkin." But today the grave-clothes have been thrown aside. The napkin has been taken from our eyes. We have been "loosed" and we have been "let go." And we are going: half a million men today; soon two millions; then five; then ten; then, in the words of our President, "to the last man and the last dollar." We are going; we are going strong; we are going—over there!

At last the spirit of our forefathers has awakened in their sons, and we seem to hear again the voice of John Adams as he grasps his musket from the kitchen wall and with his comrades hastens forth to the battle of Lexington, shouting as he runs, "O what a glorious morning!"

Never since Calvary has there been so supreme a moment in the world's history as we are witnessing now. It is no figure of speech when I say it; it is the awful fact, that on yonder field of Flanders all the forces of Hell are in a death grapple with the forces of Righteousness, determining the question, apparently, for all time, whether the future of this world shall be Christian or Pagan, Civilized or Barbarian, a Slave World or Free. We are at war. It is a real war. We have got to beat them or they will beat us. And if that should happen—then the deluge! Verily

"We are living, we are dwelling
In a grand and awful time,
In an age, on ages telling,
To be living is sublime.
Hark! the waking up of nations,
Gog and Magog to the fray!
Hark! what soundeth is creation's
Groaning for its latter day.

"Will ye play then, will ye dally
With your music and your wine?
Up! it is Jehovah's rally,
God's own arm hath need of thine.
Hark! the onset! will ye fold your Faith-clad arms in lazy lock?
Up! oh, up! thou drowsy soldier,
Worlds are charging to the shock.

"Worlds are charging, heaven beholding,
Thou hast but an hour to fight;
Now the blazoned cross unfolding,
On, right onward, for the right!
Oh! let all the soul within you,
For the truth's sake go abroad.
Strike, let every nerve and sinew
Tell on ages, tell for God."

"Who is this uncircumcised Philistine that he should defy the armies of the living God?" This is who he is. I heard in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, the Honorable T. P. O'Conner say, "Soon after this war began, I refused to believe the stories of German atrocities. I felt that they must be exaggerations, until an intimate friend related to me her experience in Brussels. She said, 'I went to the officer in command; told him of the babies I had seen dying for want of milk, and begged permission to collect a fund to purchase it for them. While I spoke he impatiently twirled his mustache, and then with arrogance and contempt exclaimed, "Madame, what you ask is not only impossible but absurd. Remember, that to a German soldier every man, woman and child is the enemy!" ' "

We ourselves could not believe such things. We did not. But we did not then know that in the handbook of military tactics, published in 1902 by the General Staff of the German Army, its very opening sentence was this: "Terrorism Becomes a Principle Made Necessary by Military Considerations." We did not then know that on page 52 of that same book these words are printed: "A war conducted with energy cannot be directed merely against the combatants of the enemy states, but it must in like manner seek to destroy the total intellectual and material resources of the latter."

At last Germany stands revealed, exactly as she is—Kaiser and people alike. Now we know what was in her brutal, putrid soul when she commenced this war. Now we know that it was all a part of her well-defined plan, thought out during forty years, that as a method of warfare, breaking every treaty and disregarding every law of Christian civilization, she should bayonet babies, and rape young girls, and crucify nuns, and practice such mutilations on men that these can be spoken of, even among men, only in whispers.

And as surely as God lives, whether it shall take one year or ten years to accomplish it, she shall pay for the evil that she has wrought, to the last drop of her rotten blood.

These then are my closing words to you: Whatever it may mean in personal sacrifice, in the loss of money, or in the death of those whom you most dearly love, for the sake of your country, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of the religion of the holy Christ, for the sake of all that you hold most precious and most sacred,—Full Steam Ahead!

I have now, for the present at least, finished my work in connection with these Saturday Night Sermons. When this is published, I shall just be entering upon my seventieth year, and have decided to lay aside all engagements which might tie me to my desk, and so far as practicable spend life in the open.

It is possible that I may resume them in the Autumn, but whether I shall or not, I cannot permit this moment to pass without referring to (Continued on page 697)

Spiritual Values of the War

By THE RT. REV. DAVID H. GREER, D.D.

THE CHURCHMAN is glad to publish for its readers part of Bishop Greer's address to the Diocesan Convention. What the Bishop of New York thinks ought to be and will be the spiritual outcome of the war is of interest to the whole church.—THE EDITOR.

I AM led to speak of another matter: not only are many of the clergy giving themselves to the service of the country in this its time of need, but also many laymen. How many have already gone from us I do not know. I have tried to make or collect a full roster of them, but so far I have been able to do it only in part, although I am still engaged in trying to make it complete; so that through the agency of our Church chaplains, or the members of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, or by some other personal means, we may be able to follow them up and minister to their needs. I have before me at present the names of about seven thousand men. I wish I could read them to you, as the names of those who have gone from us to do and perform a hard and patriotic task. May God bless and keep them both in soul and body and give them strength and courage to do the work which they are trying to do, or which through them, as a nation we are trying to do.

And what is that work? We have time and again said it, said it to ourselves, and it has been said for us by our Chief Magistrate. Namely, to rescue and redeem the world from tyranny and oppression, from a harsh and brutal and brutalizing force, and to give a larger freedom to the peoples of other lands.

But why should we as a nation engage in such a task? Why is it not enough that we should try to keep our freedom to and for ourselves and enjoy it by ourselves? Why? Because it is impossible. I do not mean morally impossible, but from the very nature of the case psychologically impossible.

For what is Freedom? Freedom is not an independent entity, a privilege, a prerogative, which we can develop in ourselves alone or for ourselves alone. Freedom is a relation or is in a relation found, between ourselves and others. We find it as we share it; we get it as we give it, and which therefore we cannot win or cannot keep and hold simply by ourselves or simply for ourselves, but which, if we would make it grow more and more in us, we must be willing to let it grow, yes, and try to make it grow more and more in others. As a man cannot live for himself alone in this world, neither can he be free for himself alone in this world; and the freedom which he wins or which he thinks he wins, but doesn't, simply for himself, is not freedom but selfishness. And selfishness is slavery. And whether he be poor or whether he be rich, the selfish man is a slave and the worst kind of slave, tied, bound and fettered both in heart and soul, and often to his body bound and the passions of his body.

Now what is true of the personal or individual life —that it cannot find its full freedom stature in itself alone, but only in relation between itself and others— s true of life in groups. We cannot in this land be free, we American people, with a full national freedom, simply for ourselves. There is not, there cannot be, any such freedom neutrality as that; and if we would work out, we American people, our heritage of freedom, we cannot work it fully out simply by ourselves, but must try to work it out in relation to the peoples of other lands than ours, sharing it with them and working it out together.

We did not think so once perhaps; we thought on the contrary that whatever might be true of the people of other lands, however great the force, the autocratic force, that ruled and governed them, we at least were free. But that was our mistake, as now we are beginning to see and learn; not so much from our own volition and choice, but because of that relation, that close world relation, in which today we are, and from which we are learning that only as we win or as we try to win freedom for the peoples in other lands than ours do we or can we win freedom for ourselves, and touch and reach our own full freedom stature.

But that is not all. Something more we are winning or beginning at least to win. For that struggle for freedom, for a world freedom, in which we are engaged, is a sharp and costly struggle, costing us much, very much, in suffering and sorrow, sacrifice and loss, and the possibility is that in the coming months, or perhaps the coming years, it will cost us more in sacrifice and loss. And just as an individual does in fact so often and for the first time find and win his soul only through the sharp mordant of a suffering experience, so does a nation find and win its soul, so will this nation, by the sharp mordant of its present suffering and disciplinary experience, find or win its corporate soul and become more and more spiritually alive. There is indeed latent and potential in it, in this American people, in this American nation, a rich spiritual treasure trove, which it has not yet developed and brought out, exercised and used; which, like an undeveloped mine, it has not put to work, but which at times it feels, vaguely, dimly feels, of which at times it dreams in high ideal dreams, which come and flit and go again like vision dreams of the soul, but which it has not bodied forth or practically expressed. But now it is coming out, that latent life of the soul, that corporate soul of the people, is taking hands and feet, is taking form and face and working body on. Now it is coming out, that spiritual idealism which is latent in the American people. The lower human life which had seemed before so practical and real, is going, dropping, drooping: the higher life is coming out, that higher life of the soul, like "meat out of the eater and sweetness out of the strong," as the only life which now it seems worth while to live, if the nation would be alive, or if it would live at all.

Can we not see it? Are we not beginning even now to see, through all the smoke and battle noise and confusion of the strife, with all its variant voices and its discordant cries—can we not see some of the best and noblest qualities of the human soul more and more appearing, and which will more and more meet and blend and merge and become at last the corporate soul of the nation!

And still something more is coming out of it all; or may we not hope at least, may we not believe, that in and through it all, this sacrifice and loss, we are coming face to face with the reality of God? As Joseph said to the sons of Jacob, so God in His Providence seems to be saying to us, "Ye shall not see my face except your brother be with you." And is it not the testimony of many persons today who on the battle line and at the battle front are suffering hurt and loss and making costly sacrifice to rescue and recover their brethren in the world and bring them back to freedom, that for the first time and as never before they are coming face to face with the reality of God. Not indeed by an intellectual process or by the arguments of the schools or the apologetics of the churches, but through their own suffering experience in behalf of others, their brethren in the world: they are finding, winning and laying hold on God, and in laying hold on God they are laying hold upon eternal life.

Why it should be so, that a sacrificial suffering in behalf of others, is the way to God I do not know; I cannot understand. It is the mystery of the Cross. I only know it is so, and that many persons have found it so and are finding it so today.

And again, what is true of the personal or individual life is true of the corporate life of the nation.

Here then are some of the deep and true and spiritual realities, which, in wrestling and contending, through suffering and hurt and sacrifice and loss for the freedom of the world, this American nation is winning for itself the reality of the soul, the reality of God, the reality of an immortal life; and which, (Continued on page 697)

Essentials of the Faith

By THE REV. JOHN P. PETERS, Ph. D., D. D., Sc. D.

This article was written at the request of the Editor as a reply to a letter which appears this week in the Open Forum under the title "The Church of Rome."

"WHAT would be required of one, either in faith or practice, to be an acceptable member of the Church of Rome which is not allowed to be taught and practised in the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States or in the Church of England?"

Perhaps we may best approach the answer to this question by putting another question. What would be required of one to be an acceptable citizen of the German Empire which is not allowed to be taught and practised in the United States?

In the form in which it is propounded there is only one answer to the first, as there is only one answer to the second question. The one thing required of one to be an acceptable citizen of the German Empire which is not allowed to be taught and practised in the United States is allegiance to the German Emperor. The nearest approach to a categorical answer which can be given to the first question is allegiance to the Pope. One thing only in each case, but that one thing carries tremendous implications, which cannot, however, be easily laid down in details.

In faith the essential doctrine of the Roman Church, which separates us from it, is the recognition of Papal Supremacy, or since 1870 Papal Infallibility, modified possibly by subjective interpretation.

Outside of this within very broad limits anything may be allowed in Rome. The Uniates of the Greek, Armenian, Syrian and Coptic churches may retain their ritual and practices, if they acknowledge the supremacy of the Pope, for, after all, celibacy of clergy, Communion in one kind or both, Confession, use or non-use of images, the language of the ritual, the nature of the music to be sung or played, the interpretation of the Scriptures, literally or by the extremest modern method, are canonical, not fundamental matters. Practically, creeds and decrees to the contrary, the same is true of belief. I have known as faithful members of the Roman Catholic faith a "Unitarian" and a "Presbyterian", I have known advanced Biblical critics and scientific progressives. If they are ready to hold these views as "private" and submit themselves to the discipline and order of authority—there is no difficulty. The one essential thing is that they recognize and obey the authority of the Pope; but in actual practice the effects of this obedience are very far reaching, and this principle of authority of one over all stretches down from above, affecting all use, and in the end determining all doctrine, even in minute matters.

The essential element in Protestantism is the right of free determination by the individual; in Catholicism, of union under authority. Carried to a one-sided conclusion the first means anarchy; the second, rigid and inhuman uniformity. In practice both are combined in varying degrees in every church. Most Protestant communions, at the outset at least, sought to establish authority by rigid doctrinal definitions. That was done also in the Episcopal Church by the Articles of Religion; and in Rome by the Tridentine Decrees. In practice Rome has substituted for the latter the principle of authority centred in one infallible person; while the Episcopal Church has allowed its articles to lapse, and depends for its authority on custom, practice and a habit of working together. The Presbyterians and some of the other older and more highly organized Protestant Communions have tended latterly to follow the same course. These differ from the Episcopal Church, however, in tradition. At the Reformation the Episcopal Church did not break with mediaeval and early Catholicity as completely as they did, preserving in organization, form and ritual, much of the old, which the others abandoned, and hence permitting in certain directions a much greater liberty. That liberty has been rather increased in latter years, so that an Episcopalian may hold to ancient or mediaeval views on the one hand, or extreme modernist views on the other, provided he conforms to certain prescribed forms, and works with other Episcopalians in sufficient harmony of spirit and of government to permit of such a degree of cohesion as to constitute some sort of a unity.

The Roman Catholic, by his increasing emphasis on the authority of the Pope (as witness the decree of Papal Infallibility), has tended more and more toward uniformity in faith (cf. the modernist definitions of the Pope) and in practice (cf. such minutiae as the Papal directions governing music in churches the world over). Presbyterians and others who had thrown away mediaeval and ancient tradition have tended to broaden only in one direction. Episcopalians have by tradition and use a liberty of faith and practice at both ends.

The Churchman is bound by certain regulations of constitution and of canon law. These prescribe the Bible, two Creeds, two Sacraments, Confirmation, and Ordination in three grades: bishop, priest and deacon; and methods of organization and administration in the nation, the diocese and the parish, including forms of religious service. The latter matters are confessedly subject to change at any time, questions of use and practice only. The former are so considered by some and not by others. All that is or can in fact be required of any one is that he shall observe and use the things prescribed. Provided he do this, he may add what forms and uses he will, and he may strive in a constitutional manner to have them changed or abandoned if he will. He may interpret them for himself, and indeed to some extent he must, for within limits no two persons can interpret any doctrine and perform any ceremony in just the same way, even when authoritatively defined; in the Episcopal Church there is neither authoritative definition nor authoritative interpreter.

How far any Churchman may go in using practices and teaching doctrines associated in the Protestant world with Rome, how far he may go in adopting practices and teaching doctrines associated in the Catholic world with Methodists, Anabaptists, Presbyterians, Congregationalists or what not is ultimately a matter of individual interpretation; and indeed it is safest and wisest to have it so. In practice we find among us in the teaching of the Sacraments here the doctrine of Zwingli and there of Rome, in orders, of Greece and Congregationalism; in inspiration, on the one side the exaltation of the letter of the Scriptures to divinity, and on the other an equalization of the Bible with all other books; in ritual the pomp of the mass in a tongue understood by none, and services as bald as Quakerism, or as erratic as Methodism. Yet through it all there is somehow a very recognizable unity of purpose, of spirit and of belief. Authority is recognized by all in greater or less degrees, but the authority of one over all is everywhere repudiated; individual liberty of thought and expression is also recognized, but is kept within some bounds of order. The Church, it is true, seems to some sometimes like a chance concurrence of atoms, always about to disintegrate and form new combinations. The extreme Protestant mistrusts the extreme Catholic and vice versa, and each is always trying to dictate his ism to the other. This distrust shows itself in the questioning of the practices of each by the other. How far may he go toward Rome and stay in the Church? How far may he go toward Geneva, toward Unitarianism, toward the Salvation Army, toward Christian Science? Precise definition of these things is impossible, as experience and history show. No two men and no two ages make the same definition. The Church is always changing and yet it never changes. It is a way of life, to use the ancient name, not an enclosure of law.

In matters of detail in faith or practice, where there is a way of life, as I see it, the question asked cannot be answered in essentials, only as I have answered it; albeit to explain my answer I have been obliged to present an explanation of what in my understanding the Church is.

Together. II

By THE REV. GEORGE HERBERT TOOP, D.D.

LIBERTY, unity, democracy—these are the compelling watchwords of today.

Liberty the world is winning, unity achieving, emocracy establishing in the face of kings and all other ıds. A fettered Church will not avail for free life, an ıtocratic Church for democratic states, a divided Church ır a united world.

Liberty of thought and speech and action must be ers. A Church bound by fear of truth or favor of ıan is of all things the least useful and most negligible ır free men.

For helping to win the new democracy being born ıday she finds herself not only without effective weapons, ıt as an institution out of consonance with much of its ıirit.

Some of her forms of government are archaic, some her formularies out of harmony with the times. To ·ove herself a really divine institution she must be uly and fully human. She needs a new baptism in the ıirit of her Lord, Who was real democracy's true ex-ınent. Born of a peasant woman; a laborer; of a free ıirit; companion of men erring and virtuous alike; orner of subtleties; lover of truth; without money or ace whereon to lay His head, but enriching men with ıerty of spirit and intellectual and moral honesties out His own boundless stores.

"Son of Man," He loved to call Himself; the one ue democrat of His day, and still the incomparable ıder of the world in democratic idealism and its fight r freedom.

William Temple has thrown into his own language a ble from the masterpiece of the Russian novelist, ostoievsky, which is pertinent here.

"In the days of the Inquisition, this fable runs, our ɔrd returned to earth, and visited a city where it was work. As He moved about, men forgot their cares d sorrows. He healed the sick folk as of old, and eeting with a funeral procession where a mother was ɔurning the loss of her only son, He stopped the pro-ssion, and restored the dead boy to life.

"That was in the cathedral square, and at that moment ere came out from the cathedral doors the Grand In-isitor, an old man over ninety years of age, clad now, t in the cardinal's robe in which only the day before he d condemned a score of heretics to the stake, but in a nple cassock, with only two guards in attendance. eing what was done he turned to the guards and said, rrest Him'. They moved forward to obey; and he nt the Prisoner to a cell in the dungeon.

"That night the Grand Inquisitor visited his Pris-er, and to all that he said the Prisoner made no reply. know why Thou art come', said the Inquisitor; 'Thou come to spoil our work, to repeat Thy great mistake the wilderness, and to give men again Thy fatal gift freedom. What did the great wise spirit offer Thee ere? Just the three things by which men may be con-olled—bread and authority and mystery. He bade Thee e bread as the instrument of Thy work; men will low one who gives them bread. But Thou wouldst t; men were to follow Thee out of love and devotion not at all. We have had to correct Thy work, or there ould be few to follow Thee. He bade Thee assume thority; men will obey one who gives commands, and nishes the disobedient. But Thou wouldst not; men re to obey out of love and devotion or not at all. We ve had to correct Thy work, or there would be few follow Thee. He bade Thee show some marvel that n might be persuaded and believe. But Thou wouldst t; men were to believe from perception of Thy grace d truth or not at all. We have had to correct Thy ork and hedge Thee about with mystery, or there ould be few to believe. And which of us has served ankind the better? Thy appeal was to the few strong ils. We have cared for the weak. Many who would disorderly and miserable have been made orderly and ppy. And now Thou art come to spoil our work and repeat Thy great mistake in the wilderness by giving to men again Thy fatal gift of freedom, through trust in the power of love. But it shall not be; for tomorrow I shall burn Thee'.

"The Grand Inquisitor ceased; and still the Prisoner made no reply; but He rose from where He sat, and crossed the cell, and kissed the old man on his bloodless lips. Then the Inquisitor, too, rose, and opened the door; 'Go,' he said. The Prisoner passed out into the night and was not seen again.

"And the old man? That kiss burns in his heart. But he has not altered his opinion or his practice."

Merely a tale of a past time?

But Pharisaism, Sanhedrins, Inquisitions, and Hierarchies are not dead things. Their spirit still persists to oppose the free play of the free spirit of free men.

When the Church shall have thrown off the shackles of her self-imposed autocracies, then shall she be able to lead men up to the mountain tops of truth and spiritual freedom—not before.

Her first and most essential step toward the establishing of herself as a moving power in human life is to create a unity within herself. And, as in the world, so in the Church. There are visible signs of that unity.

Not long ago a hint, indirect to be sure, but still a hint, came forth that the Vatican might be willing to reconsider the question of Anglican orders. And if the great Roman or Anglican communions were to come together what a mighty step toward Church unity that would be. The Anglican and the Greek churches were exchanging inquiries before the war, and drawing each year nearer and nearer together. We can confidently expect a much more rapid progress there so soon as peace shall smile again upon the earth. The Anglican and Swedish churches had commissions appointed before the war examining all the possibilities for closer interrelationships. The Episcopal Church in America has a standing Commission on Faith and Order, which is trying to bring all the churches of the world into conference on unity.

In Australia a serious effort was shortly made to set up a really national church, which should be a composite of all the churches there. In Canada efforts are being made toward a unity of all the Protestant churches, which holds much of promise for the future.

The Presbyterian churches in the United States are gradually drawing together and are laying plans for a union of their various branches or cognate churches throughout the world. The various Methodist churches are reconciling their differences, and have made a beginning of the task of drawing all their members everywhere into a great world Church. The Lutherans of the United States are merging themselves into one body. In England the Non-Conformists are laying plans for a closer union after the war in preparation for the great tasks which will then confront Christianity; while the Wesleyans, for the first time since they left her, are looking toward the Church of England, with not only a question, but something of hunger in their eyes.

In the mission fields of Protestantism there has long been a unity of action and harmony of purpose, which has had a healthy reflex action on the Churches back home.

But still there remains much to be done, much underbrush of prejudice, intolerance, and bigotry to be cleared away before we come out into the open spaces of unity.

Old and strongly intrenched organizations of any sort do not easily yield to pressure, and especially do not those organizations have to do with men's religious convictions.

Our fathers, however, brought about spiritual liberty by changing their convictions.

An opportunity without fellow in the history of time now offers itself to us of this generation to complete the task our fathers began, and hand on to our sons a Church quite free and united and one with life.

A dozen men from each of the great branches of the Church, a new kind of Twelve Apostles, apostles of liberty, in a new kind of Ecumenical Council, with free hands and the love of God in their hearts, could draw up a program for progressive action making for unity, which the Church could refuse only at her peril. But, whether in this or in some other way, conference is the way to promote harmony, and is the necessary preliminary to unity.

But such a conference must have the cross in its midst as its symbol of action, and refuse no sacrifice which it demands.

Christ's body was a torn body, Christ's heart is a torn heart, and His Church a torn Church, because of the intolerance and dissension within it.

Within our own Church we have known internal division and discord. Differences of opinion have been intense, strong feelings, if not passions, have been aroused. Many have given way to unbrotherly acrimony and petulance in the irritation of the hour. Discussion has descended to dispute and debate debased itself into questionings of motive.

To some it seemed that the only logical and honest solution was to be found in disseverance. But within the Church's life, as elsewhere, the war is effecting many changes. Even before the war one found evidences multiplying of a better and more brotherly attitude of mind developing. Saner second thought was exercising its usual conciliatory function and ministry. We each knew and loved adherents in the other schools of thought, and in spite of logical formulas we argued, as men always have done and will do, from the particular to the general. We knew in the bottom of our hearts that these brothers we loved were not guilty of disloyalty to the inner self and vital truth of the Church we both loved, even though our definitions of her differed.

The last General Convention did much to further the process of peace already begun. There was a very evident spirit of conciliation informing and guiding its deliberations. Many who faced it in prospect with disturbed thought turned to their tasks at its close with quiet assurance. Were a General Convention to be held today we would know beforehand that suspicion and dispute between parties would seem too trivial for tolerance, and that differences would be obliterated and forgotten in the tremendous issues of the hour. There would be no divided counsels, only a consuming enthusiasm for a great cause.

Well will it be for us if we can keep that temper.

We have prided ourselves on being the Church of the conciliation, and have prayed that Christ might use us as His mediating agency for restoring His Church's lost unity. That unity must be a very passion in the soul of Christ. Civil discord is not half so heinous a wrong as discord in the Church. Disputes between nations cannot be more pitiable to the Mediator than the antagonisms of His torn Bride. Said a Presbyterian minister to the writer as he met him casually on the street the other day: "If Christ were to come to Philadelphia today, as He might come for He has been here in the world before, I wonder to whom He would turn as His representatives? What Church would He claim as His? Could He find any exemplifying His spirit? Suppose He turned to the Romanists, what would that mean to us? Suppose He turned to us, or some branch of us, what would that mean to the rest? Haven't we made our differences our real religion?"

It expresses a startling thought, and one that must needs trouble us.

There are no precedents to guide us in the times that are coming. The world is in flux. Only one thing seems certain and that is change, change in thought, in problem, in values, in very speech.

The Church cannot escape the compelling influences of the time, she cannot remain what she was before.

Cabin her in the confines of the past and she will be apart from the controlling impulses of the future. Keep her in the swaddling clothes of a childhood's day that is done, and she will not have a masterful, compelling message for the day of the race's maturity which is to come.

Some day all the churches of the Crucified will one Church. How ineffable a satisfaction and joy would be if the Master find us the instrument meet f the mediating task. If so, even if we are to have a part in the process of mediation, it must be, it can b only because we ourselves are one. One in love a brotherhood, one in a consuming, eager, passionate lo for the Christ, which burns up the chaff of discord in a fire of white heat, and leaves only the garnered gra of a pure faith and a sincere and loving brotherhood.

It is a day of great visions. Wide vistas of undream possibility open before us. One finds a facility of thoug about great problems altogether new. It seems not or entirely natural, but the challenge of the time to be co structively revolutionary.

Great days bring great causes to the fore, and gre causes insure great days. But both wait on unity of a tion. While the mood is upon us let us accomplish t evident will of the Spirit.

Again conference is the door to concert in thoug and purpose and deed. And again sacrifice is the key the door. It is not a time for societies accentuating pa tisanship or agencies born for defense of difference. Th strike discordant notes in the mighty orchestration of t time with its threefold theme of liberty, unity, a democracy. We shall be without avail in the preser of an unparalleled opportunity if we are not willing a praying and acting together.

As the national life is being consolidated; as t world is drawing together; as the broken Church assuming new and kindlier relationships; so, pray G may we become one within ourselves. One in a too cl and restricted doctrinal interpretation and liturgical e pression we can never be, nor would want to be. Tl way lies stagnation and death. One sees that to be t today if he could not before. But one we can be i truer unity than that. One in the determinations of f appraisal, kindly speech and constructive criticism those who differ from us. One in magnifying the gr things that unite us and in minimizing the lesser thi which divide.

Together for a great part in a great cause in a gr time. Accoutred with the weapons of the Spirit, wh are His fruit in Christian brotherhood, "love—pea longsuffering, gentleness—meekness, temperance," mol for His leading, and responsive to the great challen

The spirit represented in such words as togeth co-operation, association, unity, call it what you will, is essential and significant spirit of today. Out of harm with it we are out of harmony with the times, and oppose it only to our loss, and negatively will hinder fulfilment of our Lord's prayer—"That they all n be one; as Thou, Father, art in Me, and I in Thee, t they also may be one in us."

A dream? Yes, but sometimes dreams come tru and with startling and unexpected suddenness. And t dream is based on the prayer of One, Who is the H of the Church, and Whose desires cannot wisely be regarded, not suffer permanent frustration.

"Together." It is the first word of the new les for the new times for the Church to learn to spell. T fulfilment of her great mission will halt and wait u her ability to spell and enter into willing acceptance all the implications of that word. Once that be maste all doors of freedom and action will open wide bef her. The rusted hinges may creak and groan, but o up they will, never to close again.

"Together." It is an alluring and potent word! other of the Church's great and vital tasks wait upon establishment. When fall crumbling the walls of markation, then, too, shall fall the walls of limitati But let there be no mistake. The times demand dem racy, and democracy is always bought at the price sacrifice. The Church should be the last to shrink fr paying that price. Anyhow pay it she must if she is keep pace with the new world's need.

"Together." With the word is bound up much if all of humanity's hope for its highest good, in both St and Church. It is the Church's watchword for the gr tomorrow if she would be a vital force and a determin agency in world affairs.

The Knight of the Labyrinth

By FLORENCE CONVERSE

XI

Rightso those that made the map began to speak one after one, and by times all together, interpreting the meaning of the map. And one saith, "Here thou seest the rose-garden, and 'tis entered from this side". And another saith, "Nay, brother, thou mistakest, for here is not the rose-garden but the banquet hall, and from this side thou enterest". And yet a third saith, "An error, an error! For here is neither rose-garden nor banquet hall, but they are to left and right of this place, which is the jousting field". Whereupon cried out five or six, "Nay, brother, nay, nay! For the jousting field is to south of here and this is the wanton's bower, or else it is the hall where is the Morality toward".

Then saith one, and he was sore perplexed, "I will show ye a strange thing. Be it understood for an hypothesis, as they do say in Bologna and in Oxford, that here on the map is the Scriptorium wherein we now stand. Are ye agreed"? Wherefore all they cried out, "We are agreed"! "Now this my finger that traceth this inky lane is I, that thread the labyrinth. Are ye agreed"? And again they cried out, "We are agreed"! "Now thread we the labyrinth so, and so, and so", saith that wise one, "And here we are come to——" Then interrupted him Sir Hugh and saith, "We are come to the high cliff and the vision of the blue sea", and all those others cried out agreeing together, "Yea, 'tis the place where is the high cliff"! And he that threaded the labyrinth with his finger made answer, "So say I also, brothers; 'tis the place where the cliff is. But look ye, likewise 'tis the place from whence we set forth but now; 'tis the Scriptorium. Can the same place be the Scriptorium and the high cliff"? And they knew not what answer they should make.

Then saith the wise one, "Again an hypothesis! I will set my finger here, at the bottom of the map", for afore he had set his finger at the top, "And I will say, 'Here is the Scriptorium'! Are ye agreed"? And they made answer, "We are agreed"! "Now, this my finger that traceth the inky lanes is I, that thread the labyrinth. Are ye agreed"? And anon they cried out, "We are agreed"! "Now do we thread the labyrinth so, and so, and so—and here—we are come—to"—and a second time Sir Hugh interrupted him, but now he saith, "We are come to the fair pleasaunce and the sun dial". And immediately all those others cried out with one voice, "Yea, we are come to the fair pleasaunce and the sun dial"! And the wise one agreed with them, saying, "Yea, ye say well; 'tis the pleasaunce, but likewise 'tis the place from whence we set forth but now,—'tis the Scriptorium. If the Scriptorium is here, at the bottom of the map, is the pleasaunce also here? Euclid saith not. For how may two tangible phenomena of equal dimensions occupy the one space? And if the Scriptorium is here, at the top of the map, is the high cliff here also? Again I say, Euclid saith not. And if the Scriptorium is at the top of the map, is it also at the bottom of the map? Brethren, this labyrinth overturneth all the axioms of the schoolmen". And all they that hearkened were sore abashed, and they might not answer him; wherefore they fell silent, and bending above the map they began anew to trace the labyrinth with their fingers, pondering.

Thereafter, Sir Hugh Lepenseur betook him to the oriel window wherein were other wise folk that sat in the window-seat and spake one with another earnestly.

And one said, "Wherefore is it befallen that certain men linger on the high cliff, and others in the banquet hall, and others again in the wanton's bower, and others like unto ourselves escape these evils? Is it of our own will that we linger, now here, now there, or is there a spell upon us and we are not free"?

But Sir Hugh saith, "Beaux amis, how it is with other men, I know not; but I am free". Nevertheless, when they would have him prove that he said, he might not; for there was no proof. And they said to him, "How knowest thou this is freedom? Haply 'twas predestinate aforetime than thou shouldst be struck upon the mouth with thy lady's glove and escape those evils". And he said to them, "Are we indeed escaped? Who shall say if there lurketh no evil in the Scriptorium"?

Wherefore was their patience sore tried, and they answered him fretful, "'Tis plain thou art no scholar, for this is the argument: Whether we that wander in the labyrinth be free to do as we will, or whether we be under a spell. And thou sayest, 'Who shall say if there lurketh no evil in the Scriptorium'? Knowest thou not that this is a non sequitur and abhorred of the schools"?

Therefore Sir Hugh made answer right humbly, "I pray you pardon me, for of a truth I was not bred to be a scholar. But do ye prove to me that we are under a spell, and I will believe".

Nevertheless, this they might not do, for there was no proof. Howbeit, they spake at great length concerning that matter, on the one side of the argument and on the other, and in the end Sir Hugh gave them good day and departed from them, and they were still a-talking.

And there was an old man that read a book in one of the chambers of the Scriptorium, who, when he saw Sir Hugh Lepenseur, he laid down his book and welcomed him right courteously. And they spake together of the labyrinth. And Sir Hugh said unto the old man, "Father, an it please you, tell me, what book is this you read"?

Rightso the old man answered him, "Son, this is the book of the Scriptures of Holy Writ, the which telleth the good and evil fortunes of the most venerable patriarch Job. And behold, a strange thing; for it is written in the twenty-third verse of the thirtieth chapter of the book, 'For I know that thou wilt bring me to death, and to the house appointed for all living'."

Then spake Sir Hugh Lepenseur, and he was sore troubled, saying, "The house appointed for all living, this is a word I know right well, for it is writ over the gate of the labyrinth and I have got it by heart. Prythee, Father, what is this to mean"? But when the old man had said to him, "What thinkest thou"? Sir Hugh made answer, for that he was ever modest, "Who am I that I should think? Howsoever this is plain that Job bymeaneth. But is the labyrinth a tomb? Nay, then, I know not"!

Then said the old man, "It may well be that the old King, that made this labyrinth, wresteth Job's word to another meaning".

"Yea", agreed Sir Hugh. "It may well be that none liveth except he entereth into this house".

"Nevertheless," quoth the ancient then, "Who is it cometh forth a whole man"?

But Sir Hugh made answer, "Who is it hath won to the secret place? Shall a man be whole that is laggard on quest? And the King's daughter is dumb".

Quoth the old man thereupon, "Thou sayest well, fair sir. An it please thee to sit down, we will discourse concerning these things, for my heart is knit unto thee".

"If I say well", saith Sir Hugh, "haply it is not I. And here is a strange thing, for meseemeth 'tis the King's daughter speaketh. Nevertheless, how may this be, for who hath heard the voice of the King's daughter"? And Sir Hugh sat him down by the side of the old man, and said he, "Father, if this Scriptorium be the secret place?"

And the old man looked kindly upon him, howbeit when he made answer he was passing sorrowful, and he said, "Son, I have bethought me of this thing. But an this be the secret place, then is it hid from us forever; for here is no way to know if it be so or no, or if here the quest endeth. This is a doom indeed, to live uncertain to life's end".

Then rose up Sir Hugh upon his feet and made him ready to depart, and saith he, "When I am come unto the secret place I shall know, and I will take mine oath upon it".

And thereafter the old man smiled scornful, saying,

"Of a truth thou art no schoolman, else how art thou arrived at this conclusion; verily, not by method of reason nor process of ratiocination. But 'twould seem thou art a creature of intuition".

And Sir Hugh, when he had heard these words, cried out, "Now God grant I may be!" And when he had so said he was in haste to be gone.

XII.

Now within a while after Sir Hugh was departed out of the Scriptorium, he came into a blind alley, and in the blind end of the alley there was a man sat with his face to the wall and his arms about his knees, and his head was bowed upon his knees that his face was hid. And Sir Hugh drawing nigh was ware as how the man did sigh and make moan, wherefore Sir Hugh spake, saying, "What aileth thee, brother? What is to do?"

Then said that man, nor never lifted his head from his knees, "I am the beginning and I am the end; there is nothing but me. Woe is me!" And albeit Sir Hugh questioned him further, this only would he say, "I am the beginning and I am the end; there is nothing but me. Woe is me!" And he said it again, and again, and yet again. But Sir Hugh reminded him, saying, "Brother, hast thou forgot? There is the King's daughter". But the man said, "Voiceless". And for all that Sir Hugh might say he would not put off his melancholy, but he sat with his head upon his knees in the dark of the blind alley.

Now, Sir Hugh, being persuaded that this sullen wight would none of him, went out at the open end of the alley and turned once on his left hand; and lo, in the gray wall yonder, an opening!

And Sir Hugh groaned within himself, and saith he, "Here is yet another of those magical by-places of the labyrinth. Now whether is it garden or hall or bower, I care not, for I am right weary of this pageant". Nevertheless, he went onward as far as the opening in the gray wall, and when he was come thither he looked within. And on a sudden, or yet his feet had crossed the threshold of that place, he ran back again to the blind alley, and as he ran he called aloud, saying, "Brother, brother, turn hereabout! Methinks I am come at last unto the secret place".

But when he was at the open end of the blind alley, he beheld as how there was no one there. For that the melancholy desperate man had already wandered away.

XIII.

Then turneth Sir Hugh Lepenseur backward in his steps, and when he was come to the opening in the gray wall he entered in without more ado. And this was a little room in shape like a circle, and the walls pure white, and open above to the sky. And in the middle of the little white room there was an altar of marble, white, under the sky. And on the altar a fire of live coals burning in a pure flame, windless, and silver tongs to mend the fire. And also at one end of the altar was a white dove perched.

Now cometh Sir Hugh to the altar, very reverent, and kneeleth on his knees, saying, "Lord, show me that I shall do!" And he said, "Wilt thou that I rend the wings of the dove? Wilt thou that I offer the dove for a sacrifice that thereby the King's daughter may be healed of her infirmity? O Lord", saith Sir Hugh Lepenseur, "the King's daughter is very pitiful; she will mourn an the wings of the dove be rent. Nevertheless, show me that I shall do".

And behold, as he knelt praying, he cast down his eyes; and there was carven about the base of the altar these words: "Lo, this hath touched thy lips; and thine iniquity is taken away, and thy sin purged". And there was carven on the altar the prophet Isaiah and the seraphims, and one of the seraphims did lay a live coal on the mouth of the prophet Isaiah.

Rightso Sir Hugh, when he had read this saying, took up the silver tongs that lay upon the altar and plucked a live coal out of the fire and offered it to the dove that rested on the altar. And the bird came near and took the live coal in its beak, as it had been a red cherry; and when it had spread its wings it flew thrice round about the head of Sir Hugh and went up into the sky and away. And Sir Hugh Lepenseur being left alone in that still place knelt down to pray. And ever and anon he mended the fire.

Now within the secret place there were nor hours nor days nor years; and who shall say how long he was a-kneeling? And within a while, as he prayed, saying "Thy will be done! for what is a voice, and what is silence?" and again, "Thy will be done!" it came to pass that he beheld a vision as of a river that flowed into the sea. And he beheld the river flowing between its banks and it was never dried. And he beheld the sea. And he said within himself, "Lo, another marvel, for I behold the river, yet am I the river; and I flow into the sea. And I am never emptied of my flowing. Neither is my will emptied of flowing into the will of God". Then was the will of Sir Hugh Lepenseur one will with the will of God.

And about this time there came to his ear from very far away a sound of singing; and it came from a long way outside the labyrinth. And Sir Hugh hearkened. And the sound of the singing came nearer and yet more near, howbeit it was yet a long way off; but presently it seemed it was within the labyrinth, a-winding near and nearer. And it was one voice that sang. And Sir Hugh saith, "How may this be? For I dare take mine oath, never afore heard I this voice, yet it is familiar unto me as mine own soul!" And he hearkened. And that one that sang drew nigh. And the flame on the altar leapt and danced for it was no longer windless. Then came there one singing, and stood on the threshold of the secret place. And when Sir Hugh had lifted up his eyes, lo, it was the King's daughter, and she was singing the Veni Creator Spiritus.

THE END.

The Advent Call

By GRACE LINDLEY

THE Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has undertaken what we believe may be a very large contribution to the life of the Church and through the Church to the nation. We are to make an "Advent Call" by means of a "Campaign," but different in many ways from those with which we are so familiar. Those campaigns have asked for things; this is to ask for spiritual power, to seek, in St. Paul's expression, not yours but you.

Christians believe that spiritual power is the greatest force in the world. They follow a Master who said of His miracles "Greater things than these shall ye do." The time has come when this power must be used to help win the war, and to prepare for and largely create the new era which must come when the war is over. Therefore, the Church which has appointed its War Commission, and whose members are doing so much in many ways for the war, must find and release (more fully than has been done) the spiritual power latent in her members. But beyond her own borders she can and should lead in developing the spiritual resources of America. Much has been said about the awakening of the conscience of the American people, much about the morale of the nation, much about generosity for the world's appalling sufferings, and the women of America have taken a full share in all this. No one doubts that they have also exerted much spiritual power, their prayers, their courage, their services are proof of that, but the time has come when there should be a way of gaining and using the united spiritual power of the country's womanhood.

It is the effort to awaken and use this tremendous power that the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions has decided upon as its war work. If the Auxiliary can get the women throughout our nation to put the power of prayer behind the struggle on the battlefield, and to prepare for the new time, making themselves more fit to share in the creation of that new world, they can render no greater service to the nation and to the Kingdom of God.

During the first week of Advent (December 1-6, 1918) women will go from house to house to the women of the Church, reminding them of this greatest gift, spiritual power, and asking them to pledge themselves to do one or more of the following things:

First: Daily prayers.
For today.
For victory.
For our men.
For our allies.
For our enemies.
For the women at home.

Prayers in preparation,
For righteous peace.
For just and true democracy at home.
For Christian internationalism.
For Church unity.
That the will of God may be done in all the world.

Second: Prayer for these same objects at the Holy Communion on certain days.

Third: To make every effort to become more familiar with the Bible message by means of systematic reading and Bible study when this is possible.

Fourth: Preparation to take part in an effort to reach the women of America.

At the end of the visits (unless it seems unwise) the messengers will suggest praying for those objects.

Each diocese has been asked to appoint a leader for this work and to see that this leader goes to one of the Summer conferences for training. In the Fall she will undertake the messengers in her diocese. It will also be wise if she has a committee to help her in all this work. Every parish will be asked to furnish its quota of messengers. After their training they should be commissioned at a Celebration of the Holy Communion for we are desirous of making these visits not as individuals but as representatives of the Church. During the week whenever possible we hope for daily Communion services and an open church, where all day long at least one woman shall be praying for the messengers. Between now and Advent leaflets and suggestions will be sent from the Church Missions House.

Both because the undertaking is so large and because we covet the joy of working with others, it is earnestly hoped that it will not be done by the Auxiliary alone but by Churchwomen whether they belong to the Woman's Auxiliary or not. If we may have that co-operation and the leadership of the clergy and the willingness of the Auxiliary to do a hard thing we may carry out in a very beautiful and literal way St. Paul's thought and be among those who are truly "rejoicing in hope, patient in tribulation, continuing instant in prayer."

Life's Values

By THE REV. PERCY TRAFFORD OLTON

THE values of life are to be found in its relationships. To be conscious of the fact that we stand related to the rest of life and to seek to define and extend those relationships constitute the difference between man and the animal. All of the questions, all of the deep mysteries and the deeper satisfactions of life, originate in the knowledge that man neither lives to himself nor dies to himself. And our place in the scale of being is determined by the depth and extent of our relationships.

It is natural for the child to be egotistical, because its little life centres so largely around itself; but as the years pass there should be a constant narrowing of that interest in self and a constant enlarging of its relationships to the life around it.

The truth of that saying of the Master's, that only by losing one's life is one able to gain the larger life, is by no means exhausted when we apply it to the denial of self for the sake of others. It has a positive meaning in that it offers life to the one who seeks to find it outside of self. Life is a matter of relationships. The selfish, self-centred soul cuts itself off from the springs of its existence, and the end must be death.

Many of us recognize the necessity of relating ourselves to the life around us, but how few comprehend the truth that life is measured by the variety and kind of these relationships: how few deliberately seek life in this way. We accept the relationships in which we find ourselves—the home, the community, the state, the Church—and we regard them as necessary to the social order and to our happiness, but we do not seek, nor expect, to find by them the larger life.

Nevertheless it is through them that we come to an understanding of ourselves and of God. We cannot become aware of our capacities, our powers, the possibilities of self-expression, unless we are living consciously through these relationships. Of what value would intellect, genius, knowledge, be to the one cut off from the society of his kind? He might develop his surroundings, but he himself must remain forever restricted in the life of the spirit.

Is it not significant that when Jesus wished to reveal God He spoke of Him in the terms of human relationships—"Our Father"? And it is His "Son" Who becomes incarnate, and is the "Guide", the "Teacher" Who is to lead us into all truth. We know God only through our knowledge of man: it is as we live with our fellow creatures that we enter into the life which is eternal: "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God Whom he hath not seen?"

How careful then should we be to cultivate even the most ordinary relationships of life! How much more sacred become the ties of home and friendship and state when we realize that in them and through them we are finding God! And, again, how eager should we be to break through all the barriers and limitations placed by man, and strive to enter into that greatest of all relationships—the Fatherhood of God and the Brotherhood of Man!

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

SOCIETY WILL CARE FOR MORAL WELFARE OF GIRLS

War Emergency Brings into Being New Church Organization

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.—On the evening of May 13 a second meeting was held at the Diocesan house, Brooklyn, which was the result of the meeting held April 15, to consider the "Moral Welfare of the Girls of Long Island."

Bishop Burgess, who presided, spoke of the three classes of women the committee would try to help: first, those who take up an immoral life professionally; second, those who fall into misfortune (the "unmarried mothers"), and third, those who live in an atmosphere of temptation on the "borderland."

For the first, the Bishop said, there was little one could do; for the second, Christian help would do much, also for the third, and in helping the third class, the first might be indirectly reached.

This meeting was called for the purpose of forming a sub-committee of the Long Island Social Service Committee to cooperate with the Church Mission of Help.

Mrs. John M. Glenn told of how, eight years ago, Dr. Manning and Fr. Huntington came to see her husband and herself to talk over forming the Church Mission of Help. Fr. Huntington's work on the lower east side of New York had brought him into intimate contact with all sorts of people and felt that there was no greater work the Church could undertake than to organize a society that would reach the three classes of women spoken of. Since its organization the C. M. H. has been doing everything possible to reach these women within the five boroughs.

Mrs. Capp explained the details of the work as carried out at St. Faith's, Tarrytown. There are now some Brooklyn girls at this home, mere children, who have gone to the home as unmarried mothers.

"It would be of enormous help to get Big Sisters in the parishes for girls returning from institutions to their homes," said Mrs. Capp.

The Society was organized under the name, Associates of the Social Service Committee.

Members are of four classes: Honorary, $50 a year; Sustaining, $10; Contributing, $5; Parish Associates who pay $1 a year, and endeavor to secure at least ten members as contributors from their parishes.

MRS. F. L. HAWKS POTT DIES IN SHANGHAI, CHINA

Well-Known Wife of President of St. John's University

NEW YORK CITY.—A cable received at the Church Missions House announced the death in Shanghai on Saturday, May 11, of Mrs. F. L. Hawks Pott, wife of the President of St. John's University, Shanghai.

Mrs. Pott was the daughter of the first clergyman of the American Church Mission in China. For many years she has been a leader in the Church's work on behalf of the women of her native land. On her occasional visits to this country Mrs. Pott was always a welcome guest at meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary and similar gatherings. Her fine enthusiasm and her abundant hope for the Chinese people have inspired thousands of women in this country to earnest service for the women of the Orient.

Miss Olive Pott is with her father in Shanghai. Three sons are at present in the military service of the United States. William Sumner Pott is a lieutenant of infantry. James H. Pott is in the Aviation Corps, and Walter Pott is in the Medical Reserve.

HOSPITAL BUILDINGS ARE A TOTAL LOSS BY FIRE

Main Building and Nurses' Home Saved by Prompt Work

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, May 16.—(Bulletin) Early this morning fire destroyed the engine and boiler rooms, the lighting and refrigerating plants and the laundry of St. Mark's Hospital. These buildings are a total loss. The Nurses' Home and the Hospital were saved only by the prompt and efficient work of the firemen.

NEW YORK CITY.—On May 17, Mr. Paul Shimmon received the following cable (the words in brackets and punctuation marks are added for the sake of clearness):

"Have received the following telegram from Urmi: 'Paul brother [of] Mar Shimun consecrated patriarch [at] Urumia, April 27 [the] patriarch, [the] Metropolitan, [and] [the] Bishops request your influence for preservation [of the] nation. Relatives [of] Mar Shimun safe at present.'

"(Signed) ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY."

For Government Use

BURLINGTON, VERMONT.—The trustees of the Vermont Episcopal Institute, situated at Rock Point, Burlington, through General C. P. Miller, their treasurer, have offered the boys' school building at Rock Point to the Government for use as a military convalescent hospital.

In conformity with the President's request to avoid unnecessary traveling, the biennial reunion of the Bishop Hopkins Hall Alumnae Association has been postponed until after the war.

A Correction

In the news story reprinted in these columns May 11 from the Detroit News, reporting a meeting at which both Dr. Newman Smyth and Bishop Williams spoke of the reply made by the House of Bishops to the Appeal to that body signed by Dr. Smyth and others, the statement: "The House of Bishops has fumbled a great opportunity" was credited to Dr. Smyth The statement was made by Bishop Williams.

MESSAGE TO PRESIDENT HITS LIQUOR TRAFFI

Signed by War Commissions of Al Protestant Churches

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—The following memorial was presented t President Wilson last week. Among othe signers was the War Commission of th Episcopal Church:

A Message to the President and to th Congress of the United States of America

Our nation has, we profoundly believ with clean hands and pure heart engage in conflict for lofty and unselfish ends.

The attainment of those ends demands a the moral powers of our people, the co servation of our economic resources, ar the highest efficiency in service.

These powers are impaired, this efficien is greatly decreased, and our national v tality diminished by the liquor traffic ar all its attendant evils, resulting in the was of food, the waste of labor, and the was of life itself.

Having duly recognized this in our arm and navy by having taken measures to pr vent the use of liquor by our troops, w believe that those who remain and serve home should willingly apply to themselv the same principles which they apply our soldiers and sailors and should subm to the same limitations for the welfare the nation.

Therefore, in the interest of those wh defend our nation, for the saving of o own supplies of food, for the highest ef ciency of the industries which provide o means of warfare, and, for the strengthe ing of the moral health of the people, w earnestly urge the President and the Co gress of the United States to take steps prevent, during the entire period of t war, by whatever means are feasible, t manufacture and sale of intoxicating liqu of all kinds for use as a beverage, includi the importation of all liquor.

(Signed) THE NATIONAL SERVICE AND WAR-TIME COMMISSIONS OF THE AMERICAN CHURCHES.

COLLEGE PASTORS PLAN TO CONFER AT HOWE SCHOOL

Will Discuss Student Needs With Y. M. C. A. Representative

Thirty Church clergymen from college towns all over the country will meet this month and plan ways and means to interest the college students in religion and hold those now drifting from the Church. This conference is the second annual conference arranged by the Department of Collegiate Education, of which the Rev. Paul Micou is secretary.

Dr. John H. McKenzie, a member of the General Board and headmaster of Howe School for Boys, Howe, Indiana, has generously invited the conference to be his guests from May 21 to May 24.

The importance of this conference is due to the loss of leaders within the student body. The best men in the upper classes have gone to the war and the new men upon whom student leadership now falls need all the support that can be given them. This is especially true in religious work. Every communion should endeavor to support the plans of the Y. W. and the Y. M. C. A.'s who understand more than anyone the religious conditions of the college students and are probably the religious leaders in the Nation who have the most definite program of appeal.

That our clergymen working among students may have first-hand knowledge of the plans of the Y. W. and Y. M. C. A.'s, Mr. Micou has invited Mr. W. H. Tinker of the Student Department of the International Committee of Y. M. C. A.'s, to attend this conference and speak on "The Plans of the Student Movement for the Next Year."

The conference will discuss the following subjects:

Co-operation with the College Christian Associations which are preparing for a new democracy by organizing war-time classes in Bible, mission and community study.

The best methods in advising and counseling students as to life work.

Plans for recruiting the ministry during war times.

Methods and materials for Advent and Lenten classes for students.

The advisability of a national Episcopal college society.

Preparation of a manual on approved methods to be followed by ministers and other workers among students.

How can funds be raised for adequate Church buildings and proper equipment in college communities?

Invitations have been sent to all student workers in the country. Many are unable to attend because of traveling expenses. The Board has a small fund which is already exhausted. It would welcome gifts from individuals to enable deserving college pastors to have the benefit of this conference. Those who have already registered for the conference are the following:

The Rt. Rev. T. I. Reese, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor, Southern Ohio; Prof. B. W. Bond, Purdue University; the Rev. William Burrows, University of Indiana; the Rev. Spence Burton, Harvard University; the Rev. J. M. Collins, Michigan Agricultural; the Rev. Richard Cox, Kansas Agricultural; the Rev. C. B. Cromwell, Valparaiso University; the Rev. Robert Williams, Princeton University; the Rev. G. E. D. Zachary, Pennsylvania State College; the Rev. William E. Gardner, General Secretary, G. B. R. E.; the Rev. Paul Micou, Collegiate Secretary, General Board of Religious Education, 289 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

G. F. S. KEEP ITALIAN DAY

Will Wear Three Flowers and Write to Rosa Garibaldi

New York City.—The War Emergency Committee of the G. F. S. A. is going to help celebrate May 24, the anniversary of the entrance of Italy into the World War.

On account of the widely distributed Teutonic propaganda amongst the Italians both in their own country and in America, it is considered very essential that Italy should know what a strong ally it had in America in the present war. The Italy-America Society has decided that it would be a splendid idea to commemorate the third anniversary of Italy's entrance into the war on May 24 and to have a propaganda in her honor. As the time was short to start new organizations, it was therefore decided to ask as many as possible of the well-organized societies to assist. It had been suggested, and the suggestion was heartily approved by the Italian Ambassador, that if every man, woman and child would wear a flower on this day and if the Italians throughout the country could write this home, it would have an immediate effect upon the morale of Italy, and this would be of incalculable help.

It proposed that members of the G. F. S. not only wear the three flowers, red, white and sprig of green that will show the Italian colors, but that they write individually to Rosa Garibaldi, the oldest member of the G. F. S. in Rome. She is the granddaughter of the great Italian patriot. Since the war began she has been a Red Cross nurse and is now in a Roman military hospital. They will also write a word of greeting to the branch secretary, Mrs. Stone-Alcock.

Miss Lindley on Council of Advice

New York City.—It has recently been announced at the Church Missions House that Miss Grace Lindley, General Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary, has been added to the Council of Advice. The Council consists of the President of the Board of Missions, the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurer and the secretaries at the Missions House. Heretofore, however, the Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary has not been a member. The Council meets at least once a week and acts on current business, referring matters of importance to the Executive Committee, which meets monthly.

CUBAN MISSION SCHOOL WORKS FOR RED CROSS

Guantanamo Children Also Make $150 Mite Box Offering

New York City.—The following graphic account of missions in war time has been received in a letter from Miss Ashhurst, one of the missionaries at Guantanamo, Cuba.

"A Mrs. ———, a Cuban from Santiago, who is the wife of an American naval officer, a doctor, now in France, has just organized a branch of the Red Cross in her home city, and came on to Guantanamo to start the work here. They gave a dance at the Spanish Club on Sunday night, April 14, at which they cleared $440. I am thinking of organizing a branch in All Saints'—though I dread doing so, for I have already 'bitten off more than I can chew' in the way of work, but I feel it ought to be done. I am only waiting for Mr. Watson's return, before doing anything rash. In the meantime we are all thrilled by the prospect of the closing entertainment which the children of All Saints' School are to give in the garden back of the church on Decoration Day or Saturday, June 1, the proceeds of which are to be given to the Red Cross. We won't make more than $25, but every little counts, and our children will feel they have some part in the work.

"I am very happy over our Lenten Mite Box Offering, which was $150, the biggest offering ever taken up in the church. As we have about 140 Sunday School scholars, I think it is very creditable.

"The other day the mother of the ——— family died, and I had my first experience of reading a funeral service in Spanish. I read only prayers, because none of those present knew our service, but they entered into the Creed and Padre Nuestro very heartily, and were unusually quiet and sympathetic: 'Oh, would that my tongue could utter the thoughts that arise in me.' If I only was more fluent in Spanish so much more could be done among the poor Cubans I think. I don't think we will ever reach the better class, as long as we are the Church of the 'Jamaicinos' to them. But we have got to have the Jamaicans, because they are pouring in hordes from Jamaica in response to advertisements for cane cutters spread broadcast through the Islands. The Marines keep us amused, we always have some on Sundays, and when there are not more than two or three I can ask them to lunch or dinner, but I can't serve more than seven at the table until I get some more table silver! Now that Dominica is living with me, we have four in the family. We are so very comfortable in our new 'altos,' hard as it was to move. I am thankful, now that the move is made."

S. S. Associations Meet

Pawtucket, Rhode Island.—The three District Sunday School Associations of the Diocese of Rhode Island were held here, and in Newport, on three successive evenings, beginning May 7. At each of them the Christian Nurture Series of Lessons was discussed.

Graduates to Meet

Burlington, New Jersey.—The annual meeting of "The Society of the Graduates of St. Mary's Hall" will be held on May 27 at 10.15 a. m., at St. Mary's Hall.

PRESIDENT PEIRCE BACK AT KENYON COMMENCEMENT

Editor of New York "Herald" Will Make an Address

GAMBIER, OHIO.—The Commencement exercises at Kenyon College occur June 15 to 18. On the evening of the 15th the Senior class will present the customary play. At the College Baccalaureate service on Sunday the sermon will be by the President of Kenyon College. The exercises in connection with the formal conferring of degrees will take place Monday morning. The Class Orator will be William V. Mueller, '18, and the Alumni Orator, Josiah Kingsley Ohl, LL.D., Kenyon, '84, Editor of The New York Herald. The Alumni luncheon will be held at noon and in the evening will occur reunions of the Phi Kappa and literary societies. Several former classes also expect to hold reunions. Intercollegiate tennis will be played on the afternoons of the 17th and 18th.

There will be a formal dedication of the Service Flag presented to the College by Mr. James H. Dempsey, '82, of Cleveland, and of the Stand of Colors for the Kenyon Battalion presented by Mr. Ralph T. King of Cleveland. The interest of this occasion is certain to be more intense with the return to Gambier of President Peirce after his recent service in France in behalf of the American Red Cross and at the French war front in charge of Red Cross "Rolling Canteen."

PROTESTANT CHAPLAINS SERVE IN ITALIAN ARMY

Seven Waldensians and Three Methodists Hold Commissions

NEW YORK CITY.—It has recently been made known by the Waldensian Society at its offices here that seven Waldensian chaplains hold commissions in the Italian army. In the war with Tripoli only one Waldensian chaplain was permitted to serve. Three Methodists have just been commissioned, making in all ten Protestant chaplains. Seventeen reading rooms for soldiers are maintained by the Waldensian Church. Until very recently the Y. M. C. A. was not allowed to do any work among Italian soldiers, although the "Y." was in Italy working for Austrian prisoners. This year the Y. M. C. A. has been given permission to undertake welfare work for the Italian army.

Over 200,000 copies of the New Testament have been distributed by the Waldensian Church, very small, just the right size for the soldier's pocket.

Six Waldensian women now form part of the royal household. The head governess is a Waldensian, and each of the royal children has a Waldensian nurse. It is said that the little prince knows and sings many Waldensian hymns.

The Waldensians are doing much work among war orphans and the refugees.

Student Secretary for Province II

NEW YORK CITY.—To raise sufficient money to pay the salary of an organizing secretary for student work in the Second Province is the purpose of a committee of eleven clergymen and laymen appointed at the Synod in January. They face the problem of seventy-seven student communities in need of shepherding. In New York City alone there are about 20,000 students, some living in boarding-houses and so very hard to find and bring into church life. All the important colleges and universities have some clergyman working near them who feels responsibility for the students of the Episcopal Church. According to a questionnaire recently sent out, 12 per cent. of all students in the colleges of the Second Province are Episcopalians.

THE REV. DR. BERRY DIES

Warden of DeLancey Divinity School —Founder of Deaf Mute School

BUFFALO, NEW YORK.—The Rev. Thomas Benjamin Berry, S.T.D., warden of DeLancey Divinity School of Geneva and formerly for twenty-one years rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd in Buffalo, died at Geneva last week.

The funeral was held in the Church of the Good Shepherd. The Rev. Philip W. Mosher of Niagara Falls officiated, assisted by the Rev. James Cosbey, the present rector. Students of the DeLancey Divinity School were the active pallbearers. The honorary pallbearers were the standing committee of the Diocese of Western New York, the lecturers of DeLancey School, the wardens and vestrymen of the church.

Burial was at Manlius, New York, where Dr. Berry had also served as rector.

Dr. Berry is survived by his widow, one son, Frank T. Berry of Philadelphia, and two daughters, Miss Amelia Berry of New York and Mary Richards Berry of Buffalo.

The Rev. Thomas B. Berry came to Buffalo as rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd (Ingersoll Memorial Chapel) in 1888.

Dr. Berry was ordained deacon at Christ Church, Rouse's Point, New York, on All Saints' Day in 1871. The ordination was in charge of the late Bishop Selwyn of New Zealand and later of Litchfield, England, and the late Bishop Doane of Albany. Dr. Berry was advanced to the priesthood in St. Paul's Church, Albany, where he was assistant rector. Later he undertook mission work on the Western frontier. In the midst of his clerical labors there he established the territorial school for deaf mutes in Sioux Falls, South Dakota. He was one of the pioneers in the education of deaf mutes and was most expert in the use of sign languages, of which he had made a special study. In 1882 he returned to the East and took up work in the Diocese of Central New York. He came to Buffalo from a parish in Guilford, Chenango County.

In his twenty-one years of service as rector of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Dr. Berry won the respect and esteem of all Buffalo. He was prominent in civic activities; for seven years he was chaplain of the Seventy-fourth Regiment and won the admiration of officers and men by the manner in which he shared in camp and on other active service the duties of other soldiers.

UNIQUE WAR SERVICE AT BROOKLYN CHURCH

Roses Dropped at Foot of War Alta in Honoring Heroes

BROOKLYN, NEW YORK.—On the evenin of Ascension Day, which was also th ninth anniversary of the Rev. Andrew Chalmers Wilson as rector of St. Paul's a most beautiful patriotic service was held at which, after prayers being offered fo the safety of the men now fighting fo the preservation of democracy, every per son present dropped a red rose at th base of the war altar.

Miss Stewart, who is now residing i Paris, recently presented this altar to S Paul's Church, for the purpose of honor ing all the fallen heroes of the allied na tions who have lost their lives on Frenc soil, and providing a place where familie of our own soldiers and sailors may com to pray for those who are now at th front.

Captain H. Cornelius, a British office who served two years in the trench, an is now a military instructor at Princeton gave an interesting account of "The Fight ing Chaplains."

As an instance of reconstruction sur gery, it is interesting to know that thi man was invalided home, with both leg almost shot to pieces. All the injured bone was removed, the good bone grew together, and he is now perfectly well his stature being two or three inches shorter than when he went into service!

GOVERNOR MAKES RECTOR STATE REPRESENTATIVE

The Rev. Lester Leake Riley to At tend Social Work Conference

SPRINGFIELD, ILLINOIS.—Governor Lowden has appointed the Rev. Lester Leake Riley rector of Christ Church, as an Illinois representative to the National Conference of Social Work to be held in Kansas City. Mr. Riley was recently elected president of the Springfield Ministerial Association.

Enlarge Offices at Missions House

NEW YORK CITY.—The offices on the second and fifth floors of the Church Missions House have been entirely rearranged. The whole of the second floor, except the chapel and Board room, has been turned over to the Woman's Auxiliary. The rooms have been repartitioned, and the office space arranged much more advantageously. The exhibit department has been transferred to the Woman's Auxiliary for the present, and Miss Evelyn Withers has taken charge of it. The Educational Department has moved into the rooms on the fifth floor, which used to be occupied by the Daughters of the King and Church Periodical Club. The library has at last ample space; book shelves have been constructed with alcoves supplied with small tables, chairs and lights. Instead of having the library and the Educational Secretary's office one and the same room, a work room has been provided for those desiring to avail themselves of the unusually good collection of books on the mission field (their geography, history and religion as well as the work accomplished by the missionary churches). These books may be borrowed by mail, and are used in this way all over the United States.

WASHINGTON CONVENTION OF REMARKABLE INTEREST

Petitions Congress to Make Good Friday Legal Holiday

WASHINGTON, D. C.—The twenty-third annual convention of the Diocese of Washington was held, May 15 and 16, at the Church of the Good Shepherd in this city, the Rev. C. S. Abbott, Vicar.

The war, missions, religious education, and social service were in the forefront all through the convention, routine and business matters were dispatched with unusual celerity, and but for a confused and confusing debate over problems arising from the new fiscal year, the convention would have ended sooner than ever before, and, as it was, adjourned by 5 p. m. on the second day.

The Bishop took up this year chiefly the organization and plans of the Church's War Committee and the local problems arising from the war. The new community conditions, increased population, lack of sufficient training, traffic and transportation difficulties, moral and spiritual dangers and needs were noted. The Bishop asked the clergy and laity to study and act upon the wartime programs for local and for country churches prepared by the Federal Council of Church, of which copies were distributed in convention. He requested organized hospitality and personal care in every congregation for the many new civilian employees of the Government as well as for soldiers and sailors. He advised energetic co-operation with the Young Women's Christian Association and the Girl's Friendly Society, together with increased parochial and pastoral activities, for safeguarding the characters of the many young women lately come into the city and into the Government service.

He urged the giving of generous help to the weaker churches in their invaluable endeavors for the enlisted men encamped in this neighborhood.

We must plan for and carry out extensive operations for the education of aliens in American ideals. In this connection the Bishop put before the convention some very disquieting data from the Secretary of the Interior. There are, for instance, over 40,000 men in our training camps who can not take the word of command in English. There are 700,000 men of draft age in the United States who can neither read nor write in any language, and therefore are the prey of demagogues, and unable readily to learn and follow the great national ideas as set forth by the President, the press, and others.

In the field of social service, in addition to war duties, the Bishop pointed out the growing disregard of Sunday in the District of Columbia. Recently the opening of the regular theatres on Sunday nights and professional baseball games on Sunday afternoons have been licensed by the district authorities, and much printing and other Government work continues without regard to the Lord's day. This led to considerable discussion on the floor, and by unanimous vote a committee of six leading clergymen and laymen, headed by Bro. Dr. McGlinn, was appointed to memorialize the President and asking him to exert his great influence to procure a reasonable Sunday law for all District of Columbia, which at present has no Sunday law. The Diocesan Board of Social Service reported that its activities continue unabated in spite of wartime difficulties, and the convention memorialized Congress, asking the passage of the pending bill providing a home for the feeble-minded of the District of Columbia, of whom there are 800, 200 being colored women and girls. At present there is no local provision for this class of unfortunates.

Missions received much attention. The Bishop not only in his annual address, but also at the annual diocesan missionary meeting Wednesday night, and from his chair on the platform at noon on Thursday, dealt with the world situation, need and opportunity, the perils if we have great nations like China and Japan preys to materialism and the doctrines of force and autocracy like Germany, and also pointed out the internal situation, declaring the great question in America today to be the quality of our citizenship.

The Diocesan Board of Religious Education showed all activities maintained without serious decrease of interest as a result of war conditions.

The Diocesan Pension Fund Cammittee, by its chairman, Dean Bratenahl, reported a most successful operation of the fund in this diocese so far, premiums being paid with notable promptness and completeness, and presented an illuminating and exhaustive review of the system. In detail was shown its application to men ordained before and after March 1, 1917, to men without cures but not retired on that date, and to men pensioned by diocesan funds. The convention ordered 500 copies of this report printed for the information of the clergy and laity of the diocese. There were several miscellaneous items of general interest. Congress was memorialized to make Good Friday a legal holiday in the District of Columbia, so that the great numbers of Christian people in the Government offices will be free to observe the day. A resolution was adopted appointing a committee of the diocese to go before the Jewish Congress soon to meet in Washington, to express our sympathy with their national aspirations and to tell them of the decision of the last General Convention that Jews taking Jesus as Messiah are not thereby compelled to renounce their national feasts and customs.

In the District of Columbia it takes an act of Congress to secure women a right to vote in parish elections, and in Maryland it requires an act of the legislature. The Church in this diocese is under special laws enacted in 1798 for the Episcopal Church. Three parishes in Montgomery County, Maryland, Christ, Kensington, All Saints, Chevy Chase, and St. John's, Norwood, secured such an act of the Maryland legislature at its last session. In accordance with the usual consideration of the Maryland legislature for the Church, the operation of this act was made contingent upon its acceptance by the Convention of the Diocese of Washington, in which these parishes are located. The convention accepted the act by unanimous vote of the diocese.

The officers of the diocese were all re-elected, and so was the Standing Committee.

SOUTH CAROLINA ACTS IN INTEREST OF UNITY

Responds to Newman Smyth Appeal to Whole Church

AIKEN, SOUTH CAROLINA.—The 128th Annual Council of the Diocese of South Carolina was held here May 14-16.

By a unanimous vote the Council concurred with the Diocese of North Carolina and the Diocese of East Carolina for the Diocese of North Carolina to elect a colored Suffragan Bishop, who will have charge of the colored work in the Diocese of North Carolina, of East Carolina and of South Carolina under the Bishops of these respective dioceses. The Diocese of North Carolina agreeing to pay $1,200 per annum toward the salary of the Suffragan Bishop, South Carolina $600 per annum, and East Carolina $400 per annum.

The Council recommended by an almost unanimous vote that the Easter offering in all parishes and missions of the diocese be devoted to missions outside of the diocese.

The Convention passed a resolution resulting from the action of the House of Bishops in regard to the Newman Smyth appeal on unity, as follows:

Be it Resolved: That it would be inconsistent with the position hitherto assumed upon all similar occasions by our communion as the "hope of the churches being found precisely where the hope of the nations is to be found in coming together into a single compact Army of God" to fail altogether to rise to this call for faith and action (and that this is in the present emergency of ministering to the American soldiers in foreign service no longer a purely academic matter) and, furthermore, that our Church must not be "afraid of its own ideals;" and, that we, therefore, instruct that a copy of this preamble and resolution be forwarded by the Secretary of the Council to the respective chairmen of the Commission on Unity of the National Council of the Congregational Churches and the joint Commission on Christian Unity of our Communion, with an urgent recommendation to them on behalf of the Diocese of South Carolina to call together their respective commissions in joint session to confer upon a plan for reunion that may be by them jointly submitted to the next session of General Convention and to the National Council of the Congregational Churches for action.

Elections resulted as follows: Secretary, the Rev. A. S. Thomas, Cheraw, South Carolina; treasurer, Mr. William Godfrey, Cheraw, South Carolina; registrar, J. I. Waring, Charleston, South Carolina; historiographer, the Rev. John Kershaw, D.D., Charleston, South Carolina; chancellor, Frank R. Frost, Charleston, South Carolina. Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. John Kershaw, A. R. Mitchell, A. S. Thomas, S. C. Beckwith, W. H. K. Pendleton, Gov. R. I. Manning, T. W. Bacot, H. P. Duvall, J. N. Frierson, J. C. Bissell. Deputies to Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. M. P. Logan, H. Thomas, G. C. Williams, T. T. Walsh, W. H. K. Pendleton, Walter Mitchell, Gov. R. I. Manning, J. E. Smith, H. W. Fraser, J. S. Whaley, Frank R. Frost, J. A. Ball.

BISHOP WOODCOCK STIRS INDIANAPOLIS CONVENTION

Editor of "News" Reads Bishop's Address Written at the Front

INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA.—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" was the text of Bishop Woodcock's sermon at the opening session of the eighty-first annual council of the diocese of Indianapolis May 14-15. The attendance was large and the spirit of the convention carried throughout the keynote struck by the Bishop of Kentucky in his brilliant, intensely practical appeal to the patriotic and religious motives to serve with full devotion the one great cause. The ratification of the revised and amended canons and constitution of the diocese was the chief business transacted. A resolution assuring the President of the loyalty and unstinted service of the people of the diocese was enthusiastically voted. The following were elected for the term ending December 31, 1918:

Standing Committee: The Rev. J. D. Stanley, president; Hon. Thomas Sullivan, secretary; the Rev. Lewis Brown, the Rev. Wm. Burrows, Louis Howland, W. K. Hatt. Trustees of the Diocese: Aquilla Q. Jones, chancellor; W. H. Buttolph, W. D. Pratt, W. K. Hatt, Thos. L. Sullivan. Board of Missions (Diocesan): the Rev. Messrs. J. E. Sulger, Jno. White, Jas. D. Stanley, Jas. W. Comfort, F. Jas. Mallett, Messrs. Edward G. Peck, J. T. Sargent, Thomas T. Moran, F. D. Rose, W. D. Pratt. Provincial synod: the Rev. Messrs. H. W. Wood, Wm. Burrows, W. R. Plummer and J. E. Sulger, Messrs. J. S. Talbot, W. C. Mitchell, J. L. Rupe, T. L. Sullivan.

The Diocesan Convention of the Woman's Auxiliary met the day preceding the council and also had the uplift of addresses by the Bishop of Kentucky. The officers for the term are: President, Mrs. Frank Lewis; first vice-president, Mrs. Watkins; second vice-president, Mrs. J. S. Sargent; recording secretary, Mrs. Perkins; corresponding secretary, Mrs. Lew Wallace; treasurer, Miss Sarah Niblock.

One of the impressive incidents of the council was the reading of the Bishop's annual address by Mr. Louis Howland, editor of the Indianapolis News. Bishop Francis wrote his address three miles from a battle in France and in the midst of the sights and sounds of war.

Kentucky Kernels: Indianapolis Churchfolk will not soon forget the intellectual stimulus and the spiritual recharging that they received from the Bishop of Kentucky, who was both brilliant and practical in his sermons and addresses.

Some of the kernels:

On Missions: "Missions are as necessary for you to maintain your conversion as for the heathen that he may be converted." "If we were not doing more for our country than some of us are doing for God the war would soon be over—over here—" "The religion that is not willing to go everywhere is not fit to go anywhere." "Christ must be to you the best loved and the most lived."

On War: "Seventy percent. of the war is psychological. You aid and comfort the enemy if you lose faith in cause or express a doubt as to the outcome." "The clock of Christianity was not put back but was set forward. We know now what things held us down." "Christianity failed? I suppose that those who determined to have this war consulted the leaders of the churches. Did they?" "It's a lot more wicked to shirk than to fight." "We will fight, thank God, till we get that peace which is the conquest of the neighborhood over the jungle." "If we do not win there is nothing worth living for."

SAYS BISHOPS ARE BLIND TO OUR CHANGING WORLD

Bishop Williams Again Takes Issue With House of Bishops

LANSING, MICHIGAN.—The eighty-fifth annual convention of the Diocese of Michigan was held in St. Paul's Church here, May 15-16, with the Bishop of the diocese presiding. The Bishop's address which followed was vigorous in its plea for Church extension, spiritual strengthening and unity of Christian people. Concerning the plan of Dr. Newman Smyth and others to have a national commission representative of all denominations to appoint and ordain all chaplains sent to the army and navy the Bishop said: "This respectful and altogether practical petition was answered by the House of Bishops in an utterance that smacks of the Middle Ages, an utterance which betrays not one note of humility, of sense of any responsibility on our part for our unhappy divisions which betrays no willingness to make a concession of non-essentials for the sake of a great cause.

"The House seems to have been utterly blind to the facts that we live in a changing world. Is the ecclesiastical system so utterly rigid and inelastic that it cannot bend to adapt itself to the new world? If so the whole system is bound to smash. It was a great opportunity fumbled. I believe that this action did not reflect the mind or heart of the Church, but only a bit of fossilized ecclesiasticism in the body thereof.

"At the front our minor distinctions are fused and disappear, our shibboleths are meaningless."

The Bishop warned the clergy to be careful of their public utterances. He said that the clergy should not let "the imperative but temporary demands of the war crowd out the essential permanent work of the Church."

Wednesday afternoon was given over to reports and routine business. In the evening there was a missionary mass meeting. Dr. Henry Tatlock of Ann Arbor reported as chairman of the Committee on War Work. The Rev. William Heilman, voluntary chaplain at Camp Custer, told of work there and stressed the great value of the health board and its activities. He said that the men of the camp were unusually clean, morally much better than the men in civilian life. "The boys realize that the country is appealing to them to keep themselves clean and strong, that they may give the best service and they are living up to this appeal."

The Rev. J. B. Pengelly, the Rector of St. Paul's, Flint, told in a humorous way of the work being done at the aviation school at Mt. Clemens. There with a start from our Church Committee a large civic committee has been formed and

NEW YORK CONVENTION SHORTEST IN HISTORY

Bishop Greer Calls Attention o Clergy to Canons

NEW YORK CITY.—In conformity with th action taken last November the Annua Convention of the Diocese of New Yor will hereafter be held in May instead o November as in past years. The first meet ing under this new order was held at Syno Hall, New York City, on Tuesday, May 1 Inasmuch as only six months had elapse since the last Convention there was littl business for consideration and the work o the Convention was concluded in one da

In his address to the Convention Bisho Greer, referring to the Canon Law, said

"I do not mean the old historic Cano Law, but the present Canon Law of tha particular part or branch of the universa Church which is named the Protestan Episcopal Church, and as that law is com prised in the Canons of the General Con vention and the Canons of this diocese, an which so many laymen, vestrymen an wardens, through their ignorance of then so often fail to observe.

"There is for instance a Canon of th General Convention which reads as follow (Canon 15):

"'No election of a rector shall be ha until the name of the clergyman whom is proposed to elect has been made know to the bishop, and sufficient time, not ex ceeding thirty days, has been given to hi to communicate with the vestry thereon.'

"In not a few cases which have come t my notice this Canon is not observed, an the failure to observe it is, as I have sai above, due no doubt to ignorance upon th part of those who, as officers of the parish vestrymen and wardens, should make their duty to know what their duties an responsibilities are and the limitations o them.

"There is another Canon, local or dio cesan (Canon 18), which says:

"'No rector or parish shall employ th services of any clergyman without cu for more than one day, unless he shall hav the written license of the bishop.' This to is often disregarded, not again intentionall but as the result of ignorance in the off cers of a parish.

"Now these may not seem to be matter of great importance, and yet if the bisho of the diocese is to be in any real sens with a real responsibility, the pastor of h flock, his diocesan flock, in other ways tha simply by Confirmations—opening the doo to let them in—he ought to know who, fo a longer or shorter time, are ministering i and to the different folds of the flock.

"This I think is so obvious that it doe not need to be stressed. Other instance might be given of the failure to observ what is at present at least the Canon La of the Church and under which it work or is supposed to work; but these perhap are enough, and I have mentioned the especially because they are coming to b just now pressing and urgent question and for this reason:

"During the past year about forty clergy men of the Church in this diocese hav either for a limited time or for the dura tion of the war, entered into the service o the country; and the number no doubt wi increase. I cannot advise against it: I hav no wish to do so. It is a right and loy thing to do. But it is creating vacancies in the diocese, temporary or permanent, which must in some way be supplied and filled, and which it is difficult to fill and supply. It is indeed always a difficult thing to fill such vacancies in a diocese in the way they ought to be filled, putting the right persons into the right places; and it is no discredit to a clergyman to say that while he would do and has done admirably in one place he would not do equally well in another. It would not be desirable, for instance, to nominate a High Church clergyman for a Low Church parish, nor a Low Church clergyman for a High Church parish; and as a bishop I have no desire to do so. I have no wish to make the diocese all of one complexion. When I accepted my election as Bishop of this Diocese I made the vow, openly before the Convention as some of you may remember, that I would try to be the Bishop of the whole diocese and not of any school of thought or particular party in it; but that I would be fair and equally fair to all; and, whatever my faults or failures may have been or are, I think I have kept that vow.

Now all this is a part, and a large part and a difficult, of the administrative work of a Bishop, especially in a diocese like New York, and which does not and cannot appear in any report of his Episcopal acts; and just now, for the reasons which I have mentioned, it is becoming more difficult than ever."

The following officers were elected: The Standing Committee, the Rev. Theodore Sedgwick and Mr. George Zabriskie; Trustees of the Cathedral, the Rev. Charles Lewis Slattery, D.D., Messrs. R. Fulton Cutting and Charles F. Hoffman; Deputies to the Provincial Synod, the Rev. H. A. Prichard and Mr. W. W. Orr; Provisional Deputies, the Rev. F. S. Leach, Ph.D., and Mr. William E. Curtis; Social Service Commission, the Rev. E. C. Chorley, D.D., Mr. W. W. Peake and the Rev. Chas. K. Gilbert; Board of Managers of the Church Extension Society, the Rev. Dr. Milo H. Gates, the Very Rev. H. C. Robbins, D.D., the Rev. E. P. Newton, D.D., Messrs. C. A. Clark, F. D. Allen and W. W. Reese; Board of Religious Education, the Rev. Dr. Nichols, the Rev. E. H. Schlueter, Dr. Samuel Patterson and Professor Charles S. Baldwin. The Rev. Chas. K. Gilbert and Mr. R. M. Pott were re-elected secretary and treasurer respectively.

The only new business offered for the consideration of the Convention was a resolution looking to the establishment of four scholarships at St. Stephen's College for sons of clergymen to be met by assessments upon the Diocese. After some debate the matter was referred to the Diocesan Board of Religious Education to report to the next Convention.

A resolution looking to the organization of an every-member canvass and a general missionary campaign for the diocese received favorable action and the Bishop was requested to appoint a committee with power to put the matter into effect.

Numerous routine matters were disposed of and the Convention adjourned after a session of but four hours. The diocese has probably never before had so brief a Convention nor one, it might be added, in which the spirit and temper of the deliberations were characterized by greater harmony.

recreation rooms opened for the soldiers which helps the military purpose of the Government, but at the same time serves a social service. Mr. Pengelly said that a thorough "clean up" in the town was due largely to the Episcopal Church and its Social Service Committee.

Routine business and reports occupied the time of the second day of the convention. The following were elected on the Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. H. H. H. Fox, Henry Tatlock, W. Warne Wilson, W. H. Poole, and Messrs. Sidney Miller, Geo. W. Patterson and George Hargreaves. As deputies to the Provincial Synod were elected the Rev. Messrs. H. H. H. Fox, W. L. Torrance, Paul Faude, J. G. Pengelly and Messrs. F. J. Weber, J. C. Spaulding, Dudley W. Smith and Samuel Post.

IT IS OUR RELIGIOUS DUTY TO SUPPORT GOVERNMENT

Bishop Lines Tells Convention—Newark Does Great War Work

NEWARK, NEW JERSEY.—At the Newark Diocesan Convention meeting May 14 and 15, Bishop Lines in his address read the names of a long list of young men of the diocese who have lost their lives in service in the war and also the names of many deceased officers of the diocese and the parishes. He presented the support of the Government in the war as a religious duty. He pleaded for an increase of the salaries of the clergy and presented the salient points of the year's work in the diocese, the choice of the Cathedral Church, the coming of the James Barber Trust Fund yielding $15,000 per year and several small funds. He said that the war was revealing the meaning of the Cross as the refuge in this troubled time. He said that the Church must take a new attitude as regards its teaching and work and as regards other churches, emphasizing service rather than ancestry, not making claims, treating other Christian people with great respect.

Bishop Stearly's address was given mainly to the war work of the diocese, especially at Camp Dix and Camp Merritt. The Newark Diocesan War Commission was organized and at work some months before the General War Commission and nearly $50,000 have been given for it, with much building and many of the clergy in the camps and abroad. He also gave an account of the Diocesan Missionary and Church Extension Work. There had been a general agreement not to press building plans which required much money, on account of the Government needs, but many projects had gone forward.

The reports on Social Service, General Missions and Religious Education were unusually full and valuable. The Bonnie Brae Farm for Homeless Boys and the new Mission of Help work were new features in the Social Service Report. For it again $12.00 were put in the budget and authority to collect $2,000 more. A new Canon on Religious Education giving stronger position to the Board and its work

The Mayor Speaks—Mayor Peters was the speaker at a public meeting of the Archdeaconry of Boston in the Cathedral on May 15. His subject was "The Church and the City." Bishop Babcock presided and a large company gathered to hear the Mayor, who is a Churchman and whose varied experience and rare accomplishments in his public work for state and nation give added significance to his public utterances.

This public meeting was in connection with the annual business meeting of the Archdeaconry of Boston. At this session Huntington Saville, Esq., was elected Treasurer of the Archdeaconry to succeed George S. Selfridge, Esq., who had resigned. The Rev. Thomas C. Campbell and Dr. J. Payson Clark were elected as members of the Executive Committee for three years.

Federation of Churches—The annual meeting of the Greater Boston Federation of Churches was held in the chapel of the "Old South Church" in Boston on the evening of May 14. After a brief business meeting there followed a public meeting for men, at which Col. P. F. Straub, Medical Corps Department Surgeon of the Northeastern Department, spoke on "The Venereal Problem in the Army." Lieut. Elmore M. McKee, a representative of the War Department's "Commission on Training Camp Activties," made an address on "The Venereal Problem in Its Relation to the Community."

Bishop Lawrence's initiative in the matter of frank and specific handling of this colossal menace to morals and health is being followed up in rather encouraging fashion by various religious leaders and organizations.

The "United Offering"—The annual service of the Massachusetts Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary for the presentation of the year's "United Offering" was held in the Cathedral on May 16, with the Rev. Edward Tillotson, Rector of the Church of the Holy Name, Swampscott, as preacher. The offering presented at this service amounted to $5,700, with still more to come from those parish branches that were unable to get their money in for this occasion.

"The Liberty Milk Shop"—The milk station which was opened by the Cathedral, in co-operation with Lincoln House, a few weeks ago in the South End is proving very popular among the Italian people of that quarter. The work is expanding rapidly. Mornings are devoted to follow-up work in the homes of those who have attended demonstrations. The Shop is to open four evenings each week, especially for the Hebrew people of the district and on one of these evenings there will be a demonstration in Yiddish. Women from the Cathedral are serving as hostesses on Monday and Tuesday afternoons.

EASTON

Annual S. S. Convention—Mr. Dudley G. Roe, who is a prominent vestryman of the Church Hill Parish, has arranged an interesting program for the Annual Convention of the Sunday School of Queen Anne's County, of which Mr. Roe is president. The convention will be held at Centreville, June 6. Prominent Sunday School workers from different parts of the State will give the addresses at the different sessions.

Buy Thrift Stamps—As the result of a Thrift Stamp Tea given by the Guild of Wye Parish approximately $50 has been added to the sinking fund of the parish as an investment in Thrift Stamps. A service flag has been ordered and will be dedicated Trinity Sunday.

Clergyman Injured in Campaign—During the strenuous closing days of the Liberty Loan campaign in Cecil County the Rev. Edmund Burk as chairman of the committee was injured in a slight accident when his horse ran away and threw him out of his carriage. He was able to resume his services the next Sunday and the quota for the Loan from that district was oversubscribed.

The congregation at Tunis Mills, a chapel of All Saints' Parish, Longwoods, the Rev. W. B. Whipple, rector, are planning to build a church in the near future. The congregation has steadily grown during the past year in this promising and fast growing part of the Diocese. EVERETT JOHNSON.

HARRISBURG

Camouflaged Gifts to Rector—The Rev. George I. Browne at Ascensiontide passed his tenth anniversary of rectorship in St. John's, Lancaster, and the twenty-fifth anniversary of his ordination to the Priesthood. These events were fittingly celebrated on the eve of Ascension Day in the parish house by St. John's congregation. On the part of the vestry a purse of $125 in gold was presented to Mr. Browne by Mr. James H. Spotts. The pastor's Aid Society presented him with a fine surplice. Both gifts were entirely unexpected by the rector. They were camouflaged under the term "Thimble Tea."

A Military Service—The Pennsylvania Reserve Militia, the Lancaster Marine Training Corps, and the Lancaster Machine Gun Company, attended St. John's Church, Lancaster, on the evening of Ascension day for a special service. The united bodies assembled at City Hall, at 7.30 and, headed by the Mayor of the City, Hon. H. L. Trout, Major H. P. Keiper of the Marine Training Corps and by the Burger Military band, marched to the Church. The service was impressive in every way and the sermon by Mr. Browne most fitting. By the way, it should be stated that Mr. Browne is Chaplain of the Marine Training Corps, and has a son in the United States navy. At the time of this service a "service flag" containing nearly five hundred stars was placed in the charge of Chaplain Browne. It represents the men who have gone into the service from the organization mentioned above. This flag was carried in the street demonstration which preceded the service. Major Keiper made the presentation speech.

NEW YORK

Dr. Lubeck Resigns—The Rev. Henry Lubeck, LL.D., D.C.L., after a rectorship of more than thirty years, has resigned the parish of Zion and St. Timothy. As one of Dr. Lubeck's fellow-rectors once said: "Most clergymen are called to a parish; Dr. Lubeck was called to an opportunity." The church that he came to was the struggling St. Timothy's. The church that he leaves is one of the strongest parishes in the city. We hope to publish next week a full account of Dr. Lubeck's ministry in New York.

Diocesan Missionary Dinner—The event of chief interest this past week was the Diocesan Convention. An account of that appears elsewhere. In the evening of the same day the Diocesan Missionary Committee had a dinner at the Hotel Marseilles. The room was crowded and considerable interest was aroused in the projected Mission for Missions according to the "Patton campaign" plan. Mr. George C. Thomas of Baltimore told very vividly how the plan had been carried out in his city. Bishop Burch described the Every Name Canvass at the Chapel of the Intercession, and Dr. John W. Wood spoke on the present financial situation of the Board of Missions. The chairman of the committee, Mr. W. W. Orr, presided.

Vicar Goes to the Front—The vestry of the Parish of the Incarnation has granted a six months' leave of absence to the Vicar, the Rev. E. M. H. Knapp. Mr. Knapp has been appointed an overseas Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. and has entered upon his work. During his absence the work at the Chapel will be in charge of the Rev. Henry Glaeser, who is now assistant minister.

Diocesan Deaconess Chapter—The deaconesses of the diocese gathered at Grace Church Neighborhood House last Saturday for the purpose of forming a diocesan organization. The New York Diocesan Chapter of Deaconesses was accordingly formed, with Deaconess Gardner of Grace Church as the president and Deaconess Humphreys of the Church of the Advocate, Bronx, as the secretary. Two or three meetings will be held each year and it is hoped that all the deaconesses in the diocese will join in this effort to strengthen the order.

New Tune for the Battle Hymn—Julia Ward Howe's "Battle Hymn of the Republic" has a new musical setting, by Katharine Eleanor Abbey, which was heard for the first time here at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine last Sunday morning. It is dedicated to Edwin Austin Abbey, lieutenant in the Canadian Mounted Rifles, who was killed in action at Vimy Ridge, April 10, 1917.

Ascension Day Service at Trinity School—The annual Ascension Day service of Trinity School and its boy choir was held at St. Agnes Chapel. The Rev. Lawrence T. Cole, D.D., rector of the school, officiated.

Fellow in Religious Education—The New York Diocesan Board of Religious Education has awarded its fellowship at Columbia University to Charles West Manzer, of Windsor, Vermont.

G. F. S. Note—Miss Fanny Raymond, vice-president of the New York G. F. S., and a most faithful and untiring associate, has been honored by a call to serve under the Y. M. C. A. in France. Many parties were arranged as farewells for Miss Raymond and at four gatherings purses were given her.

Recently the members of the G. F. S. and their friends had the pleasure of hearing Miss Helen Fraser of the National War Savings Committee in London speak at Synod House.

Holy Trinity, Harlem—A most gratifying response to the special Easter offering at Holy Trinity, Harlem, showed that eight hundred individuals had shared in the offering, although owing to the changed conditions in the neighborhood there are seldom more than three hundred at the Sunday morning service, and the total enrolment of families barely exceeds eight hundred.

MARGARETTA MILLER.

ERIE

A Gold Star—In the Cathedral of St. Paul, Erie, two service flags, containing fifty-five stars, were unfurled recently, and an Honor Roll was placed in the vestibule of the church. One gold star is on the service flag in memory of Karl Reznor who gave his life for his country on the aviation field at San Antonio. One flag was hung in the chancel and the other outside the main entrance of the church.

Cathedral Supper—The Cathedral congregation has recently enjoyed a family supper and entertainment. About 500 were present. This was an attempt on the part of the Cathedral authorities to get the congregation better acquainted with each other. The Choir and Boy Scouts gave a patriotic entertainment which was much appreciated.

LOUISIANA

Splendid Parish Showing—Grace Church Parish, Lake Providence (the Rev. Nicholas Rightor, Rector), has shown marked and remarkable advancement since the coming of its rector about February 1. At the Easter Day services the offering was devoted to offsetting all of the parish obligations, diocesan and general. The amount raised entirely cleared these obligations and left a substantial sum in the treasury, as the offering was about three times more than on any previous Easter. Just after Easter, or within just two months after Mr. Rightor's taking charge, an Every-Member Canvass of the parish was made, which resulted in some remarkable figures. The parish support was increased nearly double the old amount, while on the missionary side of the envelope the figures mounted to three times the former subscription. In view of this fact the vestry at once met and declared itself entirely self-supporting and willing to continue an arrangement with the Bishop whereby one Sunday in each month could be used by the rector for Diocesan missionary work. At the same time they voted that the change in the financial status should mean that the rector's stipend should be increased $400 per annum.

Several beautiful memorials have also been given during the Easter-tide, consisting of the seven-branch altar lights by Mesdames F. X. Ransdell, Fred H. Schneider, and Messrs. F. B. Davis and T. B. Davis, in memory of their late parents, Edward H. and Julia Blackburn Davis; a handsome credence table by Mr. W. S. Maguire in memory of his late wife, Margaret Barker Schneider; a lectern bible by Mr. Frederick J. Breithaupt in memory of his late sters, Fanny Julia and Louisa Frederica reithaupt.

The Bishop visited Grace Church on Sunay, May 5, and confirmed the largest class candidates ever presented in the history the parish. It was remarkable on acount of the number of adults, especially e men. There were twelve men, three omen, two girls and two boys. It can be ell understood why the members of the ngregation are so enthusiastic and so oroughly aroused. Mr. Rightor came to ake Providence from Savannah, Georgia, here he had been assistant-rector of Christ hurch.

MINNESOTA

ypsy Smith Doesn't Like Church—Vhen the Lord wanted a man to preach e gospel to the people of five continents didn't go to any of the temples of worip, he didn't go to any of the enthusiastic clesiastics, but he went to a gypsy camp d found the man he needed," said Gyp Smith at a Y. M. C. A. meeting here cently. "I thank God that I am not an clesiastic but just a layman, and I say that the benefit of you laymen that you may ow what it is possible for a layman to do. ou don't have to be an ecclesiastic to do e Lord's work. What is the matter with ur churches? They are cold and stiff. ou put a preacher in a refrigerator and en expect him to sweat."

To the clergy he said: "Get off your destals and do something. There is nothg undignified in working and serving. hy, I have blackened the boots of the boys er there, I have swept the floors for the ys; I have given them candy, and note per and cigarettes at one end of the hut, d then gone and preached to them at the ner end of the room and there was nothg undignified in what I did."

The address was undoubtedly good, in ces it was brilliant, but your correspondt, along with many others, would be glad know why it is necessary for "noted" angelists, and men who are doing the xtraordinary" thing, invariably find it cessary to "slam" the churches in general d their clergy in particular.

The Minneapolis Auditorium was packed d overcrowded and round after round of plause greeted the speaker's remarks with ference to the various nations on the side the Allies and the part they are playing the great war.

niors Meet—The Annual Meeting of Junior Auxiliary was held at St. John's urch, Linden Hills, Minneapolis, last turday afternoon. Large numbers, splenl enthusiasm and a keen interest in the se of missions marked the gathering. e members of St. John's branch were the stesses and provided splendid entertainnt for their guests.

others' and Daughters' Dinner—It was unique occasion when nearly seventy thers and daughters sat down to a others' and Daughters' Dinner" at St. ke's Church, Minneapolis, last Monday ht. One of the speakers referred to the t that Fathers' and Sons' Dinners were pular in all parts of the country but that s was as far as was known the first others' and Daughters' Dinner" in the ntry. It was a splendid success. The a originated with the directress of the ls' Club of St. Luke's, Mrs. G. W. Cadllader.

Clergy Help Red Cross—A number of the clergy of the Twin Cities are taking a very active part in the campaign for Red Cross Funds. Several of them have been assigned sections of the state in which to hold meetings in the interest of the campaign. FREDERICK D. TYNER.

MAINE

Gifts—A new litany desk and service book were recently blessed at St. Michael's Church, Auburn, Maine, the Rev. A. T. Stray, rector. These gifts are from Mr. Samuel Booth and his daughters, Miss Martha and Miss Minnie Booth, in memory of the late Margaret Walker Booth, for many years a devout and faithful communicant, and one of the founding members of St. Michael's Church then known as the Church of Heavenly Rest.

Goes to Old Town—The Rev. D. R. Bailey of Port-de-Grave, Newfoundland, has accepted the charge of St. James' Church, Old Town, Maine. It is expected that he will take up the work at an early date.

Fairfield Has New Rector—The Rev. Robert J. Evans, deacon, has been assigned to St. Paul's Church, Fort Fairfield, Maine, and will take up the work there about June 1. This important mission has been vacant, unfortunately, for sixteen months. Gratitude is due to the Rev. E. W. M. Weller of Caribou, Maine, for his visitations there from time to time. Mr. Weller will continue to come to administer the Holy Communion until Mr. Evans is advanced to the priesthood.

Mr. Ridgeway Resigns—The Rev. William W. Ridgeway has resigned his charge of Christ Church, Eastport, Maine, and gone to Detroit, Michigan, to be curate at St. Paul's Cathedral in that city. Arrangements are being made by Bishop Benjamin Brewster of the diocese for the maintenance of the services at Eastport during the Summer, in the hope that a permanent clergyman may be secured for the promising field in the Autumn. W. F. LIVINGSTON.

LONG ISLAND

Christ Chapel Celebrates—The fiftieth anniversary of the founding of Christ Chapel, Brooklyn, of which the Rev. John E. Gersternburg is vicar, was celebrated Sunday, May 5, and through the week a reunion and reception was held, at which letters from two former vicars, the Rev. James B. Nies, and Chaplain Horace R. Fell, of the One Hundred Second Engineers, were read.

A play was given followed by a supper, the toastmaster being the Rev. Walter De Forest Johnson, rector of Christ Church, speeches were made by the Rev. Frederick B. Bartlett, a former vicar, now rector of St. John's, Hoboken, and Mr. James Mancor, president of the Chapel Committee. Christ Church will hold its eighty-third anniversary the third Sunday in May.

Spiritual Attitude Toward the War—At St. John's Church, Huntington, the Church bell rings every day at noon, and the rector, the Rev. Charles E. Cragg, holds a short service of prayer for our own boys and for our allies.

At St. Bartholomew's, Brooklyn, and at the Church of the Incarnation, Brooklyn, the rectors come in to the Red Cross meetings at noon, all work stops, and for about ten minutes a most touching service is held, in which all our heroes are remembered, our enemies prayed for and guidance asked for ourselves.

Cross Given to St. Ann's—A beautiful processional cross has been given to St. Ann's Church by Mrs. Jessica Lozier Payne, in memory of her mother.

The cross was formally received on behalf of the parish on Palm Sunday.

Up to April seventy-three letters of transfer had been received at this Church from parishioners of the recently closed St. Peter's.

The rector, the Rev. G. Ashton Oldham, held a most successful mission during Holy Week; at the Monday evening service 200 people attended, and by Good Friday evening this number was increased to 435.

On one evening the chief theme was the renewal of Baptismal vows, and at one point in the service practically the whole congregation followed the Rector to the chancel to repeat the old-time vows.

Ascension day has a special significance for this Church, because it was on this day that St. Ann's became a Free Church; an effort, therefore, is always made to have people remember the need for increasing its endowment. An old custom still prevails to have everyone contribute at least one cent for each week in the year; this is not done just for the sake of the money, but to keep before people's minds the fact that an endowment can be raised only by remembering the need for it.

Sunday Schools—Thirty-seven schools reported a total of about $4.000 in their offerings at the presentation service, held at St. Ann's Church, Brooklyn, Saturday afternoon, May 4.

The two banners awarded were won by Trinity Sunday School, Hewletts, Long Island, their total offering for General Missions being $326.49 and the per capita $2.33.

Bishop Burgess presided; Chaplain Silver of the U. S. Military Academy, West Point, made the address. There were twenty vested choirs, and seventeen visiting clergy.

Little Helpers—The annual service of the Little Helpers was held on April 20 in Christ Church, Clinton Street.

After the service an exhibit showing where and how their offerings are used was held in the parish house.

Their offering amounted to $253 and will be used for work among children.

MARY E. SMYTH.

CALIFORNIA

Improvements—The most notable instance of Church improvement in this Diocese in the last year has been the completion of the plant of St. Paul's Church, Oakland, the Rev. Alexander Allen, rector. Recently they have finished without debt a rectory which has cost them about $9,000. This has been accomplished by one gift of $5,000, and by numerous smaller gifts covering the cost of the building. The new rectory was opened with a house-warming and a service of Benediction by the Bishop. This parish now has a beautiful church, on which there remains a considerable indebtedness, which they are paying by instalments. They have also a most satisfactory parish house entirely free from debt. Altogether, they have now one of the most complete equipments in the diocese.

Clerical Changes—Other news from this diocese at present centres about certain clergymen. The Rev. Dr. F. W. Clampett, Rector of Trinity Church, San Francisco, has been granted a leave of absence, and has received a commission as chaplain of a regiment of artillery for the most part raised in San Francisco, and now in training at San Diego. His going promises to involve several changes among the clergy of San Francisco, which are not yet sufficiently developed to warrant publication. The Rev. H. E. Montgomery, Rector of Trinity Church, Menlo Park, has also been granted leave of absence from his parish for a year, and has taken charge of the work among the soldiers stationed at camps within the diocese. He is working under the war commission of the diocese as a Church clergyman, and has no commission from the United States. The Rev. Dr. H. H. Powell is holding his Sunday services at Menlo, and the Rev. F. A. Brown, in charge of the neighboring Church at Redwood City, is doing the parochial work necessary. The Rev. Ernest Bradley took charge of St. Mary's by the Sea, Pacific Grove, on May 1; and Rev. C. L. Thackeray has come from Watsonville to take the rectorship of St. John's Church, San Francisco, which Mr. Bradley has resigned. The Rev. C. A. Hadlow, from Canada, has taken charge of Trinity Mission, Richmond.

The Rev. D. R. Wallace, in charge of St. Augustine's Mission, the only mission for colored people in this diocese, is making a persistent effort to raise money for a much-needed church for his flock. They have secured the lot on West Street, Oakland, and now have in hand about $2,000 of the $6,000 needed for the building. The Mission is practically self-supporting, and is much hampered in its growth by the lack of a proper building. MARDON D. WILSON.

PITTSBURGH

Anniversary—On Ascension Day the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, observed with a festival service the anniversary of its organization. There was a long procession consisting of the full vested choir and about twenty-five of the clergy of the city and suburbs, who held their services at an early hour in order to take part in the festival. Morning Prayer was read by the rector of the parish and his assistant, and Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop, with sermon by the Rev. A. R. Van Meter, Dean of the Cathedral at Erie. After the service a buffet luncheon was served in the parish house, and as there were present the Rev. John G. Magee and Dr. Mary James of China there were short talks on the work in their respective fields.

Mr. Van Meter, who formerly served in China, also had a word to say in behalf of the work. Bishop Whitehead and Mrs. M. C. Adams, Diocesan President of the Woman's Auxiliary, made appeals in behalf of the Woman's Hospital in Wuchang, and Dr. Brown, the rector, had prayers in behalf of the work of hospitals. The Rev. E. J. Jennings, the assistant of the parish, who was leaving in the evening for service abroad with the Y. M. C. A., appeared at the luncheon in his uniform and said a few words of greeting and farewell.

Seventh Anniversary—On the first Sunday in May, the Rev L. F. Cole celebrated the seventh anniversary of his rectorship of the Church of the Incarnation, Knoxville. During his incumbency the Church has been very much enlarged and improved, and Memorial pulpit, reredos and altar lights have been given to the parish. There are many parish activities, among them a very enthusiastic Red Cross Unit.

War Item—The Rev. Elroy Jeffery Jennings, assistant at the Church of the Ascension, Pittsburgh, has been accepted for service in France with the Y. M. C. A. He is now in training, and will leave at the end of May for France. JANE CUDDY.

VIRGINIA

John Moncure Memorial Church Opened—The John Moncure Memorial Church (colored) in Stafford County, Virginia, was opened on Sunday afternoon, April 28, when Bishop Brown made his first visitation to this new work among the colored people of Stafford County. The services were conducted by Bishop Brown and the sermon was preached by the Rev. G. MacLaren Brydon, Archdeacon of the Colored Work. The rector, the Rev. Sandy A. Morgan, presented a class of six to the Bishop for confirmation.

The property was secured and the church built by the Church people of Richmond as a memorial to the late Rev. John Moncure, D.D. The work for the past year has been in charge of the Rev. Sandy A. Morgan, who has labored most successfully in laying the foundations of permanent work in the center of a growing community of colored people, where the Church was hitherto unknown.

Colored Convocation—The Colored Convocation of the Diocese of Virginia held its eighth annual meeting in St. Philip's Church, Richmond, the Rev. R. A. Jackson, minister-in-charge, on May 1 and 2. Addresses were made by Bishop Gibson, the Rev. John H. Scott of Miller's Tavern, Virginia, the Rev. G. M. Brydon, the Rev. C. B. Bryan, D.D., of the Bishop Payne Divinity School, the Rev. L. A. King, the Rev. E. E. Miller, the Rev. J. F. Ribble, the Rev. R. Cary Montague, City Missionary of Richmond, and the Rev. Sandy A. Morgan. At the Wednesday afternoon service of the Woman's Auxiliary interesting addresses were made by Miss Lucy Gibson, Diocesan Vice-President of the Woman's Auxiliary, and Mrs. E. L. Woodward of The Plains, Virginia. Pledges were made to support a bed in one of our mission hospitals in China.

DETROIT

Annual Meeting of W. A.—The Michigan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary held their annual meeting in St. John's Church, Detroit, on May 6 and 7. On Tuesday morning the Bishop addressed the meeting. He told of his Red Cross work, and emphasizing the great need for Red Cross service from every one, said that the work of the Church should always come first. "The Church before the Red Cross, but work hard for the Red Cross!" The Episcopal Church, Bishop Williams said, was ahead of all other churches in patriotic work.

The Bishop was a little late in arriving and told how his train had been late in coming from Cincinnati, but how some railroad official had given orders for one train to wait so that the Bishop might make the convention. "We are willing to do an thing to help 'can the Kaiser,'" he told t Bishop.

The Auxiliary meeting was called to d der by the president, Mrs. Frederick Stevens. As this was the tenth year Mrs. Stevens' presiding as president of t Diocesan Branch, recognition of the fa was given.

Archdeacon Hastings of the South Arc deaconry and Archdeacon Jermin of t North Archdeaconry told of their work, a all felt greatly encouraged at what is bei done in these uncertain war times. I Mary James of the General Hospital Wuchang, China, spoke most interesting and Miss Frances Withers, the originat of the new plan for the Junior Auxilia told of the Junior Plan. About 200 wom were in attendance and the majority of t parishes and missions of the diocese we represented. BRAYTON BYRON.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Convocation for Clergy—The Annu Convocation of New Hampshire, a meeti of the clergy for conference and reading a discussion of papers, was held at St. Thom Church, Dover, Tuesday and Wednesd April 30 and May 1. At the public serv on the first day the preacher was the R Wm. Porter Niles. The paper at the mo ing session was by the Rev. John W. Su of Boston, member of the Commission Prayer Book Revision, who took the R vision as his subject. After an illumin ing treatment of the subject by the essa ist the entire membership present co tinued the discussion until time for adjour ment. The Rev. Lucius Waterman, Dean the Convocation, presided.

New Rectories—The old rectory Rochester has been sold and a mode house, near the church, has been pu chased. A rectory has also been purchas for Laconia, where the lack of one has ma it difficult to secure or keep a clergyman. WM. PORTER NILES.

SPRINGFIELD

D. D. Degree Conferred—Bishop Sherwood has just received notice from the president of his Alma Mater, Trinity College, that the trustees have voted him the degree of Doctor of Divinity to be conferred on him at commencement in June. The Bishop leaves soon for the East where on May 30, Memorial Day, he will preach the baccalaureate sermon before the graduating class of St. Paul's School, of which he is also a graduate.

Auxiliary Meeting—The Thirty-first Annual Meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held at Lincoln at the same time as the Synod, May 1 and 2.

The formal opening was on Wednesday afternoon.

The treasurer's report showed a membership of 215, and a total receipt of $596.34, an increase of $100 over the previous year; $178 had been sent for St. Agnes' School, Kyoto; $16.87 from the Little Helpers had been sent in during the year.

They voted $200 for General Missions, an increase of about $50 over last year; and $122, the amount of the Mary Caroline Hayner Memorial Fund, to be given to the Bishop.

The following officers were elected: Honorary presidents, Mrs. G. H. Sherwood and Mrs. H. H. Candee; president, Mrs. H. S. Dorsey of Alton; first vice-president, Mrs. H. H. Stoek of Urbana; second vice-president, Mrs. Eugene Gullett of Lincoln; third vice-president, Miss Caroline Forbes of Danville; secretary, Mrs. Katherine D. White of Springfield; educational secretary, Mrs. A. P. Carman of Champaign; secretary of Church Periodical Club, Mrs. Emma Swancutt of East St. Louis; treasurer of united offerings, Miss Virginia Dresser of Springfield; treasurer, Mrs. E. D. Hutchins of Champaign.

They voted to accept the invitation of the ladies of the Chapel of St. John the Divine at the University of Illinois to meet with them next year at the same time as the Synod.

MISSOURI

DE SOTO, MISSOURI.—The Spring meeting of the Southern Convocation with the parish of Trinity Church, De Soto, was a great success. The rector, the Rev. V. O. Penley, and his people were generous entertainers. Only two of the clergy of the Convocation were absent, kept away by illness. Papers were presented by the Rev. Messrs. Weddell, Tragitt, Barnes, White, Clopton and Rein, the topics being "The Church and Amusements," "Christian Giving," and "Church Advertising." One session was given over to the Rev. B. T. Kemerer of St. Louis, who led a conference on Religious Education, and Mrs. Thomas L. Dix, diocesan president of the Junior Auxiliary, gave an address on new plans along Auxiliary lines.

Helpful discussions of the papers and addresses were had and these were participated in by several of the clergy of other Churches than ours in De Soto. On the three evenings of the Convocation sermons were preached by the Rev. Samuel M. Dorrance, the Rev. Linden H. White, and Bishop Johnson. An ad clerum address was also given by Bishop Johnson. Dean J. Courtney Jones, who presided at all sessions, was nominated by the Bishop to succeed himself as dean. Altogether it was one of the most enthusiastic gatherings of the rural clergy had in recent years.

A Helpful Mission—A mission which proved of great value to Christ Church, Moberly, has recently been held by the Rev. R. D. S. Putney of Kirksville, who was assisted on one evening by Mr. Thomas L. Dix of St. Louis, Secretary of the Diocesan Missionary Board. The rector of Moberly is the Rev. George E. Wharton, the newly appointed dean of the Northern Convocation.

Visiting Missions—The Rev. J. J. Clopton and the Bishop Coadjutor have recently completed a visitation of Mr. Clopton's string of five missions and parishes in Southeast Missouri. Goodly congregations were present at all the points visited and evidences were found of new people desiring a closer acquaintance with the worship of the Prayer Book. At Cape Girardeau Mr. Clopton offered himself a short time ago as a lantern lecturer on the good roads movement. His offer was most cordially accepted and the lectures were given under the auspices of the Commercial Club, of which Mr. Clopton is a member.

A Large Class—At Crystal City the Rev. Horatio N. Tragitt, Jr., recently presented for Confirmation a class of eight young men and one young lady, the largest class in many years.

NORTH DAKOTA

A Friendly Visit—A canvass of unusual interest has just taken place in Gethsemane Cathedral Parish, Fargo. At a recent Chapter meeting it was suggested that the same twenty teams, of two men each, who made the every-member canvass last November to secure pledges for parish and general church support, again make a canvass at this time, simply to express appreciation of the gratifying result of last Fall's canvass and to set forth some of the encouraging facts of the parish life and in general make a short call of good fellowship. A printed statement was prepared setting forth some of the stimulating and encouraging facts it was desired to bring out and this statement was left in each home. Many said they did not know the Church took so much interest in people, and results were accomplished which are bound to show good fruit in the future.

A Patriotic Service—A patriotic service of much interest and very largely attended was held on a Sunday evening in April at Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, commemorating the anniversary of America's entrance into the war. Stirring addresses were made by John S. Frame and G. B. Smith, prominent attorneys of the parish. Corporal Rose of the Canadian contingent recently returned from France, where he was severely wounded and gassed, told in a simple way some of his experiences at the front, which were thrilling. He still carries a piece of shrapnel in his neck, so close to the jugular artery that the surgeons did not dare remove it.

Called to Advent Parish—The Rev. H. Garfield Walker, who for several years past has been in active service in Jamaica, has been called to the rectorship of the Church of the Advent, Devil's Lake, North Dakota, in succession to the Rev. F. H.

Oehler, who recently accepted work in Minnesota. Mr. Walker has signified his acceptance and will begin his work in Devil's Lake on Sunday, May 26.

BALTIMORE

Sunday School Institute—The fifteenth annual session of the Sunday School Institute of the Diocese of Maryland was held at the Memorial Church, Baltimore, May 4. The chief speaker was the Rev. Charles H. Boynton of the General Theological Seminary, who discussed the need of training in child study and in the methods of teaching and the parents' part in religious education. Other speakers were the Rev. Stewart U. Mitman, Field Secretary of the Provincial Board of Religious Education; the Rev. Canon McComb, the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Miss Mary D. Pitts, Educational Secretary of the Junior Auxiliary, and Miss Helen Jennings, Superintendent of Elementary Grades, Trinity Church School, Pottsville, Pennsylvania. Bishop Murray presented certificates to six members of the teacher training class who had passed satisfactory tests upon the first-year work in Child Study and Religious Pedagogy and to four who had completed the second-year work.

Presentation Service—The service for the presentation of the Easter Offerings of Sunday Schools of the city was held this year at Emmanuel Church, Baltimore, and was largely attended. Fifty Sunday Schools were represented and more than eight hundred children were in line. An address upon "The Spider and the Cross" was made by the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan. The Bishop presided and presented the banner for the largest per capita offering to the Sunday School of Grace and St. Peter's Church, this being the second year in which it has been won by them. The sum total of the offerings was $4,558 and the highest per capita offering from any school was $3.68.

Baccalaureate Sermons—The baccalaureate sermon at the U. S. Naval Academy at Annapolis will be preached as usual this year by the Chaplain, the Rev. Sydney K. Evans, in the Chapel, and at the same time the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class at St. John's College will be delivered by Bishop Garland of Philadelphia at St. Anne's Church.

Rector Resigns—The Rev. Geo. L. Paine, who was recently granted leave of absence for work in France, has since tendered his resignation as rector of the parish. This has come as a great shock to the vestry and congregation of St. Paul's. After long and earnest conferences between rector and vestry Mr. Paine has consented to leave the matter open for the present, although he has frankly stated that there is little probability of his changing his mind during the Summer. In the meantime the vestry has voted that the rector's resignation be laid on the table until October 1. The Rev. Henry S. Harte, Archdeacon of Hartford, has been appointed minister-in-charge until the end of the present year.

Clergy Conscription Withdrawn—Very much to our surprise, and indeed to our dismay, the clause in the "Man-power Bill" which compelled the services of the clergy, at least in a non-combatant capacity, has been withdrawn. Nobody seems quite to know why. But the Parliamentary Correspondent of the Church Family Newspaper states that a meeting of leading Nonconformist ministers made representations to the Prime Minister on the point. It is also stated that the Irish Nationalists tabled amendments to exclude the Roman Catholic priests from the operation of the clause. One cannot but hope that the majority of the Nonconformists and of the Romans are emphatically opposed to those who have acted for them. Certainly the Archbishop of Canterbury in the House of Lords was emphatic enough as regards the feelings of our own clergy. The original exemption of the clergy in 1916 was not put in at the request of our Bishops or clergy. When the new bill was in contemplation, the Archbishop wrote to the Prime Minister, telling him that the clergy were ready to "answer to any new call that the nation makes upon us." The Government had once more taken the responsibility of exempting the clergy and ministers, on the ground that the number of men affected by it would be too small to be of any great military value. The Archbishop has received many letters regretting this change of front. Wherever one goes, the clergy are complaining of it. One of them asked leave of the Winchester Diocesan Conference to bring in an emergency resolution, expressing the keen regret of the clergy and laity at the withdrawal of the clause, which resolution was carried unanimously.

Volunteering for Service—What are the junior clergy to do? The Church Times points out that it is not known how the military authorities would receive a general offer of enlistment in the Medical Corps. Clearly the clergy ought not to be left to decide their course by themselves: and it is announced that the Bishops will take the responsibility of deciding what men shall go, and what men shall stay. And the Church Times makes a good point by recommending that the Bishops should do more than give a lead: they should speak in a voice of command. Only so many of the clergy as are absolutely necessary for the service of a diocese should be retained, and these should be spread as widely as possible. It even pictures the Canon of the cathedral reading Divine Service himself, because the Minor Canons are gone to the wars!

The Guardian takes a similar line. But the Challenge, for once, is out of sympathy with the prevailing feeling. It believes the Government's decision to be a wise one. Clergy, like doctors, should be doing their own work. To compel them to do something else, it argues, is to admit that their own work is of no real importance—a humiliating position for the Church. But surely there is something fallacious in the argument. Every doctor is needed for his own work when so many bodies are being mangled. But it is never suggested that the thousands of clergy who could, in a great emergency, be spared for a time, should all be enrolled as chaplains in addition to t 2,000 already serving as such. And a cler man's influence for good need not ce during the time when his ministry of Wo and Sacrament are in suspension.

An Eirenicon from Scotland—Wh shall we come to the end of the chan which the war will bring us? Who wo have imagined a few years ago that t Moderator of the Church of Scotland wo find it consistent with Presbyterianism stand up in the Crypt of St. Paul's Cath dral and gravely discuss the possibilities union with the Church of England? Tr this year's Moderator is an exceptional m The Rt. Rev. James Cooper, D.D., is P fessor of Church History at Glasgow U versity, and can therefore speak with m than a Moderator's authority. I know mu of his sympathy with the Church of En land, as I have had the honor of meet him once or twice. But one was scarc prepared for the bold move which he h now taken. I have as yet no informat as to how Scotsmen will agree with move, but he is evidently speaking on half of a considerable body of opinion that country. As I write, I have only comparatively brief account of the lect as it appears in the daily press. Next w I hope to describe how the Church pr has received the proposal. Dr. Cooper a man of very large visions indeed. W he wants is a United Church for the E lish-speaking world (not forgetting Amer he was careful to add), which should l on to a visible union of all Christian p ple. With Rome, as she is at pres "neither the Eastern Churches nor the W ern Reformed Churches could deem healt reunion possible." But his faith that e that would come was assured. As gards Scotland, he is sure that the Rep of the Faith and Order Committee will p duce a great effect in his country. He tends that it shall be brought effectiv before the General Assemblies of the Pr byterian Churches in May. The next La beth Conference will receive deputati from the Churches of the two natio Meantime Dr. Cooper assures us, s phrase, that the fact of episcopacy, and continuity of the historic episcopate, be accepted. The Scottish Churches retain their Church Courts and Gen Assembly. They will be united with E land in the "quadrilateral stronghold— Holy Scriptures, the Apostles' and Nic Creeds, the administration of the Sacrame of Baptism and Holy Communion, and form of government by Bishops."

The Bishop of London, who presided the Moderator's lecture, said that the terim Report of the Faith and Order C mittee would be formally laid before General Assemblies, and warmly than Dr. Cooper. He added that if he had couraged exchange of pulpits, it was cause he thought that such exchange sho be the last, not the preliminary, step towa reunion.

The Church of Rome

To the Editor THE CHURCHMAN:

I have friends, not Episcopalians, who sometimes ask me in just what our Church differs in its teachings and practices from the Church of Rome, and though I have explained such differences as well as I was able, I have not felt that I made the matter very clear, or that it was very clear to me. I believe that I am a long way from being alone in my ability to answer the question, "What would be required of one, either in faith or practice, to be an acceptable member of the Church of Rome which is not allowed to be taught and practiced in the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States or in the Church of England?"

I hope this may be answered in your columns.

Cleveland, Ohio. W. L. MARVIN.

(NOTE.—We have asked Dr. Peters to answer at some length the question which Mr. Marvin has directed to THE CHURCHMAN. We publish in this issue Dr. Peters' reply, under the title "Essentials of the Faith".—Editor.)

"Our City of Refuge"

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

There should be no misunderstanding about the meaning of Dr. Campbell's article, Our City of Refuge, in the last CHURCHMAN. Its teaching is in contradiction to that of your first editorial in the same number, and is much to be deprecated.

Dr. Campbell commends the refusal of the Roman Church to be "rationalized," quoting Dr. Santayana, who attributes its hold over the minds of men to this refusal. But has the Roman Church achieved success in its efforts to gain this hold? It certainly wields a tremendous sway over its adherents. But it does not conquer the thinking world. It makes no notable advance. It continues to exist largely by the power of established position, by dead weight. One can hardly argue for a "firm refusal to be rationalized," for the efficiency of irrationalism, from the victories of the Roman Church, because they are not apparent.

If what we want in the Church is a "refuge from the world," then we should undoubtedly go a step further, all of us, and enter a monastery; for, as a refuge, the monastery is much more satisfying.

The companionship of Jesus is the true refuge for troubled souls, "weary and hungry for the stable and abiding," a companionship giving joy now and the assurance of joy in the time to come. It is His presence, not the thought of the Church, that comforts the mourner and cheers the young man dying on the battlefield. Jesus is the City of Refuge, not the Church, which assumes merely to minister for Him and lead men to Him; seeks His glory not its own.

If the Church is to minister successfully to men in the new world that is arising it must oppose such teaching as Dr. Campbell's, which would destroy its efficiency as an instrument of God for the salvation of mankind. It must show itself able to learn as well as teach, to gain new ideas, to meet the world's new spirit and insight and spiritual emotion with sympathy and comprehension. It must be able to free itself from bondage to the irrational, the stereotyped and lifeless. Dr. Campbell approves the statement, "A religion that I can understand is no religion for me." There will always be much in God and man, in the grace of God, the ways of God, and in the heart of man that cannot be understood. But one has no right to refuse to understand what God makes plain. Orthodoxy of the Wets

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In Mr. Everett B. Wheeler's strong letter published in last week's Churchman he quotes one of our Lord's parables and shows conclusively that the use of wine has Divine sanction.

Allow me further to call attention to our Lord's own practice. In the seventh chapter of St. Luke's Gospel he is quoted as rebuking the Pharisees of that time for their narrow intolerance in that while they reviled John Baptist for his abstinence they called Jesus Christ "a gluttonous man and a winebibber".

Believing as I do that this Jesus is God incarnate it seems, therefore, little less than blasphemy to speak of wine and wine-drinking as is the custom of the Prohibitionists.

And it was He who said on another occasion, "The disciple is not above his master nor the servant above his lord".

"Insolent"

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I have already expressed to you my appreciation of the vast improvement in THE CHURCHMAN. But I felt like shouting "three cheers for THE CHURCHMAN" when I got this week's issue and read the two splendid editorials, "House of Bishops and Church Unity," and "Guarding the Family Circle."

As for the first, I think—High Churchman though I am—that nothing more proud and haughty, not to say insolent, could have been written than the reply of the Bishops to the communication from Dr. Smyth and others. Neither the cause of Church Unity nor the work of the Church War Commission can be helped by such an attitude.

As for the second—not only the United States Army but the "mighty army" of the Church of God, will go down to defeat unless the clergy everywhere realize the danger and dare to speak out as Bishop Lawrence and THE CHURCHMAN have spoken.

Surely at last THE CHURCHMAN has "found its soul." GEORGE F. DEGEN.

From Camp Devens

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Again I write to remind the clergy of New England and Northern New York, that it is of the greatest assistance to the voluntary chaplains to have direct from the home parishes the names of those men drafted to Camp Devens.

This information should give the full name, whether baptized, confirmed and a communicant, whether accustomed to help in the parish in any way of service as vestryman, Sunday School worker, etc., and to be sure to give the regiment and company or battery to which the individual has been assigned. Sometimes the clergy have to wait for letters from camp before they can give this information as to regiment and company, but let them await information and then forward it to me.

Highways and Byways

Are you willing to do something for the Master? He gave His all for you! I know you will only give one answer to this question. This society is especially trying to follow Him in seeking and saving that which is lost. Jesus said, "Suffer little children to come unto me." There are thousands upon thousands of children that as yet have never heard this Friend.

It is especially these we seek. While our thoughts go abroad, and our hearts bleed for the terrific suffering there, let us not forget those at home. There are many byways and hedges where these little ones are hidden. We must go after them; we must be His witnesses.

At the office of this society, 56 Pine Street, New York City, many a young man stranded in the great city has received advice and help that has saved him from going under in the whirlpool.

At the Children's Mission, 266 and 268 Hamilton Avenue, Brooklyn, the children are gathered in every evening for religious instruction.

At the Children's Home, 45 Third Place, Brooklyn, is a home for children too old for the orphan asylum. This is not an institution, but a true Christian Home, such as a good father and mother would want their children to have.

At no time in the history of our Mission have conditions been as desperate as now, at no time have we needed your financial help as we do now. Shall we let the children in the Children's Home go out in the world to shift for themselves? Shall we be compelled to say "no" to the many who knock at our door and beg for the bread of life?

Dear friend, I beg you with all the earnestness that I can, in His name, who gave His life for you and me, help us that we may continue to protect the children in our Children's Home, and bring the Gospel to the children of the slums. Please act today. Surely, you who read this, can at least spare one dollar for the Master's work.

The New Books

Bishop Brent's New Book

THE MOUNT OF VISION. By the Rt. Rev. Charles Brent, D.D. New York and London: Longmans, Green & Company. 1918. $1.00.

There is much that is noble in this volume, and much that is involved and obscure. Its subtitle is "A Study of Life in Terms of the Whole", and it is a very earnest effort to gain light upon the problems of pain and evil, so burningly present at this time, by studying them in relation to the character of God, made manifest to men through Incarnation.

Perhaps the best part of the book is the preface. It abounds in profound and suggestive sayings, some of which are expressed with great beauty. "The eye, whether of the body or of the soul, can lay hold of immensities with the same facility as it lays hold of trifles". That is a truly memorable saying, one to tuck away in the mind for a time of meditation, when the challenge in it will become evident. And again, "Catholicity has nothing to recommend it unless it is the condition in which everything is measured and considered in terms of the whole. There is no graver offense than to use a Catholic garment to hide a sectarian heart". And still again, "The war is a momentary phase of a disease which was just as grave an evil before it broke out in a rash as since. The wrath of the cancer is in its roots rather than where its teeth have gnawed the surface of the flesh".

All this is finely said, and one goes forward with great expectation. But the expectation is somewhat sobered by its encounter with the first chapter, in which the thought, colored, as the author acknowledges, by the reading of Herman's Meaning and Value of Mysticism is difficult to follow. Through this and some of the succeeding chapters the author seems to be struggling with his great themes, and by no means always to be mastering them. One wishes that the writing of them could have been postponed until they had been thought through to clearer expression. The closing chapters are much more lucid, and in two of them, "Purified as by Fire" and "The Last Great Adventure", the writer is at his best, and the promise of the preface is fulfilled. R.

Donald Hankey's Common Sense

RELIGION AND COMMON SENSE. By Donald Hankey. New York: E. P. Dutton Company. 1918. 60 cents.

Donald Hankey's common sense is more rational than the rationalists, and he gives nature a meaning unknown to the naturalists and to him spirit is a reality far different from that held by the spiritualists. Donald Hankey trusted the facts of experience and found freedom for his spirit after he faced bravely the advancing armies of doubt and difficulty. When he emerged from his contest he held to the real basis of Christianity and had learned that when the nature of Christianity is understood the attacks of the rationalists lose both force and danger and that the critics had indeed helped us to understand the Bible and the Christ. In nine unpretentious chapters the late Donald Hankey had a message for the confirmation of laymen in the faith and one that will restore sickened souls to the healthy life of faith. Admirers of Hankey's other books should not miss this one that so frankly lets the reader into the secret of his character, faith filled and spirit free. A. L. M.

A Moth of a Man

THE LIFE OF FRANCIS THOMPSON. By Everard Meynell. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $2.00.

This sympathetic and illuminative biography, first published in 1913, and later republished in an edition uniform with Thompson's "Works", has an interest which is independent of any acquaintance with the lines of the poet. It is an account of a man of genius who added to the singularities of temperament the curious whims and failures which accompany the use of opium. Francis Thompson, who was born in 1859 and died in 1907, was de Quincey repeated. The parallels, especially during the period of destitution in London, are remarkable; even de Quincey's sister of the streets appears again. Out of this slough of despond he was rescued by good friends, especially the ever kind and helpful Meynells, not only kind but patient. Thompson spent the rest of his live in writing poems and reviews—the reviews for his meagre living—and in conversation, which was like the flashing of occasional lightning against a dull sky. He had an extraordinary habit of repeated platitude, which is compared to taking apart a nest of empty Chinese boxes, and then slowly and carefully putting them together again.

When he wrote verse, however, he was as remote from platitude as possible. Even his words were strange, some of them taken from obscure Elizabethans, some of them of his own construction. He delighted his friends, who rather hurt his fame by declaring that he was second only to Shakespeare; and even those who disliked his writings found them fascinating as well as repellent. "It is idle", said one of them, "to throw the book to the other end of the room. You have to pick it up again".

Very few knew the man himself. He was one of the shyest, most timid, most absent-minded of mortals. "A stranger figure than Thompson's was not to be seen in London. Gentle in looks, half-wild in externals, his face worn by pain and the fierce reactions of laudanum, his hair and straggling beard neglected, he had yet a distinction and an aloofness that marked him in the crowd". "He was constantly alone; and, often as I have met him in the streets of London, I have seldom surprised him in a conscious moment. He would walk past, looking straight before him, and if he was always late for his appointments, and took longer by several hours to get home at night than the average man, it was because he would retrace his steps and go to and fro upon a certain beat, as if indefinitely postponing the evil moment when he would have to confine himself for food or sleep". He would be seen standing beneath a street gas-jet, or by the flares of a book-stall, to finish an overdue article, and, dashing off the final sentence, he would rush into the shop to sell the book which he had been reviewing, and to the post-box to mail his manuscript. "A moth of a man, who has taken his unreturning flitting". G. H.

An Unconventional Biography

W. E. FORD, A BIOGRAPHY. By J. D. Beresford and Kenneth Richmond. New York: Doran & Company. 1918. $1.35.

Great is Pestalozzi; great is Comenius; great is Froebel, and great is W. E. Ford and Beresford and Richmond are his prophets. They must be Irish prophets, too, for they say that Ford was a man who lived before his time, hence this book, for these two authors would have him live when his true time arrives, which, by the way, has not fully come. They call their book a biography, though Plutarch might prefer to agree with the London Bookman and call the book a pow-wow.

Ford may some day be recognized as an era making educator. His biographers think that he will, and though Beresford's psychology is a little self-conscious and Richmond's opinion somewhat biased by ardent admiration, they make out an interesting case for education by self-developed volition rather than by imposed habit.

This Mr. Ford had faith in his own impulses, a keen and original mind and the courage to free himself from the spell of tradition. He was radical, but radical because he struck down to the roots of the educational idea. Thank you, gentlemen, for your unconventional biography of an unconventional man who vitalized the conventions that he did recognize. A. L. M.

Some Short Stories

THE COUNTRY AIR. By L. P. Jacks. New York: Henry Holt & Company. 1918. $1.25.

CHRONICLES OF ST. TID. By Eden Philpotts. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1918. $1.50.

The Country Air is the name of a volume of six stories by the editor of the Hibbert Journal. They are stories of homely, simple, rustic life, and as we read them we catch a breath of the wholesome air that blows over English farms and lanes and churchyards. Each story of simple country life has a tragic element that haunts one. They remind one of Gray's Elegy both in the beauty of the telling, the simplicity of the setting and the human interest of the characters.

Short and rustic as the stories are of "Farmer Jeremy and His Ways"; "Farmer Perryman's Tall Hat"; the two tramps in "Macbeth and Banquo on the Blasted Heath"; they leave an impression on the reader's mind and his thoughts go back to them again and again after.

The other is a volume of stories by Eden Philpotts, who is always an interesting and compelling writer. It deals with characters of the west country of England, and one gets very close to the people with their homely humor, their strong and rugged characters, their shrewd observations. The very first story in this volume, "The Church Grim", is a fine piece of work, artistic without any apparent effort. And short as it is the three characters of it are vividly portrayed, the old man who tells the story, the parson of the church and the curiously weak hero of the episode of the Church Grim. The other stories of the book are equally interesting and the whole volume is quite worthy of the author. H. J. M.

Personals

The Rev. W. M. M. Thomas sailed for Porto Alegre, on May 6, with his family. This is the fourth attempt Mr. Thomas has made to return to his post as headmaster of the Southern Cross School since last January. Twice the boat was taken off at the last minute, and once, on the eve of sailing, his children came down with whooping cough.

The Rev. Leroy F. Baker should be addressed hereafter at 118 Kelso Street, Harrisburg, Pennsylvania.

The Rev. Laird Wingate Snell of Cortland, New York, has accepted a call to St. Peter's Church, Helena, and will enter upon his duties there the middle of June. Mr. Snell was for some time rector of St. Luke's, Jamestown, New York.

The Rev. Marshall F. Montgomery of Grantwood, New Jersey, has been called to the Church of the Incarnation, Great Falls, to succeed the Rev. G. G. Bennett, who goes to St. Paul's Church, Minneapolis.

The Rev. Dr. M. C. Dotten, President of the Standing Committee of the Diocese of Los Angeles, has changed his address from Riverside to 500 Del Rosa Drive, Pasadena, California.

The Rev. Carroll Lund Bates will assume the locum tenancy of Emmanuel Church, Norwich, New York, on June 1. Mr. Bates has recently published a series of pageants on the Church Year which have attracted a good deal of attention.

The Rev. Henry B. Bryan has accepted the call to become the rector of Grace Church, Jersey City, New Jersey, in succession to the late Rev. Pelham St. G. Bissell, and entered on the duties of the rectorship on May 1. His address is 268 Second Street, Jersey City, New Jersey.

The address of the Rev. Geo. H. Cornell, D.D., is changed from 252 Galena Avenue, Pasadena, California, to 288 North Shaffer Street, Orange, California.

The Rev. J. H. C. Sauber has been appointed as Vicar-in-Charge of St. Stephen's Church, Boston, until October 1, 1918.

Bishop Lawrence is absent from his diocese until the last of May visiting military camps and cantonments in the West as Chairman of the Church War Commission. He will also visit his daughter in Oregon before his return home.

The Rev. H. B. Lee, Jr., secretary of the Diocese of West Virginia, having accepted a parish elsewhere, the Bishop has appointed the Rev. R. E. L. Strider, Wheeling, West Virginia, Secretary until the meeting of the Council. The names of Delegates to the Council should be sent promptly to him.

Mr. Frank Taylor Weil was ordained to the Diaconate in St. Paul's Church, North Andover, Massachusetts, on the Sunday After Ascension, by Bishop Babcock.

The address of the Rt. Rev. Sheldon M. Griswold, D.D., Suffragan Bishop of Chicago, is changed from 1026 Bryn Mawr Avenue, Chicago, to 1314 Hinman Avenue, Evanston, Illinois.

The Rev. Chester Coal Hill, formerly of St. Andrew's Church, Big Rapids, Michigan, has entered upon his work as Priest-in-Charge of St. Lawrence's Church, Libertyville, St. Andrew's, Gray's Lake, and St. Ignatius', Antioch.

Archdeacon Meem arrived in this country on furlough from Brazil on May 6.

At the Encaenia recently held at King's University, Windsor, Nova Scotia, the honorary degree of Doctor of Civil Laws was conferred on the Rev. Canon W. Chas. Wilson of Springhill Mines, Nova Scotia. Canon Wilson's hospital work is well known to a host of American Churchmen.

The Rev. George C. Graham of Scranton will go to North Brookfield, Massachusetts, resigning from Carbondale June 1.

The Rev. John I. Blair Larned of Scranton has been called to be the Dean of the Pro-Cathedral, South Bethlehem.

R. S. Slaymaker, M.D., of the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul, Chicago, Physician to the Western Theological Seminary, has received a commission as major in the Medical Corps of the National Army.

Mr. William A. James, President of the Richmond Local Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, has volunteered as a Brotherhood Secretary, and took charge on May 13 of the Brotherhood work under the Y. M. C. A. at Camp Sevier, Greenville, South Carolina.

At the invitation of the Right Reverend the Bishop of Ottawa, Canada, the Rev. Dr. Manning will preach the sermon at the opening of the Synod of the Diocese of Ottawa on Monday, June 3.

my joy in that which I have tried to accomplish, and my profound appreciation of the unfailing kindness of all my associates on The Churchman Staff. These are the things one never forgets.

And to the great congregation whom I have been accustomed to address in these "Talks," I want to tell you of how often you have helped me. During these years your generous words have never ceased to reach me, and far more than you can guess, have cheered me to keep on with my work. They have made me very happy. I wish that I might know each of you personally. I shall preserve your letters among my treasures. I thank you.

And now, goodbye. The Lord bless you and keep you. The Lord cause His face to shine upon you and be gracious unto you. The Lord lift up the light of His countenance upon you and give you peace, both now and forevermore. Amen.

when its present task is done as it ought to be and will be, will make it not only a better and a stronger but a more united nation. Then, too, will the Christian Church become a stronger and more united Church; its frictions and collisions will somehow go and vanish; it will become a more united Church, and as such will do a larger and a greater work in building up in the world and in all the world the kingdom of Jesus Christ.

Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co.

Atlantic Building 51 Wall Street New York

Insures against Marine and Inland Transportation Risk and will issue policies making loss payable in Europe and Oriental countries.

Chartered by the State of New York in 1842, was preceded by a stock company of a similar name. The latter company was liquidated and part of its capital, to the extent of $100,000, was used, with consent of the stockholders, by the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and repaid with a bonus and interest at the expiration of two years.

During its existence the company has insured property to the value of $30,949,773,989.00. Received premiums thereon to the extent of $312,671,550.90. Paid losses during that period $152,928,388.68. Issued certificates of profits to dealers $96,523,710.00. Of which there have been redeemed $90,801,110.00. Leaving outstanding at present time $5,722,600.00. Interest paid on certificates amounts to $24,494,668.95. On December 31, 1917, the assets of the company amounted to $18,041,890.25.

The profits of the company revert to the assured and are divided annually upon the premiums terminated during the year, thereby reducing the cost of insurance.

For such dividends, certificates are issued subject to dividends or interest until ordered to be redeemed, in accordance with the charter.

was adopted. The Board will consist of the two Bishops, the four Archdeacons, eight persons appointed by the Bishop, eight elected by the Convention and five may be added by the Board itself. They may be clergy, laymen or women. One thousand dollars were voted for it in the budget.

Canon Elmendorf, reporting for the Social Service Commission, stated that of the $50,000 asked for from the diocese for the work of the Diocesan and General War Commissions there was already in hand $45,000. Of this sum $9,000, the percentage designated before the campaign opened, had gone to the general War Commission.

At this point in the proceedings Mr. Moncll Sayre, a member of the convention, made an unfortunate impression by denouncing the part the diocese had played in contributing to the general War Commission fund. It was perhaps the manner of his rebuke, more than the substance of what he said, that created ill feeling among the members.

The proposition concerning St. Stephen's College from the Synod was referred to the Board of Education to report next year.

The officers retiring were re-elected to Standing Committee, Board of Missions etc. Mr. Albert H. Baldwin of Maplewood was elected treasurer of the diocese. A new canon requiring consent of the Finance Committee or Convention to collect money in the diocese was passed and the purpose is to have all property owned by diocesan institutions or commissions protected from mortgage or alienation in the same way as parish property. The diocesan budget of $38,500 was voted for support of Episcopate, Diocesan Missions and Diocesan Administration of all kinds. Never were so many activities reported and their condition stated. The Confirmations in 1917 were 2,134, about equally divided between the two Bishops.

APPROVES RESOLUTION OF HOUSE OF BISHOPS

New Jersey Convention Takes No Action on New Brunswick Appeal

ASBURY PARK, NEW JERSEY.—The 147th Convention in the 134th year of the Church in the Diocese of New Jersey occurred in Trinity Church, Asbury Park, on May 14 and 15. It was a notable Convention in large attendance and quick dispatch of business.

One successful feature was a Joint Session of the Convention, the Woman's Auxiliary, and the Girls' Friendly Society. Another was a Missionary Pageant enacted by people of Trinity Parish, Princeton. Elections resulted in only minor changes, and appointments continued chiefly the existing committees and Trustees.

The Bishop's Annual Address dealt comprehensively with local interests of the Diocese.

All Trust Funds, of which there are many in the Diocese, were reported in good condition.

In the matter of the recent effort at New Brunswick for religious unity the Convention did not commit itself officially further than a resolution of approval of the Bishop's attitude in the matter.

An effort was made but was defeated to change the time of convention from May to January.

The Committee on Constitution and Canons, co-operating with others to be appointed with them, is charged with the duty of a general revision of the Constitution and Canons.

A budget of expenses was adopted for the year, and appropriations were made for the various general Boards and commissions. It was decided to make the Missionary Apportionment for the Diocese $12,000 instead of $10,500 as last year.

The report of the Committee on the Church Pension Fund was an exhaustive one, revealing some present arrearage, but with promise of the Diocese regularly meeting that obligation. H. E. THOMPSON.

Our School Service Bureau

FOR YEARS we have maintained for the benefit of readers of The Churchman a School Service Bureau, which has aided parents materially in selecting the right school. Years of experience have given us a knowledge of good schools which school-seekers will find valuable, and it is entirely at the service of our readers.

In seeking advice about schools we ask our readers to give the following information:

The age and sex of the child.
The maximum amount you are able to pay.
The state or section of the country preferred.
If any special training is required.

With such information at hand, we shall be glad to suggest schools to meet the conditions.

There is no charge whatever either to the school or school-seeker for this service.

What Our Periodical Club Thinks of the Zone System Law :: :: ::

The following resolution has been adopted by the Church Periodical Club in regard to the Zone System applied to Periodicals

WHEREAS: During the past thirty years the Church Periodical Club has been instrumental in placing large quantities of periodical literature of all kinds in remote and isolated communities in every part of this country, and

WHEREAS: There is documentary proof that this effort has been beneficial in raising the moral tone and the standards of living in these communities as well as in encouraging self-improvement on the part of individuals, and

WHEREAS: The application of the zone system to periodicals, by increasing the price and by lessening the number published, will seriously limit the philanthropic and educational work of the Church Periodical Club, and

WHEREAS: It is at this time a patriotic duty to give every aid in moulding the thought of all communities along the lines of intelligent loyalty, therefore

Be it Resolved: That the Church Periodical Club protests most earnestly against the application of the zone system to periodicals, and urges its members to ask the aid of their Senators and Representatives in repealing the present law.

Our Contributors

Bearing in mind the counsel of William James concerning moral relaxation we have asked Dean Hodges for some suggestions for summer reading for the parson. We are sure that the tired layman will welcome a word along this line from our very human contributor.

Elizabeth Cranstoun is a New York contributor. And God Saw That It Was Good is a story of Gervase, the monk who learned how to say from his heart Benedicite Omnia Opera Domini.

Rosamond Lothrop Bigelow's account of What a Summer Conference Means came to us with the following letter:

As the Conference for Church Work is to meet in Cambridge, Massachusetts, from June 21-July 6, it may be enlightening and encouraging to many of your readers to have the impressions of one of the younger members of that Conference last year brought to their attention.

In these days of great tension and anxiety and tired brains and bodies, may not this tribute inspire many of our young women and some of our men to avail themselves of this opportunity for recreation and renewing of their strength and poise? I speak as one who knows from experience of what the Cambridge Conference means, and I feel grateful beyond words to Rosamond Lothrop Bigelow for expressing as she has for me and many others our sense of deep obligation for the great privilege of having had a part in it.

Very sincerely,
LETITIA GLENN BIDDLE.
Audalusia, Pennsylvania.

The Rt. Rev. James Bowen Funsten, D.D., the Bishop of Idaho, has sent us an excellent impression of Camp Lewis, the result of a recent visit there. He was consecrated Bishop of Wyoming and Idaho in 1899. In 1907 his mammoth missionary district was divided.

Constance D'Arcy Mackay, whose charming verses, Wild Apples, came to us just in

The Red Cross Drive and Its Moral

THE conduct of the Red Cross drive during the past week could not fail to touch the imagination of even the most prosaic people. It has been one of the most inspiring episodes that has come in to lighten the heavy air of the long season of war. The Liberty Loan showed some fine spirit, but somehow the Red Cross has moved upon a plane high above that of the Loan. After all, with all the patriotic fervor of the Loan drive there was, as the President intimated in his thrilling speech in New York, a 4¼ per cent. interest attached to that gift to patriotism. Investment in the work of the Red Cross bears no interest; it is out and out giving. Therefore it has been borne along on the wings of real enthusiasm.

At the theatres, in the streets, the hotels, in our places of business, everywhere good-natured crowds were "held up" by good-natured men and women; automobiles were stopped and penalized by smiling policemen holding signal disks, bearing lurid red crosses. Nobody complained. Everybody smiled and gave and gave again. He would, indeed, be a crabbed, sordid Philistine and cynic who did not respond to this appeal to the heart. If any one thinks that the world is still standing on the brink of savagery he has the Red Cross to reckon with. This war may be the most brutal war ever waged. The business of killing has been precise in its science; but there has never been a war before in which Christian sympathy has so been touched to the quick by the agony of our brothers and sisters throughout the world.

We must not be complacent. God knows, we still love our possessions. Some of us have not given till the heart said stop. Some of us have merely given what we could comfortably spare. That is not, of course, Christian generosity. But let us not be censorious. Those who have not caught the spirit of this great outpouring of fellowship verily will have their reward. What they have hugged to their bosoms will be as heavy as the thirty pieces of silver. The heart of the majority is in the right place, and most of us when the appeal of compassion has been understood can be trusted to do our honorable part. Red Cross Week has brought to us here in America convincing evidence that all is not wrong with the world. But it also holds out eloquent promise of how some day, when industrialism shall direct its splendid brain power and imagination to paths of beneficence and brotherhood, some of the world's wrongs will be righted and the anguish of our common life ameliorated.

Our leaders of industry, the keen brain of capitalism, have been getting some of the thrill to be found in vocations of disinterested service. They have not found the experience dull. We prophesy that, after the war, they will not be willing to return to a complete absorption in the drab business of industrialism pure and simple. We shall have their co-operation, their enthusiasm for the solving of the tangled problems of social reconstruction. Some day, who knows, we may see men like Mr. Davison and his associates organizing a drive to clean up our city slums, to wipe out tuberculosis and to put an end to unemployment. It can be done. Here, too, may be found ample room for the exercise of power. Beneficent America has not yet turned her inventive energy to these honorable tasks. The Red Cross drive has shown us how such things may be done.

The Question of Hate

WHEN we ask the question whether a Christian should hate we find ourselves at once knee-deep in troublesome definitions.

Anyone standing on Fifth Avenue in New York in front of the large window where have been displayed for some weeks the cartoons of German atrocities in Belgium and France finds himself the victim of a strange feeling. Something happens to the muscles of his jaw; his finger-tips tingle and his fists involuntarily clench. An awful desire to take somebody by the throat grips his whole being. And the worst, or best, of it is, he is not ashamed of what he feels. He is so violently persuaded that it is the only way for a Christian to feel that he is almost ready to turn upon any fellow-gazer who remains calm and unmoved by the spectacle. Hate may not be the noun to describe accurately what he feels at that moment towards the men who perpetrated these horrible deeds and towards those higher up who gave the order for shrecklichkeit; but, by whatever name the sensation may be called, he experiences no shame in sharing it and one of the most trustworthy instincts of his soul persuades him that there is nothing in the religion of his Master which would chide him for feeling precisely as he does feel. For a moment he finds himself fervently in sympathy with the Old Testament. Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate Thee? rings through his soul with moral assurance.

Unless we can be perfectly frank and real in dealing with the question of loving and hating our enemies we had better not mention the subject at all. Most of us in our Sunday mood have talked about how a Christian ought to feel towards his enemies in a way that has had rather a hollow ring. Hypocrisy is too rough a word to call the thing, but it serves the purpose.

A good many preachers of the Gospel feel that they are under contract to teach unconditionally that a Christian should love everybody. As a matter of fact he knows that he doesn't and he also knows that he doesn't intend to do so; but he isn't quite persuaded whether his resolute intention is due to the outcroppings of the old Adam or is a perfectly respectable virtue. It might make some of our teaching on this subject a bit more real to the listeners if the preacher made a personal confession. He need not use the word hate with all its controversial implications to describe what is going on in his soul when he reads about the Kaiser standing on a hilltop in Flanders thrilled by the spectacle of battling legions; but he can confess that his fists feel a yearning towards the Kaiser's person; he really wants to do him physical damage; he would if he could put an end once and for all to the whole Potsdam coterie, and he would like to do it personally and with violence.

Wouldn't it clear the air a bit of hypocrisy to make such a frank confession? In the first place it would be an honest statement or description of a state of mind that people who call themselves Christian share and, except when they are posing, share unblushingly.

We are open to persuasion by those who think differently, but we think that this type of indignation is thoroughly Christian. There are a dozen different kinds of hate, but this is not hate. It is one of the most salutary instincts that the race possesses. It is an instinct which God gave us whereby to conserve the moral values of infinite worth to the race. If, when a man confesses that he feels this indignation, some one intrudes the question of whether we are not bidden to love our enemies, the answer is "Why change the subject?" It isn't our enemies who disturb our peace of mind; it is God's enemies who incite us to anger.

It will be a loss to the cause of peace and international law if the present enemies of Prussia allow themselves lightly to pass over or forget Germany's manner of conducting war. We need not use the unhappy word revenge any more than we need employ the word hate; but it is our business to see to it, if the power is given to us to do so, that Germany is made to understand how her morals strike other people. In 1870 Prussia was brutal in her manner of conducting war, but we think that we are upon firm historical ground when we say that never before in Christian history has any nation conducted a war in so bestial, cruel, unchivalrous and morally petty a manner as has Germany done in the last four years. The brutal energy she has shown in inflicting pain upon the helpless, the resourcefulness in devising ways to be boorish, to bully and outrage the weak, is something quite new in the psychology of war.

What folly to talk about loving these people en masse! The majority of them deserve our pity—a pity that is akin to love. They are poor, helpless driven beasts. They have been bred for cannon fodder. They are driven into shambles by a force which they can no more resist than could poor Serbia or Belgium. They know not what they do. But there are people in Prussia who know precisely what they are doing. They are not doing it in passion either. It is a cold, calculating conspiracy. They have devised with scientific precision a machine of terror and destruction. Its purpose is satanic in its selfishness. We are not called upon by our religion to love these people. They are the enemies of God: they desecrate all the values which the sacrifice of the Christian ages have tried to conserve. No terms of peace can ever make these men our friends unless their souls are changed by conversion and repentance. If they continue to rule Germany, then it is our dearest hope that the power will be left to the allies to treat Germany as a pariah among the nations of the world.

This war is an utterly different war from any that has ever afflicted the world. The difference lies not in the magnitude of its armies or the number of the nations involved. It is unique in world experience because never before has any nation deliberately, in cold blood, proposed to seize the riches and the power of the world by whatever brutal or dishonorable means could compass the end. Wars heretofore have had their codes of honor, such as they were.

Pasteur, one of the gentlest Christian souls that has lived, wrote during the War of 1870: "Every one of my future works will bear on its title page the words 'Hatred to Prussia! Revenge! Revenge!'" His biographer in quoting those words added: "One of the most Christlike souls of our times, Henri Perreyve, speaking of Poland, of vanquished and oppressed nations, quoted Psalm cxxxvii and exclaimed: 'O Anger, man's Anger, how difficult it is to drive these out of man's heart! and how irresistible are the flames kindled by the insolence of injustice!'"

The atrocities of the War of 1870 called forth this terrible indignation. What if Pasteur had lived to know the Prussia that we know and to witness the scene which his beloved people have been made to look upon these last four years! Hate is not a word that a Christian will take lightly upon his lips. Unless held in check by a Christian compassion and self-control, it is likely to be very wasteful of nerves and morale.

It must not be forgotten that anger, even righteous anger, is a consuming fire. If it gets beyond control, it is likely to burn up what we can ill afford to lose. The withering sin of self-righteousness and a passionate exclusion of self-criticism are pretty certain to manifest themselves when we give free rein to our anger over others' misdoings.

German atrocities have done a twofold spiritual damage to the race. They have debased the German soul and they have so intensified the hatreds of war as to prevent any genuine humility and self-abasement among the nations who have suffered these atrocious evils at the hands of the enemy.

It is only in such a mood of humility that God can speak to us and show us His way of establishing the peace of the world.

Righteous anger can be one of the moral assets of civilization; but it can also inhibit the grace of God.

WE suggest to parents who are interested at this season in the problem of selecting a school for boys or girls that they read carefully the advertisements of such schools appearing in this number of The Churchman.

THE WEEK

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

Mr. Burleson and Mr. Hearst

MR. BURLESON was clever, forensically speaking, in linking Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Hearst together in his recent reply to charges of favoritism, but no one was convinced and a good many people were disgusted. America does not doubt Mr. Roosevelt's patriotism, though all of us may not like some of his methods. But Mr. Hearst has yet to perform some act of public service that will win him the confidence and respect of our citizens. Whether the communities which are barring the Hearst papers are within their legal rights we do not know. That such action is wise we are not sure, but we applaud the sentiment which makes decent communities wish to spew out of their mouths Mr. Hearst and all his sordid, tainted, degrading journalism. This type of journalism is one of the noxious diseases to which the body politic of a democracy is always liable. There is fertile field in America for its operation. But we can count upon the moral health of our people to ward off the infection.

Disquieting Data

IN his address to the convention, Bishop Harding of Washington stated upon the authority of the Secretary of the Interior that there are over 40,000 men in our training camps who cannot take the word of command in English and that there are 700,000 men of draft age in the United States who can neither read nor write in any language.

The war, certainly, is revealing some gigantic tasks to be performed in America if democracy is to be made intelligible to our fellow citizens. A good many agencies are at work upon plans for making Americans out of our foreign population. But it is a work of patriotism for which all of us should feel responsible. Rectors have a good deal upon their hands, but perhaps some of the tasks to which they are allotting time and thought might be postponed in the interest of this necessitous problem. Every church with a foreign population within its parish should see to it that something is being done to Americanize the people. The war has vividly revealed the danger of a non-American community within our borders.

Our City of Refuge

WE are in sympathy with Mr. Gilbert's criticism of Dr. Campbell's article "Our City of Refuge," but we would remind our correspondent that The Churchman is in no way committed to the opinions expressed in any of its special articles. Outside of the news columns and editorial comment, The Churchman is in a sense a public forum for the interchange of responsible opinion within the Church.

Dr. Campbell in the article in question in emphasizing the other-worldliness of the Gospel and of the Church might seem to counsel an indifferent attitude of detachment from world problems. Such a view would convert the idea of the Church into an invisible Kingdom or a monastery. Of course, Dr. Campbell holds no such theory. Our hope for a better world after the war lies in the other emphasis. Our faith in the absoluteness of Christ's lordship is going to find expression, we trust, in a new social and international ethic. By the Church claiming the world for itself, we shall transform our common life—our work, our play, our arts and culture—into a Christian civilization. If we hope to put an end to wars, industrial and international, the Catholic Church will have to become in fact the Body of Christ. There is no church in existence today that can lay claim to this high catholicity.

Summer Conferences

"A SUMMER conference in a war year?" This is a question that those responsible for Summer conferences are hearing frequently.

Never has there been a Summer when Church workers could more profitably employ a part of their vacations at a conference. The immediate necessity of war service has in some cases destroyed our balance and dimmed our perspective. The urgency of the usual parish duties has been exceeded by the greater urgency of war work. Bible classes, mission study classes, even Lenten services showed a considerable falling off last Winter.

At the same time a preoccupation with war work which sees no farther than the present obvious necessity produces a dryness of spirit that is not conducive to the best type of service. A quiet steadfastness that springs from roots struck deep into fundamental realities is the only antidote for war nerves, discouragement and impaired morale. Ten days at a conference spent in getting back to bottom rock; ten days of Christian fellowship; ten days of daily celebrations of the Holy Communion, and Sunset Services where our worship is the more natural for the natural setting of trees and open sky; ten days of quiet study of those things which make all the present unrest and agony so eminently worthwhile: this will help us to orientate our distracted selves and return to our place in the great battle infinitely better fitted for whatever work falls to our share.

Training the Laity

THERE are still many parishes unable to afford the expense of sending some one of their workers to a Summer conference because of the fact that in addition to the scholarship the fare for a long railroad journey has to be considered. Happily every year this situation is being bettered by the addition of one or two new conferences under diocesan or provincial auspices to the already large number of schools for Church workers. The Summer schools have grown out of the desire on the part of laity and clergy alike that parish workers should have at least a little training in the specialized work committed to them along the lines of education, missions and social service.

There has been a good deal of dissatisfaction with the muddling method of allowing eagerness for service to be the sole criterion in the choice of lay workers. There has been a growing eagerness to have the parish work done in the best way and by the best methods that the combined experience of many workers can devise. That is the meaning of the Educational Department of the Board of Missions and of the General Board of Religious Education. What the Summer conference offers is opportunity to learn about these methods, and to exchange ideas and suggestions. Of course it offers a great deal more, for it combines with the opportunities of a training school something of the inspiration of a retreat and the recreations of a holiday resort. On another page appears a typical account of what a Summer conference means to one of its younger members.

The value of an investment in conference scholarships for the lay workers is fully realized by many parishes. Some parishes send their rectors as well. Money thus spent brings wonderful returns. There are many people who, if the matter were but brought to their attention, would gladly subscribe to a parish scholarship fund.

The Scottish Church on Unity

OUR English correspondent has given our readers a slightly wrong angle on the address of the Moderator of the Church of Scotland made in the crypt of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, recently. Mr. Cairns seemed to see in the address merely a compliment to Episcopacy, not a challenge to the English Church. Dr. Cooper maintained the validity of the Presbyterian orders and could never for himself or for his Church consent to an arrangement which might be interpreted as implying the contrary. But he also believes that the united Church of the future must be episcopal in its government. He hoped that in four or five years the Church of Scotland and the United Free Church would be incorporated with one another. He looked beyond that to a united Church in which the Church of England (and therefore also the Episcopalian Church of Scotland) together with the Presbyterian bodies would be united without sacrifice of any essential principle. The Presbyterian bodies would maintain all the distinctive marks of their life from kirk sessions to General Assembly. They would retain their elders and hold fast to the rights, liberties, and privileges which they now enjoy; but they would accept the historical Episcopate, thereby uniting themselves with the Anglican communion and opening the way for union in a remoter future with Rome and with the East.

Remembering Our Dead

WE recall the vivid scene in one of Maeterlinck's plays where the old people who have passed unto Paradise are grieving because they have been forgotten by their dear ones on earth. We in America have been frequently reminded of our lack of respect for the dead. We are busy and life has absorbing interests. The farther one goes west in our country the more he will find the custom of attending the funeral of friends going into disuse. Only the most intimate friends feel that obligation of respect.

The Church with its doctrine of the Communion of Saints ought to prevent this contracting of our affections and gratitude. Anniversaries should find us in our churches, giving thanks to God "for the good example of all those thy servants who, having finished their course in faith, do now rest from their labors."

Life would not tend to coarsen, to grow hard and sordid, as it so often does, if we Christians would avail ourselves of some of the spare hours that we spend in church to say over to God our gratitude to the dead.

Modern Romance

THE Jews have re-entered the Holy City after an exile of two thousand years. The Zionists' dream has been fulfilled; the Jewish Administrative Commission, headed by Dr. Weitzman, have taken over the work of redeeming Palestine. The Commission is composed exclusively of Jews with the exception of one official representative of the British Empire. Dr. Weitzman and his associates are officially recognized by the Entente.

How different is the fulfilment of prophecy from the forecasts we make is illustrated by the manner and method of this new entry into Palestine. It was not a crusade with banners flying and symbolic rites stirring the imagination. The twentieth century pilgrims came by rail, bringing with them as their retinue the latest implements of science, engineering, chemistry and agriculture. Be as romantic and visionary as he likes, the modern knight errant is bound to be a man of affairs.

Dying for Us

HERE are singularly touching words; they are from the pen of Professor Gilbert Murray. Has the idea behind them ever been expressed more finely:

"There is one thought that is always with me, as no doubt it is with us all—the thought that other men are dying for me, better men, younger, with more hope in their lives, many of them men whom I have taught and loved. . . . Some of you will be orthodox Christians, and will be familiar with the thought of one who loved you dying for you. I would like to say that now I seem to be familiar with the feeling that something innocent, something great, something that loves me, has died, and is dying for me daily."—Scottish Chronicle.

An English View of Mr. Wilson

WHATEVER may be the ultimate value of her military power, the present moral power of America is incalculable. More and more the President seems to take into his own hands this whole aspect of the war. More and more he stands out as the one man who is big, strong, spiritual. His latest message to the Russian people is a stinging rebuke to this country, whose whole attitude to the Revolution grows more and more deplorable and mischievous. Very seldom have we been so badly at our worst, or so lacked vision, and lost grip on final issues, and repudiated principles. And we know it. Not one of us dares to turn on the President, though he is taking a line in fundamental opposition to our own. His words smite us into an uneasy silence. The dumbness of our press is most significant. The President has shamed us.—The Commonwealth.

Reading for Relaxation

By THE VERY REV. GEORGE HODGES, D.D.

ALL good Churchmen who have enjoyed the hospitality of Anthony Trollope in the cathedral close of Barchester will remember how Archdeacon Grantley protected himself against the possible misjudgment of the lay mind. Hearing a knock at his study door, he immediately opened the top drawer of his desk, placed therein the novel which he had been reading, drew towards him the manuscript of the sermon upon which his visitor would probably expect to find him engaged, and having swiftly completed these prudent preparations said, "Come in!" Indeed, what parson is there of us all (these paragraphs are intended for clerical reading) who under such circumstances would not resort to some such white hypocrisy? It is our automatic obedience to the conscience in whose regulations we are trained. It is like the response of the retired veteran to the word "Attention!" The veteran, in the old story, is carrying home his domestic providings from the grocer's; up goes his head, down go his hands, and down go all the parcels. Besides, it would be tedious, and perhaps unconvincing, to explain to a parishioner that we were reading the novel as a study in human nature, in order to get a better understanding of the missionary society or of the vestry. The fact might be that we were reading the novel because we were tired and wanted a bit of rest and change; or simply for fun. Why not?

In the Summer these conventions do not so heavily oppress us. We may now read novels unashamed. We may freely indulge the catholic taste of the woman whom Dr. Hale so sympathetically appreciated, who sent to the public library for "a sermon book and another book." The time of the singing of birds has come—a happy exchange for the singing of even the best of choirs—our trunks are packed for our well-earned vacation, and in them along with a "sermon book" for edification is "another book" for the pure joy of relaxation. Or better, other books; other little books, like the "other little ships" which set sail along with the Master and the apostles on the Sea of Galilee.

Happy is the person who is as yet unacquainted with Barchester, for he has a great pleasure in store for him. Even to remember or reread Trollope's cathedral novels is a delight, but to enter for the first time into these quiet pages, and to make friends with these real people, is the exceeding great reward of those who have taken their privileges leisurely, and have left some good things until now. I would not commend these novels to a reader who specializes in detective stories, but in these days of strain and anxiety, when busy people take a brief vacation to get away from this troubled world, that they may presently return to it with renewed faith and strength, detective stories are too much like the parties of the Summer in which society people seek (in vain) to rest up for the parties of the Winter. To begin with The Warden, and continue with Barchester Towers, and read on through Dr. Thorne and Framley Parsonage to the Last Chronicle of Barset, is to refresh one's spirit with the blessings of peace. The volumes of this series are included in Everyman's Library, and are thus within the permissions of our strait economies.

Archibald Marshall has written books which seem to some readers to be like Trollope's stories, though with a difference, I think, and at a distance. His latest novels, Abington Abbey and The Graftons, have for one of their characters a clergyman of such a disagreeable (though perfectly respectable) sort that all the parsons who are of that kind ought to read the books to find out what they look like. Most of Marshall's novels are pleasant and intimate and worth while; except Upsidonia, which proceeds upon the entirely mistaken theory that because it is a rather amusing thing to stand on one's head for ten seconds, it must be much more amusing to stand on one's head for ten weeks. As the title indicates, the people of this book stand on their heads from the first chapter to the last.

I once asked Canon Hannay why he chose "George A. Birmingham" as his pen name, and he said that it was because there are as many people named Birmingham in the part of Ireland which he describes as there are people named John Jones in Wales. Under this locally common name the author has written a number of novels about a community of deliciously uncommon people. There never was on sea or land such a doctor as the hero of General John Regan, or such a parson as the hero of The Major's Niece. These books are pure fun. They are frankly and skilfully and triumphantly amusing. There is also Spanish Gold, which is perhaps the best of the three; and Lalage's Lovers. The weary and depressed cleric who puts these books in his kit and spends his holiday in Canon Hannay's Ireland will come back smiling.

The same beneficial results will follow the diligent reading of the Cape Cod stories of Joseph C. Lincoln. The plots of these tales are for the most part subordinate to the people about whom the tales are told. The reader does not much care what they do so long as they talk. Their conversation is an unfailingly varied discussion of human nature. The interlocutors are most of them old sea captains, American cousins of the tarry skippers with whom W. W. Jacobs makes us so familiarly and pleasantly acquainted. The titles of the books do not greatly matter. The hurried or bewildered parson who wishes simply to get away for two weeks from the world in general, and his parish in particular, and still more from himself, will say to the clerk in the bookstore, "Give me three of Jacobs' novels and three of Lincoln's. I don't care which." Unless he is a well-read person, and is acquainted with these classics, in which case he needs no help from me. If no works of these authors are in stock, the reader may fall back on O. Henry. But I am not trying to give a complete list of the literature of innocent amusement.

Having thus brushed away the cobwebs of discouragement or perplexity or fatigue, the sun of the new heavens will shine with an illuminating light on the pages of somebody's life and letters. Stopford Brooke's, for example. He makes a good transition from the "other book" to the "sermon book" because he was a man of letters who was incidentally (and temporarily) a clergyman. He was always an interesting person, full of ideas which he expressed in picturesque phrases in his letters. Thus he said of the decadent poets that he did not anticipate for them any very deep damnation in the world to come, but he hoped that they would be soundly spanked into life by the Four Winds of the Spirit. This is a detail of celestial discipline which presents a mighty pleasant picture to the Christian imagination.

Very curious are Brooke's criticisms of the Church of England as he approached the time of his departure from it. "I asked myself again and again, 'Is the position tenable? Can we long go on as a community asserting that we subscribe to Articles and Formularies, or rather to the general body of doctrine contained in them, while it is plain that the Evangelical subscribes in one sense, the Ritualist in one totally different, and the Broad Churchman in another as different from both as they are from one another?' . . . Never before in history did there exist a religious community purporting to be at one which had practically no dogmatic basis at all. For this is what it comes to. We agree to act and live together, each of us holding contradictory schemes of doctrine, on a basis of mutual tolerance, and owning union in one thing alone, obedience to the spirit of Christ." To most liberals that which Brooke counted a fault is a shining virtue. It is in this that the Church of England is a church and not a sect. Not only that, but in this the Church is a demonstration of the possibility of a Christian community, and of the way in which it may be accomplished: not on a dogmatic basis, but on a fraternal recognition of the inevitable fact of difference, and in obedience to the spirit of Christ.

Or if not the biography of Stopford Brooke, which is in two volumes and expensive, and which anyway might annoy rather than amuse the conservative mind, then the biography of John Richardson Illingworth. This is one of the quietest of all quiet books, being the account of an Oxford scholar in a parish so rural and secluded that moss and ivy and even small trees grew in the west end of the church. It tells how he ministered to his simple people; how he lectured on philosophy at the university on week days, and preached plain sermons to peasants on Sundays; how he wrote letters of counsel and comfort and books of theology; how a group of famous friends came every year to spend with him a week-end of quiet days; and how he lived his gentle, high-minded (and absent-minded), modest and useful life. The pages are in tune with the wind in the trees, and blend with the shining of the sun across the ripples of little rivers.

As for the "sermon book," perhaps the best thing this year for a parson's summer reading is The Church in the Furnace. It should be read not in the beginning of the vacation, but towards the end, when the rector is thinking again about his work, and is making his plan of campaign, and is considering how he may do better than he did before. For this is a book of criticism and complaint. Seventeen loyal and devoted English chaplains make each his own individual report as to the kind of religion which the men in the army have brought from the parish to the front. Seventeen army officers might in like manner have reported upon the results of the English training camps. The purpose and function of the Church being to prepare men to live a godly and a Christian life, it is now possible under the conditions of mobilization to see how well or ill this religious business is actually done. The chaplains agree that it is done very badly. They are dismayed to find on examination that men who were baptized in the Church and taught in Sunday School, and some of whom have heard a thousand sermons, are pitifully and tragically ignorant of the fundamental matters of the Christian faith, and are quite unaware of any vital relation between the Christian religion and their own life. The chaplains report this situation to our excellent and pious mother, the Church, with domestic plainness of speech. They are mightily concerned about it. They hope that as a result of the disclosures of the war, no future generation of English clergy shall be so ill-trained as those who are now in Holy Orders, and that the Church shall no longer minister so inadequately to the needs of the men.

The reader will consider his own sermons and his own services. What are they actually accomplishing? What, indeed, does he definitely intend them to accomplish in the lives of his people? What, then, shall he do in the new year of work that he may be a better teacher as well as a better preacher, and that he may help to bring a new sense of the presence of God into the prayers and praises of his people? The book is positive and constructive as well as critical, and suggests answers to these questions.

Reflections of an Abandoned Farmer

By THE REV. WILLIAM AUSTIN SMITH

SINCE first reading Horace's charming odes upon salads, I have been a devotee of country life. That was in my youth while I still lived in the city. Since then I have raised salads for the market and have tried to make lettuce and cucumbers pay. I have eaten the tender, succulent things under my own vine and fig tree, but not in that singleness of mind projected by the ancient poets.

In those days a salad was a spiritual thing. It was compounded of Etrurian zephyrs and cooling dews—Hybla bees for neighbors. It was chastely guarded by peaceful peasants and was the special care of tender goddesses.

It was not until I took over the raising of salads for profit that I became aware of a lack in the realism of Horace. Not a word had the poet said about grubs and blight and "hired help."

Farming as a pursuit of idealism is not an affair of broad acres. It is a state of mind. The happiest farm in the world, and I venture to say the most successful, may be had in any city apartment on a Winter's night before a blazing log and a shelf of books on "Apple Raising," "How to Make Hens Pay" and "Where to Grow Alfalfa." Here the weary business man may stake out a claim and get close to the soil. No capital is required and no experience. In these matters experience is likely to breed a cynicism which will defeat the simple happiness of fireside farming.

The luxury of this spiritual type of agriculture is that it is free from all sordid and clogging detail. We are not making a business of it. We had made a business of other things and found them spiritually wanting. In the city we were growing peevish and anxious over trifles. It was the heart's thirst for space and detachment that set our faces towards the country. So at the end of our nervous day, we took sanctuary from our disquietude in "Waugh on Apples" and "Farm Management." After perusing the pile of monthly bills, there was refreshment in the phrase, "raising what we eat." What delicious cool we found beneath those spreading oaks in imaginary door-yards as loyal yeomen came bringing in the sheaves.

Then one day we made our venture of faith. We exchanged the fireside farm for a thing of acres. We beat our city comforts into pruning hooks and ploughshares.

Life at Newport, at the height of the season, is bovine simplicity in comparison with the life of a farmer. I mean the farmer who goes in for peace of mind as a crop. However by skill or chance we may make the farm pay, it is a dismal failure if it disappoint our dream of the simple life. We had wiped the city dust from our feet in search for higher satisfactions. Were the farm to fail us in this regard, our last estate would be worse than the first; for we should stand as one wounded in the house of his friends.

Herein, so often, lies the tragedy of farming when entered upon as a spiritual venture. People, nowadays, take the farm in much the same mood as, in more troubled times, men took to the monastery. Farming to such is more than a hobby; it is a religion; for it symbolizes the protest of the soul against bondage to "things."

It was at a Spring exhibition of the Salon that I first became interested in apple-raising. Frieseke's apple blossoms set me on the quest of orchards. Think of raising as the business of life a crop of this ethereal, tantalizing beauty! Little did I then know of the horrid possibilities of an apple blossom.

An orchard in spring was once to me a holy thing. I sought the poets for wealth of words to spell the joy of that swaying mass of loveliness. That was before scab and aphis, blight and lice had been added to my daily vocabulary. Now, the coming of that holy hour when acres of swaying blossoms kiss one another in the breeze heralds the approach of the most anxious season of the year. It is a summons to be up and doing. Spray nozzles must be hurried out of their cob-webbed seclusion. Great tanks of lime-sulphur are rolled across the lawn and begoggled farm-hands bear down upon those heavenly fields. In the interval from the first fugitive suggestion of pink till the last petal is sent shivering on the wind these tender buds must four times be drenched in noxious fumes.

I recall the shock with which I first read the pomologist's "Orchard Calendar." With what Teutonic thoroughness these slaves to fact had desecrated my calendar of the good old days of fireside farming! It used to run thus:

Last of April, boughs take on a delicate green.
May first, leaves full blown.
May seventh, first pink of apple blossoms.
Middle of May, orchard like heaven.
Two weeks later, blossoms fall.

I have long since laid aside this romantic calendar and one published in Amherst now stands, menacing me, on my desk:

Early Spring as buds are breaking, spray for scale, aphis and fungus diseases.

Just before blossoms open, spray for moth, aphis and scab.

Within a week after petals fall, spray for everything.

Four weeks later, spray for moth, worm, scab and lice.

Where once we talked about rare June days, now, quite naturally, we speak of good spraying days. Anxiety over spray materials and "hired help" have read a new meaning into Frieseke's apple blossoms. I have eaten of the tree of knowledge.

The most serious handicap of genuine farming, as compared with fireside agriculture, is that the former does not permit the enjoyment of weather for its own sake. Climate is always a secondary good or evil. The hay is spoiling because of the rain or the corn is going to be ruined on account of the drought. Rain or shine, something is bound to suffer. Oh, for the good old days when sunshine and rain and wind were just "weather!"

In one profitable respect my farming was a success. There was a plentiful crop of earnest reflections. Morally, it was worth the experiment.

Until embarking upon agriculture, I had thought that I understood the implications of the Christian teaching concerning "detachment from things." Any properly ordained minister is supposed to have mastered the technique of this elementary doctrine of our religion. Not until I moved into the country did I see that I had been skimming only the surface of the great truth. Herein is the mystery of the so-called "simple Gospel teaching." It takes either a saint or a sinner to measure its sweeping implications. Not being a saint, I was compelled to earn my understanding otherwise. It came to me by way of apple raising.

When I found that I was losing my zest for apple blossoms, I knew that all was not right within me; so I fell to overhauling the precepts of my religion. Like most people, I had fondly supposed that the battle for detachment and simplicity is less keen in the country than in the "busy marts of trade." Sherry's, to a superficial observer, looks more worldly than a farm in Vermont at the height of the haying season. Pretty books sometimes write as if scenery can make moral muscle. Give our bodies an open sky and our souls some breathing space and all will be well within us. Closeness to the soil should change a race of anxious Marthas into Millet peasants.

Then suddenly the truth came to me. It was on one of those rare spraying days when I found myself upset by spray materials, and the indolence of farm help. "Things" were getting on my nerves. Not the same things, to be sure, which I had often moralized over and had tried to move away from. This time it was grubs and blight, bad weather and inefficient help. Different things, to be sure, but "things" nevertheless.

Could it be then that detachement, after all, is wholly a problem of the will and that the battle is as hard in one place as another? Heretofore, like most parsons, I had been interpreting the menace of "things" to mean vulgar things, which I had not particularly cared for—the plush and baubles of life for which silly people barter away their peace of mind. It had not occurred to me that a man may lose his soul quite as effectually among beautiful things as among the sordid and vulgar. Beautiful surroundings do not reduce the moral risk so materially as some sociologists suppose. St. Augustine, who was a pretty shrewd observer of human nature, expressed a doubt whether many clergymen could get into heaven. A rough assault that upon the environment argument!

Sunsets and ripening grain and hay-cocks in an orchard are truly beautiful to beautiful souls, but they can no more save a man's soul than can sky-scrapers and elevated railways kill the spirit. A grub can be as mind-disturbing as the buzz of factory wheels and city smoke. What is more beautiful than a garden of perennials? But how one can worry, if one chooses, over hollyhocks and iris!

The awful sin, wherever we live, is to let "things" spoil our apple blossoms for us. That is just what is happening every day to people who have fled to the country as well as to city dwellers. We can blast the most beautiful gifts of God by a wrong attitude. We are continually turning the rarest bits of heaven into "things."

Take the joy of parenthood. How we can waste its precious hours, now that child-life is something to be studied, by regarding our children as objects with careers, prospects and capacities, to be worried over, instead of blessings to love and enjoy! We have seen parents and teachers puckering their brows over backward children as if stupidity were a crime. What a pity to make ourselves and our children unhappy because they happen to be dull! They cannot help it, poor dears, and neither can we. And, after all, what a stupid world this would be if all the people in it were clever. Our nursery orchards are getting to be all spray and preventives. Why not keep the apple blossoms?

Herein, too, is the weakness of organized religion. People get to fussing over it instead of enjoying it, as they should. I have often wondered whether it was not a grave mistake ever to have organized so sensitive a thing as religion. It was necessary, of course, but we must pay the penalty of continually seeing it reduced to the status of "things."

I fear that most of our churches are not keeping the scent of blossoms as effectually as they might. No sooner are we happy over our religion than along comes somebody with a passion for bigness and building, and away goes the scent of Spring. Just as we settle down to enjoy our church-going, there bears down upon the parish the secretary of one of the many "religious movements." He demands to see our Christian evidences. Are we 100 per cent. efficient? Of course we are not and we are forthwith made to feel ashamed of our lack.

The serenity of the religious life of our town was spoiled for a whole year by our weakly yielding to a "house to house canvass" campaign. A secretary swooped down upon us demanding that we be up and doing. The air was sulphurous with statistics, programs and men's dinners. Secretaries of organizations whose business it is to "promote" Christianity are a terrible menace to apple blossoms.

I like to remember that St. Francis always kept the scent of flowers about his religion. That is why we love him.

"I NEVER found any so religious and devout that he had not sometimes a withdrawing of grace. There was never saint so highly rapt and illuminated who, before or after, was not tempted. For he is not worthy of the high contemplation of God who has not been troubled with some tribulations for God's sake."

Wild Apples

By CONSTANCE D'ARCY MACKAY

SUMMER grasses made this basket
That the Autumn apples fill.
Wild the grasses, wild the apples
I have gathered on the hill.

All the guerdon of the garden
Does not seem as sweet to me
As the things that I find growing Wild and free.

And God Saw That It Was Good

By ELIZABETH CRANSTOUN

GERVASE, the monk, had lived a faithful, laborious life. He had always been obedient to the Rule of his order, reverent in his devotions, diligent in his work, but as he grew older a shadow seemed to fall on his soul. When he had borne this trial patiently for some time he told his confessor about it and asked: "Why is it, my father, that I am so bereft of joy? I have seen many of God's servants growing old and their faces shone with inward peace and sweet content, but each year I feel more depressed and dreary. What is wrong with me?"

His confessor, who was also his life-long friend, said: "I cannot answer that question, Gervase. I have seen for years the faithfulness and fervor of your devotions. I have watched your unremitting toil over the beautiful manuscripts that have made our monastery famous. I have heard from your lips the secrets of your inner struggles, yet I do not know why it is that you walk with downcast eyes, and that you rarely smile and often sigh. It has not been revealed to me. But, my son, there is One who knows: you must ask Him."

So that night Gervase, kneeling in his cell, asked God to show him why there was no holy joy to lighten the evening of his life. When he had prayed, he laid him down to rest and, falling into a deep sleep, he dreamed that the hour of his death had come. A mighty angel lifted him in his strong arms and bore him upwards through the clouds, through the azure spaces, through the tremulous ether, higher and higher, till they reached the courts of Heaven. Then Gervase found himself standing before the great white throne, and God said to him: "Gervase, my child, what dost thou think of my beautiful world?" The monk tried to remember what he had thought of God's beautiful world, and was silent. But when God asks the soul a question He will always help it to answer honestly, so at length Gervase said: "I have never thought about it at all, dear Lord. I never even noticed it."

Long before the convent bell tolled for Prime, Gervase awoke and went out into the garden, so eager was he now to see God's beautiful world. He climbed a hillock and watched the pageant of sunrise. When the clouds broke up in the valley below him the shadows in the heart of Gervase melted away too, and when the mountain peaks were touched with rosy light Gervase trembled with tender happiness. He came in from the garden just as the office began. There was something in his face which the other monks had never seen before; they looked at each other in questioning astonishment. Later when they came out of the refectory, Gervase, instead of going to his cell to work, sought out the abbot and asked permission to leave the convent for the day. This was the first time he had ever asked for a holiday or been willing to take it when it was offered, and the request was gladly granted. Gervase spent his holiday in the forest looking at his Heavenly Father's beautiful world. Oh, the wonder of it! The turquoise sky seen through the tracery of green boughs, the deeper blue between the tops of tall pines, the velvet carpet of moss, the limpid rivulet with its refreshing music, the songs of birds, the whisper and rustle of the forest breezes, the patches of sunlight in the open glades, the soft, cool banks of ferns, the woodland flowers, all these found their way through wondering eyes and ears into an adoring heart. When Gervase knelt in his cell that night he answered God's question again, and this time he said: "Lord, I have seen thy beautiful world, and I find it worthy of thee."

From being a sad-hearted monk Gervase became a radiant witness of the joy he had found in the works of God. The holiness of beauty found its way into his prayers so that they became hymns of praise, and the beauty of holiness inspired his work so that his manuscripts became gems of art. One day the monastery received an order from the Queen, Anne of Brittany, to illuminate for her own use a breviary. The task was without hesitation given to Gervase, and to this day we may see the exquisite flowers, the delicate grasses, the butterflies and bees and tiny insects with which his wonderful margins and initial letters are adorned.

Might we not think of the story of Gervase as we go forth into God's beautiful world this summer? A single day in the fields or woods or by the sea might be a foretaste of Heaven if we saw in the sweeping outlines and vivid coloring, in the wonderful contrivances and adaptations of nature the love and the wisdom of God. And even those of us who must stay in town need not be without our glimpse of God's beautiful world. Anyone who tries can find a place from which to view the sunrise, that marvelous symbol of the Resurrection. The Heavens declaring the glory of God belong to us all, the great river flows by us, the stars shine above us, and there are breathing places where we can all walk under the trees and hear the chirping of birds. Let us, therefore, consider the work of His hands that we may have an answer to give Him should he ask us what we think of His beautiful world.

What a Summer Conference Means

By ROSAMOND LOTHROP BIGELOW

SOMEONE has said very truly that "ordinary things can be said—but extraordinary things can only be spoken haltingly." That is how one feels when one tries to express what the Cambridge Conference means to one.

One of the very first things one thinks of is the delight and interest of seeing old friends and meeting and discovering new ones. One can start right in on the real things here—and not waste time over trivial externals as one so often does.

And then—the joy of coming out from parochial and diocesan limits into the whole! How our own difficulties shrink when we hear others tell of similar difficulties met and overcome! For Cambridge does take one right out of one's own little personal problem—and at the same time it sends one back to that same old problem with new light and a determination to work it out and come through on the other side. Many of us can't go to the General Convention and know that wonderful feeling of the whole—many individuals and groups making up one great whole. Perhaps we can't have that unforgettable experience—but here in a lesser degree that feeling, with its strength and vision, may be ours.

With what glad thanksgiving do we remember these days. For some of us it may be our first experience of a daily Eucharist—that real beginning of our day. And we remember how our Lord was waiting early one morning for His disciples, after the night of their own fruitless striving, how He met them by the shore of the lake, and at that time especially bade one of them "Feed My Sheep," "Follow thou Me." We remember too that then in that early morning hour the disciples "knew that it was the Lord."

There are our classes and lectures, where again we come together, not as individuals, but in groups united in one common aim. The representativeness of these classes, with their members coming from many places, and so bringing varying points of view is the biggest sort of help and value. Each of us looks forward to going back to our work, of whatever sort it may be, with new courage and hope.

Sunset Service, lectures, compline—these are more things to remember to be thankful for. Truly, we have been given much. The daily Communion, the companionship and fellowship; classes and lectures with all the strength and inspiration that they bring; the wonderful corporate feeling that God the Holy Ghost is working in us and empowering us, the clearer call to love and service; a fresh revealing of God's purpose; these are perhaps the outstanding experiences that we bring away.

Dispensing Fresh Air and Fun

By THE REV. GUY EMERY SHIPLER

WE were sitting in the city room of The Boston Traveler one afternoon some years ago, twirling the thumbs of our brains, and wishing some real story would "break." It was late Spring and the annual period of Summer monotony in the newspaper world was rapidly settling over the office. Already I had covered several Summer assignments. I had reported the Harvard-Yale tennis tournament; I had interviewed the hobos, the Spring flowers and the birds on the Boston Common; I had dug a story out of the weather bureau, assuring the people of the Hub that Summer would no doubt arrive on schedule time! I had had the thrilling experience of following overfed golf players around the course at the Brookline Country Club. And I knew that, like most reporters on a newspaper in Summer, I was a liability rather than an asset. Doubtless the city editor sat up nights trying to think out assignments to employ my time.

The door opened and the managing editor came in. (He was, by the way, Marlen E. Pew, who has just been made the personal press representative of Secretary Baker.)

"How would you like to take charge of the Outing Department this Summer?" he asked me.

And so it happened that for that Summer, and the two Summers following, I had the most interesting experience which has fallen to my lot—the experience of mingling with some thousands of kiddies from the tenements, and watching their joy as they went from hot pavements and dark rooms of the city to open fields or to the sea; of seeing pale faces go and brown faces come back.

The Outing Department of the Traveler was, at that time, one of the great fresh air works of the country. Each Summer thousands of tenement children—many of whom had never seen the ocean, never played in the sand, never romped in a field—went either for a day excursion to Shore Haven Cottage at the beach, or for two weeks to one of our three camps in the hills of Eastern Massachusetts. All day long through the Summer the office was a mecca for hundreds of youngsters. One after the other dirty little faces would show above the top of my desk, and a voice would plead: "Say, mister, can I go to the country?" Every name was carefully recorded on an application blank, and our investigator sooner or later looked up the home conditions of each child. Thousands of dollars were contributed by the citizens of Boston each Summer for the work.

During the course of that first year I became curious as to the origin of fresh air work. I had known something of the many agencies which were doing the same sort of thing we were doing. The New York Tribune, Life, The Chicago News and many other publications had their fresh air work. Many other kinds of institutions, not only in America, but throughout the world, were sending children and mothers to the country for Summer outings.

So it came about that I discovered, what I no doubt should have known before, that the first fresh air work in the world was organized by Dr. Muhlenberg, Rector of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York, to whose original ideas of being kind the world and the Church owe so much.

From 1848 to 1852 the cholera was sweeping over the United States. In the congested districts around the Church of the Holy Communion Dr. Muhlenberg and the sisters working with him were devoting themselves to the care of the sick and the relief of their families. It was in the Summer of 1849 that Dr. Muhlenberg conceived the idea of sending as many women and children as possible away from their insanitary tenement homes in the city to the fresh air and open fields of the country. Day excursions were organized, all provisions were provided, and, whenever necessary, a sister conducted the party on its outing.

This method was followed, with an ever-enlarging field, each Summer until 1882, when the parish received an estate of seventy acres of land on which stood a spacious dwellinghouse. This was less than twenty-five miles from the city. A new phase of fresh air work began with this gift. Women and children were taken to the country for periods of a week or a fortnight, and, where necessity required, they were kept for longer periods. Subsequently the house was doubled in size, and three more were added, so that now it is possible to care for 300 mothers and children at one time.

The New York Times was the first newspaper to inaugurate a similar fresh air work, which it did in 1872. Other papers in various parts of the country followed its example. In 1876 the first European fresh air work was begun in Switzerland, to be followed shortly by similar work in many other countries. So today, as a result of Dr. Muhlenberg's inspired action, millions of poor children each Summer go from tenement to country, and pallid cheeks grow red, while child hearts are made happy. Fresh air societies and other organizations in the United States alone send well over one million children each Summer to the country or the shore.

I have on my desk a worn scrap-book, on the pages of which are pasted many of the stories I wrote for the columns of the Traveler about the children who became our friends in those three Summers. On the fly-leaf is written: "Dedicated to those thousands of kiddies who loved the sun and the sea and the flowers, and who were the incarnation of joy." As I turn its pages, how vividly I see in my memory the faces of those youngsters who stood out from the crowd clearly enough to have their stories told in our columns! From among those records I am going to reproduce here, just as I wrote it for the Traveler, the story of Little Pat, as he was always known in the office:

Longing

In the first days of the hot weather, when the pavements were beginning to give back the heat from the broiling sun, and dark tenement rooms seemed to grow darker, Little Pat came in. He stood with his bare toes twisting restlessly, and asked if he might go to the country.

There was no place for him then. It didn't seem quite just to send Pat, sturdy in spite of the years in the tenements, when there were hundreds of others in whose cheeks no color lay under the dirt. So we told Pat he'd have to wait until things settled down, when perhaps he might go. It was hard to turn him away, for there was longing in his eyes.

He went back to the hot pavements, and the riot of trucks and cars in the day, and the sweating closeness of the little rooms at night. But he didn't stay.

When the next crowd of boys were gathered at the South Station, waiting for the train to camp, Little Pat's face was suddenly projected into the picture. He had thought it over and decided that he would go to the station and take a chance. So he was there, his clothes tied up in a blue bandana handkerchief that dangled from a stick.

When the attendant told him there was no place, he slunk off through the crowds of the station, his hands deep in his pockets, his head down on his chest, his heart aching, back to the hot pavements.

But nothing daunted his determination to go. Through the days in the street, and through the long, stifling nights, Little Pat dreamed of the country. The next time a party left for the camp, he was there with his bundle neatly tied up in the blue handkerchief. Of the attendants he begged the high privilege—but there was no place. And so, week by week, he went and came again.

But finally Little Pat's patience was gone. He made up his mind that he would go to the country. He had thought it all out.

As the last train for camp this year pulled slowly from the semi-darkness of the station, a little figure started to crawl up the steps of a car. From his one suspender hung a bundle in a blue handkerchief.

But there were no accommodations at camp for an extra boy, and they put Pat off the train.

It was close to sunset of the following day and the boys in camp were gathered before the big tent on the hillside for the evening stories, when far off across the meadows a figure moved against the Western sky, silhouetted a moment on top of a stone wall, before it jumped to the ground. Slowly it came on toward the camp, evolving into a boy, from whose shoulder swung a blue bandana bundle at the end of a stick. Over the tenement grime was layer upon layer of dust, through which the perspiration had woven fantastic patterns. It is twenty-four miles from South Boston to the Traveler camp, but Pat had walked it through the hot sun of a long, long day. Wearily he dropped into the circle on the ground, and sat looking off to where the sun was slipping behind the hills, a red ball of fire.

"Say—dis is a swell place—ain't it? Wot makes de sun red like dat—hey?"

Then Little Pat dropped over on his back and closed his eyes. "Swell," he sighed.

They let him stay.

The Story of the American Guard

By A MEMBER OF THE STAFF

"EVERY well-informed person knows that military training develops a boy physically as nothing else will. Give him an opportunity to receive training, and you will see him stand erect, head up and chest out. He will show you that he knows how to walk, and he will have manly bearing, a fine lung development, hardened muscles. He will be alert and responsive. He will show that he has been taught obedience to authority and respect for the rights of others. He will indicate the possession of courtesy and good breeding. All in all he will show that he has been taught how to take care of himself physically and grow into strong manhood."

After reading those words, no one will question the good fortune of America's largest military organization for boys in having as its president Brevet Major General George R. Dyer. They express his conception of the value of military training for the youth of the United States.

General Dyer is in command of all the home defense units and auxiliary bodies in New York State. And besides holding this important position he is the enthusiastic head of the American Guard, the boys' organization referred to above. Among his supporters in this latter work are some of the best-known military men in the country, including Major General Leonard Wood, Colonel William G. Bates and Lieutenant Colonel Sidney Grant.

The American Guard is of peculiar interest to members of the Episcopal Church, not only because a large percentage of its battalions are found in various parishes throughout thirty-three States, but because the Guard was organized by a well-known Churchman, the late Captain Andrew C. Zabriskie. Realizing that at some time in the not distant future the United States would doubtless be placed on a universal military training basis, and because of his natural interest in the welfare of boys, Captain Zabriskie organized what was then known as the Junior American Guard, to be composed of boys who would volunteer to fit themselves to fight for their country when called upon.

In a period of three years well over 13,000 boys, scattered through thirty-three States, have joined the Guard. In Greater New York alone there are at the present time over 5,000 members.

The organization is non-sectarian in character, with national headquarters at 70 Wall Street, New York City. It is open to all American boys, irrespective of their social or financial circumstances. There are no dues paid to headquarters, as the organization is supported by contributions from public-spirited citizens. Instruction, under trained military leaders, includes military drill, first aid, signaling by flag, telegraph and wireless, aviation, personal hygiene, sanitation, marching, and establishing and maintaining Summer camps. These camps are organized on a military basis.

The question naturally arises: In what way does the American Guard differ from the Boy Scout movement? As a matter of fact, the difference is fundamental. No compromise is made with the informal methods of boy scouting; the Guard is established to prove the efficiency of a boy organization trained by experienced soldiers, as against the social activities of non-military and merely patriotic boy organizations. Its experience has amply proved that real military training, as strict as that given a regular in the United States Army, can be applied to boys at an age when they are able to handle a sub-calibre rifle.

Anyone who may doubt the possibility of fulfilling the rosy promises of those men who are enthusiastic about the Guard should see the boys on parade. On various occasions they have turned out in their home cities, and, to the amazement of the town folk, have touched a high-water mark in military appearance. In New York City several thousand members of the American Guard have paraded the streets, marshaled in companies and battalions, and carrying sub-calibre rifles, and have received ovations from hundreds of thousands of people, many of whom had not supposed such results were possible. The lads have showed the effect of splendid military training and discipline, such as is achieved only under the direction of experienced military officers. The little army has exhibited its radio company at such times, equipped with complete wireless outfit; its signal corps and its nurses' corps.

On one occasion when the boys marched from Bowling Green up Broadway to City Hall in a recruiting drive, distributing 15,000 circulars informing boy spectators where they could go to enroll, the appeal was electrifying. Before the parade had marched half way to City Hall a mob of boys was climbing the wooden stairway of the old-fashioned building on Beaver Street, then the headquarters, clamoring that they wanted to join. Equipment and uniforms were provided, and in a brief hour the Quartermaster's Department was entirely cleaned out.

Membership in the Guard is open to boys between the ages of twelve and eighteen years, but the commissioned officers must be over eighteen years of age. Following the plans of Captain Zabriskie, this cadet organization is divided into companies and battalions, each company commanded by a captain, and each battalion by a major, as in the regular army. A company consists of forty boys, including officers, and the battalion numbers not less than three nor more than eight companies, with a major and staff. The smallest unit in the Guard is a squad, consisting of eight boys, one of whom is warranted as a corporal.

Any person of good character, twenty-one years of age, or over, can organize a company of the American Guard.

When the organizer, called the Commanding Officer, has secured a sufficient number of boys, he should write to the Adjutant General, American Guard, 70 Wall Street, New York City, for membership application blanks, etc. The boys will be required to fill out an application blank and have it signed by the parent or guardian. The Commanding Officer will be required to fill out an application for commission, giving him military rank, according to the number of boys under his command.

A Visit to Camp Lewis

By THE RT. REV. J. B. FUNSTEN, D.D.

AMONG all the cantonments there is probably not one whose situation is so unique as that of Camp Lewis. It is located about twenty miles away from Tacoma in a beautifully wooded country and with an unequaled climate. In my journey down from Tacoma I traversed a road which is one of the best samples of what is being done in highway building. The road took us away from the population of the great communities that border on Puget Sound. Indeed, this is one of the advantages of Camp Lewis, that its men are not subjected in such a large degree to the distracting influences and allurements of a great city. I understand that there are about 20,000 men in the camp and that there is the probability that before long provision will be made for 50,000. The local county government and business men and perhaps also the state have dedicated to the Government about 60,000 acres on condition that it is made a permanent military training ground. The buildings are of a more substantial character than is usual and it would seem to have every qualification to make it a very valuable and permanent part of our military establishment. The commanding general, General Green, is a man of distinguished ability and charming personality and it is a great pleasure to know that he is an earnest Christian and communicant of a Church.

When I arrived in Tacoma I was met by the Rev. Herman Page, Jr., who has been appointed chaplain by the General War Commission of our Church. Although the weather was threatening and in fact occasional showers were falling, I got in the Ford runabout which the Commission has put at the service of Mr. Page, and we started on our journey to the Camp. Mr. Page had to stop to take in a Canadian captain who was going down to speak at the meeting of all the religious workers which was to be held that morning. The captain proved a most interesting traveling companion and I was especially glad when I arrived at camp to be able to attend this meeting. It gave me an opportunity to note the personality represented in that especial department. I also heard an interesting address by a Y. M. C. A. secretary who had just come from the other side. One thing that impressed me about his address was his realization that the Y. M. C. A., excellent as was its work, could not under its present system do what it should in the spiritual field. He saw the need of earnest ministers who would administer the sacraments and emphasize the spiritual life as well as teach the simple truth of the Gospel. He felt that sensible earnest men ought to be sent by the various denominations to do this work, because a man without common sense would fail to accomplish what he is supposed to do. He felt that too often men got the idea of the Mohammedan that death in battle expiated all sin and they left out the thought of the necessity of repentance and the acceptance of the work of Christ.

The Canadian captain also gave a very stirring and humorous account of the religious work on the other side. He also emphasized the need of effective, earnest chaplains, and while all recognize the value of the work of the Y. M. C. A., I was impressed with the tone of warning lest this great organization degenerate into a mere provision for the temporal needs of the men in camp. There were a good many other speeches by the various religious workers of the camp, and more than one confessed the great difficulty of the work, especially in the matter of reaching the men individually, or of having an opportunity of having them assemble in large numbers for religious instruction.

One thing impressed me quite forcefully and that was the unity with which they worked and the apparent interest they took in having Good Friday and Easter services. They appointed a committee of which the Rev. Mr. Page was a member to prepare suitable arrangements. I was very glad to be able to call on General Green, the United States officer who is in command of the camp. He was exceedingly gracious and expressed himself as most interested in all that pertained to the welfare of his men. He spoke of the desirability of having some inter-denominational co-operation, especially among the leading Protestant bodies, that would give them a building in which they might have apartments for the clergy that worked in the camp and also a large spacious chapel to promote their special work, it having been found that the halls of the Y. M. C. A. were not always available. The general is a West Pointer, and bears upon his person and in his point of view the indication of the splendid training of that great institution on the Hudson.

I went with Mr. Page to the large building erected by the Y. W. C. A. as a hostess house and I realized what a need is being supplied by this excellent organization. In fact, I do not see how its work could be dispensed with in Camp Lewis, because it furnished the only place where anyone could have an opportunity of getting entertainment, even in the matter of getting food or meeting friends. I met a great many of my old acquaintances among the workers and was very much pleased with the general outlook both from the viewpoint of a citizen and religious worker. I must confess, however, that in the matter of religious work the thing that pleased me was rather the great opportunity presented to us of doing effective work than any sense of what had already been accomplished. The whole thing is so new and in such a fluid state that we must recognize that patience is one of the necessities of the situation. We must, however, not allow ourselves to be inert. Our chaplain, Mr. Page, is doing his work as well as anybody could and a great deal better than many would under his conditions. He has no equipment, he has to deal with uncertainties and has to stay in Tacoma, twenty miles away. The Roman Catholic priest told me they had six priests at work there, and after looking over the situation I am convinced that our proper equipment would be one experienced and older man and two younger men of whom Mr. Page should be one as we could get no one any better to accomplish what he is doing so admirably.

I had a talk with Bishops Keator and Page, as well as with the Rev. Dr. Shayler of St. Mark's, Seattle, and all of them realized that a work so vast and so important was beyond the financial power of our nearby diocese and missionary districts. We will have to look to the War Commission appointed by General Convention and representing the national Church to meet effectively the religious needs of Camp Lewis. I came away impressed with the fact that the Church here has one of its greatest opportunities and that to fail to meet it will mean a loss of mission and self-respect. This great war, terrible as it is, is one of those flood-like periods of breaking up of existing things and while it is on one side most destructive on the other it affords an opportunity of rebuilding on better and more spiritual lines our national and individual life, which we all recognize has become too materialistic. Let us be awake to our opportunity and let us meet our responsibility at Camp Lewis and every camp where there are thousands of young men who are about to go forth to give their lives, if necessary, to maintain the freedom of the world. Surely it would be a very narrow and worldly conception of freedom if we think only of political liberty and worldly comforts and forget to lead these young men to a vision of Him who came to bring that Truth which if a man accepts will make him free indeed.

Emerson said of Gibbon: "The man has no shrine; a man's most important possession."

Seeming Waste

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

THE war has revived much of the talk of a generation ago about the lavish cruelty and waste of Nature in regard to sentient life, especially human life. We

> Considering everywhere
> Her secret meaning in her deeds,
> And finding that of fifty seeds
> She often brings but one to bear, are less perplexed perhaps with these squandering potencies than with the tragedies that come later.

> And he shall be
> Man, her last work, who seem'd so fair,
> Such splendid purpose in his eyes,
> Who roll'd the psalm to wintry skies,
> Who built him fanes of fruitless prayer;
>
> Who trusted God was love indeed,
> And love Creation's final law—
> Tho' Nature, red in tooth and claw
> With ravine, shriek'd against his creed—
> Who loved, who suffer'd countless ills,
> Who battled for the True, the Just,
> Be blown about the desert dust,
> Or seal'd within the iron hills?

There is a painful appositeness in this mid-Victorian question to the appalling slaughter taking place daily on the battlefields of Europe. No wonder that tortured minds and hearts are everywhere asking: To what purpose is this waste? Our fairest and noblest youth is being sacrificed in hecatombs—to what end? Nothing that will ever be gained thereby in this world is worth what it is costing in blood and tears. If our horizons are bounded only by the consideration of what is to happen to human society here on earth as the result of what we do and suffer in our effort to defeat Prussianism, then we may as well say boldly that the statesmen are wrong in their declaration of our war aims. Even President Wilson, who carries the moral appeal to a greater height than statesmen among the Allies, fails to place it high enough if this is all. He says we are fighting to make the world a fit place to live in. If we are not fighting for something greater we had better not fight at all, for we are not succeeding very markedly. The world after the war will be a sadder, emptier place than it was before; it will be a world with a generation missing, a world of women, children and old men. We are killing, killing, killing, and those who die are the worthiest to live. H. G. Wells wrote years ago, in his Modern Utopia, of the waste of sorrow and suffering caused by premature death under the conditions of our modern civilization. That was in time of peace; what would he say now!

Grim and sinister fatality seems to attend all human efforts after betterment in this world. Man does wonderful things—up to a point—and then himself destroys the fruits of his labor. He takes ages to create what can be brought to ruin in an hour. We falsify our own hopes and deprive the future of its fairest promise by our own folly and ruthlessness. Such is the sombre verdict of history upon our doings, and never more so than to-day. Somehow the output in soul seems to deserve a better return than it has ever won. There is no continuous advance in human affairs; at ever-recurring intervals by our own mad act we bring to nought our dreams of well-being and delight. It is an error to suppose that only the best has survived in man's ways of ordering his corporate life; as often as not it has been the opposite. The moral grandeur exhibited at Thermopylæ has had an inadequate outcome in the Greece of to-day. There was an older Greece still, a Greece great and wonderful, but unknown to history, the Greece of which Homer sang and which lives only in myth and legend. Until yesterday we thought the blind poet had invented it, telling of a Golden Age that existed only in his own mind. Now we know he told the truth, or less than the truth, for the spade and mattock have confirmed his story. What happened to that far-back Greece that kindled the lamp of culture ages before classical Greece appeared on the scene? Some human avalanche, some savage inundation, overwhelmed it and left not a trace behind. Julian the Apostate was right many long centuries afterwards when he saw that with the destruction of classical Greece in its turn a thousand things gracious and beautiful would perish from the earth. That was why he tried to save paganism, though happily he strove in vain; unfortunately with the fall of paganism culture and refinement went, too, for nearly a thousand years. For what did Rienzi die, Savonarola, Lamennais?—for this last-named was a martyr, though he never stood on a scaffold. One can but repeat that their expenditure of moral forces, and that of millions like them, accomplished but little in proportion to its own greatness. And it is always so; it is so now; the magnitude of human self-sacrifice far exceeds its earthly gains, even when those gains do not turn to loss, as is only too frequently the case. The death of one mother's boy in the present world-war establishes a claim upon the universal order greater far than shall ever be honored by what follows to civilization at the signing of peace.

Yet look at Nature's processes again and see what they have to teach us. There is no waste whatever. Forms break up, but life remains. Of what life is in itself we know as little to-day as did the builders of the Pyramids, but that it is something that uses matter without being identified therewith is becoming ever clearer. An eminent physicist recently gave to the writer as his considered opinion the statement that physical life represents only a comparatively tiny fraction of the total manifestations of life, and that psychical precedes physical evolution; only so could he account, he said, for the production of some of the rarest and most beautiful organic developments. Where Nature brings but one seed to bear on this side of the veil of sense, she brings a thousand to fruitage on the other; she sows here for a harvest there; and what looks to us like waste is careful conservation. Life put forth for a moment in physical form and then withdrawn, is still active and operative in a wider sphere; it is the one seed that bears on this side which is comparatively restricted in growth and yield.

So is it also with those who pass from us in the plenitude of their youthful prime through the dread circumstances of war. God needs the greatness of soul that is theirs but for an ampler and more glorious sphere where it shall bear fruit thirty, sixty, and a hundredfold. The very act of sacrifice wherein life is laid down lifts it to loftier altitudes and sows it anew for a richer harvest than earth at its best shall ever know.

The Flowers of France

By GERTRUDE HALL KENT

> No lilies tall the golden sun shall greet
> When wide-eyed Summer hovers over France;
> No daisies at the west wind's touch shall dance
> Through fields where armies strive but never meet;
> No crimson petals fall in fragrance sweet,
> Nor hidden violets lure the eye by chance:
> Ah, Summer, thou shalt veil thy stricken glance
> And mourn the blossoms perished at thy feet.
> Yet blooms there are as on an altar heaped—
> The lily of devotion gleaming fair,
> The rose of chivalry that burns in red;
> And from those woful meadows still are reaped
> Deeds that have blossomed forth in courage rare
> And crowned with leaves of bay the happy dead.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

FIRST PUBLICITY BUREAU IN HISTORY OF CHURCH

To Be Established by a Diocese—Kansas Does It

TOPEKA, KANSAS.—The Convention here voted to establish the first diocesan publicity and advertising bureau in the history of the Episcopal Church. To membership on the bureau Bishop Wise appointed three clergymen of the diocese who had reported to the Convention of their pioneer efforts in using display advertising in their local newspapers. The Rev. Joseph Harvey of Pittsburg, Kansas, was made chairman, the other two clerical bureau members being the Rev. Carl W. Nau of Emporia, and Dr. P. T. Fenn of Wichita. A. J. Carruth, Jr., city editor of the Topeka State Journal; Carl Bolmer, cartoonist of that newspaper; Paul J. Brindel, Kansas City newspaper man who handled the publicity for the Convention, and Prof. N. A. Crawford of the Kansas State Agricultural College department of journalism, are the other members of the bureau. Mr. Brindel was elected secretary and Mr. Haynes advertising expert of the bureau.

The bureau is preparing display advertising copy to be used by the parish churches in their local newspapers similar to that which brought remarkable returns in William Allen White's Emporia Gazette. The copy which was prepared by the Rev. Mr. Nau and Mr. Haynes not only gave St. Andrew's Church in Emporia a distinctive name, "the little red church on the corner," but filled the church to capacity for its Sunday evening services. The cost of the five advertisements run in a weekly series was practically paid for by the increased collections from the increased attendance. Mr. Haynes in addition to preparing the display advertising copy for the diocese of Kansas will be glad to send samples of the five successful Emporia ads to any rector.

CHARMS OF NORTHFIELD ROUSE WIDE ENTHUSIASM

Many Delegates Will Take Vacations During Brotherhood Convention

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.—From all over the country come indications of remarkable enthusiasm for the St. Andrew's Brotherhood Convention to be held for the first time this year at Northfield, Massachusetts. The venture has met with unbounded approval throughout the Church.

There are good reasons for this enthusiasm, for Northfield itself offers innumerable attractions, quite apart from the convention program. Famous as one of the beauty spots of America, its appeal is well-nigh irresistible to those who have once known intimately its charm. In contrast to the conventions of other years, there will be offered at Northfield daily opportunities for golf, tennis, boating and hikes. There are not only stretches of level country, but one may, if one so wishes, have the experience of mountain climbing.

Those who have charge of the arrangements for the convention have shown their wisdom in so scheduling the program that every afternoon will be free from convention work, giving an opportunity to those present to enjoy to the full the recreational facilities of Northfield. With this prospect in view, many delegates are arranging to take their Summer vacation during the convention, which last from August 14 to 21. The regular sessions will be held each morning and the inspirational meetings each evening.

DEAN SILLS IS ELECTED PRESIDENT OF BOWDOIN

Succeeds Dr. William DeWitt Hyde as Head of Maine College

BRUNSWICK, MAINE.—Dean Kenneth C. M. Sills was elected president of Bowdoin College at a meeting of the Board of Trustees and overseers held in May. He has been acting president since the death, nearly a year ago, of Dr. William De Witt Hyde.

The new president was born in Halifax, Nova Scotia, in 1879. He is a son of the Rev. Dr. Charles M. Sills, Rector of Trinity Church, Geneva, New York, and has been a prominent Churchman in Maine. He has been delegate to General Convention and Provincial Synod. President Sills was Dean of Bowdoin College under the administration of President Hyde. For three years following his graduation from Bowdoin and Harvard he was instructor in English and the classics at Bowdoin, leaving Maine to become tutor of English at Columbia University. In 1907 he was made professor of Latin language and literature at Bowdoin and he was appointed dean of the college three years later.

He was a candidate for United States Senator from Maine on the Democratic ticket in 1916, but was defeated.

WATCH FOR THESE FAKERS

Paul Shimmon Warns Against One "Rev. Simon Daniel"

NEW YORK CITY.—The following warning is issued by Mr. Paul Shimmon:

Some one, evidently a foreigner, by the name of Rev. Simon Daniel is going around in Virginia, Maryland, etc., bearing letters of recommendation from some oriental bishops. Also, he has shown to the clergy a letter bearing the letterheads of the Assyrian and (possibly) Armenian Relief Committee. The Bishop of New York being Hon. Chairman, and The Ernest M. Stires, D.D., Chairman, with my name also on the letterhead, and the letter is signed by me, allowing him to solicit funds.

I have given no such letter to any one. My signature is forged. The person or persons having such letter should be turned over to the police, and the immigration bureau should be informed of the whereabouts of the man. Please also communicate with me and oblige,

PAUL SHIMMON.

WINE FOR COMMUNION NOT BARRED BY DRY LAW

Supreme Court Hands Down Important Decision in Oklahoma

OKLAHOMA CITY, OKLAHOMA.—The introduction into the State and transportation from one point to another of altar wine intended for sacramental purposes is not prohibited by the constitution or the statutes of this State, according to an opinion written by Justice Thos. H. Owen of Muskogee, and handed down by the Supreme Court last week.

The constitution of the State prohibits the sale and transportation of intoxicating liquors, and the bone-dry law enacted by the last legislature makes it an offense to transport intoxicants. The Santa Fé Railroad Company refused to accept a shipment of sacramental wine from a Roman Catholic priest billed to a church in Guthrie. The lower court held that the constitution as well as the statutory law denied the right to ship wines for sacramental purposes the same as though it had been intended for use as a beverage, because neither the constitution nor the statute exempted sacramental wine, in so many words, from its application.

Justice Owen in the syllabus of his opinion says:

A thing may be within the letter of the law and yet not within the law, because not within the spirit, nor within the intention of its makers.

Among other things which may be considered in determining the intent of the lawmakers is the evil which it is designed to remedy; and therefore this court properly looks at contemporaneous events, the situation as it existed, and as it was pressed upon the intention of the lawmakers.

No purpose of action against religion and religious institutions, when properly conducted, can be imputed to any legislative body.

First $1,000 Now In Hand

NEW YORK CITY.—The War-Time Education Fund of the General Board of Religious Education makes an encouraging report.

On May 15 not a person had been directly asked for a gift, not a congregation had taken an offering and yet over $1,000 had been paid in or pledged. One lady sent $300, her first contribution to the work of the General Board. A regular contributor sent $250. Two Liberty Bonds have been pledged, one by a Western Church Preparatory School, the other by a New England Sunday School. A Bible Class voted and sent $55. A rector in Chicago, $50. One retired clergyman $20, another $10.

For Memorial Day

The Young Churchman Company has published an admirable service leaflet for public use on Memorial Day, containing special intercessions and hymns with the proper psalm, references to proper lessons, and a Collect, Epistle and Gospel. These may be had at the price of $3.00 per hundred with postage additional by sending to The Young Churchman Company, Milwaukee.

DR. PERCY DEARMER COMES TO BERKELEY SCHOOL

Well-Known English Clergyman to Give Courses Next Year

MIDDLETON, CONNECTICUT.—The well-known English clergyman and author, the Rev. Percy Dearmer, D.D., is to be at the Berkeley Divinity School in the coming academic year, where he will give courses in liturgics and sociology.

Soon after the outbreak of the war Dr. Dearmer left his parish and went to Serbia together with his wife (well known as a novelist and writer of mystery plays) to work with the Red Cross. There Mrs. Dearmer died of typhus in July, 1915. (At about the same time one of their sons was killed in Gallipoli.) On his return from Serbia Dr. Dearmer went to France to work for the Y. M. C. A., and was then invited to go to India for the same organization. He left England in October, 1916. Just before his departure, in September, 1916, he married Miss Knowles, who for some years had been secretary of the Anglican Fellowship. They have been in India since then. Dr. Dearmer has been lecturing for the Y. M. C. A. and acting as temporary professor of literature at Delhi. He has also been doing some work for the S. P. G. and the C. M. S.

Dr. Dearmer has paid especial attention to the study of Liturgics, and his "Parson's Handbook" and "The Ornaments of the Ministers" (in the series "The Arts of the Church," of which he was editor) are well known. He was also an editor of the English Hymnal and the English Carol Book. He is much interested in the Russian Church, and was at one time chairman of the Anglican and Eastern Orthodox Society, on behalf of which he visited Russia in 1912. He has taken a prominent part in questions of social reform, and was for twenty years secretary of the Christian Social Union. The subject of Spiritual Healing also interests him greatly: he has been chairman of the Guild of Health, and in this connection has written a book entitled "Body and Soul." Others of his writings not mentioned above are "Everyman's History of the Church of England," "Rome and Reunion," "False Gods" (a study of some popular misconceptions of the nature of God), and "Patriotism and Fellowship," lately published. He is a frequent contributor to the Guardian and other English Church papers.

Dr. Dearmer will arrive in San Francisco at the end of June. He will be free in the Summer months before taking up his teaching work at Berkeley to undertake a limited number of speaking and preaching engagements. He has lectures on the war as well as on the historical, liturgical and social topics in which he has made special studies. Those who desire to learn further of Dr. Dearmer's plans can do so by communicating with Dean Ladd at Middletown, Connecticut.

Retiring Fund Society Meets

NEW YORK CITY.—The semi-annual meeting of the Clergymen's Retiring Fund Society was held May 10 in the Church Missions House. The Treasurer's report showed receipts amounting to $29,897.29 for the last six months and a balance on hand of $13,899.43. Annuities paid last November amounted to $24,262.40. Measures were taken looking toward establishing as the uniform rate of percentage for annuity, on whatever amount each annuitant has contributed to the Treasury, the 25 per cent. not less than which has been regularly paid during the last fourteen years.

It was also determined to amend the Fundamental Laws by striking out the provisions for antedating and taking multiples of one's original payment. The continuous usefulness of the Society will be chiefly to those of the clergy who are over sixty-eight years of age, and already on the annuitant list, and to those who recognize the value of a life annuity at sixty, notwithstanding that in addition a pension may be waiting them at sixty-eight.

INSERT FOR HYMNAL USED IN DENVER CATHEDRAL

Dean Hart Pastes Folder of National Hymns in Cathedral Books

DENVER, COLORADO.—Dean Hart of the Cathedral here has prepared an excellent insert for the hymnal with hymns to supplement the shortage of national hymns felt by so many clergymen. "Our hymnal was not prepared amidst the din of war," commented the Dean in speaking of this leaflet. The insert is the size and shape of the hymnal page, and is pasted into the cathedral hymnals, the different hymns being numbered 198a, 199a, etc. One beautiful hymn which is seldom used is that of James Russell Lowell, which is as follows.

Once to every man and nation
Comes the moment to decide,
In the strife of truth with falsehood,
For the good or evil side;
Some great cause, God's new Messiah,
Offering each the bloom or blight,
And the choice goes by forever
'Twixt that darkness and that light.

Then to side with truth is noble,
When we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit,
And 'tis prosperous to be just;
Then it is the brave man chooses,
While the coward stands aside
Till the multitude make virtue
Of the faith they have denied.

By the light of burning martyrs
Jesus' bleeding feet I track,
Toiling up new Calvaries ever
With the Cross that turns not back;
New occasions teach new duties,
Time makes ancient good uncouth;
They must upward still and onward,
Who would keep abreast with truth.

Though the cause of evil prosper,
Yet 'tis truth alone is strong;
Though her portion be the scaffold,
And upon the throne be wrong,
Yet that scaffold sways the future,
And, behind the dim unknown,
Standeth God within the shadow
Keeping watch above his own.

ORDINATION

Mr. Alfred Scott Priddis of Cambridge, Massachusetts, a senior in the Cambridge Theological School, was ordained to the Diaconate by Bishop Babcock in the Church of Our Saviour, East Milton, Massachusetts, on the morning of Whitsunday. Mr. Priddis has been acting as lay-reader in East Milton, which is a mission of St. Michael's Church, Milton, whose rector, the Rev. H. Boyd Edwards, is in France as chaplain of the 101st Engineers.

ONE DAY'S INCOME PLAN INCREASE REMARKABLE

Many Dioceses Organized on Modern Campaign Basis

NEW YORK CITY.—The One Day's Income Plan is maintaining its advance over last year's record and totaled over $38,000 the middle of May.

An increasing number of parishes took Thankofferings on this plan on Whitsunday and others will do so on Trinity Sunday. In some instances this is being done on a diocesan-wide scale—among them, Albany, Bethlehem, Colorado, Georgia, Iowa, Kentucky, North Carolina and New Mexico.

Members of the American and Japanese staffs of the District of Kyoto have sent in the largest offering that district has ever made to the plan. In the same week gifts came from an Armenian and from many of the South Dakota Indians. The Army and Navy are also represented in the list of the plan's friends.

Bishop Howden of New Mexico has sent a cheering message to the Board of Missions about the apportionment: "It may serve perhaps as a stimulus for our larger and stronger neighbors to let you know that our Convocation last week passed the following resolution with enthusiastic unanimity:

That in recognition of the call for special missionary effort which the present world crisis brings to the Church this Convocation determines that the District of New Mexico shall exceed its apportionment for General Missions this current year by at least three hundred dollars.

This resolution was, I think, the most popular of the entire three days' session. This means that New Mexico will increase its offerings about twenty-three per cent. above the minimum asked of it. Eastern Oklahoma, as already reported in these columns, took a similar action a few months ago.

"Give the coupons of Liberty Bonds to the Missionary Work of the Church," is the slogan of one patriotic rector. Needless to say, the Board of Missions can put them to excellent use.

The program in full is as follows:

Monday, May 27—4-6 p. m., Faculty Reception to the Trustees, the Alumni and Friends in the Gymnasium; 8 p. m., Evensong and Baccalaureate Sermon by the Rt. Rev. Wilson Reiff Stearly, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor of Newark.

Tuesday, May 28—Alumni Day—7 a. m., Celebration of Holy Communion; 10.30 a. m., Business Meeting of Associate Alumni in Sherred Hall; 12 m., Reading of Alumni Essay in the Chapel, Essayist, The Rev. Charles Malcolm Douglas, B.D.; Report of Necrologist; 1 p. m., Alumni Luncheon in the Gymnasium (admission by card); 2 p. m., Meeting of Board of Trustees in Sherred Hall.

Wednesday, May 29—Commencement Day—7 a. m., Celebration of Holy Communion; 11 a. m., Commencement Exercises; 1 p. m., Senior Class Luncheon in Hoffman Hall (admission by card).

ORDINATION

BLOOMINGTON, ILLINOIS.—Bishop Sherwood ordained to the Priesthood in St. Matthew's Church on the Sunday after the Ascension, May 12, the Rev. John Turner Lillard, Jr., Deacon in charge of St. Andrew's Church, Paris, Illinois.

M. STEPHANE LAUZANNE SPEAKS AT CHURCH CLUB

Declares That "The Barbarian Shall Not Pass"

LOCK HAVEN, PENNSYLVANIA.—The Wartime Supper of the Church Club of the Diocese took place on the evening of the 14th in the dining hall of the Central State Normal School.

The President of the Club, Mr. Richard M. H. Wharton, was the toastmaster. Sir John Willison, Canadian correspondent of the London Times and for two years editor of The Daily News, spoke to the toast "Dauntless Canada—never did and never shall lie at proud foot of a conqueror." In the outset he read a message to the Church Club from the Prime Minister of Canada. He exhorted the people present not to be too critical of those in authority. "The sum of that which is efficient is so much more than that which is inefficient the world needs every ounce of strength that you have, therefore stand together."

He was followed by M. Stephane Lauzanne, who spoke to the toast "Fighting France—the land of scholars and the nurse of arms." "We will perish to the last but the barbarian shall not pass," he said. "France is not bled white," and to prove it presented the facts that in September, 1914, France had 1,500,000 men in her army, now she has 2,750,000; in September, 1914, France was making for her own use 12,000 shells a day, now she is making 300,000. In 1914 she had 25,000 women working in her munition works, now she has 250,000. In the three first years of the war she spent twenty billion dollars and of this she borrowed only two billions.

M. Lauzanne is a member of the French Commission to this country. He was an officer of the French Army and was wounded at the battle of Verdun. The speeches of both these men were received with great enthusiasm.

The Bishop of the Diocese followed, speaking to the toast "The Cross Victorious," "In hoc signo vinces." The Bishop's speech was a masterful effort and brought the occasion to a fitting conclusion.

90,000 In Christian Nurture Classes

NEW YORK CITY.—Ninety thousand pupils are working with the Christian Nurture Series in eighteen thousand classes in Church schools!

These are the figures for the present year. It is interesting to note that the use of the Series is quite evenly distributed throughout the country, in proportion to population. There are not so many in the Southwestern section as further north, and the Pacific Coast is a little behind other sections; but in the whole country there are but five Dioceses and Missionary Districts which record no use of the lessons. New England shows a long list, largely due to many schools in and around Boston and through Connecticut. The Province of New York and New Jersey makes a good showing, with a large use in practically all dioceses.

An effort to furnish aid in meeting some of the teachers' problems is to be made by the General Board of Religious Education in the publication of a Christian Nurture Supplement to The Leader. This starts with the June issue, and will present articles based on experience with various features and problems. Its principal feature will be a training course for teachers using the Series. It is the hope of the General Board that this publication will aid in making the Church Schools using the Series more efficient and productive of better results.

A Word from the Federal Council of Churches

THE Church that is to lead the nation into the spirit of penitence and prayer must itself be filled with that spirit. Driven by a deeper sense of need, by the heavy burden of the world's bitter sorrow, the Church must as never before find her way to the feet of her Master and Lord, there in humility and grief to confess the incompleteness of her own life, the inadequacy of her own response to His teaching and leadership. Only when under His searching gaze she has turned from inward strife, from pride, from devotion to lesser standards than His own, and renewed her obedience to His Holy Spirit can she rise to proclaim Him—not by her word only but by her life—the Lord of all. Only as each one of us who bears a share in her life and work puts away from himself and from whatever interests he represents all that is unworthy and, standing in the continual presence of God, lives every day in honesty, in zeal, and in wisdom—in faith, in hope, and in love—can the Church fulfil her ministry of moral leadership and spiritual reconciliation.

INCREASED DEMAND FOR RED CROSS CHAPLAINS

NEW YORK CITY.—In addition to the recently reported need for Red Cross chaplains, a cablegram received by Red Cross Headquarters in this country asks for twenty-five Protestant Red Cross chaplains at once and indicates that there will be a demand for as many as that each month for some time. Experienced ministers of ability are desired, particularly men of middle age who can pass a physical examination and are willing to serve for one year at least. Although as originally reported, these chaplains are not included in the provisions of the war risk insurance law, the Red Cross provides an opportunity to take out insurance and guarantees 750 francs monthly to cover expenses, in addition to transportation both ways and an allowance of $200 for equipment.

The Bureau of Personnel of the Red Cross writes that it is depending upon the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America to recommend the highest type of minister available for this service—"men able to inspire our soldiers to repose in them absolute confidence and desire for their help and guidance in every way." Names of men qualified should be sent to Rev. Clyde F. Armitage, 1112 Woodward Building, Washington, District of Columbia, Secretary of the Federal Council's General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains.

MISSIONARY PHONOGRAPH WILL AMUSE CUBA JACKIES

Rev. Mr. Watson Takes Organ and Phonograph Back to Guantanamo

NEW YORK CITY.—The Rev. William Watson just before he sailed for Cuba last week came into the office of THE CHURCHMAN. "I've got my organ for the naval base at Guantanamo," said he. "I've got something to amuse the boys with, too, when they come into town. Somebody has given me a phonograph. Heretofore, when the boys came in, all I could say was: 'Take off your leggins and your shirts, make yourselves cool and at home.' Then I was reduced to my theological library for entertainment. Even then they appreciated the chance to get out of the hot uniform for a little while and lounge around. They'd go away saying, 'This is just like home, doc.' But the phonograph will help matters considerably."

Mr. Watson is the missionary at Guantanamo and was acting chaplain at the naval base until Mr. Ackley went down. Mr. Ackley is soon going over to France, and they want Mr. Watson back at the station. Mr. Watson had a letter from Miss Ashurst, missionary teacher, that gives an idea of the way the boys on shore leave like to come into the mission house in Guantanamo:

"Mr. Ackley is sending up lots of marines to call on us. Every day now they come. Two were here at dinner tonight. Three came on Saturday to call. On Sunday five came to church at eleven o'clock, one to Sunday School. Corporal ——— came on Sunday night. Two more on Monday, one on Tuesday and three today. It takes lots of time, but I feel it will be well spent. If the poor boys are happy in spending a couple of hours talking to us, I don't think we could do better work than entertain them. Last Sunday was clear and we had the best service since Easter."

Recently the colored folk in the mission raised $475 for the best Estey harmonium that could be bought. So good is it that Mr. Keene, a civilian at the naval station comes into Guantanamo every Sunday for the pleasure of playing it. There are seventy-five children in Miss Ashurst's school. They pay $1 per month for English instruction and $2 for Spanish. Besides this there are thirty children in a school taught by a Negro in the south porch of the church. In the Sunday School are 150 English-speaking children and fifty Spanish-speaking little ones.

Prizes Are Awarded

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.—The William H. Lincoln prize of fifty dollars offered to members of the junior and middler classes for excellence has been awarded to Frank Goostray of the middler class. Mr. Goostray is a graduate of Saint Stephen's College in the class of 1916 and a native of Boston.

The Salmon Wheaton prize, the income on $1,000, for excellence in reading, and open to members of the senior class, was won by Alfred S. Priddis of the senior class. Mr. Priddis is a graduate of the University of Rochester in the class of 1915 and a native of Rochester, New York. He has also been awarded the William Otis Smith prize of one hundred dollars for excellence in the department of homiletics.

NANCIAL METHODS ARE CHANGED AT SACRAMENTO

ɔnvention Marked by Efficiency and High Enthusiasm

SACRAMENTO, CALIFORNIA.—The Eighth nual Convention of the Diocese was ened in St. Paul's Church here on May The Bishop read his Annual Address in ce of a sermon.

The Convention took hold promptly of ancial conditions, changed the method of essing parishes, adopted a form of spe- l contributions to increase income until larger endowment could be raised, or- ed the Bishop's pension premium which l been neglected to be paid. Mrs. Jean- te M. Brock, a rural delegate, person- contributed $5,000 to the endowment of Episcopate. A new policy for the ard of Missions was approved, whereby ssionaries will be paid out of a common id. Future investments of diocesan ids were ordered limited to securities mitted under the Savings Bank act. ny new men were chosen for diocesan cers with the intent of pressing more ively for financial support and general gress. The principal Boards elected re as follows: Standing Committee: the v. W. H. Hermitage, the Rev. Mark enbark, the Rev. P. G. Snow, the Rev. S. Bartlam, W. W. Lyman, N. P. Chip- n, W. B. Lardner, C. W. Bush. Dele- es to Synod: The Rev. I. E. Baxter, the v. P. G. Snow, the Rev. W. H. Hermi- e, the Rev. C. E. Farrar, E. D. Seaton, E. Boudier, F. A. S. Foale, D. Barni- t. Board of Missions: the Rev. M. enbark, the Rev. W. H. Hermitage, the v. E. S. Bartlam, C. A. Swigart, F. A. Foale, D. Barnicott, H. E. Boudier. rectors of Diocesan Corporation: N. P. ipman, W. F. Bachelor, E. D. Seaton, R. Sanford, J. M. Henderson, W. Pol- d, W. P. Swain, E. L. Maddox, G. N. rritt. In succession to F. H. Denman, o had served many years efficiently as easurer of the Diocese, W. F. Bachelor Sacramento was elected. The Rev. P. Snow was elected Secretary of the Dio- e. The Hon. N. P. Chipman was re- cted Chancellor for another term of ee years.

The Woman's Auxiliary held a success- mass meeting in St. Paul's Church, with eral vested choirs which rendered music a high order under the direction of s. Fred Harvey of Galt. A strong, spir- ıl sermon was preached by the Very Rev. W. Gresham, D.D., Dean of Grace Cathe- l, San Francisco. Mrs. Louis F. Mont- le of San Francisco made a stirring ress on "The Call to Greater Service." The Convention was largely attended, s marked with abounding spirit of prog- s and harmony, and marked an epoch spiritual advancement.

VE PATRIOTISM FROM BECOMING PRUSSIANISM

Proper Church Support, Bishop Harris Tells Convention

HOUGHTON, MICHIGAN.—At the Twenty- d Annual Convention of the Diocese of rquette, which met here on May 15, the Rev. Robert L. Harris, D.D., Bishop djutor, sounded the keynote of the meetings by his analysis of conditions in the diocese and his program of church extension. The immediate opportunities for extension are due to the existing equipment in church buildings and rectories placed at strategic points under the administration of Bishop G. Mott Williams. With the help of funds asked for this work Bishop Harris expects to within a short time convert several dependent places into self-sustaining parishes manned with resident clergy.

Bishop Harris in his address identified church support with the highest patriotic endeavors of the day as calculated "to save patriotism from becoming Prussianism." The Standing Committee, the Secretary of Convention and the Treasurers of the several funds were re-elected for the year. Convention began with an informal gathering at the Houghton Club on Tuesday evening, at which interest in the Bishop's plans was substantiated by subscriptions. Following Convention a reception was given in honor of Bishop and Mrs. Harris at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Allen F. Rees.

TRAINING OF LEADERS IS CONVENTION NOTE

Kansas Gives Most Consideration to Educational Work

TOPEKA, KANSAS.—Bishop Wise, with the able assistance of the Cathedral clergy of Topeka and the hearty approval of conferences in connection with the Diocesan Convention by the Convention of last year, planned and carried out one of the most inspiring Conventions ever held in the church, from May 12-16. The keynote of this Convention was "Education in Church Leadership." For this purpose some of the great leaders of the general Church were there to represent this idea in different ways.

The Bishop read his address on Sunday afternoon to the largest and most representative congregation ever assembled in the Diocese. Bishop Wise said he had held seven Parochial Missions during the year, besides making numerous addresses to colleges, high schools and at army cantonments. Thus he has brought the Church in contact with the people of the state. He announced the dissolution of the Kansas Theological School and the conversion of the Barn of Bethany College into a bishop's house that the present Bishop's residence may become the home of an Associated Mission in Topeka.

A happy incident of the Convention was the visit of Mayor Reeves and Chaplain Otis Gray of the 353rd Regiment, the "All Kansas" regiment, from Camp Funston. Both made short and impressive speeches, and Chaplain Gray was presented with a purse of $250 for personal expenses.

The most interesting action of the Convention was the consolidation of the "Trustees of the Convention" with the "Trustees of Church Property" and the appointment of Memorial Day, May 30, for special patriotic services. The Convention elected the Rev. Herbert Hawkins Secretary Registrar and Treasurer of Diocesan Missions. The Standing Committee of last year were re-elected. Mr. C. A. Magill was elected as the Kansas representative to the Provincial Synod. The Convention increased the salary of the Bishop $1,000.

COADJUTOR NOT ELECTED AT TENNESSEE CONVENTION

Many Delegates Attend Charities and Corrections Meeting

MEMPHIS, TENNESSEE.—The 86th Annual Convention of the Diocese of Tennessee, with the Diocesan Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary, met in St. Luke's Church here May 14-16. The sermon at the Woman's Auxiliary was by the Rev. E. E. Cobbs, Rector of Christ Church, Nashville, and addresses were made by Mrs. Loaring Clark of Chattanooga, and Deaconess Hart of the Chinese Missions.

As the Rev. W. J. Loaring Clark, D.D., appointed to preach the Convention sermon, was suddenly called to serve the Red Cross in France, the Bishop read his Annual Address at the opening service of the Convention, in place of the usual sermon. The Rev. Arthur Howard Noll, LL.D., was re-elected and began his twenty-first year as Secretary of the Diocese. Few changes were made in the Diocesan officers. The Standing Committee was re-elected.

The time seemed not propitious for the election of a Bishop-Coadjutor as had been expected, though a liberal majority of the Bishops and Standing Committees of the Church had given their consent to such an election. The Convention adjourned to meet in Christ Church, Nashville, at the call of the Bishop, in October, to give further consideration to the subject of such election. Scarcely more than routine business was transacted at the Convention. The attendance of both clergy and laity was rather smaller than in previous years, due to war conditions. An educational character was given to the Convention by an exhibit of historical relics; by the meeting of the Diocesan Board of Religious Education of especial interest to Sunday School workers, and by the play of "The Pilgrims and the Book Beloved," given in the open air in the evening after the adjournment.

The Fourth Annual Conference of the State Association of Charities and Corrections in Memphis, on the days preceding the Convention, brought the Church into close touch with Social Service. The Governor of the State commissioned all the clergymen of the state as delegates to this conference, and many availed themselves of this opportunity to learn what was being done in the State of Tennessee for the betterment of social conditions.

On May 15 the Bishop visited the Church Home, Memphis, and blessed and dedicated a new playground acquired by the Home, given by the Vanity Fair Club. In his address on this occasion Bishop Gailor gave a brief account of the growth of the Home under the care of Sister Anne Christine, and stated that the Vanity Fair Club originated about twenty years ago in a group of young society women who were led to undertake some work that was thought to be worth while, and who had since then given no less than $20,000 to the Home.

A number of clergy and laity in attendance at the Diocesan Convention accompanied the Bishop after the adjournment of the Convention to Keeling, Tennessee, to attend the second annual commencement of the Hoffman-St. Mary Institute for Colored, under the charge of the Rev. Archdeacon Demby, recently elected Bishop Suffragan for the colored people of Arkansas.

MUST ENABLE CLERGYMEN TO EARN A FAIR LIVING

If Church Is to Keep Them, Erie Convention Is Told

ERIE, PENNSYLVANIA.—The Eighth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Erie was held at the Cathedral of St. Paul here, May 14 and 15. The Rev. Martin Aigner, D.D., President of the Standing Committee, read the annual address.

Services and business sessions occupied the whole of Wednesday, Dr. Aigner presiding. The Standing Committee elected for the ensuing year consists of the Rev. Messrs. Martin Aigner, George F. Potter, John E. Reilly, Reginald S. Radcliffe; Messrs. C. E. Martin, E. R. Shepherd, T. W. Shacklett, S. P. Ker.

Missions, supply of Clergy and Clerical Stipends occupied considerable attention through the address of Dr. Aigner, the reports of the Archdeacons, reports of other committees and addresses from the floor of the Convention.

In his address the President said concerning the dearth of clergy:

"The scarcity of clergymen is a reality, and the small number of Candidates for Holy Orders is alarming. The great opportunities of War, as an Army or Volunteer Chaplain or a Red Cross Worker or a Y. M. C. A. Secretary or Assistant, have drawn, and are drawing, many men from our ranks by the extent and fascination of the service, the intense interest and pressing importance of the duties, and the really adequate remuneration. Of course, men will give their highest service for a mere pittance. Devoted priests are doing it here now. But they must live. If we would have them and hold them we must enable them to live."

The Committee on Social Service presented a resolution that the Convention give its hearty endorsement to the Prohibition Amendment to the Constitution of the United States and urge every clergyman and layman in the Diocese to support it. ARTHUR L. SEITER.

NO WOMEN DELEGATES IN THE DIOCESE OF MAINE

Convention Defeats a Proposed Amendment to the Canon

BANGOR, MAINE.—It is an interesting fact that the 99th Annual Convention of the Diocese was held at St. John's Church here on May 15 to commemorate the completion of the beautiful new stone church, which was recently dedicated, to replace the one destroyed by fire in 1911.

At the Convention Bishop Brewster declared that the war must be fought to a successful finish, and emphasized the importance of individual loyalty to Christ and His Kingdom.

The Convention adopted a resolution pledging to President Wilson loyal support and unfaltering devotion in the prosecution of the war.

A proposed amendment to the canon providing for the election of women as delegates from the churches and missions to the Convention was defeated.

Mayor Charles B. Clarke, of Portland, was re-elected treasurer of the diocese. The Rev. Ernest A. Pressey, of Portland, was appointed registrar of the diocese.

The Standing Committee of the Diocese was re-elected. The Diocesan Board of Religious Education is as follows: The Bishop, chairman; Dean Kenneth C. M. Sills, who has just been chosen president of Bowdoin College; the Rev. R. R. Gilson, the Rev. Canon R. W. Plant, Mr. F. H. Gabbi, Miss Marguerite Ogden, Miss Caroline Burgess.

The deputies to the Provincial Synod of 1918 are: The Rev. Canon R. W. Plant, the Rev. A. E. Scott, the Rev. Canon Philip Schuyler, the Rev. R. R. Gilson, Dean Kenneth C. M. Sills, and Mr. Henry V. B. Nash.

The Church Club of Maine met at 6 p. m. for the annual election of officers and a banquet. Mr. F. H. Gabbi of Portland is president, and Mr. Sidney St. F. Thaxter of Portland is secretary.

The Rt. Rev. Paul Jones, D.D., who has taken charge of the Central Maine Mission, with residence at Brownville Junction, Maine, was present at the Convention.

In the evening of Convention day there was a service at St. John's Church, with interesting addresses.

On Thursday there was held the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary and Junior Auxiliary. The Rev. J. Edward Hand, rector of St. John's Church, Bangor, in extending a welcome to the delegates, said it is fifty years since the Auxiliary had met in Bangor. Addresses were made by Mrs. Herbert Payson of Portland, president of the Maine Branch, and also by Miss Grace Lindley, general secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions. W. F. LIVINGSTON.

CONVENTION PENALIZES CLERGY WHO ARE SLOW

Asheville Adopts Unique Method of Jogging Memories

ASHEVILLE, NORTH CAROLINA.—The twenty-fourth annual Convention of the Missionary District of Asheville was held in Trinity Church, May 15-16.

The Rev. Lee Frontis Anthony was ordained to the priesthood at the opening service of the Convention on Wednesday by the Rt. Rev. Junius Moore Horner, Bishop of the district.

The necessary action preliminary to the organization of the district into a diocese was taken. The Convention felt that the time had now come for the district to become an independent unit in the Church. As the matter now stands the several parishes and missions will be given an opportunity to show their desire in the project by raising the required amount.

Stress was laid upon the necessity for promptness in the parochial clergy in sending in their statistical reports by placing a penalty on those who do not send them in on time.

The Rev. Alfred H. Stubbs was elected secretary and treasurer of the district. The Rev. Walter S. Cain was elected registrar to fill out the unexpired term of the late Rev. Dr. R. R. Swope.

The Rev. H. Norwood Bowne was elected dean of the Convocation of Waynesville.

The Rev. Edmund N. Joyner was elected dean of the Convocation of Morganton.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod—Clerical: J. B. Sill, A. W. Farnum, S. B. Stroup, J. N. Atkins, H. A. Dobbin and W. S. Cain.

ase Hospital Anniversary—Base Hos-tal No. 6—formerly the Massachusetts eneral Hospital Unit—went forth from rinity Church, Boston, on Trinity Sunday year ago to their work in France. On e first anniversary of this God-speed rvice Trinity Church held a service of mmemoration. The same hymns were ng and many of the same prayers said. he Trustees, Staff and nurses of the hos-tal were all invited and many of them ere in attendance. The great church was owded. Dr. Mann spoke of the fine votion of the members of the unit and ith especial affection of the chaplain, the ev. Henry K. Sherill, formerly his own rate and a young man greatly beloved rector and people of Trinity. The Hon. uis A. Frothingham, former Lieutenant-overnor of the Commonwealth, who has cently visited Base Hospital No. 6 in rance, was present at this service and ve his impressions of the hospital and e work it is doing.

he New May 30—The parishes of the ocese in general are observing Memorial ay in the spirit of the President's procla-ation. And people in general about Bos-n seem to be looking on Memorial Day is year without its usual atmosphere of liday merry-making.

At the Cathedral there is announced a lebration of the Holy Communion at 8 m., a special service at 9.30, at which shop Lawrence is the preacher and at o'clock a second celebration of the Holy mmunion. At Trinity Church the serv-of the day is at 10.30. At the Church the Advent at 9.30, the Kalendar calls a Solemn Requiem for all who have d for Freedom, with the sermon by the v. George Nattress, and special inter-sions before the Blessed Sacrament at on and at 5 p. m. In the Roxbury dis-ct the congregations of St. Ann's, St. nes' and St. John's are joining in a spe-l service at St. James' Church at 10.30, which the Rev. A. George E. Jenner, ctor of St. Ann's Church, is the preacher. ch of the three churches has its own rochial early service.

ar Work Machinery—The great plunge ead which this country has made in re-t weeks in its fighting effectiveness and the number of soldiers it is sending to nce is being reflected here in our parish rches in the way they are getting more l more thoroughly mobilized for duty in nection with the war and its strong port.

Some of our parishes organized effec-ly for relief work last Spring and have n producing more and more largely every nth. One of these was St. James', Cam-lge, which recently celebrated the first niversary of the formation of its Red ss Auxiliary. This Auxiliary at pres-numbers 150 active members and has nt nearly $1,000 for supplies for its rk during the past year. Another large ish Auxiliary that has been long hard work is that connected with St. John's, naica Plain. This parish group has had expend an average of $100 a month through the past season for supplies for its own workers—so numerous and active were they in surgical dressings and other Red Cross needs.

A type of inclusive organization is being developed in some of our parishes which bids fair to become very effective in stimulating, directing and correlating all varieties of war work that the people are able to do. This organization is a general Parish War Committee of from twenty-five to thirty members, very carefully chosen as being representative. The committee membership is then assigned to four working sub-committees: "On the Honor Roll," "On Red Cross Work," "On Food Conservation" and "On War Relief and Liberty Loans." The chairmen of these sub-committees and two other members of the general committee chosen at large compose a Board of Directors who are given the entire executive responsibility of all the Parish War Committee's varied work. This Board of Directors meets regularly and often and keeps its hands upon all the activities—stimulating here, appropriating money there, giving asked-for suggestions in another quarter, etc. The entire membership of the Parish War Committee meets once a month and hears detailed reports of the actual work of all its sub-committees.

As an instance of the way such an organization works, during the past week the sub-committee, "On War Relief and Liberty Loans," of one parish War Committee set itself the task of canvassing the entire parish in the Red Cross "drive" for $100,000,000 with the result of an unprecedented inflow of funds through the Parish War Committee for the Red Cross work of war relief. KENNETH RIPLEY FORBES.

NEW YORK

News From the Bishop's Office—On Trinity Sunday at the Cathedral the choir from the chapel at West Point, consisting of about seventy-five cadets, took part in the eleven o'clock service and sang their special academy hymn Alma Mater. The preacher was the Rev. Wm. Austin Smith. The dean preached in the afternoon. In the evening there was a large confirmation service for candidates from the colored parishes and missions of the diocese, among which are St. David's Chapel, St. Jude's Chapel, St. Cyprian's Chapel, Messiah Chapel, St. Clement's Missions and All Saints' Mission. The Cathedral choir sang and the Bishop made the address. In accordance with the proclamation of the President, a special service of supplication and prayer for the Nation was held on Thursday, May 30. Bishop Lloyd was the preacher. On the afternoon of Decoration Day the Bishop consecrated Ascension Church, Mt. Vernon.

Plans for Every Member Campaign—The clergy and laity are gathering at a luncheon downtown this week to make plans for an extensive and intensive religious and missionary campaign in the diocese, one feature of which will be an every-member canvass. The Bishop has appointed Mr. William Fellowes Morgan president of this campaign.

SAN FRANCISCO

W. A. Meeting—On May 13 the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese held their semi-annual meeting at the Cathedral. At the business meeting a sum of $500 was raised for the work of the Church Hospital at Wuchang, China. Practically every branch was represented.

Made Deaconesses—In St. Mark's Church, Berkeley, on May 10, Bishop Nichols set apart Margaret Peppers and Frances Berg as Deaconesses. Dean Gresham preached an inspiring sermon. Deaconess Peppers has been appointed to work in Bontoc, Philippines; Miss Berg will go to St. George's Church, New York City.

A Right Policy—The Rev. Hugh Montgomery, Chaplain, has pursued the right policy in this important work. At the Presidio he will not allow his office to become a mere amusement agency, but will give to Churchmen the inspiration and the stimulus which the men in uniform so need during this time of reawakening of the religious impulse dormant in all of them. The War Commission in the Diocese of California, with Mr. L. F. Monte Monteagle, chairman, is made up of the Deans of the three Convocations, together with three laymen. The Commission is putting the responsibility of the Church before the clergy and the laymen in such a way that there will be no difficulty in raising the sum apportioned by the National Commission.

Miss McLaughlin Speaks—Miss McLaughlin, of the Industrial Insurance Commission of the State of California, spoke before the Social Service Committee of the Diocese May 14. Under the chairmanship of the Rev. G. W. B. Wright the Social Service Department has been doing educational work of great importance. Not only are there open meetings held once a month at St. Stephen's Church, but the Committee keeps the clergy informed of all civic, industrial, state and national welfare and social service work. Mr. Wright, Mr. McGinnity, and Mr. Astredo were present at the meeting of Social Workers in Santa Barbara. Mr. McGinnity and Mr. Astredo are now attending a national meeting of Social Agency experts in the East. It might be interesting to note that Mr. Astredo is the Chief Probation Officer and Mr. McGinnity is the chairman and genius of the San Francisco Chamber of Commerce Charity Indorsement and Social Service Commission.

Clerical Seminar Re-established—The Rev. W. M. Bours, president of the Clerical Seminar in San Francisco, has put energy into a re-establishing of the Seminar, which is over twenty years old. The monthly meetings are alive with discussions of questions of current interest to the Church, and the readers of the papers have the great pleasure of defending their position against all comers. Out here on the Coast there is every tendency to slow up, but with an active and keenly enthusiastic Seminar or Clericus such as this the Clergy keep alive and abreast with the world of thought in theology, philosophy, literature and politics.

IDAHO

Indians Are Smiling—The Fort Hall Indian Mission is going on well. The Rev. S. W. Creasey is assisted by the United Offering teacher. The attitude of the Bannocks and the Shoshones is most friendly. The rumor had gotten abroad that the building destroyed by fire would not be rebuilt until after the war, but now that the building is actually going up, more substantial than ever, the Indians are all smiles when the missionaries meet them. The Bishop has an excellent man in charge of the construction.

Hospital Does Great Work—St. Luke's Hospital, Boise, has been doing a wonderful work this Winter. It has been running at full capacity. Fifteen hundred patients were cared for last year, one thousand of these were operative cases. The Bishop has complete control and it is an out and out Church hospital and that means a great opportunity for our spiritual work. It is necessary to rebuild a set of operating rooms at once. The plans are drawn and the Bishop has given out the contract at a cost of $7,000. Though lacking in cash, he had acted in the faith that Christ who helped the sick when He was on earth would not fail those who sought to help them through His Church now. Several graduate nurses are badly needed in St. Luke's at once.

NORTH TEXAS

Convocation—The Eighth Annual Convocation of North Texas met in Big Spring, the guest of the Mission of St. Mary the Virgin, which numbers thirty-seven communicants, and is at present without a resident minister. This portion of the district is in the very heart of the drought-stricken section of Texas, where there have been but a very few inches of rain within a period of two years.

Notwithstanding these facts this was one of the very best meetings ever held in North Texas. The attendance of clerical and lay delegates and members of the Woman's Auxiliary were all above normal, and the spirit of all sessions was bravely hopeful and determined.

Bishop Temple presided at all sessions and in his address dealt forcefully with the problem of the Church's work during the war and the preparation of the people to meet the issues which shall grow out of the war. It was an appeal for patriotic loyalty and religious devotion.

Archdeacon Wm. Garner preached the Convocation sermon, and Rev. A. W. S. Garden, Secretary of the Seventh Province, made a stirring appeal for Church extension as a big business enterprise more than worthy to be classed with the gigantic undertakings made necessary by the war. Rev. C. L. Pardee, D.D., representative of the American Church Building Fund Commission, addressed a joint meeting of Convocation and the Auxiliary. His message was of special interest because of the fact that practically every building in the district has received valuable help from the Commission.

Considerable difficulty was found in securing an accurate account of the state of the Church because of inadequate and inaccurate records in many congregations. The Committee on the State of the Church was instructed to prepare for next Convocation a form of Treasurer's Book that would correspond with the form of annual or triennial report.

Among the elections and appointments were the following: Council of Advice, the Rev. A. D. Ellis, the Rev. W. A. Williams, J. C. Prude, Will Stith; secretary, the Rev. G. C. Rafter, Clarendon; treasurer, C. J. E. Lowndes, Amarillo; chancellor, Judge Arthur Yonge.

President Woman's Auxiliary, Mrs. Henry Batjer, Abilene; vice-president, Mrs. J. B. McClelland, Clarendon; secretary-treasurer, Mrs. W. W. Rix, Big Spring; treasurer United Offering, Mrs. Henry S. Gooch, Amarillo; director Juniors, Mrs. Walter C. Sherman, Amarillo; Little Helpers, Miss Lila McClelland, Clarendon.

RHODE ISLAND

An Interesting Anniversary—The Church of the Transfiguration, Edgewood, has been observing its twenty-fifth anniversary in unusual manner. On Sunday, May 12, the mortgage on the property was burned. This had existed since the beginning and had been slowly reduced from year to year. On the following Sunday, Whitsunday, the church was consecrated by Bishop Perry, and the rector, the Rev. Levi B. Edwards, announced the gift of a stone tower, to cost $10,000. This is the anniversary offering of Mrs. William H. Hall, a communicant of the parish from its beginning. The breaking of the ground for this tower in the near future will complete the anniversary observances.

When the present rector took charge in 1909 the parish was worshiping in a small chapel on its present attractive site on Broad Street, in the suburbs of Providence. In the following year the present beautiful church, of Oneco granite, was erected, where, it is remembered, Bishop Perry held his first Confirmation after being made bishop in 1911. At the same time the chapel was transformed into an attractive rectory, and guild rooms were provided in the basement of the church. The architectural grouping of the buildings, enhanced by successful landscape gardening about them, has made the church property rank among the most picturesque in the diocese. The property is now valued at $34,000. There has thus been a phenomenal growth of the parish during the nine years' rectorship of the Rev. Mr. Edwards.

WYOMING

A Fiftieth Anniversary—Fiftieth Anniversaries of Church life are not common events in the Western districts, and the rector and people of St. Mark's Church, Cheyenne, felt a deep sense of gratitude and thankfulness to God in the observance of the Semi-Centennial of St. Mark's Parish, commemorating the erection of the first Church, 1868; the first services in the present Church, 1888, and the cancelation of the indebtedness on the Parish House, 1918.

Communicants and well-wishers numbering more than two hundred gathered at a Fellowship Supper held in the Parish House on the evening of Thursday, May 16, to extend congratulations over fifty years of achievement.

Many noted speakers had been secured for the occasion, and many tributes were paid to the memory of Cheyenne's fi rector, the Rev. Joseph W. Cook, wh pioneer work in this vicinity made possi the building of the first Church in 18 incidentally the first Church struct erected in Wyoming; to the Rev. Geo C. Rafter, who for twenty-two years ser the parish as its rector and who s serves it as its beloved Rector Emerit under whose guidance the present Mark's was built; to Bishop Thomas, w inspired the building of the Parish Ho and to the present rector, the Rev. S. Huston, under whose direction the he indebtedness on the Parish House has t year been canceled.

During the program following the din which was presided over by Mr. Hus as toastmaster, addresses were given Mr. Frank S. Burrage of the Cathed vestry, who has spent a number of ye in Wyoming and who gave a noble trib to Dr. Rafter; by Dr. Rafter; by Bisl Thomas, who gave due credit to the p and present workers in the parish; Bishop Johnson of Colorado, who had co from Denver for the occasion; by D Thornberry of St. Matthew's Cathed Laramie, classmate and old friend of Huston, and by Mr. Luke Voorhees Mr. J. H. Walton of the present ves

On Friday afternoon, May 17, St. Mar Guild, successor to St. Mark's Mite Soci of fifty years ago, extended hospitality i "Golden Anniversary Tea." On that ev ing the Confirmation Service was held.

While the present St. Mark's was b in 1888 its consecration was deferred u May 14, 1893, and services on Whitsun morning were in commemoration of event. The Collect, Epistle and Gospel the Consecration of a Church were u in this service, the epistle being read Dr. Rafter, who had been instrume in building the Church. The sermon gi by the rector was on the text "Ye Are Temple of the Living God."

OKLAHOMA

Convocation Meets—The Annual Con cation at El Reno, May 6-8, had great a tions to its interest in the presence inspiring addresses of Bishops Wise Thurston, the Rev. Dr. Pardee of Church Building Fund Commission, and Rev. T. R. Ludlow of Boone College, H kow. Especially were the addresses of latter informing and stimulating. The of the Convocation's work and that of simultaneous Woman's Auxiliary largely of a routine sort. The offic chosen were with slight exceptions th of the past year. The action of the Bis in putting the work among colored pe under the care of the Suffragan Bishop Colored Work, elected by the Diocese Arkansas, when he is consecrated, unanimously approved.

An Interesting Program—In connect with the fiftieth annual convention of Diocese to be held June 4-6 at Ch Church, Easton, the Rev. Henry Da rector of Christ Church, has prepared interesting anniversary program which be given the evening of June 6. The F George Lay, son of Bishop Lay, the Bishop of the Diocese and now headma of St. Mary's School, Raleigh, North Ca lina, will give an address. The Rev. R t Wilson, D.D., of Charleston, South Carina, the only surviving clergyman who as a member of the first convention of e Diocese, will also make an address, and dge Pierce of Chestertown, chancellor of e Diocese, will discuss the history and ospects of the work here.

n the Standing Committee—At the last eeting of the Standing Committee the ev. Henry Davies, Ph.D., was elected to a vacancy caused by the death several onths ago of the Rev. Mr. Howard. He as also made secretary of the committee.

ork at Camp Meade—In our little pel of St. Peter, Patuxent, in the centre the Remount Depot within the area of mp Meade, we have held regular serv- for soldiers, under the general superon of Volunteer Chaplain Torrey, and ices have been held on our initiative invitation by other religious communs, including the Roman Catholics. We e also used the Y. M. C. A. buildings in the cantonment, but have been forced ne conclusion that the only way in which work can be properly and adequately e is through additional building facil- to supplement them by providing es solely for worship and the administion of the Sacraments, and thus relieve e other buildings so that they can e satisfactorily fulfil the particular purs for which they were primarily and ifically erected.

ully persuaded of the necessity and duty of affirmative response from the Church to this Macedonian cry, Pennsylvania, Washington and Maryland proposed erecting at Odenton a building costing about $5,000, but Mrs. B. H. Buckingham and her sister, Miss Isabel C. Freeman, two good Churchwomen of Epiphany Church, Washington, being informed of the undertaking, generously contributed the whole amount necessary for a most complete and commodious structure at a cost of more than twice this sum. A conveniently located lot was purchased at Odenton to accommodate this building, the title to which is vested in the Church Extension Society of the Diocese of Maryland, with the agreement that should Camp Meade at any future time be evacuated as a cantonment the plant will be used by us as central headquarters for the prosecution of missionary work of our Church in Anne Arundel County. This building is now nearing completion and will accommodate a resident staff of four clergymen. This will include a chief of staff and three associates—one from each of the dioceses represented. In addition to the chapel there is a large attractive lounge or social room, a dining-room, and a kitchen. The second story is an open loft where dormitory accommodations could be arranged for probably ten or twelve men.

The total cost of Epiphany Chapel and Clergy House at Odenton, Camp Meade, including land and furnishings, will be in round figures $14,000, all of which has been contributed by private individuals.

This building will be opened this month, with appropriate services. Major General Kuhn, Commanding Officer of Camp Meade, and General Nicholson will be the principal speakers for the occasion.

DENVER

Bishop's Memorial Chair—The Rev. Horace B. Hitchings left $3,000 for a memorial to himself to be placed in St. John's Cathedral, Denver, of which he was rector from 1862 to 1869. He also left one-third of his property, estimated at $75,000, to the Cathedral and another third to an allied institution, St. Luke's Hospital, Denver. The memorial took the form of a Bishop's chair, a copy of the most beautiful one existing in England, that at Worcester Cathedral, and it was dedicated on Rogation Sunday, the deed of gift being read by Mr. George Berger and the procession consisting of the Committee of the Diocese and the Cathedral vestry, enlivened by the bright uniforms of the cadets of the Collegiate School, all advancing eastwards under the rich shadows of stained glass and banners of allied nations and among others a service flag of fifty-four stars.

The Bishop was escorted to his new throne by the Dean and Canon Holoran, and the other clergy officiating were the Rev. F. W. Oakes and Archdeacon Schofield, but that morning returned from Africa, for whose safe return a thanksgiving prayer was suitably interposed in the service. On the lofty, towering chair are three figures, one of Dr. Hitchings, another of his friend and companion in missionary labors, Bishop Randall, and the third the late Bishop of Utah, Frank Spalding, killed not so long ago in an automobile accident in Salt Lake, fearless champion of Christianity and first Episcopal product of the Cathedral of St. John.

Strong Men's Club—The Men's Club of the Cathedral parish meets nearly 100 strong every month, and was addressed in May by Mr. W. W. Grant on his impressions of the great personages of the war.

Wins the Banner—St. Barnabas received the banner for Children's Lenten Sunday School collections at the gathering of all diocesan schools held at St. Mark's. The total collection was over $1,500. The banner class has always been from this Church, where also nearly $10,000 was collected for the Third Liberty Loan. Evergreen, beloved little haunt of tourists in the mountains, came second with forty-seven little boxes contributed by the native children of the place containing $100.

Many Changes—Trinity Memorial Church has been occupied by the Ascension congregation since the fire in the latter Church, but now Trinity is to have a resident rector, the Rev. Claude Reader from Merrill, Wisconsin, and Ascension is to rise from its ruins at a cost of $20,000, most of which sum is in hand. St. Thomas has also gathered enough money to build a new Church. Emanuel Church has been deprived of its vicar for an indefinite period, the Rev. S. R. S. Gray, who is substituting for the Rev. F. R. Godolphin at Grace Church, Oak Park, Illinois. Canon Holoran was in charge of the parish, but is succeeded now by Archdeacon Schofield, and the Sisters of St. John the Evangelist have been allotted the vicarage for their domicile and work.

Parish War Work—St. Mark's rejoices in the selection of her own Frank Shelby to be in charge of all the Brotherhood of St. Andrew work at the front with headquarters in Paris. This Church counts fifty or more to her service flag, had nearly 600 communicants at Easter in spite of these absences, gave $265 to the Church's War Commission and $60 to the Bishop of Jerusalem's Fund, and reckons her regular morning congregations at 400.

Colored Work—Great things may be expected from a Negro commercial association founded by the Rev. Henry B. Brown in Denver, to unite the colored population for farming, colonizing and mercantile pursuits. Its weekly bulletin and co-operative store attendance promise to dignify the scattered efforts of the formerly scattered population.

WEST TEXAS

Chaplain Appointed—The post of diocesan chaplain to army camps in the Diocese of West Texas, made vacant by the appointment of Chaplain Lee W. Heaton to be Archdeacon, has been filled by the appointment of the Rev. Frank A. Rhea by the War Commission. Chaplain Rhea has been missionary among the Sioux Indians on the Sisseton Reservation in South Dakota. Strangely enough, his first opportunity to serve the soldiers was in the case of two Sioux Indians—twin brothers—who are stationed at Kelly Field, the aviation camp.

The camps in and near San Antonio are now well covered by civilian chaplains, but it would mean a great saving in time to have the names and camp addresses of Churchmen stationed here. Texas is the state of magnificent distances and army camps are built on the same scale. The diocesan chaplain is always ready and eager to be of service to the men in the camps or to the rectors and relatives at home. Address communications to the Rev. Frank A. Rhea, Diocesan Chaplain, room 315 Prudential Building, San Antonio, Texas.

Organization Increased—The diocese has been fortunate in having Miss May Case Marsh, Field Secretary of the Girls Friendly Society, as a visitor in the various parishes and missions during the past month. Branches have been organized in all of the San Antonio parishes and at St. Philip's School, and at Cuero and Victoria. Three new Chapters of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew have been organized in the diocese in the past two months.

PHILADELPHIA

A Correction—Bishop Garland is to preach at St. John's College at Annapolis: not at Naval Academy, as reported last week. The chaplain of the academy always preaches to the graduating class.

At Presbyterian Church—Bishop Rhinelander preached in Calvary Presbyterian Church on Sunday, May 12, on "The War and Church Unity."

Historical Society Meets—The Church Historical Society met at the Divinity School last week. Prof. Robinson was the principal speaker on the life and work of Bishop White.

For Women Workers—At Holy Trinity Church there was lately held a Prayer Service for women war workers. As an outcome of that meeting, in which leaders of many religious bodies took part, steps are being taken to have an hour of prayer for general use at noon.

Funeral of the Late Mr. Davidson—The Rev. Thomas William Davidson, who died on Ascension Day, was buried from St. James' Church on Monday, May 13. Mr. Davidson had done much for the poor, the sick and prisoners in the care of the City Mission.

Churches Robbed—Twelve churches have been robbed in the last two weeks in the city. Ten were Presbyterian, but St. Luke's and The Epiphany, in Germantown, were the last to be entered. It took the thieves some time to enter the right church. Nothing of value was taken.

ST. LOUIS

Big Brother Conference—The International Conference of Big Brothers and Big Sisters met in St. Louis this month and brought together men and women of large experience in child welfare work. Among the speakers on the program was the Rev. Rufus D. L. Putney, who spoke on Religious Phases of Big Brother Work. Before he studied for orders, Mr. Putney was one of the organizers of the movement and served as secretary of the Big Brother organization in New York. Mr. Putney has been for three years in charge of the Church's important work at Kirksville.

Home for Convalescents—The Church in St. Louis is exceedingly proud of the ministrations which are carried on under her auspices in the city institutions. Just now a new step forward has been taken in the establishing of a Country Home for Convalescents. There has been such a home in the thick of the city for a number of years. It is proposed now that there shall be an attractive resting place on a farm, ten miles from the city. It is hoped eventually to have accommodations for men, women and children. But for the present women only will be received; those who have been discharged from the various city institutions as cured, but who need quiet surroundings, pure air and wholesome food to assist the processes of recuperation. A farm of twenty acres has been bought, with an eight-room house, in an ideal location. This will add another excellent opportunity to the Hospital Missionary, the Rev. John Howard Lever, to minister in Christ's name to them that are out of the way.

Bishop Tuttle at Rally—Bishop Tuttle attended and gave the benediction at a big patriotic rally in St. Louis under the auspices of the Gideons, Sunday, May 12. The principal speaker was Former Governor Folk of Missouri.

Assistant at St. Peter's—The Rev. George Lloyd, since the Rev. W. L. Essex resigned his position in January, is associated with the Rev. Dr. Phillips in connection with the work of St. Peter's parish and as vicar of Epiphany chapel, St. Louis.

LOS ANGELES

Easter Echoes from the Pacific—Better belated, perhaps, than not at all, St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral is just now, May 5, celebrating the tenth anniversary of its accomplished dean and rector, Dr. MacCormack. The Pro-Cathedral has notably enlarged its scope during these ten years. The noonday services during Lent were the most successful of any year since their inception. The climax was reached on Good Friday at the Three Hours' Service, when over 1,500 were present. On Easter Day many hundreds failed of admission into the church. Approximately 1,000 received the Holy Communion.

Fifth Anniversary at St. John's—St. John's Church, Los Angeles, too, is celebrating the fifth anniversary of its rector, D. Davidson. On Easter Day there were more than 900 Communions, the offerings exceeding $2,300. The parish has now upwards of 1,200 communicants, being nearly double the number on the books of the church when the present rector began his ministry five years ago. On a recent Sunday the Bishop confirmed a class of 78.

Ninety-one and Drives a Ford—The Church of the Epiphany, Los Angeles, honored its associate rector, the Rev. Henderson Judd, on a recent occasion with the presentation of a large cake with 91 tapers on it at a birthday party for their distinguished guest, who, on that day, had attained that great age. Mr. Judd may be said to be the Nestor and the Mentor of the diocese rolled into one, and greatly beloved by all. When he reached the comparatively mature age of 90 Mr. Judd invested in a Ford, never having driven a machine before, and, having since become an expert in covering some 4,000 miles, he has lately published "The Auto Experiences of a Nonagenarian." Mr. Judd is the indefatigable Honorary Representative of the Jerusalem and East Mission for the Province of the Pacific, and he has brought this diocese ar the entire province up to an enviable re ord in their generous contributions to th fund.

Loss at South Pasadena—The Easte tide of St. James' Church, South Pasaden has been saddened by the enforced resign tion, through continued illness, of its high esteemed rector, the Rev. W. H. Wotto Mr. Wotton has done most effective ser ice during his long ministry in the dioce as rector of St. Athanasius' Church, L Angeles; the Church of the Messiah, San Ana, and of late years as rector of S James' Church, South Pasadena. It hoped that a complete rest will effect h restoration to health.

Commander is Grateful—As a numb of the soldiers from Camp Kearny are v itors in Oceanside on Sundays, the ladi of the Guild of Grace Church serve t each Sunday afternoon to the visiting s diers in the parish house. BETHLEHEM

Many Changes Among Clergy—Th are many changes in the Diocese of Be lehem among the clergy. The Rev. Le B. Sheen, who has served as Assist at St. Stephen's, Wilkes-Barre, has be appointed a Y. M. C. A. Secretary for t transport service. Mr. Sheen is eminen fitted for work among men and will fit i this peculiar kind of service. It will be business to travel back and forth on t transports, going with the troops and turning with the invalided soldiers. T Rev. J. Arthur Glasier has accepted a c to Trinity Church, Bethlehem, leavi Trinity Church, West Pittston, after a v successful ministry.

Commission Wants Women Member The Social Service Commission of t diocese is to seek an amendment to t canons so as to permit the appointment three women to the commission. It is hop in this way to bring into its work seve distinct interests which have hitherto o been represented by an auxiliary commit without any vote or authority.

War Gifts Large—The total amount ceived for the Church's War Commissi Fund was $17,989.

Good Year for Mission—The Dioces Board of Missions reports a very succe ful year. Between $10,000 and $11,000 w raised and $800 was paid upon old del The Board is seeking to bring into clo iation an auxiliary commission of the ese, the Bishop's Church Extension ıd Commission which has succeeded in ing in the past four years over $24,- riotic Services at Evanston—On the Sunday in May the Rev. John Henry kins, D.D., of the Church of the Re- ner, Chicago, preached the first in a s of six notable patriotic sermons on erica and the War" at the afternoon ice at St. Luke's Church, Evanston. Hopkins handled his rather startling ect, "Christ versus Antichrist, an Inter- tion of this War," in his usual master- manner. On May 12 the preacher was Very Rev. Bernard Iddings Bell, Dean ond du Lac, the chaplain to the Jackies e Great Lakes Naval Training Station. subject was "The War and Our Ameri- Men." He paid a glowing tribute to the kies at Great Lakes." Much interest evinced at this, the first of Dean Bell's rances at St. Luke's since he an- ced his decision to remain at the Naval ning Station.

Pays to Advertise—Quite recently Pond of the Cathedral and City Mis- Staff advertised in the diocesan , asking for the gift of an organ for se of the clergy at the services in the y jail. The response was astonishing, organs being given. All, however, been well placed. St. Andrew's ch, Downer's Grove, presented the organ, which was placed in the jail; tryman of St. Martin's Church, Austin, nted the second, which was placed in Women's Chapel at the City House of ction, while the third, presented by ls at Burnside, was placed in the Lady l at the Cathedral. ALBERT EDWARD SELCER.

English Church News

St. George's Day—One of the possible by-products of this great war is that St. George may come into his own. We are not good at celebrating special days in this country. Even if we had a national event comparable to your Fourth of July, one doubts whether we could focus our national spirit sufficiently. But at least we are trying to recover St. George. It can be only a limited celebration: Scotland, Ireland and Wales are out of it. Even England has almost forgotten her patron saint, and many Englishmen could not give the date of his anniversary. But the coincidence of the day with the date of the brilliant attack of our navy at Zeebrugge has done something to help us this year. Our sailors at least remembered the dragon. But our best chance lies with the Church. At present, the matter of the celebration has been left to a few churches of the advanced type, such as that of All Saints. It is noticed, however, that the observance of the day is becoming more general.

Clergy for Military Service—We are determined that the nation will not be able to reproach the clergy any longer as shirkers. Our Bishops seem to be unanimous in deciding that we must come forward just as if the compulsory clause had been passed by Parliament. The Bishop of London is the most outspoken of them all. All clergy under 51 years of age are invited to send in their names, making an offer to undertake either combatant or non-combatant service. He is prepared to give dispensation to combatants "now that the lives and honor of women and children depend upon the courage and skill of their men-folk." It will not be possible to let all who offer go. It will be necessary to have one priest in each parish, and in certain large parishes two. A special tribunal will sit daily at the Bishop's house in St. James' Square, consisting of himself, his suffragans, and the archdeacons, which will decide what offers can be accepted. This, he points out, would have been the procedure, even if compulsion had been passed. Those who are not accepted can join the volunteers at home. They must lighten their duties as much as possible, give up all committee work which is not absolutely necessary, and confine themselves to one sermon a week, devoting the rest of their time to administering the Sacraments, visiting the sick and mourners, and conducting intercession services.

The Moderator's Lecture—The Church Press has received Dr. Cooper's lecture in the crypt of St. Paul's with great approval. The Guardian says that the event makes us begin to realize the immensity of the step forward which at last seems to be possible, if not quite imminent. The Church of Scotland and the United Free Church are in the process of fusion, and it is felt that the process must not stop there. We on our side "must be prepared to accept in federation a degree of elasticity very different from what might be appropriate in a case of absorption." We need elasticity anyhow, and if this is to some extent forced upon us by circumstances, so much the better—"the accomplished fact will often obviate a wilderness of discussion." The Church Times notes the Catholic temper which Dr. Cooper displays, though it thinks him mistaken in his claim that his own Presbyterian ordination is valid. But it strongly approves Dr. Cooper's attitude towards Episcopacy as the only sure bond of union, and of his generous attitude towards the Scottish Episcopal Church, which he recognizes as "genuinely Scottish, with a real root in the country." The general comment is that "the atmosphere is changing, and things will soon be possible in reality that could scarcely be imagined a decade ago."

The Evangelistic Work of the Church—Those who think that the National Mission of 1916 has been a failure have quite misapprehended its real scope. It was essentially a process of diagnosis, and its chief result has been to disclose the weaknesses of the Church itself. The Committee on Evangelistic Work has at any rate learned many things, and has just issued its report. It is full of assertions and suggestions, which in less exciting days would be amply discussed. The Archbishop of Canterbury indeed asks that it should be criticized, and the Church papers are doing their best. The leakage from organized religion is undeniable, and the remedy is not easy to find. There does not seem to be any "deep spiritual hunger" for religion, but rather, as the Church Times points out, for a better and happier world. The easiest way to make the Church popular would be to identify her creed with social service. The Committee is alive to the danger of this: the Church must not undertake social work "of a palliative nature" in order to gain a hearing. The Church must do her own work, and her social activity should be used as "the approach to the work of evangelization." It is not quite clear what the Committee means by this distinction, but probably the idea is that we should be careful not to "tack on" the Gospel to a policy of social activity, but to proclaim our social principles, not as ends in themselves, but as a preparation for the Gospel, frankly saying so throughout.

Generally speaking, the Committee want to recover the evangelistic spirit as a permanency, and not merely as a thing to be invoked on special occasions. And yet it suggests that there should be a "generous year" during which all the agencies of the Church should be directed towards the work of evangelization, abandoning meantime the usual parochial organizations. But the Guardian points out that the Church cannot afford to scrap the toil of years, and thinks that instead of a year of special work, there should be special Mission seasons, other than Advent and Lent. And the work should be as little of the "organized committee" type: the Bishops themselves, with their central group of missioners, should lead the effort.

BISHOP BRENT GRANTED WAR LEAVE BY DIOCESE

Resolution Favoring National Prohibition Passed Almost Unanimously

JAMESTOWN, NEW YORK.—The Eighty-first Annual Council of the Diocese of Western New York was held at St. Luke's Church here, May 21.

The Bishop of the Diocese, the Rt. Rev. C. H. Brent, D.D., being absent on his duties at the war-front in France, as General Headquarters Chaplain, the Secretary of the Council, the Rev. G. S. Burrows, acting under the canon, called the Council to order. The Rev. C. A. Jessup, D.D., rector of St. Paul's, Buffalo, was elected Presiding Officer of the Council.

Among others, resolutions were adopted as follows:

(1) Recommending and urging upon the parishes the increase of clerical salaries to the amount of 20 per cent.

(2) Urging the passage of the Barkley Bill, and the co-operation of the laity of the Church in securing war-emergency prohibition, and the ratification of the National Prohibition Amendment by the Legislature of the State. (Only two negative votes.)

(3) Recommending to the Synod of the Second Province that St. Stephen's College, Annandale, be an official college of the Province and arranging for aid in its financial support.

A very important business before the Council was the consideration of communications from Bishop Brent proposing either the arranging for his resignation as Bishop of the Diocese because of his detention abroad on war duty, or the election of a Bishop-coadjutor. The communication drew from the Council the following memorial and resolution, which were unanimously adopted:

The Bishop of the Diocese of Western New York has been appointed by the Secretary of War as Senior Chaplain of the U. S. Army in France—the most responsible position ever held by any clergyman in connection with the Army of the U. S. of America. His pre-eminent fitness for this very great distinction is everywhere conceded, not only because of his high character and great ability, but also on account of his past experience in connection with the Army and Government of the U. S. During the fifteen years of his residence in the Philippines, from 1902 to 1917, he was constantly in touch with the officers and men of the U. S. Army, and with every individual clothed with official responsibility in the administration of the civil affairs of the Islands. Moreover, his personal relations with General Pershing, commander-in-chief of the American Expeditionary Force, are known to be exceedingly personal and intimate.

We are most emphatic in our belief that the U. S. and its Allies are waging a righteous war, a war upon which we ask God's blessing without hesitation, and which we are sure Christ our Lord approves. In this practically world-wide war, a war of nations and peoples, and not merely a war of armies, we are all, every one of us, called upon to give our best. The best that the Diocese of Western New York can give is our Bishop. We are, as we should be, proud beyond words to give him for this service. As he himself has recently said: "We must give until we have nothing left to give, and if one dies in the giving, that is of no account." We must act in the same spirit that actuates him, if we are to be in any sense worthy of having him as our Bishop. If he lives, and we pray God that he may be spared, we shall be unspeakably proud when he returns to us to assume his duties as the head of our diocese. If he dies, and he well knows that this is within the range of possibility, we want him to die as Bishop of Western New York, as well as Senior Chaplain of the U. S. Army in France.

Therefore be it Resolved: That we record our deep appreciation of the privilege that is ours of giving our great Bishop for this great work; that we heartily endorse the action of the Standing Committee in granting unto him indefinite leave of absence; that in the judgment of this Council the relation existing between Bishop Brent and ourselves is one which only death can sever; and that we extend to him the assurance of our personal affection and complete approval of his acceptance of the high office conferred upon him by our Government, and we ask the prayers of the people of the Diocese for his overwhelming success in the discharge of the duties as Senior Chaplain, and his safe return to this diocese at the end of the war.

The Council adopted resolutions approving of the election of a Bishop-coadjutor for the diocese and requesting the consent of the Bishops and the Standing Committees of the Church; and providing that as soon as the necessary consents are obtained a Special Council be called to meet as early after the first of September as possible.

A very happy feature of the Council was the presence of the Rt. Rev. Fred'k Courtney, D.D., who, upon the request of the Council, addressed it, expressing his thanks to the Church people of the diocese for the cordial reception accorded him in his work within our borders; and suggesting the thought that the diocese should thank God for its Diocesan and the great work he is doing as headquarters Chaplain General, A. E. F., in France.

Bishop's Brent's message to the Council was on "Making Democracy Safe for the World." Sentences from it are:

> A salutary whirlwind is sweeping through the world, bearing both life and death in its tearing, scorching breath.
> There is no lesson which the churches are learning in the War Zone of greater importance than the impotence of our divided Christianity. I see no glimmer of hope for permanent and fraternal peace among the nations without at least as permanent and fraternal a peace among the churches.
> We, a complex and shattered world, stand face to face with the simple and only God. When men and nations and churches shall have become as simple as His only laws, the two laws of love, require us to be, then the kingdoms of this world will become the Kingdom of God and His Christ."

The following were elected to office: Standing Committee: The Rev. C. J. Davis, the Rev. C. A. Jessup, D.D., the Rev. W. A. R. Goodwin, D.D., the Rev. C. M. Sills, D.D., A. C. Walker, S. S. Brown, J. W. Crafts, M. D. Mann, M.D.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. C. A. Jessup, D.D., the Rev. P. Cushing, the Rev. G. S. Burrows, the Rev. G. M. Irish, W. J. Tully, A. B. Houghton, J. M. Prophet, J. G. Buckley.

DIVINITY SCHOOL GIVES BUILDINGS FOR HOSPITA

Announcement Made at Commen ment—New Courses

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.—De Bartlett announced at the commencem service of the Philadelphia Divinity Sch that the buildings had been sold to Mercy Hospital for Negro Officers and S diers. The sale involved $120,000. T buildings will be enlarged to accommod 200 beds, and eventually 1,500 to 2,000.

The Parish House of St. Andre Church, Eighth and Spruce Streets, v be the home of the school for the next t years. Recitations will be held there, they were in the first days of the sch before it moved, in 1882, to the larger qu ters now abandoned. A house has b rented at 901 Clinton Street to house students. It seems likely that there v be but twelve or fifteen in attendance n year: so many have gone into some fo of war work.

Dean Bartlett reported that the sch planned a two-year course, without Greek Hebrew, for business men, and for an ol group of men than usual. Also a spe course for any soldiers who plan to st for the Ministry after the war. A vent of faith was made, in the statement t such men need not be deterred from s a course through lack of funds. It hoped that someone, somewhere, somet would provide for their tuition and supp as in England.

Bishop Talbott conferred the degree Doctor of Sacred Theology upon the F Edgar Lewis Sanford (in course), and Honorary Degree upon the Rev. Alfred Gilman of Boone University, Wuch China; the Rev. ORES THE METHODS OF MODERN MINISTERS

Wonder Worth-While Men Seek Other Professions!

HILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA.—The Rev. A. MacCallum of the Walnut Street byterian Church addressed the clerical herhood at the church house on a re- Monday morning.

Each of the various sects places its ch buildings at strategic points, con- ed only from its own point of view," aid. "The city is divided into a series verlapping parishes. Maps of each de- ination cover the whole city, and ignor- ll the others. There is a steady rivalry een the different groups. Each seeks at up its neighbor if it can. The thier churches call the most attractive her, and hire the best singers that they and advertise through the community they have done so. A. Convention Reveals War Work spite of the great amount of work for the Red Cross and other war nizations the reports show good work in the Auxiliary. Much knitted work has been sent from Auxiliary branches to Bishop Israel in France. Bishop Horner of the Missionary District of Asheville asked assistance for the families of men who enlisted in Government service from his field, and the Auxiliary expects to send relief.

The officers elected for the ensuing year are: President, Mrs. J. E. Reilly, Oil City; vice-president, Mrs. J. K. P. Hall, Ridgway; treasurer, Miss Clara Miles, North Girard; secretary, Mrs. M. A. Byles, Oil City; organizing secretary for the Archdeaconry of Ridgway, Mrs. T. A. Morrison, Smethport; organizing secretary for the Archdeaconry of Meadville, Mrs. A. W. Krouse, Sharon; education secretary, Mrs. J. W. Mullins, Franklin; Junior Auxiliary secretary, Mrs. A. Reed, Erie; assistant, Miss Amy Radcliffe, Ridgway; Little Helpers secretary, Miss Vera Black, Bradford; United Offering treasurer, Miss Anna Copeland, Warren.

NEW MEXICO WOMEN MEET

Their Increase of Missionary Apportionment Inspires Men to Do Same

ALBUQUERQUE, NEW MEXICO.—The annual session of the Women's Auxiliary of the Missionary District of New Mexico and Texas West of the Pecos River opened here on April 30, and continued three days.

Mrs. Fuller Swift, of El Paso, Texas, conducted a round table each day. The Rev. A. W. S. Garden, secretary of the Province of the Southwest, and Miss Peters, of the San Juan Indian Mission, contributed much that was inspiring and educational.

The quiet hour was conducted by the Rev. Walter S. Trowbridge, of Sante Fe. Bishop Howden visited the body at various times and gave wise counsel and hearty encouragement.

Under the able leadership of the president, Mrs. George Rutledge of El Paso, the Auxiliary reported a year of advanced service. The Pilgrimage of Prayer was observed, helpful institutes held and a marked increase in the interest of the women noted.

The Auxiliary voted to increase their apportionment and that action inspired the Convocation to ask the Board of Missions to increase the apportionment of the entire district. The next annual meeting will be held in El Paso, Texas, at the Church of St. Clement.

ORDINATION

GREAT FALLS, MONTANA.—The Rev. John Millard Nelson of Livingston was advanced to the priesthood in the Church of the Incarnation here on Ascension Day by the Rt. Rev. William F. Faber, bishop of the diocese.

At the same service Mr. Claudius Arville Ross of Great Falls was ordained to the diaconate. The candidates were presented by the Rev. Gaylord G. Bennett, who also read the Epistle and assisted the Bishop in the administration of the Holy Communion.

Morning Prayer was said at 9 o'clock by the Rev. J. Millard Nelson, Mr. Ross reading the lessons. The sermon was preached by the Bishop. The Rev. J. N. Chesnutt, D.D., of Fort Bruton was present in the chancel.

Mr. Ross is assistant at the Church of The Incarnation, Great Falls.

LIST OF CONFERENCES FOR CHURCH-WORKERS

Suggested That Vestries Pay Expenses of One Person to Conference

NEW YORK CITY.—From the Board of Missions comes the following detailed information regarding the various Conferences for Church-workers this Summer:

Church Conferences: Eagles Mere, Pennsylvania, Province III, June 17-21; Gambier, Ohio, Province V, June 19-20; Cambridge, Massachusetts, Province I, June 21-July 6; Geneva, New York, Province II, July 1-12; Racine, Wisconsin, Province V, July 17-25; Sewanee, Tennessee, Province IV, August 6-13.

Brotherhood of St. Andrew: Northfield, Massachusetts, August 14-21.

Interdenominational Conferences of the Missionary Education Movement: Blue Ridge, North Carolina, June 25-July 4; Silver Bay, New York, July 5-14; Estes Park, Colorado, July 12-21; Axilomar, California, July 16-25; Ocean Park, Maine, July 19-28; Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, July 26-August 4; Seabeck, Washington, July 30-August 8.

The Church Conferences are, of course, intended primarily for Church people. They provide the best possible courses of instruction in the various phases of Church work, usually grouping the courses under the three departments of Religious Education, Social Service, and the Mission of the Church, respectively. Excellent instructors, both clerical and lay, conduct the courses throughout the morning of each day of the conferences. The afternoons are given over to recreation and excursions, for which the location of each conference provides abundant opportunity.

"It would be abundantly worth while if vestries would seriously consider paying all the expenses incident to sending at least one member of their parish to the Conference within their own Province," said Dr. Sturgis. The cost, exclusive of railway fares, and the small registration fee ($3.00-$5.00), varies from about $10.50 to $17.50 per week. Further information regarding any of the Conferences can be procured from the Educational Department, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

WOMEN'S GUILD HAVE JOINT HOOVER LUNCH

EAST MAUCH CHUNK, PENNSYLVANIA.—A "Hoover Supper," an interesting experiment to promote co-operation, was recently tried in St. John's Church and proved most successful. It was served in the parish rooms, and the members of all the organizations for women and girls in the parish were invited. There are six such organizations in St. John's. Different colored badges of crèpe paper were worn by the guests to designate the society to which each belonged.

The rector of the church, the Rev. H. E. A. Durell, was toastmaster, and introduced the speakers.

Miss Boyer of Pottsville was the guest of honor and gave a very inspiring talk on co-operation and the joy of the Master's Service as it finds its expression in the activities of the parochial organizations. Short addresses were made by the heads of the different societies. The festivities closed with the singing of the national hymn, America.

LOUISIANA FIRST STATE TO DEFEAT RATIFICATION

But Prohibition Movement Grows Apace Throughout the Country

NEW YORK CITY.—Louisiana furnishes the first State legislature squarely to defeat ratification of the Federal Prohibition Amendment, that legislature doing so by a tie vote of 20 to 20 in the Senate on May 23, after the House had given a favorable vote of 70 to 44. Louisiana is a license state and New Orleans is one of the strong "wet" centres of the Nation. Notwithstanding this fact, it was believed by the prohibition forces that the legislature could be carried and the tie vote shows how near their hopes were of realization. It can be voted on again by the next session of the Louisiana legislature.

Congress is again the scene of prohibition activity, due to efforts to force the President to exercise his power to prohibit the use of any foodstuffs for the making of beers and wines. On May 21, sitting as a committee of the whole, the House of Representatives amended the Food Production Bill so as to forbid the expenditure of $6,100,000 out of the eleven million dollar appropriation until the President issues a proclamation embodying the prohibitions specified above.

"In our judgment," says Dr. Epringham, "it would be better for Congress to pass the Barclay Bill for complete prohibition for the duration of the war than seek to saddle such action upon the President under the conditions that now exist. While the President is conditionally empowered to commandeer the stocks of whisky in store, he cannot do so in fact because these liquors are not now necessary for munitions purposes nor are they likely to be. With this as a basic fact, the President has refrained from closing the breweries so long as he could not prevent the sale of whisky. It is a legislative function and Congress should act, not seek to unload the responsibility on the President."

The Northern Baptist Convention in session at Atlantic City and the Presbyterian General Assembly, in session at Columbus, Ohio, have both taken action favorable to immediate national prohibition.

New Jersey continues to increase the number of "dry" communities, elections on May 21 adding twelve more.

Congress has enacted prohibition for the Territory of Hawaii.

During the week the Diocese of Harrisburg and of Western New York have passed by large majorities resolutions urging the ratification by the State legislature of the Amendment to the Federal Constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of alcoholic beverages.

LONG ISLAND CONVENTION AGAINST PROHIBITION

Fails to Ratify Amendment, Saying Question Is Political

GARDEN CITY, LONG ISLAND.—The annual Convention of the diocese, which opened at the Cathedral here May 21, refused to ratify the National Prohibition amendment by a vote of 89 to 50. The question developed warm discussion, speakers against the ratification protesting that the question of prohibition was a political question, and therefore had no place in a religious convention.

Bishop Burgess made a strong protest against the clergy being tongue-tied in times of great political crises. The Church "must speak for justice and truth. It is hers to supply the religious motive, which if it prevails will make any form of government successful."

The Rev. Robert Rogers, Ph.D., was re-elected secretary, the Rev. John Gerdtenberg assistant secretary and Mr. George Hewlett treasurer of the Long Island Diocese.

The consideration of the new canon giving women the right to vote at the annual elections came up and was won by a majority. The work being done by the Social Service Committee was presented, and it was urged that the plans now being made to work with the Church Mission of Help might be furthered by interesting the women of the parishes.

A resolution was offered concerning the organizing of work for religious education in the universities and colleges in the Province of New York and New Jersey.

THE REV. HENRY LUBECK, LL.D., D.C.L.

The trustees of the diocese are Mr. Frederick T. Aldridge, Mr. George Hewlett, Mr. Charles B. Denny, Mr. Walter Jennings and Mr. William J. Montgomery. The Standing Committee was re-elected. The following were elected as the Diocesan Board of Religious Education: The Rev. William Garth, the Rev. Duncan M. Genns, Mr. W. R. Marsh and the Hon. Charles H. Fuller.

A Worthy Mission

NEW YORK CITY.—The Society of Inner Mission and Rescue, with an office at 56 Pine Street and its Children's Mission and Children's Home in Brooklyn, is carrying on a campaign to raise funds to maintain its work.

The work of the Mission is one of those essential works which a city like New York can ill afford to be without. Last year there were nearly 4,000 calls at its office for help. Children are gathered every evening in its Brooklyn Mission for religious instruction, and its Children's Home deserves hearty support.

DR. LUBECK'S RECTORATE RECORD OF ACHIEVEME

Created Wide Sphere of Influenc the Church

NEW YORK CITY.—After a rectorate more than thirty years in one parish, Rev. Henry Lubeck, LL.D., D.C.L., re of the Church of Zion and St. Timo 334 West Fifty-seventh Street, New Y City, has resigned.

Dr. Lubeck was born in Sydney, Aus lia, and was ordained priest in the Dio of Grafton and Armidale, New So Wales, in 1882. Very soon afterward came to this country and entered the cese of Albany, where he served most cessfully as rector first of Zion Chu Fonda, and then of Grace Church, Ly from which cure he was called to St. T othy's Church, New York City, then on the city's smaller parishes. Under Lubeck's able and wise administration parish has had a wonderful growth. It combined with Zion Church and the r nificent Gothic structure on Fifty-sev street was built and called by the nam Zion and St. Timothy. From this pa as a centre, the influence of the bel rector, famous throughout the whole An can Communion for his eloquent and tensely spiritual sermons, permeated city, touching with benediction thousand men and women of whom he can n know.

During his ministry in New York he has worked intensely and with all might amid countless discouragements trials which have increased from yea year. He has met them all unflinchi refusing flattering offers to go elsewh not once but many times, until he has reached the present time when he is tremely tired physically and seeks a cease from the struggle against overwh ing difficulties of location, tremendous and anxious effort.

Dr. Lubeck has always had the eage sire to lift everything up to a very ex plane, to develop the most delicate fine of feeling and thought, and to advance sublimest spiritual life in organizations individuals. His great aim has been to ate loftiness everywhere. Those who k him best feel that he has accomplishe this in an almost supernatural manner where he has failed to do so in the live his parishioners the fault has not been the self-sacrificing, earnestly devout of God who ministered to them.

Mrs. Lubeck, formerly Miss Emma of Albany, is not only a charmingly s and intellectual helpmeet, but for t years has been a most active worker i parish and diocesan affairs, and the Mission Society, the Benevolent Cha the Altar Chapter and many organizat of the parish as well as the city strong testimonials to her efficient and ing service.

By his many friends it is earnestly h that Dr. Lubeck will in a little while re active work, for while he is physically he is mentally and spiritually fresher stronger than ever and prepared now the best work he has ever done. Ho the place and rank among the preache America that he does, the Church will allow him to really retire.

The Open Forum

The Bishops and the Church

o the Editor of The Churchman:

Does the House of Bishops speak the ind of the Church? If so we must for ry decency's sake henceforth keep silent ncerning Church Unity. Their unsym-thetic and gratuitously offensive reply to e communication presented to them rough Dr. Newman Smyth precludes any rther negotiation. It can only serve to epen the conviction which has for some me obtained among the Protestant urches that we are not sincere, and ver have been, in our protestations of de-re for unity. They believe that our real m is that "they all shall be one"—and at we shall be the one. They have good ound for the belief. A generation ago e "Quadrilateral" was offered by us as a fficient statement of "faith and order" on which to rest a reunited Church. The fer was more than courteously received the other churches and the prospect oked promising until it became evident at the offer was only a brutum fulmen. as there been a moment since that time hen the House of Bishops would have nsented to reunion on that basis—"The postles and Nicene Creeds as a suf-ient statement of Doctrine?" Ten years er the House of Bishops, ignoring the fer already made, deliberately estopped possibility of action upon it by announc-g that "Fixity of interpretation is of the sence of the Creeds." Now they wantonly fend those coming with a practical pro-sal by the implication that the churches hich they represent are not faithful even the Creed itself, and moreover that they e not such responsible bodies as can fely be negotiated with. Is this the nd of the Church? If so, as honest men d gentlemen let us have done with talk out Church Unity.

But are we not busy even yet with an-her device which the Commission on ith and Order seeks to arrange? How n we expect the other churches to deal th us while we have practically repu-ted the platform which we offered of r own motion twenty-five years ago?) we really want organic reunion? The ly must be. that as an ecclesiastical or-nization we do not, on any basis which n be accepted either by Rome or Protes-tism. The time has come to ask whether official machinery of the Church, with House of Bishops as its senate, rep-ents the Church. The House of Deputies rtainly does not. It could not if it would, the simple reason that it is not a rep-entative body. Five-sixths of its mem-'s is represented by one-sixth of the uties. Every proposal to rectify this quity is stubbornly opposed because its rection would allow the real mind of Church to be expressed.

Does the House of Bishops serve any ter? There the bishop who voices the shes of a hundred thousand communi-nts, in the active currents of the world's ought and movement, speaking for men who sway the destinies of the e, only equals that of him who speaks a little group of men, most of whom are dependent through him for their livelihood.

No; the reunion of Christendom will never come through officialdom in any form. The search for it through a negotiated agreement upon Faith and Order is will o' the wisp. It proceeds upon the assumption that a theory of the Church may be formulated first and then translated into concrete existence. Such a negotiated union would not outlast the generation which constructed it. No formula of the Faith can be constructed at any time which will serve for all time. The very words of the formula change their connotation as time goes on. No system or Order can be fixed and unchangeable. This procedure is contrary to God's and nature's way of doing things. No Creed or Discipline now extant came about that way. The earliest churches were planted, grew and became self-conscious organizations before they even tried to define their Faith. They altogether grew into a coherent body before they could arrange their Order. No Protestant church now extant formulated its doctrine and discipline first and then organized itself about it. It is like Locke's constitution of a State for the Carolinas—coherent, symmetrical, perfect, and which when put in practice lasted one year. The State or the Church must come into existence and feel its own soul before it projects its constitution. Church Unity when it comes will come from the unofficial action of individual Christians and congregations. The material for the Church of the future exists now in countless numbers. It is scattered and incoherent. It is sick and wearied with the scholastic futilities of formal dogmas. It will not even take the trouble to deny them. But it feels the stirring of a new life. Its individuals are not much given to speech. In the stern time in which we live their souls seek adjustment with the essential realities of things. But they are slowly discovering each other and drawing together into a religious fellowship. When that fellowship grows and becomes self-conscious it will formulate its intellectual Faith and its working Order. It is for this reason that we welcome such action as that taken in Newark and proposed by Newman Smyth. That the House of Bishops turned its back upon them with contempt matters little as to their future.

Concerning War and Free Speech

To the Editor of The Churchman:

May I venture to give expression to certain principles which, as I believe, are at this time controlling the thoughts and actions of an overwhelming majority of the people of our Church, if I may judge by what I hear from those whom I meet?

We repudiate the teaching of modern German philosophers that questions of morality are not involved in the actions of a State. The State is the aggregation of the individuals who compose it, and the moral rules which govern them should govern it also. If the State holds that it is not bound by the moral law, the logical and inevitable result will be that its citizens or subjects will come to deny moral obligation.

Holding these views, we declare without hesitation that the course of our country in entering upon the war in which it is now engaged is just and righteous. We are fighting not only to defend our homes and families against attack and outrage, but to maintain liberty and justice in the world and to secure to ourselves and our posterity the civilization which is based on the principles of our holy religion.

It is not our purpose to engage in controversy with those who hold that all war is sinful. Such an idea is based upon a partial and distorted view of the teaching of Christ and of the New Testament and it has never been held by this Church or by the Church Catholic of which it is a branch. There is the same warrant for opposing and restraining the crime of a nation as there is for controlling and punishing individual evil-doers.

Whether one holding the view that all war is sinful can remain in communion with this Church is a question for the conscience of the individual. But we declare that it is improper for anyone to promulgate such a view as a doctrine of this Church, and if the person who takes such a course occupies a position which lends authority to his utterances we consider that his action deserves disavowal and rebuke.

The justly valued right of free speech is not interfered with by this declaration. That right has always and everywhere been limited by the requirements of morality and of the public safety. These limits cannot be determined by any individual for himself. His conscience must be informed by the opinion of the wise and good of his age and of all ages. The Thugs in India act according to their conscience, but their conscience needs enlightenment.

A decent respect for the opinions of mankind should be encouraged; an inordinate respect for individual opinion should be repressed. It is rare in the centuries that an Athanasius arises, or that he is called upon to stand, against the world.

The Pension Fund Surplus

To the Editor of The Churchman:

May I, a subscriber and reader of many years, write you in regard to the pension matter? I am well assured from my own conclusions and from what I have heard from others, that at least two million dollars over the five millions originally proposed was at least under the tacit assumption that those receiving help from the Aged and Infirm Clergy Fund would be included among the pensioners of the new fund. It would be difficult to lay one's finger upon any definite statement to that effect, even when the absorption of that fund was being discussed. Now the position is positively taken that only those actively engaged when the new pension went into effect are included. All the obligations already assumed by the Aged and Infirm Clergy Fund were to be religiously protected, but as a matter of business and of right to all others they had no part. Now I am not writing in my own behalf, but as a matter of justice and fair play to those upon whom the present decision has worked a hardship. I had been superannuated for two years before the present was

Old Salem

MEMORIES OF OLD SALEM. By Mary H. Northend. New York, 1917: Moffat, Yard & Company. $4.00.

Mary H. Northend knows her Old Salem. In the lavish volume published by Moffat, Yard & Company we have not only a charming possession for booklovers, a collection of fascinating cuts of old doorways, and fireplaces, gardens and china, but a very interesting chronicle of Old Salem. The book is full of the wizard romance that still lingers about the old town. The reader can see that the author loves her Salem. She tells us why. The blood of the sea captains is in her veins—those fearless men with steady brains and iron will.

The splendid volume is a welcome addition to the already large collection of presentable books upon New England's mecca of tourists. W. A. S.

Over Japan Way

OVER JAPAN WAY. By Alfred M. Hitchcock. New York, 1918: Henry Holt & Company. $2.50.

Mr. Hitchcock, whose amusing, easy style reveals the professional journalist, gives one in this delightfully printed and illustrated book a pleasant account of his journey through Japan. There is nothing new in it. In fact, it seems doubtful whether there is much in the way of superficial description or non-critical history of Japan which has not been already written and rewritten. But the volume is good reading, and makes a welcome change in our diet of war books. M. J. H.

The Faith of a Farmer

THE FAITH OF A FARMER: Extracts from the Diary of William Dannatt of Great Waltham; edited, with an Introduction by J. E. G. de Montmorency, M.A., LL.B. London: John Murray. New York, 1917: E. P. Dutton & Company. $2.25.

This is a curious book, consisting of extracts from the diary of a busy but pious farmer (1843-1914), selected according to the subject and not in chronological order. It is a gentle practical sort of piety, with a vein of mysticism running through it that will doubtless appeal to those who like quiet, meditative writing. The style is simple and readable, and the book is excellently printed. There are occasional naive reflections on familiar themes that repay one for wading through many dull and conventional passages. Farming and Patriotism

THREE ACRES AND LIBERTY. By Bolton Hall. New York, 1918: The Macmillan Company. $1.75.

The scent of land is in the title, but the book is not a romance. It is the distillation of years of practical experience in farming. Mr. Hall is one of the pioneers in "back to the land" literature. A good deal of that type of armchair farming reminds us of Ladies' Home Journal housekeeping. It makes the "artistic home" altogether too easy. But Mr. Hall enters into scientific detail. He knows what an acre can produce and he tells the reader how to accomplish it.

Some of these chapters are of especial interest just now, while gardening and patriotism go hand in hand. This revision deserves a continuance of the popularity of the original volume which bore the title.

WAR GARDENS. By Montague Free. New York, 1918: Harper & Brothers. 50c.

Harper & Brothers have made a distinct contribution to the cause of patriotic gardens in this excellent little manual. The author is the head gardener of the Brooklyn Botanic Garden. He manages to answer in very small compass most of the questions which the backyard gardener asks himself. The 1917 vacant plot harvest amounted to three hundred and fifty millions. Perhaps with intelligent guidance, such as is offered here, the 1918 crop may be even greater. M. J. H.

A Pilgrimage of Peace

ON THE WINGS OF THE MORNING. By Arthur Grant. New York, 1918: E. P. Dutton & Company. $2.00.

Mr. Grant leads us on a pilgrimage of great beauty and attractiveness from the Island of Saints and the Land of Lorn in Scotland, through the Pilgrims' Way, by Winchester and Salisbury, to the cathedral city of Chichester, fragrant with its memories of William Collins. In these essays Scotch highlands and English countryside make their contrasting appeals to our sense of beauty. Our appreciation of their literary and historic associations is stimulated by thoughts of Sir Walter Scott, George Withers, John Keble, George Herbert and Lord Tennyson, with whose lives these villages which Mr. Grant describes are so closely connected. The pilgrimage is a pilgrimage of peace, told in words of simplicity and beauty, by an observer keenly alive to the glories of nature.

An American Parson in England

THE NOTE BOOK OF AN AMERICAN PARSON IN ENGLAND. By G. Monroe Royce. New York, 1918: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $2.00.

More entertaining than serious are these happy sketches by the rector of St. Thomas', Windsor, New York. We are sure the delightful writer has a "nose for news" and here and there we gather the impression that he has a 'heart for sermons," but he writes as a friendly human who sees life values even in the superficial and the curious. That is to say, his attitude toward life is kindly and in his eye is a glint of humor that sees rainbows of promise in the blue Mondays of a stranger in a strange land, where commonplace things are turned over by a keen imagination and made to contribute their share of lore and laughter for the gentle reader. The author held a special license from the Archbishop of Canterbury and spent six years supplying Sunday services in several dioceses and visiting all sorts and conditions of parishes. He gives the gist of his interesting experiences, together with considerable historic information, in these twenty-five pictures with his paints well-mixed and his brushes ripe and the canvases all that could be desired.

Poems for May Time

SONGS OF THE CELTIC PAST. By Norre Jephson O'Conor. New York, 1918: John La Company. $1.25.

These are songs for May time. Th blend with one's mood now that " . . . May is come again Filling with blossom all the Irish land" and other lands too, where the beau seems so great that the reader wonde whether certain parts of Long Island mig not also be described in the poet's verse:

Wild birds are singing:
The breeze is bringing
The keen clean smell of the wind-swept s

In the garden close
Is the new-blown rose,
And the blossom white on the hawthc tree.

At any rate the Songs are so charmi and their lilt so engaging that the reac appropriates all their wealth of imagery a exaltation of beauty to his own mood, he reads them as he should out of do with the scent of apple blossoms and lil in the air and the May sun smiling on hi He lets May weather and the poet's ve carry him into the kingdom of beauty a the rule of the fairies that the very wor Celtic Past conjure up. Puffed Rice Dishes for Lilac Time

About lilac time the demand for Puffed Rice reaches zenith. Don't miss it for a day.

Every dish of berries calls for these crisp, flaky bubbles. Without them it's like shortcake minus crust.

Mix With Berries

Every bowl of milk, at noon or night, needs these airy, toasted globules. Nothing else has half of their delights.

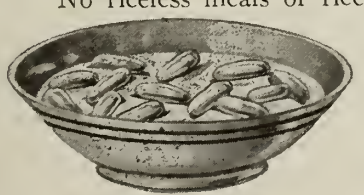
Just Grain Puffs—Nothing Added

Puffed Grains are so flavory, so enticing, that they hardly seem like grain foods. But they are.

Puffed Rice is simply whole rice steam-exploded—puffed to eight times normal size. Its flavor is due to a fearful heat—its flimsiness to puffing.

It means a whole-grain food, easily digestible. Every food cell is exploded.

No riceless meals or riceless days are called for. So Puffed Rice—also Corn Puffs—can be daily delights.



Float in Milk

Let children and grown-ups enjoy them to the full. It's the ideal form of grain food and the form which they prefer.

In summer-time serve them in abundance.

Nut-Like Uses

Crisp and lightly butter for eating between meals—like confections. Some do this, also, before adding sugar and cream. It makes a nut-like dish.

Garnish ice cream with Puffed Grains. Use them in candy making. They taste like bubbled nut meats.

Use them as wafers in soups.

They are more than breakfast dainties—more than milk-dish crispies. Enjoy all their delights.

OBITUARY

FITZGERALD.—The sudden death of Mrs. Fitzgerald of New York City and Garrison-on-Hudson removes a devoted daughter of the Church and an ardent patriot. During the rectorship of Dr. Satterlee she was a communicant of Calvary Church and afterwards a generous friend of the National Cathedral at Washington. The fine reredos of the Bethlehem Chapel was her gift erected in grateful memory of the Bishop and founder of the Cathedral. Mrs. Fitzgerald endured more than ordinary sorrows but neither her courage nor her faith faltered. Gifted with more than ordinary executive ability, she threw herself unsparingly into Christian service. Her quiet generosity to the poor will long be remembered. No good cause appealed to her in vain. The last Sunday of her life found her at the altar of her parish church and she died as she had lived, in the communion of the Catholic Church, leaving behind the imperishable memory of a brave and good woman.

Her interesting account of this movement, The Little Theatres in the United States, was published last Autumn. Miss Mackay has often contributed to THE CHURCHMAN. Gertrude Hall Kent is a Philadelphia contributor. A Wag in the Office who was looking over the Table of Contents for the Outdoor Number, seeing how largely the editorial staff has been pressed into service as contributors, remarked that we ought to call it the Indoor Number.

For the Laity

THE CHURCHMAN is more than willing to co-operate with the valuable suggestion contained in a letter from the rector of one of the leading parishes in the Middle West which has just been received, in which he says: "Last week in our Diocesan Council one of the missionary speakers deplored the small circulation of Church papers among our laity. I should be glad if something might be accomplished towards increasing the number of subscribers to THE CHURCHMAN in my parish, which has had small outlook beyond its own limits."

This rector has asked that 150 copies of THE CHURCHMAN be sent to a member of the parish to be used in soliciting subscriptions. THE CHURCHMAN offers profitable commission to such solicitors.

Dr. Grant's Anniversary—The News Editor of THE CHURCHMAN forbade me to mention Dr. Grant's anniversary in my letter. He said, "That is a front-page story." But the weeks have gone by, and nothing has been said about it. The reason is that the staff of the Church of the Ascension are all so very modest that they have failed to send THE CHURCHMAN the story they promised. The bare facts are that on Ascension Day the Rev. Dr. Percy Grant completed the twenty-fifth year of his rectorship, and that a service in celebration of his anniversary was held in the parish church. The Church of the Ascension, on lower Fifth Avenue, on the edge of the notable and notorious Greenwich Village, has a place all its own in the diocese. It was among the first churches to have services of music on Sunday afternoons. Many of the oratorios and cantatas are sung each year. Its Forum on Sunday nights is characteristic of the liberal attitude of the parish. There are men and women who never enter a church at any other time who flock to the Forum. It has outgrown the parish house, and now meets regularly after evening service in the church building. The parish house hums with activity all the week. There are clubs of the Greenwich Village neighbors that meet regularly fifty, sixty, seventy strong. Of Dr. Grant himself, suffice it to say that there are few of the clergy whose pastoral ministrations are more deeply valued by their people.

Whitsuntide Festival at St. Michael's—On Whitsunday afternoon the annual children's festival service was held at St. Michael's, when St. Jude's Colored Mission, St. Faith's Sunday School and the Sheltering Arms Orphan Asylum joined with St. Michael's in presenting a Whitsunday pageant. This is in line with what has been done for several years past in developing at special services pageants for teaching the children Church truths in their application to present-day conditions. This pageant interpreted Whitsunday in relation to the present war. The Crusader's Hymn was sung and the lesson, Acts II, 1-11, was recited by the children from the Sheltering Arms.

At Grace Church, West Farms—The Rt. Rev. John P. Tyler, D.D., Bishop of North Dakota, confirmed a large class in Grace Church, West Farms, on May 17. The beautiful bronze memorial tablet erected in memory of the late Rev. James A. Derbyshire, B.D., thirty-two years rector of the parish, was dedicated. Addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. Van De Water and Archdeacon Pott. The rector, Rev. Albert Edward Bentley, has just concluded a special series of patriotic sermons, "America and the World War," which have attracted much attention. He is now preparing a number of patriotic addresses, "The Hand of God in American History," under the auspices of the Red Cross.

Chaplain Silver New Incarnation Rector—The Rev. H. Percy Silver, who was appointed chaplain of West Point by President Wilson in 1913, has accepted the rectorship of the Church of the Incarnation and will assume his new work on October 1.

At Trinity Parish—The police force held their annual service in Old Trinity last Sunday afternoon. The sermon was preached by Police Chaplain John A. Wade, Rector of the Church of the Evangelist. Daily Red Cross meetings have been held on the steps of St. Paul's Chapel during the Drive. On Friday noon Governor Whitman spoke there, and afterwards, accompanied by Dr. Manning, he marched down Broadway to the Treasury steps where they both spoke after having stopped at the Chamber of Commerce to speak to the campaigners at their daily luncheon. The Chapel of the Intercession has started the out-door sunset service in the west porch of the chapel again. Last Sunday this service was a Red Cross service. All of Washington Heights turned out in good force. The service is followed by the ceremony of lowering the colors.

Here and There—Dr. Slattery is preaching the baccalaureate sermon at Columbia this year. Calvary Church has begun its service in Madison Square on Sunday nights. Clergy, choir and people march from the church to the square. The Church of the Holy Communion is holding a series of services from 7.30 a. m. to 8.00 p. m. on Memorial Day.

VIDED CHURCH HAMPERS WORK WITH OUR ARMY

shop Brent Says Ecclesiasticism Is Cruel and Cold

The following letter from Bishop Brent the subject of church unity has been eived in this country:

"3 Easter, 1918.

Just as now is the time to strike for the ty of nations so is it the time to strike the unity of the churches. I wonder v many people at home realize that our ef difficulty in connection with the morals the Army is due to the divided church. ı meet it at every turn. Many feel it keenly that they can see no enduring or stantial good coming out of our purely sical or human effort without some vement pari passu earnestly aiming for a gdom of God among men not divided inst itself.

Last Sunday I was with our fellows before they went into the great battle, ıe of them to die before the week closed. one place the Chaplain asked for the of the church. It was refused. The ool house was refused. The little town so crowded with soldiers that the only e we could find for service where we e welcome was a barnyard. There er the wide-spreading eaves of a great ı we set up an improvised altar. The ıch peasants and the cattle that stood vere hospitable to us. The weather was k and dull. It was Bethlehem over in as the massed khaki knelt in the litter straw before the Christ of Bethlehem. re was no room for Him in the inn. that exclusiveness can do is to shut out from itself and drive them nearer to . Sometimes ecclesiasticism is so cold cruel with its anathemas and lack of on that one wonders how God can con- e to use it for His Kingdom—if He s. t seems to me the time has come for o do something daring and loving for Kingdom's sake. It is antediluvian to inue thinking in mere terms of continu- or of yesterday. We must both think act in terms of the new order, in terms he Kingdom of God. Individual effort course must be continued and has its t. But the churches should act. The titutional assembly of every one should for the definite purpose of moving for nference on the peace of the churches, no other aim to distract—our own eral Convention should lead. Not the se of Bishops alone but the whole Con- on. Then the churches willing to share ıch a conference should do so, regard- of those which might choose to sit t. The world is falling to pieces, the ches are tagging on behind the armies, nothing is being done that is worthy name of witness bearing for unity as st begs of us to interpret it. Happy church that takes the lead in such an nture of faith! I have often thought ır late determination to reach the Rus- Church. We were not too early but ate, much too late, too diplomatic, too ılating.

ı the American Expeditionary Forces n do more in behalf of unity in the that has been chosen me than in any task at the moment at any rate. It not be much but it is something."

ADVERTISE YOUR WANTS IN THE CHURCHMAN

Our Contributors

The Church in the Furnace, a really outstanding and constructive "war book" forms the basis of an article by the Dean of the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge.

The Rev. Arthur Ketchum is acting rector of the Church of the Epiphany, New York City.

The Rev. John Wallace Suter, Jr., associate minister of Christ Church, Springfield, Massachusetts, wrote the PRAYER FOR MOURNERS on page 749.

Lucy C. Sturgis is the Junior Secretary of the Woman's Auxiliary in Massachusetts. For a number of years she was also Educational Secretary. She has taught mission study classes at summer conferences, institutes and conventions all over the country as well as in her own diocese. Last year she wrote the junior textbook Simon Peter—Rock. Mission study leaders throughout the Church will be interested to hear what she has to say about Missionary Education in Massachusetts.

The Rev. Francis H. Richey, who contributes a suggestive article on Church finance called Temporal Insanity, is rector of Trinity Church, Asbury Park, New Jersey.

The Rev. Eliot White (Used Railroad Ties) is the rector of St. Paul's Church, Ossining, New York.

The Rev. George William Douglas, D.D., a close friend of the Cutting family, gives a pen portrait of Robert Bayard Cutting, whose death in the Y. M. C. A. service in France occurred last April. Dr. Douglas was for many years a canon of the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, New York, and has always been a contributor and a friend to THE CHURCHMAN.

The following letter came to the Editor from Bishop Paul Jones. We think the joke is on the people who don't give to missions rather than on the Board. After all the Board stepped as far as it could!

Can it be possible that you are making fun of the Board of Missions in your issue of the 18th? Under the heading "B. of M. Takes Financial Forward Step," aside from distributing certain funds left by the dead, the only items that could suggest the title are the facts that the Board decreased the appropriations for the year 1919 and increased the salaries of domestic Missionary Bishops. Many mere "forward" steps of that kind will land us in the rear of the procession.

Things in General

George Adams Smith had the same sad experience with the American reporter that falls to the lot of all prominent Englishmen who visit our shores. He made that fact evident to a representative of THE CHURCHMAN who approached him at the close of his address in the chapel of Columbia University.

A layman in Dr. Smith's party introduced the member of the staff by saying: "This gentleman represents our leading Episcopal Church paper." After that unexpected tribute, the staff member thought he saw an opportunity of a real story.

"Won't you give me some sort of message for our readers?" he asked.

The effect was immediate, unexpected and electrical. All the Scotch in the er son of the famous scholar flashed from ni snapping eyes and whipped itself off th end of a most facile tongue.

"There you go again. You repo er have no mercy on an exhausted man. o come to him after he's just given yo a the message he has, and ask him fo more. I've given sixty-two addresses nc I came to America, and after every c reporter has come and asked me to sa something. What in the world do yo ex pect of an utterly exhausted man?"

The "gentleman of the press" with re his lines in fairly good order, medit in on this theme: "It would be interesti see George Adams Smith in action wh isn't exhausted!" (Incidentally—this i ev dence that he got a story!)

The Diocesan Convention of Long Is an refused to consider the subject of pr bition on the ground that it is a po ic question. This is a new reason!

In a Red Cross address in Cincin a Bishop Williams said: "During my o of inspection in France I saw plen German prisoners. They seemed cont te happy and well-fed, and I saw no them trying to escape or trying to get ba into hell again."

A Notable Council

THE Presbyterian General Assembly, which met last week in Columbus, Ohio, in its deliberations in the interest of Church Unity made a gesture of real amity towards Evangelical Christians of other Communions in this country. We publish on the second editorial page of this issue of THE CHURCHMAN the recommendations adopted by the Assembly. It is to be remarked that the General Assembly, which is a conservative body not unlike our own General Convention, voted unanimously for entering without reservations into conference and negotiations with other Protestant Churches. All that the Presbyterians insisted upon, said the Rev. Henry Sloane Coffin in an interview with a representative of THE CHURCHMAN staff, is the common Gospel and life which are the priceless heritage of Evangelical Christians; the emphasis is upon the heritage of experience not the heritage of tradition.

It is significant that the Presbyterian Church waited for the Episcopal Church to take the lead in the effort towards unity. The action of the House of Bishops in their recent session, however, convinced our Protestant fellow-Christians that it was useless to wait longer for our leadership. Valuable as such leadership would have been and indispensable as is its co-operation if there is ultimately to be a reunited Christendom, the Presbyterian Assembly felt that the psychological hour had come for a venture of faith. The Episcopal Church failing them, the Presbyterians took up the challenge of the hour.

It is also interesting to note into what hands this whole problem has fallen. The moderator elected in Columbus is the Rev. J. Frank Smith of Dallas, Texas, a graduate of Union Seminary, a man alert to the opportunities of the new day. The conservative and timid elements in the Assembly worked sympathetically with the younger and eager liberals. One and all felt that the hour had struck in which God would show men of faith the way. They proposed to trust unreservedly the Holy Spirit.

Great things are bound to come from such courageous adventure. The Presbyterian Church has done well not to postpone effort towards reunion until such time as our own Church shall feel inspired to act. The more discerning Presbyterians, however, freely acknowledge that a united Evangelical Church which does not include the Episcopalians will not only miss the leadership which our Church is so well fitted to supply in any movement towards unity, but that our exclusion from the conferences will make the problem of unity more precarious and difficult later. But they could not wait any longer for the fellowship which we have shown such reluctance to offer.

The Presbyterian Church is trusting these matters to the younger men. If the Episcopal Church is to take any effective action toward unity, we shall have to place more confidence in the younger generation. Committees appointed to meet the overtures of sister churches must be selected from among men of daring faith and creative imagination, men who have the mediating mind. We have not done this. We have left these matters to men who could be counted upon "not to give up anything essential" and to hold in equipoise antagonistic views. We need leaders of another type, men who are so sure of their faith in Christ, who carry their heritage so confidently that they dare under the pressure of great opportunities to lift their admiring eyes from the historic episcopate and their own competent Orders to the needs of the growing Kingdom.

The hour has come for a new leadership in the Episcopal Church. We congratulate the Presbyterian Assembly that it has found such leadership at this supreme hour in Christian history. God never confers the grace of insight upon timid souls. We have better leaders in the Episcopal Church than we have dared to use.

Small Wage-Earners

BY the recommendation of the Railway Wage Commission, a larger body of small wage earners are likely to have their income markedly increased than ever before in our history. As the New York Evening Post remarks, the schedule of increased salaries, quite contrary to the usual procedure in such cases, makes the largest increase apply to the small wage earners. Some of these will receive a more than 40 per cent. raise in wage. For 250,000 manual workers and 115,000 clerks whose salaries have been $57 to $58 a month, 500,000 men who have been paid from $60 to $75 a month, an increase is recommended of more than 40 per cent.

This is good news for all who are sympathetic with the hardship of the small wage earners. The railway employees are indeed fortunate that they have a benevolently inclined government to look after their needs. All clerks, bookkeepers, school teachers, curates, missionaries and rectors are not so well cared for. They are not organized into industries nationwide in scope; they are not members of unions with implements at hand to make their wishes formidable, and some of them, such for example as teachers and clergymen, shrink from any wage discussion that would bring their profession into press notoriety. Clergymen are especially sensitive about pressing their claims. They will beg Sunday after Sunday for every cause but their own.

But they ought not to be compelled to plead their own cause. If their vestries do not see that, with the cost of living advancing from fifty to seventy per cent. in the last decade, a clergyman cannot live decently upon the salary that was paid by the parish fifteen years ago, then the bishop ought to draw the attention of those vestries to the matter. That some bishops have done this we note in their annual diocesan addresses; but a good many have not. There is a modest work in reconstruction that can be done right here at home by putting our country clergy and the rectors of small city parishes on a living wage. If we can raise nine million dollars for a pension fund, innumerable millions for other war drives, there must be good will and leadership enough in the Church to pay its clergy adequate salaries.

We do not think any man was ever deterred from entering the ministry because the ministry was insufficiently paid. At the age when young men make their decisions, romantic impulses are in the ascendancy. They are not worldly or calculating. There would be just as many men offering themselves for the ministry, we think, if they had to beg their support from door to door. But a good many men, after they have been in the work of the ministry for ten or fifteen years, are prevented from giving their highest service to the Church because they are constantly harassed by money cares.

"What can we do?" says the vestryman. "We can't really afford to pay the small stipend we now pay. We have a deficit each year which a few men must meet." If this is really true, if after the budget for the music is cut down to the lowest figure, if after all the little luxuries of worship and church furnishings are dispensed with, there is still an inability to support the rector decently, then the church should be turned into a mission and be provided with whatever services the diocese can afford to offer. The clergyman would then be released for some larger work for which the bishop could arrange a living wage.

The fact is the ministry is precisely in the condition today that nearly every wage earner shared a quarter century ago. He did not have behind him an organization to compel a hearing on the wage question and the benevolent employer was not greatly concerned. The minister will not haggle over his salary with his people and generally there is nobody else who cares enough about the matter to see that justice is done.

Protestant churches are willing to pay only a celibate wage, but they disclaim a celibate priesthood.

Answering Letters

THE Living Church in its issue of May 18 contains a forceful editorial upon the subject of rectors' pastoral neglect of soldiers in camps. It seems that chaplains find great difficulty in getting information from the clergy at home and that these rectors appear little concerned about the doings of their parishioners in camps.

Some of the difficulty may be attributable to carelessness in addressing letters. Where there are from ten to thirty thousand soldiers in one camp, it is of course necessary that addresses be accurate. In the cases cited by The Living Church, where rectors have not even written to soldiers confirmed in camp, we must stretch our charity to the utmost and believe that there was some miscarriage of mail.

And yet, knowing the frailty of parsons as we do, we are tempted to believe the worst. Clergymen lack the business man's sense of responsibility as regards answering letters. Most clergymen will not even answer an invitation with an R.S.V.P. staring at them in the left-hand corner. Some of us who have held the troublesome office of chairman of committees on hospitality for diocesan conventions know how much the parson is given to take certain favors for granted. He intends to come and he expects to be entertained when he arrives, but he will not take the trouble to tell the committee in advance whether or not he wishes to be served. Occasionally one finds a clergyman who is scrupulously prompt and courteous in these social matters.

The chaplain's difficulty in getting information from rectors is one shared by other information-gathering agencies in the Church. Most clergymen will not answer letters if they can help it.

These are some of the ways in which the parson exhibits a strand of selfishness that makes him pretty much like other mortals. The business man is more courteous and thoughtful in this regard; his lapses occur elsewhere.

Unity Proposals of the General Assembly

THE General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, at its recent session in Columbus, Ohio, unanimously adopted the report submitted to it pertaining to the overtures sent up from thirty-four Presbyteries as follows:

"(1) That the General Assembly overture the national bodies of our sister communions to hear and prayerfully consider a program for church union.

(2) That the General Assembly name a time and place, as early as possible, for an interdenominational council of Evangelical Churches.

(3) That our Assembly state frankly, in this call, that the purpose of the council is to discuss, and if the way be clear, to adopt a definite plan of organic church union.

"Your committee, before recommending action, desires to congratulate the General Assembly, and through it the whole Church, that these overtures show that there is an earnest desire for church unity growing in power in the hearts of many, and a determined effort putting forth to accomplish the same.

"It is to be noted that our church has long been forward in its expression and effort looking toward the reunion of the Evangelical Churches of America. We recommend the following action:

> "1st. That we, the Commissioners to the one hundred and thirtieth General Assembly now in session at Columbus, Ohio, do declare and place on record our profound conviction that the time has come for organic church union of the Evangelical Churches of America.
> "2d. That this Assembly hereby overtures the National Bodies of the Evangelical Communions of America to meet with our representatives for the purpose of formulating a plan of organic union.
>
> "3d. That the Assembly's Committee on Cooperation and Union, consisting of the following members: Wm. H. Roberts, D.D., J. Wilbur Chapman, D.D., James H. Snowden, D.D., Wm. McKibbin, D.D., Charles R. Erdman, D.D., Edgar P. Hill, D.D., Robert Mackenzie, D.D., Wm. H. Black, D.D., Wm. J. Darby, D.D., Edgar A. Elmore, D.D., J. Ross Stevenson, D.D., George Reynolds, D.D., Charles Little, D.D., John F. Carson, D.D., Wm. P. Merrill, D.D., H. G. Mendenhall, D.D., Elders Gen. George H. Shield, Judge John A. McIlvaine, Henry W. Jessup, Esq., Hon. E. E. Beard, Robert S. Fulton, Esq., Prof. J. J. McConnell, be authorized and directed to designate the place and time, not later than January 1, 1919, for the abovenamed convention; to prepare a suitable invitation, to fix the ratio of representation, and appoint the delegates of our Body; to prepare a tentative plan of Organic Union for presentation, and to attend to all necessary arrangements.
> "4th. That as a beginning the Moderator and Stated Clerk be directed to wire the four national church bodies now in session, asking them whether they will appoint delegates to such a convention on organic union between the Evangelical bodies, explaining that we have voted in favor of it."

International Friendship

"PROCTOR Academy at Andover, New Hampshire, has taken a notable step toward promoting international good will, by organizing a method of correspondence between its own pupils and those of certain schools and colleges in other countries. Two types of letters have been sent out from Proctor Academy and other schools, which have joined in the movement; viz.: personal letters and class letters. Personal letters have been sent to pupils in Japan, China and certain South American countries. Class letters have been sent to Argentina through the kindness of the ambassador, the Hon. R. S. Naòn. The work has developed such possibilities that Proctor Academy has created the office of Secretary for the Promotion of International Amity. The first incumbent is Mary N. Chase, who will be glad to answer any inquiries in regard to the plan. She may be addressed at the Academy."—From the New World.

A Statesman's Message

"LIKE most Englishmen, Earl Grey was spiritually shy, and only now and then let me see what was moving him, and moving him very deeply. These moments were unforgettable. I seemed for a second to see his soul straining to know if I had apprehended the uttermost truth of his spirit which he shrank from uttering. He said to me once: 'You know the idea of those words—he being dead, yet speaketh? A voice from the grave often gets a hearing. That's what I'm after. I want to try and make my voice sound from the grave. I want to say to people that there is a real way out of all this mess materialism has got them into. I've been trying to tell them for thirty years. It's Christ's way. Mazzini saw it. We've got to give up quarreling. We've got to come together. We've got to realize that we're all members of the same family. There's nothing that can help humanity, I'm perfectly sure there isn't, perfectly sure, except love. Love is the way out, and the way up. That's my farewell to the world.'"

How to Use the Seminaries

MR. MICOU'S depressing forecast of what is likely to happen to our theological seminaries if the war goes on another two years has begun to stimulate the inventiveness of Churchmen. The professors are not to be allowed to remain idle and the halls become desolate from disuse.

An interesting suggestion comes from one of our bishops. He proposes that the seminaries open courses of instruction for parochial clergymen; these courses to be given after Christmas and to run through six weeks or two months. It is urged that the convenience of the country clergy and those working in the remote fields of the Church's work be especially taken into consideration.

One obstacle to this plan at once suggests itself. Not only are the seminaries depleted by the war, but so also is the parochial ministry. Bishops are at their wits' end to know where to find "supplies." As the seminaries fail of graduate candidates, the condition is not likely to grow better.

A Polish Mother's Prayer

SOME of the fugitive verse which is appearing in the magazines and newspapers just now is extremely beautiful; the standard of "Occasional Poetry" was, indeed, never higher. Readers will thank us for reproducing these lines. They are entitled "A Polish Mother's Prayer," and their meaning and pathos are deepened by the accompanying statement that there is not at present a living child in Poland under eight years of age:

Baby Christ, to Thee I pray—
Baby Christ, whose dimpled fist,
Like a rose-leaf sunshine kist,
Seeks Thy mother's warm, white breast,
Thy mother's full, white, rounded breast.
(Hush, my baby!
Must my heart forever ache?)

Baby Christ, my eyes are red,
Weeping for my poor man dead,
Dead for Poland's sake.
(Hush, my baby!
Close your cruel, pleading eyes.)

Babe, all-loving and all-wise,
Take my weeping babe to Thee.
(Hush, my baby!)
My eyes are dry,
My breasts are dry;
There is no pity 'neath the sky.

Baby Christ, to Thee I pray;
Take my hungry babe away!

The Financial Solution

FOR years the question of meeting the financial obligations of the Church has been a heavy burden distracting and dispiriting those whose ordination was to another ministry than that of serving tables. The reason for this diversion of the clergy's time and strength is the refusal of the laity to recognize the obligation of stewardship.

In the course of the past decade a group of laymen have banded themselves together with the avowed purpose of insisting on the recognition by all communicants of this obligation. We are all familiar with the Laymen's Missionary Movement and with its accompaniments, the Forward Movement in our own Board of Missions, the duplex envelope, etc. They are planning this year to harvest the results of the lesson in proportionate giving which patriotism has taught, and to emphasize again the duty of Christian stewardship.

A rather interesting light is shed on this situation by the fact that the treasurer's books at the Church Missions House show that this Winter, whereas the amounts received on the apportionment have fallen off considerably, the amounts received on the One Day's Income Plan have increased. The apportionment is a bill rendered to the Church at large; the difficulty is that its obligation is not generally acknowledged. The One Day's Income on the other hand is a voluntary expression on the part of certain individuals of the duty of stewardship. Those who have contributed their one day's income have undoubtedly also paid their full share of the apportionment.

G. F. S. Responsibility

A COMMON criticism passed upon the Girls' Friendly associates is that they do not really guide those for whom they are responsible in the matter of purity. Purity is one of the fourfold obligations on which the society is built. But there are many associates who have little knowledge of how to instruct their charges in this difficult matter, and there are some who apparently neglect that part of the obligation altogether. They are not alert to danger signals, and when it is too late all they can offer is ineffective sympathy or condemnation.

The first to acknowledge the justice of this criticism will be those associates who feel most heavily this part of their burden of responsibility, and who meet it most ably. Only the other day a New England social welfare leader who, in the course of this Winter's war work for girls, had been thrown into close relations with G. F. S. associates, told us that she had never in the course of her divers experiences met any group of workers whose personality, skill, devotion and social point of view she found higher than those of the G. F. S. associates.

Recently there appeared in THE CHURCHMAN an article entitled "Comfort the Feebleminded" written by the chairman of the Springfield Committee for the Study of the Feebleminded. There is much in that article which G. F. S. associates would do well to take to heart. In guarding social purity and thereby social health, it is not enough to prevent a girl from "getting into trouble." Every member of the G. F. S. who is to be married should be instructed by her associate in the responsibility of motherhood. No G. F. S. member should, if her associate can prevent it, be allowed to enter into a marriage that will result in children physically or mentally debilitated. The G. F. S. associate should be familiar with the fundamental principles of eugenics.

But even this is only part of the responsibility. Probably the closest personal relationship in the parish is, or should be, that between the G. F. S. member and her associate. And so if a girl is feebleminded or sub-normal, there is no one who should more quickly detect it than the associate. There is no one, then, in a better position to advise the parents about the girl's education and future welfare.

More than 50 per cent. of the girls who "go wrong" are mentally sub-normal. In many cases the parents and friends of the girls hadn't any realization of this fact. The girl was dubbed "stupid" or "flighty" or "slow at her books." The G. F. S. associate should be able to interpret these symptoms, to recognize danger signals. Otherwise it is impossible for her to guard the social and spiritual welfare of her charges.

Being a G. F. S. associate is a highly specialized job. Spiritual ability and sympathy with girl-nature are of course the fundamental necessities. But so also is some knowledge of practical sociology and practical psychology. If the G. F. S. is to fulfil the magnificent and peculiar opportunty open to it, more of its associates must measure up to the standard of the New England group so highly spoken of by the social worker we have quoted who added to her praise the significant words: "The reason the Girls' Friendly Society reaches those the rest of us can not touch is that their work has, besides all the rest, the religious basis."

"The Church in the Furnace"

By THE VERY REV. GEORGE HODGES, D.D.

OF the seventeen chaplains of the Church of England who have written the chapters of *The Church in the Furnace, most of them seem to have come to the experiences of the war from the shelter of very quiet places. They were fellows of colleges, and examining chaplains. Noticing these titles set beside their names in the beginning of the book, the reader wonders what preparation these detached employments have given them for a right judgment of their new parishioners. He looks for some exaggerated dismay as these gentlemen come to close quarters with the coarse life of the camp. It becomes plain, however, in the progress of the book, that these apprehensions are not justified. The writers are indeed dismayed: they say frankly that the customary conversation of many of the men is enough to melt an iceberg; but they are not deterred by these superficial offenses from appreciating the excellent qualities which are behind this camouflage of vocabulary. These chapters were written at the front, between bombardments, in vital contact with the facts, by men who have been set free by these conditions from the hindering conventions and conservatisms of normal life, and who therefore speak with much frankness.

The chaplains agree as to the religious effect of war on the men who are engaged in it. If we have been inferring from the writings of Donald Hankey, and Coningsby Dawson, and the fine young Frenchmen whose letters have been printed in the Atlantic Monthly, that the war may result in a revival of religion, and that our young men will probably return from it uplifted, spiritualized by their experience, and filled with high visions of good things, the chaplains warn us that we are mistaken. Some men, no doubt, who went in good, will come out better. There will be recruits for the depleted ministry. There will be a new earnestness and directness, a new impatience with trifles and irrelevancies in religion, and a new ideal of the kingdom of God, in the souls of a few. In general, however, the chaplains tell us that the task of the Church after the war will probably be more difficult than it was before.

War, they say, is a "spiritual narcotic." "It is untrue —as must be roundly stated from the outset—that war is a reviver of religion. I had at one time a vague idea that it is so, but experience definitely confutes it. Indeed, if I may write quite personally, it has had for me the opposite result. It is for myself at any rate a constant struggle to keep the spiritual sense alive at all. The combined circumstances of this life distinctly make against religion." This is a chaplain who thus confesses the effect of war on himself, upheld as he is by his faith and by the religious occupation of his life. How much more difficult, then, must be the condition of the common soldier.

The men who say these things are not pessimists. They believe in religion. They believe in the Church; even in the Church of England, to which they all belong, with which alone they concern themselves in these chapters, and of which they speak with a frankness which is warranted by their faith and affection. In the preface to the book a bishop applauds the criticism of the chaplains as a contribution to the work of reconstruction. "In almost every stage of the development of our military machine," he says, "they have seen a parallel to what the stages of the creation of a true Church Militant might be; namely, a discontent with the present disorder and confusion; a realization of the present faulty intelligence of the task before us, and of our indefinite grasp of our true objective; and the conviction that we must dare to scrap that which is out of date and effete in our methods, so as to be able to mobilize and unify the enormous Christian resources now lying dormant."

The chaplains complain that a majority of the men come from the parish to the camp without religion. Most of them have been baptized, many have been taught in Sunday school, many have been confirmed, but they are "almost completely unconscious of any sense of fellowship with the Church of their Baptism." "It is startling and humiliating to find out how very little hold traditional Christianity has upon men. It is not only their confounding ignorance of the elementary Christian facts—not one in ten, I should think, has any clear idea of what our religion is, or implies, or offers—but that they fail to see how it bears upon or helps them in our present circumstances." That is, when the Church comes to the test, as it does under the conditions of mobilization, and it is possible to examine in a cross-section of society what it is actually accomplishing in the lives of men, we perceive that it is not making an effective appeal either to enthusiasm or to intelligence. The chaplains find that a majority of the men are both indifferent and ignorant as to religion. This, it is true, is the report of a Church of England examination. It will be interesting to know what other chaplains have to say. The chances are, however, that this fairly represents the whole situation.

The chaplains find that the Church is neither a good camp nor a good school.

It ought to be a good camp, a training place for all the virtues out of which men should go on militant errands. When, however, the so-called Militant Church is looked back upon from the point of view of an actually militant army, the adjective seems foolish. It is militant in an academic, ecclesiastical, processional sense, without much idea of fighting.

One chaplain gives an account of his experiences as a pastor making parish calls. In one place he finds the man of the house at home—is indeed met by him, quite by accident, at the door. Immediately the man of the house calls to his wife, "Mother, here's the gentleman from the church to see you." "We have considerable difficulty in persuading him that the object of our visit is as much to see him as to see his wife." Upon this the chaplain remarks that "without in any way wishing to minimize the splendid work which women have done in the last three years, it is obvious that we should have made a poor show against the Germans if the army had been recruited from women only." Another parishioner defends himself from any possible criticism on his pastor's part by saying, "I never do anyone any 'arm." The pastor imagines a sergeant going along the line and finding a soldier sitting on the fire-step smoking his pipe. "What's the matter, sergeant? I 'aven't done any 'arm, 'ave I? What's all the row about?" The sergeant, he says, would explain in language which is not permitted to parsons. So, again, with the man who says, "I used to go regularly to church, but I gave it up because somehow I didn't seem to get any good out of it." The chaplain remarks that "the man who joined the army to get something out of it would be thought half-witted."

The seventeen chaplains are pretty well agreed on this point: that the Church, if it is to attract and hold men, must give them men's work to do, must make large demands upon them, must enlist them in what they call "the great adventure." The war shows that the capacity for enthusiasm is unlimited—when there is a definite object about which to be enthusiastic. There is no end to the response of men to the demands of a great cause: they will give their money, their energy, their whole selves, even to the extremity of death.

When, however, the chaplains come to the point where we expect them to tell us in the next breath just what masculine works we ought to undertake, they are almost as vague as the rest of us. They suggest no program. They do indeed discuss "fellowship in the Church" in one chapter, with special reference to the social distinctions which are perhaps more marked and obstructive in England than in this country. In another chapter they consider "fellowship in industrial life." "The war," they say, "is dealing shrewd blows every day to prejudice, criticism and suspicion; blows from which, please God, these evil spirits may find it hard to recover, and which will prevent them from again taking their usurped places in the fighting line of the forces of evil." They quote from the Bishop of Stepney, "What about our social relations? the bitterness that has parted rich from poor? the contempt of class for class? Shall we ever revive the old scorn with which we looked one upon another?" But they leave us to work out the details of these matters; as is wise, and, indeed, necessary.

The defect of the Militant Church, as the chaplains see it, is the lack of a clear "objective." The Christian people who in their Baptism were enrolled as soldiers of Christ have not had it made plain to them what or how they are to fight. In general, of course, we are to fight the devil: but on two different fields of battle—in our own souls, and in the community about us.

A part of the objective is to get the individual to take God's side in the daily strife which is proceeding in his own interior life, to provide him with ammunition, and to give him definite assistance in putting down Satan under his feet. Let the preacher, as the drilling officer of his regiment, consult his sermons of the past twelve months in order to see what he has contributed to the militant efficiency of his hearers. What has he done to set them up in alertness against spiritual attack? to make them know the difference between true friends and foes in the disguise of friends? to instruct them in the approved methods of dealing with various kinds of enemies? How many sermons has he preached, not about sin, but about specific sins?

Another part of the objective is to engage the parish on the Lord's side in the strife against the devil in the community. Precisely where, in our town, is the devil entrenched? Under what plausible devices of camouflage is he hiding his great guns? What are the social wrongs which must be attacked, if they are to be attacked effectively, in force? What is there in our neighborhood which corresponds to the conditions which breed disease—stagnant water, defective sanitation, and the like? What are the moral equivalents of these things? If a parish is honestly militant, the parson is the captain and the people are soldiers. The rector and the vestry will hold a council of war. They will decide upon a campaign. Precisely what shall this parish do this year in the service of this town against the devil? What is our part in the necessary business of this offensive and defensive warfare, and in the operations of moral reconstruction?

As with the fighting Church so also with the teaching Church. The Church ought to be a good school. The chaplains find that it is not. Out come these young men from the instruction of the Church, and their ignorance of religion is tragic.

The chaplains may overstate the matter; they may not take sufficiently into account the normal reticence of men concerning the life of the soul. What they say is that so far as they can discover a majority of the men have no religion at all. The chaplains give them full credit for many even splendid qualities, and praise their persevering cheerfulness, their brotherly love, and the unreserved devotion of their whole selves to the great cause; but they are unable to see that these virtues are connected with the Christian religion. They are Christian virtues, and they may belong in a vague way to a civilization which is nominally Christian, but they seem not to proceed from any Christian motives, or to be practised for any Christian reasons. The men have the vaguest ideas of God, and apparently no ideas at all of the revelation of God in Jesus Christ. They are unaware that the life and death of Christ is in any way of importance to them. They do pray, some of them, and if their minister or a pious friend sends them a little crucifix they wear it. But the crucifix is worn as an amulet, and the prayers are mostly incantations against death. They are superstitious but not religious.

The chaplains blame the Sunday school, and the Confirmation classes, and the sermons. They complain of the Sunday school that the teachers "tell" the children instead of teaching them, and that the things which they tell them are of little value from the point of view of character. They do not lay hold on life. One chaplain says that the Church has "specialized in irrelevancies," extending the offense from the teachers to the preachers. We hope, indeed, that we are doing better in this country, with our new interest in religious education, and our increasing perception of the fact that not information but "Christian nurture" is the supreme function of the Sunday school. But we are far from an adequate appreciation of the need of a definite objective.

In that scrapping process, which will be so considerable a part of our spiritual reconstruction, we will throw out of the Sunday school all such lessons as make no contribution to our essential purpose. That purpose is to train up boys and girls to be good men and women, to be such disciplined soldiers of Jesus Christ that they will know how to contend against the devil in their own souls and in the community in which they live. We will apply the pragmatic test to the curriculum of the Sunday school, asking as to each detail, "How does this work? what does it effect? what is its relation to the life of righteousness and religion?" Whatever cannot endure this test goes out. There are Sunday school instructions which are as useless toward getting children ready for the militant activities of a good Christian life as the teaching of embroidery would be, or of the theology of the Aztecs, or of cryptogamic botany, in the preparation of soldiers for the front.

So with our services and sermons. The chaplains go into some detail in discussing the liturgical and theological changes which are suggested by their new knowledge of the needs of the men. They would give the minister a large liberty in the adaptation of the ancient order to the modern conditions. And they would have the preacher address himself somewhat more directly to the mind and life of the congregation.

There is an admirable consideration of such matters in a Talk to the Clergy by Bishop Vincent of Southern Ohio, on The Church's "Faults" and "Failures," just printed for general distribution. There is also some profitable reading along this line in an essay by Dr. Crothers in his book Among Friends. The essay is entitled "The Colonel in the Theological Seminary." "I went to church yesterday," says the Colonel, "and witnessed a series of operations which filled me with dismay. The minister began by seizing a text as a base of operations. I observed that the base was not secure, but this made less difference, as he was evidently prepared to change his base if the exigencies of the engagement demanded it. His first mistake was one of overcaution. In order to defend himself from an attack from the Higher Critics, he had to strengthen his front by barbed wire entanglements in the way of exegesis. This was an error of judgment, as the Higher Critics were not on the field, at least in sufficient force to take the offensive. The entanglements intended to keep a hypothetical foe from getting at him prevented him from getting at once at the real enemy. He thus lost the psychological moment for attack. While he was endeavoring to extricate himself from his own defenses I trembled for the issue of the affair. Having finally emerged into the open he was apparently prepared for vigorous operations. I watched intently for the development of his plan. . . . At first I attributed to him a masterly strategy in so long concealing his true objective. He was, I thought, only reconnoitering in force before calling up his reserves and delivering a decisive blow at an unexpected point. At last the suspicion came that he had no objective, and that he didn't even know that he should have one."

This is the heart of the whole matter. The chaplains writing from the field, where they have been observing the actual operations of successful war, tell us that victory depends on a definite objective, and on a carefully considered and continually amended plan of campaign. These are the principles according to which the allies are carrying on their war against the Kaiser, and they are also the principles according to which in every parish we must carry on our war against the devil. Anything else is but a beating of the air.

Missionary Education In Massachusetts

By LUCY C. STURGIS

I HAVE been ordered to write a description of the methods of missionary education in the diocese of Massachusetts, and, inasmuch as to do so at this particular time is a good deal like trying to paint the portrait of a kaleidoscope, I face my task with more of the virtue of obedience than of prudence.

I was not asked to define just what is meant by missionary education, but for the sake of clearness in what comes after, I want to explain that I take it to stand for education which produces missionaries—people who are ready to devote their lives in all sincerity to the work of the Church, wherever they see a need which they can qualify themselves to meet in the home parish or community no less than in the mission field so-called.

I was not asked to take a text; yet I can get most quickly to my point and at the same time account for the above-mentioned changing form of our efforts here, if I explain that for several years past we have been guided largely by St. Paul's exhortation in I Cor. xiv: 19, "In the Church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue".

For ten years, from 1906 to 1916, I held the post of educational secretary for the Massachusetts Auxiliary and its Junior department; a situation which was supposed to show a very pretty example of unity, but which in reality demonstrated quite clearly the impossibility of attempting to hold two such positions and do anything like a fair job by either of them. What the Auxiliary and the Juniors learned I do not exactly know, but I myself learned three things which Miss Corey and I are trying to make use of in the work we now share.

First of all I learned that although the number of Churchwomen who complacently state that they take no interest in the Church's missionary work is certainly diminishing, the number of those who are ready to take any real responsibility for the awakening of active interest in others is depressingly small, even in the ranks of the Auxiliary.

Next, I gained an almost overwhelming realization of the opportunity of an educational secretary to reach out, through the Auxiliary, to every woman in the Church, and gain her intelligent co-operation in the work for which the Board of Missions stands.

Finally I discovered, by means of a series of experiments which were alternately successful and disastrous, that no one course of study, and no one method of presenting information, would suit everyone. I believe that an educational secretary who would come anywhere near to living up to the breadth of her opportunity must employ every available means to provide material which is within the comprehension of various groups of women and calculated to arouse not only their personal activity, but also their desire to interest others in the things of which they have learned—and this brings me back to my text.

If the experience of missionary education in this diocese is worth anything, it goes to show that the form of presenting information must be constantly changing to keep in touch with all sorts of situations in the parishes, and to appeal to all sorts of women. No educational secretary can begin to meet the demand by herself. She must have the hearty co-operation of the whole Auxiliary board as well as of her own committee; and the same thing I believe to be true (even more true, if possible) in the relationship of a Junior educational secretary with her Auxiliary board and diocesan Board of Education. If missionary education in this Auxiliary amounts to anything, it will be because of the sincere effort that has been made to work all along in sympathy with every educational organization in the diocese.

Miss Corey's educational committee includes not only the vice-president and mission-study leaders of each section of the diocese, but also representatives of the Girls' Friendly Society, the Guild of St. Barnabas, the Church Periodical Club and the diocesan Board of Religious Education.

These women meet each year during the Autumn, to study the material which is recommended by the Educational Department of the Board of Missions, and to decide upon the best ways of presenting this to the women of the diocese by means of training classes for parish leaders, lecture courses in central places, conferences, institutes, reading clubs, plays, talks, and every other possible method that can be supplied to meet special needs. Subsequently, the plans of this committee are carried out by these women and other members of the diocesan Auxiliary board, and classes are held for the training of Auxiliary leaders, Girls' Friendly associates, and Sunday school teachers, and for nurses in the various hospitals near Boston. In much the same way the Junior committee is working with the diocesan Board of Religious Education and the Girls' Friendly candidates associates in an effort to bring missionary information to all the children of the diocese in such a way that no child shall consider himself or herself a thoroughly loyal member of the Church unless actively at work in setting forward the Church's mission at home and abroad.

What we are trying for, both through the Auxiliary and the Junior educational work, is a gradual increase in the number of those who gladly give of their prayers, their labor, and their influence, in order "that the kingdoms of this world may indeed become the Kingdom of our Lord and of His Christ"; not because it is their duty, not because the Church is asking it of them, but because they "cannot but speak the things which they have seen and heard", for the sake of the King Whom they have learned to love.

Temporal Insanity

By THE REV. FRANCIS H. RICHEY

WRECKED because of the failure of financial programs. This is not an uncommon happening in parishes in our branch of the Christian Church. Upon examination one finds that unless the temporal affairs of a parish are properly managed they prove the ruin of Church endeavor. The theory on which the Episcopal Church conducts its business affairs is good as the practice proves, when Church corporations carry on their business as the Church directs. It is also true that the majority of churches in our communion do not carry on their business affairs as they should and so become inefficient. Some of the reasons for failures in temporal affairs are as follows:

(1) Laymen in many cases when elected to vestries do not know their real position as to the assumption of obligations. To elect a man to a vestry and have him become responsible for "a large debt" when he has no way to provide for its liquidation puts a conscientious man in an embarrassing situation, one which a good business man might well hesitate to fill. It would dampen the ardor of many vestrymen, if they realized that the only sources from which they can secure monies to meet parish expenses are—the people, themselves, the bank. The first is the one place a vestry can nine times out of ten get money necessary to meet parish expenses. The second no one wants any man to do unless he can afford it, and the third should only be a last resort, in order to protect creditors or to see that running expenses are kept paid up.

(2) Members of churches are not rightly informed as to their duties in the exercise of their suffrage in church affairs.

(3) The difference between a "vestry" and a "board of trustees" is not generally understood.

(4) The idea that a vestry can run a church is one reason why churches are wrecked.

(5) The distinction between the "congregational system" as such (the power rising up from the people) as contrasted with the "church theory" (power coming down from above). If men and women do not understand this difference how can they be held accountable for their acts in our churches?

(6) The "church" system unless it functions as the Church directs can make no advance. It will and does automatically prevent action. The reason being that the three parts—executive, representative and people—if they agree, accumulate and produce through united effort. If they disagree, no separate part of the body can of itself act. In the Federal Government the principle of unity requires the will of the people to be made effective through their representatives and put into action by the chosen executive.

Churches can be maintained, if Church members will adopt the methods used in the present day by men of business accomplishment. No Church should ever attempt to carry on its year's work without a budget. No member of the Church should be released from Church dues unless unable to afford them. The parish must enlarge itself in action, for the parish is too small a unit. It should be a diocesan move that, once a year—at a time best suited to the greater number of parishes—all should turn "to serve tables" and provide for the body of the Church. As many days as necessary should be set aside when all monies needed for decent maintenance of parishes should be raised and money for support not mentioned again, except as emergency demands.

A body of men, not more than three, who had proved by work in their respective parishes their ability to provide for the material side, should be chosen at the annual convention, and upon them should devolve the direction of financial effort during "budget week".

If the U. S. Government finds it necessary to organize citizens into particular units to float Liberty Loans and for the carrying on of governmental activities, why should churches not follow the same plan? This is the day of the "campaign"—why is the Church not campaigning for her one great need? Just listen to the cry of hard-pressed bishops and clergymen, who are unable to give their best to the Church because they are burdened with "serving tables", to say nothing of trying to live on less than the day laborer. How unjust is the condition as we have it today, the rector raises the money and the vestry "suggests" how it is to be spent. Women's backs are broken with waiting on the men at that "church supper", men infuriated because wives are worn out with church work, and after the row arises a real case of parish scandal. Then come vain regrets, offense never intended, apologies demanded and refused, and all because some devout people really are striving to help the Church.

The Church in its diocesan unit can well afford to copy the great industrial concern. That today is a great holding company for many similar concerns; all are provided for by the life blood of the parent concern, and because of the life in the young member it grows and develops and becomes in time a feeder for the body. So with the parish church, if there was only some connection besides a sending to the parish clergymen a demand to "pay up", there might be more of an appreciation of the diocese on the part of the parish.

The Used Railroad Ties

By The Rev. ELIOT WHITE

From my swift train I see many wornout ties lately dug from under the rails, and thrown beside the track in a jumble as of huge jackstraws.

They have been replaced, one by one, by new, sound timbers, glossy black from a bath of preserving creosote.

Each of the old ties is scored across near its ends by a sunken, blackened groove where for years it bore the rails and the thunderous, bruising burden of rushing locomotives with passenger or ponderous freight trains.

And beside each groove are seen the empty pits from which the spikes that secured the rails have been drawn.

The fibre of the used timbers is seamed, splintered and decayed from their long span of exposure to changing seasons—silvered by frost, buried deep in snowdrifts, scorcht by midsummer sun, and drencht by rain.

Indeed the oldest are crumbling almost to powder on their upper surfaces.

The laborers who are fitting the new ties into the empty places have sometimes flung the old at random down the slopes of the railroad embankment, where they lie scorned and naked, although now and then one has been partly hidden, as though in pity, by bright ferns and wayside flowers.

It is with a sense of relief, as for a more fitting destiny after such honorable service, that the traveler elsewhere on the route sees the worn timbers carefully piled together, and burning like funeral pyres against the dusk.

And farther still he passes mere drifts of gray and reddish ashes where the heaps have been entirely consumed.

Used—outworn—replaced by fresh and younger material!

You furrowed and crumbling timbers, now you seem to me like the bodies of men and women,

Bearers of the heavy traffic and burden of modern life!

Factory and office workers, miners, constructors of immense buildings and daring bridges, diggers of subways and tunnels, telephone operators, saleswomen, housekeepers, domestics, railroad workers, sailors, stevedores, drivers, machinists, carpenters, molders, masons, smiths, firemen, policemen, doctors, surgeons, nurses, missionaries, teachers, and all the other faithful supporters of the world's stupendous toil and progress.

And see!—here amid the scattered ties the traveler discerns two that have fallen together so that one lies over the other in the form of a rough cross!

Behold also the marks where the iron spikes that they endured so long were drawn!

Yes, the symbol of supreme love and self-sacrifice whereon Divine and Human met and were one, never again to be severed.

Ah, and when the outworn human ties that have served so well and long, through all changing seasons of experience, and under utmost pressure and even agonizing crushing by the savage weight and plunging, roaring speed of life—

When they realize the significance of the spike-pitted and splintered Token of love among them, either now when their fellows seem so heedless and ungrateful, or in the advancing dawn of a nobler Fraternity,

They receive with infinite solace and peace the assurance that their courage, endurance and loyalty have companioned and united them forever with the Wearer of the thorns, and Sufferer under the scourge, nails and lance-thrust of life, for that Love's sake that even though as by fire reveals Humanity as the chosen habitation of God Himself.

Robert Bayard Cutting: An Appreciation

By THE REV. GEORGE WILLIAM DOUGLAS, D.D.

BAYARD CUTTING was out of the ordinary. One could not be with him intimately for half an hour without perceiving that he was consumed by the idea that for a human being it is a great privilege to be.

He was born on December 15, 1875; he died on April 1, 1918. It was a short time to live. He was graduated from Groton School in 1893, and from Harvard "cum laude" in 1897. Then for two years he was a schoolmaster at Groton; after which he entered his father's office in New York, to undertake a business career and devote his spare time to civic, philanthropic and religious efforts, as his father, Mr. Robert Fulton Cutting, had before him. Hereby he rapidly developed decided ability for business, and secured the confidence of men of distinction who came in touch with him. At his death he was a Trustee of the Franklin Trust Co., and the Resolution of the Board of Trustees of that institution is a fitting tribute to the value they put upon his services. He was one of the founders of the College Men's Political Association, intended to encourage the best ideals of political life among college students. He was a member of the Advisory Committee of the Cooper Union. He was a Trustee of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor; of the International Association of Vacation Bible Schools; of the N. Y. Trade School; and of the Boys' Club, to which during a considerable period he devoted one night weekly. In recent years he was deeply interested in the proper treatment of the feebleminded; and as Chairman of the National Committee on the Feeble Minded he did more than any other individual to achieve the important results hitherto attained, so that many States have made public appropriations to deal with this difficult problem. After his death the Minute of the National War Work Council, signed by William Sloane, John R. Mott and Walter T. Diack, bore witness to his noble character and work, as a member of that Council, among the soldiers of France.

Like expressions of admiration for his ability, and of thankfulness for fellowship with him, came to his family from all the important organizations with which he had been associated; and beside such corporate expressions, the deep grief at his loss was still more touching in the very large number of letters from individual friends. These emphasized his good judgment and breadth of view, no less than his winning personality. And more than one hard-headed man of business said of him such words as these: "I shall never, never forget him. He was my inspiration, and the greatest influence in my life." Everybody spoke of his unselfishness, and puremindedness, and his business associates laid stress on "his rugged, unflinching rectitude, combined with tact." Bishop Lawrence, in a letter to his father, covers with characteristic terseness the main ground of his character: "He gave himself for his great company of friends and fellow citizens."

Although Bayard Cutting had the natural zest of life, his usual mood was graver, and spiritually higher; so that, as he grew to manhood, his fellows found in him a certain aloofness. He was uneasy in luxury, and took alike his amusement and his work as part and parcel of the self-same life. In his society you knew beforehand that the face of his soul would flush at the bare idea of the senses triumphing in a man, and you were conscious of an austere personality that was ever ready to scourge the wandering mind. Though quite capable of having a thoroughly good time, early in his young manhood he found out what he really enjoyed, and did not persist in doing things supposed to be delightful, either under the delusion that he enjoyed what he did not, or because he liked to have other people think that he enjoyed them. As to books, he took honors at Harvard, was fluent in French, and disclosed to his intimates a fondness for the best poetry; but to him by all odds the most interesting and illuminating share of the drama of life was the reaction which we get personally from other living beings who are with us in the same pilgrimage. Yet even as to one's own personal experience he understood what Matthew Arnold meant by "the buried life," which only at rare intervals emerges to our consciousness.

In these respects a true picture of him is given by the following extract from a recent letter of one who, summer after summer, was his host in the foothills of the White Mountains:

"His whole attitude and purpose in life was the embodiment of service for mankind. He alone, of all men I have known in the contests with self, came out victorious; and before the outbreak of the war he had devoted his entire energy to those unfortunate fellow-creatures who live in the twilight zone between reality and nonentity. . . .

"It was these beautiful autumnal days that record in the diary of my memory unforgettable associations with him. We would go down to the lake with our guns, accompanied by my English setter, Bede; paddle across, or, still better, go to the head of the lake, some four miles away. Then for a tramp of an hour or so, and back to our cache in the canoe for lunch. Then another tramp, and back in the canoe for the homeward voyage. He would take the bow and I the stern seat, with Bede in the middle, his nose elevated on the thwart, if by chance he might get a whiff of game on the west wind. Bayard did not paddle, but would ask if I cared to have him recite some of the poems from his favorite authors. As we glided down the lake, I would try to keep the stroke of my paddle in rhythmic consonance with his verse, until the boathouse canoe-run brought an end to the day of joy in living. It was an anomaly that a man so disposed should have developed a liking for me. No two persons ever started life under so widely different conditions of environment as we did.

"I have spoken of the third member of our party, Bede. On him Bayard wielded a potent influence. Though this dog had come down in our family through mother and grandmother, yet when Bayard came, he forgot entirely his sense of obligation to me and was always Bayard's enforced chaperon when he started for a walk. If I happened to remind him that I might need his help in a short tramp about the lakeshore or the nearby hills to provide a dinner for our guest, neither that nor the sight of my gun made any impression. A stroll with Bayard was preferred to anything I had to offer. . . .

"However others may define the words, to me Bayard Cutting was one of the real supermen, whose lives give to earth a touch of Heaven."‡

His father's office was full of courtesy to all who came and went, and Bayard had a genius for drawing out the best side of his subordinates. Because of his deep confidence in the purposes of God for every creature he could evoke what is sincere and simple in all natures.

Philanthropy was not in his case a substitute for direct faith in Jesus Christ. Bayard Cutting had found Christ and followed Him; and when, in our country church, he knelt with us at the altar for Holy Communion, we were assured that this young philanthropist "knew Him Whom he had believed."

Furthermore it was from our Lord's life as our personal pattern that Bayard Cutting, in his philanthropic labors, soon learned that our best work in this multifarious world is not so much that of organization and administration, as of quiet individual ministry apart from the limelight of publicity. He was not averse to formal committees: he was an excellent organizer. But he knew how to preserve and to impart to committee-work something of his personal touch; and his success in organizations was largely due to his ability to inspire silent effort in his associates, whereby large designs were carried out in corners.

Whatever he had to do as a citizen of the world, he was always aware of the welcome that awaited him in his happy home. Bayard was a true scion of his home, where the whole atmosphere conveys what St. Peter in his Epistle said of members of a Christian household—"heirs together of the grace of life." A letter from France mentions that "it was his dying request that his mother should have the little New Testament which he always had at hand." And another—one of his associates in an ordinary commercial affair where such traits of character are seldom in evidence—wrote of him to his father: "Permit me to say I know he loved you so."

‡This same remark was made by another letter-writer, each unbeknown to the other.

It was characteristic of both the father and the son that when the call came to serve our country's cause in this world-war there was prompt obedience to the summons. Bayard's familiarity with French defined his task, so that last July he sailed for France, where his work with the Y. M. C. A. was in harmony with all his previous activities. From day to day he went on "doing the next thing," with the same shy courtesy to others, the same devotion of himself, which hitherto had actuated him; and with the same conviction that the best rewards are not the most dazzling and conspicuous: that there is a wide world of happy, delicate emotions open to every manful spirit that waits on the Lord, and abides patiently upon Him in ministering to men. As Associate Organizer in the Advance Section of the Y. M. C. A. he became active in locating establishments, and he was particularly happy in working with the people of the land. So his last letters were buoyant with happiness and hopefulness. He was the right man in the right place.

But with little warning he suffered from an intestinal obstruction that demanded a surgical operation, to the effects of which he succumbed. "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends."

A letter from Bishop Brent to his father, dated Easter Monday, relates some incidents of the closing hours:

"Bayard put up a noble fight for life, but it was against terrific odds. The morning after the operation he said to me, when I came in, that he was dying. But I told him he must set his face toward life—'I shall not die but live, and declare the works of the Lord,' was the text I gave him. He found inspiration in the fact that it was on Maundy Thursday that he received the Holy Communion. . . . On Saturday I saw him again and found him greatly wasted, and suffering a good deal. . . . He did not talk much, but I read to him John XVII, and prayed. He felt that he could not stand the strain much longer. He asked me to look after his brother. My Easter Day was very full, so that I did not get to the hospital until the evening. Doctors Barclay and Stillman told me that he was losing ground, and that there was not one chance in fifty of recovery. I again said prayers with him and 'Abide with Me.' He was wandering a bit, called me doctor, and said he must get up. After service, about nine, I went in again and found him quite quiet. The night nurse said to me that he was 'an ideal patient.' Thinking he was asleep I said to her: 'He is one of the dearest and most loyal of friends.' He opened his eyes and said, 'Bishop, do you mean me?' I said, 'Yes.' He replied, 'Thank you, Bishop,' and clung to my hand. I had prayers with him at the end of which he murmured, 'For Jesus' sake.' Then before I went he said, 'I can do no more. I am worn out. I leave everything in your care.' I said good-night to him, and left. This morning I got out to him just after he had breathed his last. The chaplain was with him and had prayers just before he died, and thought that perhaps he knew, though he had been for some time seemingly unconscious. We have arranged to have the funeral tomorrow, the first part at the hospital and the last at the cemetery. Some of the Y. M. C. A. secretaries and two officers are to act as pallbearers. Chaplain Barnett and I will take the service.

"You must rejoice to have had a son like Bayard, absolutely unselfish and actuated by the highest motives. His last week of life was a triumph from first to last. There was no wavering, no false note, and nothing but steadfast trust and patient waiting. It is a great thing that his dust will be a part of France, France that he loved and served. His latest work was entirely among the French people. He understood them and was happy in doing what he could for them. My friendship with Bayard began long years ago at Groton School. I quickly discerned the fine soul that lay hidden behind his modesty and diffidence. We understood one another, I think. I treasure my fellowship with him as a happy memory. I know how keenly you will feel the loss that has come to you. At the same time you cannot escape the consciousness of the triumph which he has won for you not less than for himself. As I think of it, his life rises up as very complete in the sense that Christ counts completeness. Is there, can there be, anything greater or grander? It is the one success that human life knows.

"Easter Tuesday.

"Quite a number of Bayard's friends were at the service. John Rogers, Ogden Mills, Dr. Benton were among the pallbearers. The day was bright and springlike, with birds singing and leaves budding. The cemetery, which already contains a number of American dead, is at the foot of a hill below the town in a lovely valley, with the River Marne flowing near by. 'Taps' was sounded at the close of the service, and we left him with the flag of his country covering him and the roses of France resting on his bier.

"Will you please accept my sympathy in your bereavement? We prayed for you today and God answered our prayers, and will answer them."

C. H. Brent.

The Tommies in the trenches never say that their comrade is dead: "he has gone West." Or else they say, "he has passed on." And from the whole brief story of Bayard Cutting's earthly life and death do we not derive the same impression of the naturalness of the life after death? After exercising his privilege of being alive here—taking a hand in what there was to do—he has simply passed on into the mystery of the life that is to be. As one of his new friends in France wrote of him from the American Red Cross office: "They will love him in the other world, as he will himself feel at home with the best that he finds there." And a letter from an older friend at Groton School declared: "He will not have to go far to enter the Kingdom of Heaven."

A Prayer For Mourners

HAVE compassion, O most merciful Lord, on all who are mourning for those dear to them. Be thou their Comforter and Friend, and bring them to a fuller knowledge of thy love. Assuage the anguish of their bereavement, and leave only the cherished memory of the loved and lost, and a solemn pride to have laid so costly a sacrifice upon the altar of freedom. For the sake of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Valley Road

By ARTHUR KETCHUM

WHEN we came out of the woods—
Wet woods dusky and vague
And silver with thrushes—
Into the Valley wide and blue
With lingering twilight;
When we came out together,
From the darkness and silence
Of dim woods solemn with night,
And great hills sombre and silent,
And found the little road
Glimmering, dipping, winding,
Under the friendly trees,
Along the upland pastures,
(Do you remember the birches
Slender white columns
Of ruined temples?
The scent of strawberries from hidden gardens
And the far lights scattered like stars?)
When we came out of the woods
This is what I kept saying,
Over and over
Like a refrain,
"O to go on so always
Dark hills behind us forgotten
Unknown valleys before us
And a road without ending
Together."

WHAT OUR BISHOPS ARE SAYING

The Four Essentials

Bishop Rhinelander's Convention Address

Bishop Rhinelander's 1918 convention address was one of the most notable war utterances he has yet made. "Behold I make all things new" was his text. He spoke of the four necessities for the successful waging of the war, Confidence, Penitence, Endurance and Prudence.

Confidence in the righteousness and essentially Christian nature of our cause, a realization that only if our war were contrary to the righteousness our Lord taught could we say as some have said, "when I entered the war I left my Christianity behind," a determination to fight in this war as in Christ's cause were some of the points that he made. The Bishop quoted an eminent Bible scholar, identified throughout his life with the Quakers, who has recently been confirmed in Philadelphia, as saying that the only way to win the war against war was to win this war against militarism.

Secondly, said the Bishop, "We must have penitence. . . . It is not enough to have a righteous cause. We must be worthy of it, we must live up to it, and living up to it is a much harder thing than fighting for it. When knights of old set forth on holy quests, there was strict trial made of their spiritual fitness. It was an admirable and necessary rule. And never had any knight of old so high and holy an adventure as has been given to the rank and file of our citizens. For in strict truth the spiritual future of the world hangs in the balance. Count up all the spiritual treasures which men prize: faith, liberty, justice, truth, righteousness, brotherhood and peace: all are at stake, not for one people, or for two, but for all the peoples of the earth. If we lose, the world will lose them. If we win, the world will win them with us. But because they are spiritual treasures that we fight for, therefore we shall not and we cannot win them (even though we may defeat the Germans) unless we are spiritually worthy.

"The Archbishop of York, in one of his memorable addresses, pictured Almighty God as anxiously questioning, not on which side the final victory would fall, but whether the Allied nations could safely be entrusted with that victory. It is a daring way to put it, but it makes the point quite clear. Can God, as He looks down on us, decide to trust us as we are with the responsibility of victory?

"Thirdly: We must have endurance: endurance without limit of either time or effort. We must endure until the end: until the thing is accomplished for which we took up arms. That is what I mean by endurance without a time-limit. There would be a deadly danger in a premature peace. It would secure to the Germans the chief aims for which they made war at the beginning. It would leave the world wholly without security for the future. It would nullify all our sacrifices. But there would be in a premature peace a more deadly danger still. For it would mean nothing less than our spiritual surrender to our spiritual enemy. It is possible, I think, to centre our hopes and efforts too much upon the moment of a final victory. Rather we should be set on unwavering faithfulness to our cause whatever happens.

"Recently it has been my privilege to attend banquets given to distinguished Englishmen and Frenchmen, here and elsewhere. They were very moving and interesting occasions. The enthusiasm was overpowering, and entirely spontaneous. There were thunders of applause, and tears in many eyes. But what struck me most, and moved me most, was the spirit and behavior of the visitors. There was about them, in their looks and voices, in their whole bearing, a solemn gravity, kindly, very human, and yet somehow quite detached. It was not that they were foreigners; it was not that different blood ran in their veins. It was simply that a different spirit had entered into and possessed them. As they looked down from the speakers' table on the brilliant scene; as they told us of the strains and privations they had left behind, of the agony and sorrow, the long-tried patience, the unmeasured sacrifices, the unwavering fortitude of their countrymen at home, one felt, and one knew they felt it also, that we over here were still on the very surface of the conflict; still at our play, still unheeding and untouched.

"Finally," said the Bishop, "we must have prudence. . . . Prudence means wisdom, practical and positive, clear-sighted, keen-witted, resolute in action." . . .

"The Archbishop of York noted the lack among us of spiritual foresight and preparedness as what chiefly disappointed him. Over there, in France and England, they realize quite clearly that the one thing which cannot happen after the war is a return to old conditions. A new world is being born. In it men will be moved by new ideals, filled with new purposes, bound for new goals."

The Bishop closed with a strong appeal that the Church make all things new. He called special attention to the weakness coming out of our congregationalism. Then he said:

"Do you ask me to be practical? To suggest a program? Well, here are some items. As a first necessity, free pews, or rather no pews at all, but only serviceable seats for use in the intervals of worship. Next, simple and moving music, not to be listened to, but to be made and raised by the people to the praise of God, who loves to hear His children sing. Then services at reasonable and democratic hours: at hours, that is, which really meet the soul's need and suit the people's habits. Then the Lord's own service restored to its rightful place as the living heat and centre of every Lord's Day worship and observance: and I mean Communion simultaneously with Eucharist: feeding together no less than worshiping together: feeding that we may worship. Then all our Church officials playing the part not only of trustees of property, but at the very least of non-commissioned officers, put into office for that purpose, helping and caring for the rank and file who have honored them by choosing them to lead and represent them. . . .

"This war is waged to make the world a decent place to live in, or, as Christians would prefer to put it, to set up the Kingdom of God upon this earth. Prudence, brethren, suggests that we should set about it here and now.

"'Behold I make all things new.' When the boys come home they will be bent on newness. They will look with new eyes upon our homes, our education, our commercial system, our politics, our international relations. There will be a new and grim strength of purpose behind their demand for drastic change. Shall they, or shall they not, find us ready for it and working at it?"

A New Attitude in the Church

From Bishop Lines' 1918 Convention Address

The great truth which is being revealed to us is the power of the Cross of Christ. We have put it above and within our churches and have bowed before it as the symbol of our religion, but we have never measured its meaning, and it is coming to us now. The Cross upon which the world's Saviour died must be trusted to help us through this awful experience in the world's life. While not wanting in reverence or in pity for the crucified Master, like his disciples we have stood afar off and we must come nearer to Him and hear Him speak to our hearts. It sometimes seems like a dying world, with death more familiar to us than ever before! but if dying with Him it shall rise and live with Him in the glory of His Resurrection. Who shall bring the world to understand the meaning of the cross and to find the needful comfort and help therein, if not you who bear Christ's name and worship and love Him? It is not the mystical thought of the preacher, but it is the truth which sustains and holds us up and comforts us which the world today must find in the cross of the Lord Jesus.

"The Church must, however, not only remain in communion with its Lord in worship, in ways appointed for making and keeping companionship and friendship with Him, it must have a message concerning the use of all our powers and resources, material as well as spiritual, for the cause of righteousness. Religion is a larger word than ever before and the Church must claim for religion every department of human life, letting the old distinction between secular and religious pass, that the whole life may be consecrated by a high and holy purpose.

If this church is going to make a large contribution to the religious life of this country, a new attitude must be taken and a new spirit developed. We must be a more adventurous people, with more courage, larger vision, with new plans which are neither sentimental nor sensational and less worship of what is safe. It is time for us to put the church as regards its support upon a plane above the church supper and the fair, with articles given by unwilling givers to be bought by unwilling buyers. We must have church suppers and entertainments not to make money but to cultivate a friendly family feeling in the church and bring the people together, forgetting their differences as Christian people ought to do. Our great business folks must cease to think that they are so busy or that plans in their minds are so important that they can not go about from time to time to church social gatherings and behave as good Christian people. And our women must forget their social position and dress so simply in church as not to make other women uncomfortable and find their friends in parish gatherings and receptions among such women as I suppose our blessed Lord and His Mother knew and loved when they lived in Nazareth or visited in Bethany. The women who are never thinking about their position are a great blessing in a parish. We have allowed distinctions to be emphasized and what is artificial and unreal to develop so as to threaten the existence of Christian feeling and conduct in our parishes and it is full time that there was a new spirit in us.

I think, also, that if this Church is to have a place of religious leadership in the country we must get into a better relation with the Churches about us, stop making claims and remove the suspicion of being exclusive and ungenerous. There is something which I would call snobbery which has been a blight upon the life of the Mother Church across the sea, in its attitude toward nonconformity and dissent and we have brought something like it across the sea and it is not only entirely unchristian but it is against the spirit of our people and it will only do the Church harm. We are deeply attached to our own Church; we are thankful that its continuity in organization and faith from Apostolic times is unbroken and no other church has anything more in the way of association with the past than we preserve and desire. It is not a time so much to talk about ancestry as it is to show efficiency in dealing in the spirit of Christ and in accordance with the truths of the Gospel, with great companies of people under new conditions of life.

Keeping the Church Alive at Home

From Bishop Guerry's 1918 Convention Address

We are in danger, some of us at least, of forgetting that the work of keeping the Church alive at home is just as important in this war as the work of carrying the message to the men in the trenches. As one of the mid-day preachers in St. Michael's Church said last Lent, "It is all one camp," meaning the camp "over there," and the camp here. You cannot separate them any more than you can separate a boiler from its engine. The engine is powerless to do its work, unless it is coupled up with the steam generated in the boiler; and our Army would be deprived of its splendid idealism and faith in the righteousness and justice of our cause if there should be a weakening of the moral and spiritual foundations of the nation at home. It cannot be too often repeated that this is no war of governments, but of peoples and of ideals. The principles involved are so fundamental—the issues which must emerge when the war is over, so tremendous, and the task of reconstruction which lies ahead of us so exceedingly difficult, that our people will stand in need of the highest moral and spiritual leadership. As the casualty lists grow longer and sorrow and bereavement come to many an American home, the ministrations of the Church will become more and more to many a burdened soul like the shadow of a Great Rock in a weary land. The time is close at hand when the utmost capacity of faith and of sacrifice of the life in the Nation will be put to the test. And if there are no clergy at home to proclaim the unsearchable riches of Christ, and to strengthen the faith and hope of our people, what will become of the spiritual defenses of the Nation? . . .

The longer the war is waged the more deeply I am impressed with the moral and spiritual significance of the struggle in which we are engaged. During his recent visit to this country some one asked the Archbishop of York this very searching and practical question: "Your Grace, if, as you say, this is a righteous war, and God is on the side of righteousness, then why does He not give us a speedy victory?" I was much struck by the Archbishop's answer: "Because," he said, "we are not yet worthy to win the war." It must be that God in His wisdom is not yet satisfied that we are willing to dedicate all for the preservation of those great ideals which He has entrusted to us; He is not yet satisfied that He can trust the nations of the earth to carry these ideals to their fullest fruition, no matter what the cost. When He can so trust them the war will come to an end.

The Archbishop is right; the supreme question before the nations of the world is not what France or England or America wants through this war, but what is God's plan and purpose? Are we as a nation prepared to do His will? Have we yet humbled ourselves, under the mighty hand of God and sought to know His will? Not until the Nation as a whole is lifted in faith to the high plane of sacrificial service and places itself in the hand of God as a willing instrument for the carrying out of His great and divine plan, will the war cease.

Lord Roberts, the greatest of modern English captains, said just before his death, "England has the ammunition and she has the men, but she will never win this war, until she wins it on her knees." And it is to our knees before God that we must come; and if it be the purpose of God through the stern discipline of suffering, to bring back the nations of the world, engaged in this mighty struggle, to a recognition of His divine sovereignty, and to a new appreciation of spiritual values, then I do not hesitate to say that it is worth all that it costs.

The War Duty of the Clergy

From Bishop Chesire's 1918 Convention Address

There is a danger that in the excitement of this great national crisis of the world's history, and in the clamorous demands made on all sides for our sympathy and our cooperation we may suffer some confusion of ideas, and seriously mistake our real duties and obligations. I think I have seen some such mistakes. Many of them proceed from high and pure motives, and illustrate noble qualities of character. But they are none the less mistakes, and injurious in the end. Our supreme duty is that each man should stand in his place, and do that work which specially belongs to him to do. If we have a plain and distinct duty before us, we have no right to neglect it and run off to some more attractive or adventurous, or dangerous field of service, because it appeals to us. So far as I am able to understand the true principles of duty, a clergyman has no right to abandon the exercise of his function, and to undertake other work. He has voluntarily devoted himself to a specific course, and has solemnly pledged himself to pursue it exclusively. Upon that condition alone he received his ministerial commission. I am not saying that his country may not make such a demand upon him as would require him to obey her call: I am not saying that want of a field for ministerial labor might not justify him in taking other work: I am not saying that a lack of men to do other important work might not be a valid reason for him to respond to the necessity of the case. But I do say that none of these peculiar circumstances exists at the present time to justify our clergy in leaving the proper work of the Ministry to engage in the secular duties arising out of our great struggle. Our country, so far from calling on the clergy to abandon their proper functions, has declared expressly and emphatically that they should not do this. By exempting the clergy from military service, exempting them as clergymen, our Government has said that their proper function is so important to the welfare of the nation, that the country demands of them that they apply themselves diligently to their proper duties. There is abundant work for them, both at home and in the army. If some proper appointment in the army, calling for the exercise of his function, comes to a clergyman he may properly accept it. But if no such opportunity offers, the eagerness of his spirit to have a hand in the great conflict does not justify him in undertaking secular work. And no imaginary benefits to be derived from the perilous experiences of war will so much avail for the real discipline of his character as submitting to give up his own personal desire and doing his duty in that state of life unto which it has pleased God to call him. . . .

I say nothing of the great Christian tradition which prohibits the voluntary taking up of arms by those in Holy Orders, though in these days of an increasing sense of the importance of corporate life and the obligation of the social conscience so general a feeling in all ages of the Church expressed in many ancient canons should not be lightly regarded.

I feel it necessary, my brethren, to speak of this matter. I appreciate the spirit of heroic self-sacrifice which impels the young priest to feel that he must go and take his place in the ranks with his brethren. But we are not our own masters. We have dedicated ourselves to a particular work, an important work; and our country, no less than the necessities of the Church and of the world, has said to us that we must stand in our place, and do our work, while those who are called for that other work fulfil also their duty in doing what they are called to do.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

DR. DOBBIN OF SHATTUCK DIES IN CALIFORNIA

Had Been Rector of Shattuck School for Half a Century

FARIBAULT, MINNESOTA.—The Rev. James Dobbin, rector emeritus of Shattuck School and for sixty years an outstanding figure in the life of the Church in Minnesota, died on May 18 at Long Beach, California. He was one of that little group of pioneer missionaries associated with Bishop Whipple and James Lloyd Breck, to whom the Episcopal Church in the Northwest owes its foundations. None who ever saw the venerable headmaster will ever forget his flowing white beard, his vigorous bearing and his masterful leadership. To quote an editorial in one of the Faribault papers: "The Rev. James Dobbin, rector emeritus of Shattuck School, and for nearly half a century rector, instructor and builder of that institution, will live so long as its buildings stand; so long as its graduates go forth in their manly strength of body and mind each year to become of usefulness in all the activities of life, business and professional; so long as the stars upon their service flag shine with the glory of voluntary service for their country; so long as Shattuck's sons survive, and the generations that follow them remember what Dr. Dobbin and Shattuck School have done."

It was known that he had been in failing health for many months. He was born in Salem, Washington County, New York, June 29, 1833, and was reared on a farm, receiving his earlier education in the public schools. At the age of eighteen years he left home, and prepared for college at the Salem and Argyle Academies, making his way upward by his own energy and industry. In 1855 he took charge of the school at Argyle, where he remained until 1857; then entered Union College, graduating in 1859. The same year he came to Faribault and assisted Dr. James Lloyd Breck in a mission day school for one year. Then he returned to New York and again conducted the Argyle Academy, one year later taking charge of the Greenwich Academy. In 1864 he came back to Faribault and took up the study of theology at Seabury Divinity School. Just before taking holy orders in the spring of 1867, he was prevailed upon by Bishop Whipple and the Rev. Dr. Breck to attempt the founding of Shattuck School, and he remained in charge of that institution until September, 1914, when he resigned as rector and went to California for the benefit of his health.

In 1901, feeling the need of a school for boys between the ages of seven and thirteen years, too young to be admitted at Shattuck, he and his wife founded St. James' School, of which he was a trustee to the time of his death. The school has been a great success, and adds more honors to those previously achieved by Dr. Dobbin. As has been said of him, "His work is written in the lives of those who have passed under his fostering care for more than three decades past, and the influence which has emanated from his life will be felt for generations to come."

The funeral service for Dr. Dobbin was held at Long Beach, California, Tuesday, May 21, at 11 a. m., and at the same hour a memorial service was held at St. James' School, Faribault, Rev. Dr. F. F. Kramer, of Seabury Divinity School, delivering the address, which paid an eloquent tribute to the deceased for his important and far-reaching work.

The body was cremated, and at some later date the remains will be brought to Faribault and placed in Maple Lawn Cemetery.

NEW YORK MAKES PLANS FOR DIOCESAN CAMPAIGN

Great Enthusiasm Displayed at Luncheon Last Week

NEW YORK CITY.—At a luncheon held Friday at the Downtown Club in Pine Street seventy clergymen and laymen of the Diocese of New York, gathered to make definite plans of a diocesan every-member canvass in the Autumn, found their enthusiasm reflected in a statement made by Bishop Greer toward the close of the meeting when he declared: "Now something will be done. This is more than a paper organization."

Mr. William Fellows Morgan, who presided at the meeting, had just been made permanent chairman of the Executive Committee for the campaign, a fact which led Bishop Greer to say further: "I know that Mr. Morgan has a reputation for doing things."

The Bishop stated his conviction that the undertaking was only incidentally a money movement, and was primarily a spiritual and religious campaign. There was great hope for its results, because it was to be undertaken in a hopeful time. Mr. George Zabriskie, who had told of the every-member canvass in Calvary Church, had referred to a communicant who was not in favor of the campaign, and whose explanation of his position was that "it had never been done." Referring to this statement, Bishop Greer said: "The man who says it can't be done must either be converted, get out of the way, or be crushed."

The plan for the campaign was outlined by Mr. Samuel Thorne, Jr., and the Rev. Milo Gates gave a detailed description of the Every-Name Canvass recently so successfully conducted in his parish. Bishop Lloyd said that he had watched Mr. Morgan and added: "He'll make your life a burden." Later on the speaker declared, to the evident amusement of his hearers, that "laymen can make New York a civilized community."

Members of the Executive Committee elected were as follows: Chairman, William Fellows Morgan; first vice-chairman, Haley Fiske; second vice-chairman, William Walker Orr; secretary, Samuel Thorne, Jr.; treasurer, Alvin W. Krech; general secretary, Frank H. Merrill.

The Very Rev. Howard Chandler Robbins was elected secretary of the committee of clergymen.

GENERAL SEMINARY WILL HELP WAR DEPARTMENT

Trustees Decide at Commencement to Offer Use of Dormitories

NEW YORK CITY.—The Board of Trustees of the General Theological Seminary voted at their meeting during the commencement period of last week to turn all unused dormitories over to the War Department for war service work. It was decided that to help make up the deficit the students this coming year should follow the example of the West Point cadets in shoveling snow from the paths and sidewalks, an item which amounted to $800 last year. The degree of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on the Rev. Edward A. White of Bloomfield, New Jersey, and Bishop Fiske of Central New York. The Rev. Dr. Francis J. Hall was elected a professor in the seminary for life.

Commencement was held on Wednesday the usual service taking place in the Chapel of the Good Shepherd at 11 o'clock. Essays were read as follows:

Mr. Vincent Charles Bonnlander, B.A. of Columbia University and M.A., of New York University, and the Diocese of New Jersey, Subject: "The Quest for Security."

Mr. Donald Fraser Forrester, B.A., of Queen's University and M.A., of King's College and the Diocese of Fredericton, Canada. Subject: "The Glastonbury Legends."

Mr. Benham Ewing, M.A., of the University of Michigan and the Diocese of Michigan, was excused from reading his essay on "Prayer in Its Relation to Life."

The baccalaureate sermon was preached on Monday evening by Bishop Stearly of Newark. That afternoon the usual reception was held in the gymnasium. At the annual meeting of the Associate Alumni held on Tuesday morning an essay entitled "The Preacher's Vision and Task" was read by the Rev. Charles Malcolm Douglas. The meeting was followed by the annual alumni luncheon.

President Signs Chaplains Bill

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—President Wilson signed on May 25 the bill to increase the number of chaplains in the Army. The General Committee on Army and Navy Chaplains has already presented to the War Department the names of enough men to meet a large part of the quota required by the bill, but reports that the names of unusually well qualified candidates are desired in anticipation of the increasing size of the Army.

Building Commission Meets

NEW YORK CITY.—At its meeting on May 16 held at the Church Missions House loans amounting to $21,900 were voted to parishes and missions.

The corresponding secretary of the Commission is as usual at this time of the year visiting Diocesan Conventions, Councils and Convocations, explaining the work of the Commission and expressing its willingness and desire to assist in the work of building churches, rectories and parish houses

HALF OF HOSPITAL STAFF FROM ST. BARNABAS GUILD

Church Has Splendid Record at Camp Pike, Bishop Tells Convention

BATESVILLE, ARKANSAS.—The forty-sixth annual Council of the Diocese of Arkansas met in the beautiful new St. Paul's Church here from May 8 to 10; the Woman's Auxiliary meeting at the same time, and continuing in session throughout Friday.

The Bishop in his address dwelt particularly upon the activities at Camp Pike; several of the diocesan clergy being at work there, and a most encouraging outlook for more extensive work to be done by the Church. Many Churchmen are among the officers and soldiers, and more than one-half the Red Cross nurses at the Base Hospital are Churchwomen, most of them members of the Guild of St. Barnabas. A building for services and Church work is greatly needed, and a request for the same was sent to the War Commission of the Church.

No change was made in the personnel of the Standing Committee except to elect the Rev. C. C. Burke to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of the Rev. M. W. Lockhart, who was appointed chaplain in the National Army. The Rev. A. E. Lyman-Wheaton was elected secretary of the Council, and Mr. E. P. Mathes, chancellor of the diocese. The Standing Committee recommended the Rev. Jerry Wallace for ordination to the priesthood, and Wm. E. DeClaybrook, D.D., formerly a colored Baptist minister, for ordination to the diaconate. Canonical consent was given to the consecration of the Rev. E. Thomas Demby as suffragan bishop of Negro work in Arkansas.

The Rev. Charles L. Pardee of the American Church Building Fund visited the Council and made a strong plea in behalf of the work.

Thursday night an enthusiastic missionary meeting was held and several addresses made. The Suffragan Bishop gave an account of his work during the year, and the Rev. E. T. Mabley made his report as warden of the Helen Dunlap School for Mountain Girls.

The Woman's Auxiliary was a most inspiring gathering. The reports of the various branches represented were the best ever made, and the United Offering Fund received larger contributions than during any previous year. A very forceful paper, entitled "Shall We Neglect Church Work for the Red Cross," by Mrs. James R. Winchester, was read by the Rev. R. W. Emerson before the Auxiliary; and Mrs. Walter S. Hall, a sister of Bishop Roots of Hankow, gave an interesting address on China. Illustrations of how to teach the Christian Nurture Course to children of the kindergarten were given by Mrs. C. A. Linaker. Mrs. J. B. Pillow was re-elected president, Mrs. Walter G. Hall and Mrs. John Ferrill were elected first and second vice-presidents, respectively. Ten of the fourteen branches were represented.

A Letter From the President

PAWTUCKET, RHODE ISLAND.—A resolution unanimously adopted by the congregation at the patriotic rally in St. Luke's Church on a recent Sunday evening, and telegraphed to President Wilson, pledging the loyalty of the members of the Church to the United States Government and volunteering to do everything possible to bring victory, brought the following acknowledgment from the White House to the rector, the Rev. Arthur J. Watson:

THE WHITE HOUSE
WASHINGTON

May 27, 1918.

My dear Mr. Watson:

The President warmly appreciates your telegram of May 26 and he has asked me to thank you and those who joined with you for your patriotic and loyal expressions. Sincerely yours,

(Signed) J. P. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

CLOSING EXERCISES HELD

St. Paul's, Lawrence, Finishes its 30th Successful Year

LAWRENCEVILLE, VIRGINIA.—The thirtieth annual closing exercises of the St. Paul Normal and Industrial School which began Sunday, May 19, with the preaching of the baccalaureate sermon by the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D.D., rector of St. Stephen's Church, Savannah, Georgia, and an alumnus of the school, and closed Wednesday, May 22, with the graduating exercises, were among the most enthusiastic and successful in the history of the school. Unusual interest was attached to the celebration this year on account of its being also the thirtieth anniversary of the founding of the school. The program emphasized both the academic and industrial features of the school's training.

The graduating exercises took place in the basement of the Memorial Chapel at 3 p. m. Bishop Thomson opened the exercise with a short prayer in which he paid a most feeling tribute to Bishop Randolph, late president of the board of trustees of the school. The singing of jubilee songs by the quartette was greatly enjoyed. "Little David Play on Your Harp" and "Swing Low Sweet Chariot" were among those sung.

The alumni address by the Rev. Junius L. Taylor, D.D., attracted special attention on account of the unusual circumstances of his career. He came to St. Paul's a full-grown man unable either to read or write. So illiterate was he that no class could be found for him. He stayed at the school, however, worked his way through by learning the shoemaker's trade, and finished his academic course and went to the Bishop Payne Divinity School, Petersburg, for his theological training, graduating from there with honor in 1904. He has been engaged in the sacred ministry ever since. During his ministerial career he has presented 425 persons for Confirmation. He attributed all that he had become to the school, which made it possible for him to get training and education. It was of him that Bishop Greer of New York said: "If St. Paul's had done no more than turn out Taylor, it had richly repaid every cent spent for its maintenance."

Bishop Lloyd's address was wonderfully inspiring and helpful.

Mr. William Anthony Aery, from the Hampton Institute, followed Bishop Lloyd in a terse, but forceful, speech of five minutes, full of hope and encouragement. He told the school that he brought greetings from Hampton Institute and its new principal.

SOUTHERN VIRGINIA WILL ELECT A COADJUTOR

Bishop Urges an Increase in Clerical Salaries

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA.—The twenty-sixth annual Council of the Diocese of Southern Virginia met in St. Paul's Church here May 28. All of the sessions were presided over by Bishop Tucker, assisted by Suffragan Bishop Thompson.

The Rt. Rev. William C. Brown, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor of the Diocese of Virginia, addressed the Council with reference to the educational needs of the Church in the State of Virginia, with special attention to Stuart Hall, at Staunton, owned jointly by the two dioceses.

The annual reports and addresses of the two Bishops were then read by them, and consisted mainly in a recital and record of their official acts during the past year. Mention was made of the need of increase of clerical salaries, and that the colored work of the diocese is in a very satisfactory condition. Bishop Tucker intimated his desire for a Coadjutor Bishop and commended the wise statesmanship of President Wilson.

The Convocation of Southwest Virginia presented a memorial asking the Council to consider the advisability of dividing the diocese, and a committee was appointed to investigate the matter and report to the session of the Council next year.

At the session of the Council on Tuesday night, Archdeacon Russell made an eloquent address in regard to the colored work, but especially concerning St. Paul's school at Lawrenceville.

The Board of Religious Education announced that a Sunday School Teachers' Training School would be held in Lynchburg from June 17 to 21, and that the Norfolk School will not be held this year.

At the session on Wednesday morning the time was largely taken up in a discussion of the matter of electing a Coadjutor Bishop, it being the evident desire to improve the condition of the Suffragan Bishop by making him Coadjutor Bishop. A motion was passed instructing the Standing Committee to ask the consents of the Bishops and Standing Committees of the Church to the election of a Coadjutor Bishop, on the ground of extent of territory.

A resolution was passed looking toward amending the constitution of the Diocese so as to provide for the annual meeting of the Council on the third Tuesday in January, instead of in May as at present.

A resolution was passed instructing the secretary to send a telegram to President Wilson expressing the confidence of the Church in Southern Virginia in his wisdom, and assuring him of its loyalty in our struggle for freedom as against autocracy.

A resolution was passed expressing the sentiment of the Council as opposed to any effort toward enlarging the sphere of the Provincial Synods by conferring legislative power upon them. Most of the present officers were re-elected for the coming year.

PUBLISHERS ATTACKED BY CONGRESSMAN KITCHIN

Understands the "Game" of All Periodicals and Newspapers

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—Representative Claude Kitchin, Democratic leader of the House and Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, in the course of an address advocating the postponement of revenue legislation until next session, attacked the publishers of the country here last Tuesday, declaring that they were responsible for the Revenue bill recommended by President Wilson, and that they hoped to induce the President or the Secretary of the Treasury to force through a Revenue bill with the postal zone system eliminated.

It is interesting in this connection to note that Representative Kitchin hails from the South, a section of the country little affected by the unfair zone system.

In his speech Mr. Kitchin first reviewed the attitude of the Administration, and then launched into a bitter attack on the publishers of the country, plainly attributing the President's desires for immediate legislation to what he called the "publishers' lobby."

In the course of his speech Mr. Kitchin stated that he had hoped Congress could get through its business in time to adjourn by July 1. Certain political fences, those of Mr. Kitchin perhaps most of all, will have to be built up before the next election; and if Congress remains in session during the Summer months the time for political campaigning will be short.

Mr. Kitchin's direct attack on the publishing interests of the country was as follows:

"I knew that they (the publishers) attempted to get it on the Post Office bill in the House or to get a separate bill for the purpose. They failed. They attempted to get it on the Post Office bill in the Senate Committee and they failed. They then gave notice that a motion would be made in the Senate, after the Post Office Appropriation bill was reported to it, to suspend the rules so that such amendment could be offered to the bill, and thus have another fight in the House and the Senate.

"I know that they planned that if they could not get it in some pending bill, one way or another, they would insist on a Revenue bill which would offer them their chance. I know that the leading papers that have been denouncing Congress and the Ways and Means Committee, and especially me, for the present postal rate provisions, as soon as they had the first intimation that a tax bill would be demanded by the Treasury Department, came out in strong leading editorials demanding, in the interest of the Treasury and the country, that Congress enact another revenue bill.

"I understand their game. I want to warn this House and the country of their game. Here it is: They are going to try to put the repeal of the postal provision or the suspension of its operation upon whatever revenue bill that is passed here. But they know that the manhood and patriotism, the sense of right and justice, and of honesty and fair dealing, between the Government and every class of the people of the membership of this House will forbid and prevent such repeal or modification going on a bill here.

"They then hope to put such an amendment on in the Senate, and then, when it goes to conference, they are counting upon the conferees of the House and the Senate sitting in session day after day and week after week and finally getting together on every proposition except the repeal or the modification of that provision, and then, when election time or adjournment time is nearing, they hope to get the President or the Secretary of the Treasury to insist upon the House conferees yielding, appealing to them not to take the responsibility of defeating or further delaying the passage of the greatest and most important tax and financial measure ever proposed, on account of sticking to the little, pitiful postal rate provision.

"That is their game, and, gentlemen, I warn you now, see if that is not the path they take. I am going to watch and see who is going to help them play that game and let you see what a prophet I am. I serve notice on them and the House now that, if the Speaker's judgment shall assign me as one of the conferees, there will be one who will not help them play that game, but will use all of his power to thwart it."

If Representative Kitchin's accusations are true, it would seem that the publishers were laying themselves out to very serious consequences. If they are not true—and this seems more probable—Representative Kitchin should be scourged from office.

SOLDIER CHOIR SINGS AT IMPRESSIVE SERVICE

Boys from Battle Creek Camp Wear Uniforms in Procession

MARSHALL, MICHIGAN.—An impressive military service was held in Trinity Church here on Sunday morning, May 26. Mr. C. J. S. Williamson, Brotherhood of St. Andrew Secretary, and the Rev. William Heilman, Episcopal War Commission Camp Pastor at Camp Custer, brought a soldier choir of fifty voices to the church in automobiles furnished by members of the Marshall congregation.

To the people of Marshall it was a notable occasion, and the sight of a choir all in khaki with soldiers in uniform carrying the flag and the cross in the procession is one that will not be soon forgotten.

An excellent dinner was served to the choir by the women of the parish immediately after the service. In the afternoon the local rector gave an impromptu organ recital, and the men lingered long in the cool, beautiful church, listening to the music.

In order to arrange for the service it was necessary for Mr. Heilman and Mr. Williamson to make more than one hundred personal calls, and also to arrange for several choir recitals both in and out of the camp.

ORDINATIONS

CLEVELAND, OHIO.—In St. Paul's Church, Sunday, May 26, Bishop Leonard advanced to the priesthood the Rev. Messrs. Walter Freeman Whitman, Charles T. Hull and Nathaniel R. High Moor. The candidates were presented by the Very Rev. A. A. Abbott, archdeacon of the diocese; and the preacher was the Rev. Andrew Chapman, rector of St. James' Church.

N. E. GIRLS' FRIENDLY HAS HEARTENING MEETING

Providence Gives Warm Welcome to Large Gathering

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.—The recent combined meetings of the New England Provincial Conference of the Girls' Friendly Society and the annual diocesan gatherings of the Order at Providence were successful beyond expectation. On May 18 a throng of children from all parts of the diocese sang heartily in the Candidates' Service at St. John's Church, and listened to an address by the Rev. Anson B. Howard. The banner for best attendance throughout the year was awarded to the Church of the Redeemer, Providence. The annual business meeting of Associates on May 24, at the Bishop McVickar House, heard the annual reports, which showed the present membership in the diocese to be 2,101.

Every diocese of New England was represented in the opening meeting of the Provincial Conference at All Saints' Parish House on Friday afternoon, May 24. Miss Mary B. Anthony welcomed the delegates; the devotions were by the Rev. Alfred P. Johnson, first chaplain of the G. F. S., and Miss Helen Stratton of Western Massachusetts presided. The topic of commendation was introduced by Miss Katherine Jackson of Connecticut, followed by discussion. Mrs. S. McLean Buckingham, of the national headquarters, made an address on the department of literature. And the Holiday House activities were presented by Miss Cornelia Whittier, general head of Holiday House work, and by Miss Margaret Jackson of Connecticut.

Bishop and Mrs. Perry entertained the conference in the late afternoon, and over 500 guests thronged the house and grounds and enjoyed a gracious hospitality. The annual supper of the Diocesan G. F. S. followed in Grace Church Parish House when 500 girls from the various branches enjoyed a social hour before the annual service in the church, when the day reached its climax. There were over 700 members and associates in the long procession, with many of the clergy and the Bishop. The address was from the Rev. Percy G. Kammerer.

Bishop Perry was the celebrant at the Corporate Communion on Saturday at 8 a. m., when over 200 G. F. S. members were present. The forenoon conference was presided over by Miss Sarah B. Hopkins of Worcester, Massachusetts, when the report was read from the War Emergency Committee, of which Mrs. Harold Brown of Rhode Island is the national chairman. The assigned topic, "Constructive Forces in the G. F. S.," was discussed by Miss Drown of Manchester, New Hampshire, Miss Mackintosh of Boston, and Miss Taber of Connecticut. During this conference the annual diocesan meeting of the Candidates' Leaders was held. The closing afternoon was occupied with a sightseeing automobile ride followed by a garden party at the residence of Mrs. Edward W. Blodgett, in Pawtucket. The 125 delegates from other dioceses were hospitably entertained in Providence and vicinity. The unusual attendance and interest at all the gatherings, whether of a business or social nature, made the conference a notable event in the life of the Girls' Friendly Society in New England.

CONFLICT IN CHINA GREETS THE REV. MR. TYNG

Boston Tea Party Spirit Felt by Troops in the South

NEW YORK CITY.—The Rev. Walworth Tyng, Changsha, China, returned to his station after furlough in this country to find a serious conflict between the troops of the North and South Provinces raging in the neighborhood of Changsha, the Board of Missions announces. The southern troops, Mr. Tyng says, have never been satisfied with the results of the first revolution. The conservative North, which is also poorer and less populous, has always managed to keep control of the military ascendency as one of the survivals of the Manchu rule. The army quartered in the Southern Provinces has been mainly a northern army. The result has been the development in the south of a feeling very similar to that underlying the Boston Tea Party of Revolutionary fame. This has produced a series of revolts since 1911, to secure the reality of the results aimed at in the revolution of that year.

"All the Mission Compounds, including ours, are a mass of humanity, mostly women and children. There are only a few of our men to manage affairs. These Chinese workers of ours are doing the job very well. We must have at least 300 or 400 women and children from outside. The floor of the church even is covered at night with sleepers, besides schools, verandas, and all other sheltered spaces.

"We have a month's supplies of food and fuel in our boys' boarding school and have arrangements for feeding the people. There is something very pathetic in their fears. We had to disappoint them in one respect: in refusing to allow valuables to be stored in the premises (so as not to tempt the looters in and jeopardize lives).

"The city has hardly a vestige of 'business as usual.' It is like a Sunday morning in some of the 'down-town' districts at home, with an unwonted and oppressive hush, but here there is the added tension of many possible dangers, such as fires and looting. We could see the smoke of one of the barracks going up this morning, just outside the East wall.

"There are a good many new buildings here in the last nine months. The American Consulate is in good new quarters on the river front. The fine new Yale hospital is finished and in operation. My own house not being open I spent my first night here as a guest of Dr. Hume in one of the private rooms for foreign patients. The Presbyterians keep on building, the latest being a boys' boarding school, a native pastor's house, a foreign residence (the third) and the big new church, besides a start on a large new school building for the girls' high school. They have only been here for four years (to our sixteen), and have nowhere near the opportunity of our wonderful location: but they have put in about four times the plant we have and keep about double our staff. This is going on, war or not war, and is a possible basis for some comparisons not pleasant to realize."

While in this country last Winter, Mr. Tyng, with the approval of the Board of Missions, asked for $18,000 for the purchase of land and the erection of buildings in Changsha. Towards this amount gifts and pledges total approximately $9,000. At its meeting on May 8 the Board of Missions appropriated $4,500 from the undesignated legacies for Changsha. The Board of Missions will gladly receive and add to the Changsha Building Fund any gifts on account of the $5,000 still needed.

JEWS AND CHRISTIANS LECTURE ON THE BIBLE

Roman Priest, Liberal and Orthodox Rabbis in Parish House

FORT WORTH, TEXAS.—The Rev. Edward Henry Eckel gave the observance of Whitsuntide in St. Andrew's parish an unusual character by two occasions in honor of the Bible. On Whitsunday itself, after evensong in the church, a large number of people repaired to the auditorium of the parish house, where Mr. Eckel delivered a lecture on "The Superiority of the Bible to Other Sacred Books," and incidentally the preeminence of Christ to the founders of the ethnic religious of the East; after which he exhibited about fifty volumes of bibles and bible apparatus from his private library, some of which he explained before giving the people an opportunity to swarm around the exhibition tables and examine the books for themselves. A Latin Vulgate of 1489 with hand illuminated capitals in color was the object of chief interest.

On the following Wednesday evening the exhibition was repeated after a series of addresses as follows: "The Bible and Judaism," by Rabbi George Fox, liberal Jew, and Rabbi Charles Blumenthal, orthodox Jew; "The Bible and the Roman Catholic Church," by the Rev. Robert M. Nolan, rector of St. Patrick's Church; "The Bible and Protestantism," by Dr. W. W. Barnes, professor of church history in the Fort Worth Baptist Theological Seminary, speaking in place of Dr. L. R. Scarborough, president of the seminary, whose duties at the seminary obliged him to forego the delivery of an address prepared for the occasion; "The Bible and the Anglican Church," by the Rev. E. H. Eckel. Rabbi Fox also contributed some four or five books for exhibition and Rabbi Blumenthal exhibited and explained the use of phylacteries and a ram's horn. There was a large mixed audience and a most amicable and edifying discussion of the Bible from the several viewpoints represented by the speakers.

HOBART COLLEGE SETS RECORD OF ITS HISTORY

No Commencement This Year, But Was Held During Civil War

GENEVA, NEW YORK.—For the first time in the history of Hobart College there will be no commencement ceremonies here this year. There remain in town but three members of the senior class and only thirty-five men altogether. Even in Civil War days the commencements were held and the enrolment at the college never fell below seventy-five. The only event marking the close of the college season will take place on Sunday, June 9, at St. John's Chapel, when the degree will be conferred on the members of the graduating class who are here and the names of the absent ones will be read.

"BEST BEHAVED ARMY EVER GATHERED," SAYS EX-JUDGE

Y. M. C. A. Secretary Writes Enthusiastically of Our Men Over There

NEW YORK CITY.—Writing from Paris on Palm Sunday, Judge Galloway, a Churchman now acting as secretary under the Y. M. C. A. in France, says that our boys are "the best disciplined, best behaved army ever gathered together."

"I have just come from a quaint old church where I heard the Mass celebrated with unusual solemnity," the letter begins. "The presence of so many women in black mingled with the blue of the French soldiers and some of our khaki made one vividly conscious of the ever-present tragedy. The war has made France very much more religious than she has been for years past. However, just now I happen to be stationed in a province which has always been noted for its piety and quaint superstitions, some of them survivals of Druid times. . . . As I write I hear the heavy tramp of many men and I go to the window to see our brave, splendid boys leaving for the front and the sight, while inspiring, is necessarily a sad one. I can not say enough about the splendid morale of our men. They are the best-disciplined, best-behaved army ever gather together and the change in men which we noticed after they put on their uniforms is only intensified after they arrive here. They seem to realize their responsibilities and obligations and they are dignified and ennobled thereby.

"Before leaving America I had fortunately prepared talks on French history, folklore and so on, and I found on my arrival in Paris that it was the particular thing they wanted for our men and while I was at first assigned to les foyers du soldat in the French army, . . . I have been transferred to the educational section of the Y. M. C. A. under Dr. Anson Phelps Stokes of Yale, and I am talking and singing every night to our men. . . . The intense interest and enthusiastic attention of my audiences is a positive inspiration and I smile to myself that I ever could have been content to remain in America when here everybody can be of direct service. . . .

"The work that Uncle Sam is doing over here is stupendous. But all America must realize that its soul must be annealed to the white heat of patriotism and sacrifice before we can be triumphant, which for humanity we must be. The spirit of France and England is incomparable and unconquerable and we must measure up to it. The war will not be over soon and we must go down into the valleys of despondency many times, but in the end we will conquer."

DEPOSITION

Acting under the provisions of Canon XXXIII of the Digest on Friday, May 3, 1918, in Grace Church, Charleston, in the presence of the Rev. William Way and the Rev. George C. Williams, I did depose from the Ministry Percy J. Robbottom, Presbyter, he having in writing renounced the Ministry of the Church and asked for deposition.

(Signed) WM. A. GUERRY,
Bishop of South Carolina.

Charleston, South Carolina.

CONNECTICUT ASKS FOR PROHIBITION DURING WAR

Takes Steps to Increase Clerical Salaries, with Minimum Basis

HARTFORD, CONNECTICUT.—The annual convention of the diocese, which first assembled in 1783, was held in Christ Church parish house here May 21 and 22.

The usual diocesan conference was held at the Church of the Good Shepherd on the morning of the opening day of the Convention. Prof. Irving Fisher and Allan George Blumer, of Yale, were the chief speakers on "Prohibition and the Constitutional Amendment." Prof. Fisher's statements have since elicited replies from the brewing interests.

Professor Fisher declared that the investigation of the affairs of the Brewers' Association had revealed that the German-American Alliance had been financed by this association.

Elections during the course of the Convention were as follows: Treasurer of the diocese, General William W. Skiddy; Standing Committee: the Rev. William A. Beardsley, St. Thomas, New Haven; the Rev. Geo. T. Linsley, Church of the Good Shepherd, Hartford; the Rev. Dr. J. Chauncey Linsley, Torrington; the Rev. Dr. Storrs O. Seymour, Litchfield; the Rev. Geo. M. Thomson, Christ Church, Greenwich; Deputies to Synod of the First Province—Clerical: the Rev. J. Eldred Brown, Trinity, Norwich; the Rev. Samuel R. Colloday, Christ Church, Hartford; the Rev. John F. Plumb, St. John's New Bedford; the Rev. Charles O. Scoville, Trinity, New Haven; Lay: Harry H. Heminway, Christ Church, Watertown; Burton Mansfield, St. Thomas, New Haven; Charles A. Pease, St. John's, Hartford; Charles H. Tibbits, St. Paul's, Wallingford.

The Bishop in his address said that eleven clergy were in service and, he estimated, 2,500 laymen. He pointed out that great care should be used by the older women of the church in guiding the girls and young women who in increasing numbers were taking up war work.

The committee appointed a year ago to consider the matter of making laymen eligible for the Standing Committee urged that the present practice of clergy alone being eligible remain. After considerable opposition the report of the committee was adopted.

The Rev. Charles A. Tibbals, rector of Sandy Hook, after a spirited appeal to the Convention, introduced a resolution to the effect "that $1,200 and a rectory shall be the minimum salary of a married clergyman and that $1,000 be the minimum of a clergyman not married." The resolution was unanimously passed without debate.

Prof. William P. Ladd was warmly welcomed by the Convention as the new dean of Berkeley Divinity School. After a strong appeal to the diocese and the church at large for their loyal support for Berkeley, Dean Ladd introduced a resolution that a committee of ten be appointed, with power to add to its number, to consider the needs of Berkeley and to report at the next Convention. This was adopted.

Just before the close of the Convention the Rev. Wm. Williams introduced motions that the Convention reaffirm its action of last year in opposing the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors for the duration of the war, and also that it ratify the Federal amendment for nation-wide prohibition. As it was doubtful whether a quorum was present it was felt unwise to take action on so serious a matter as the second resolution. After adopting the first, it was decided to table the second.

Bishop Brewster presided at the diocesan dinner, which was held at the Hartford Club on the first night of the Convention. Excellent speeches were made by Congressman Merritt, who had come from Washington to attend the dinner, and also by Hon. Jos. W. Alsop, of the State Council of Defense.

WEST MISSOURI ORGANIZES DIOCESAN MEN'S CLUB

Rural Deaneries Have Been Abandoned—Board Reformed

KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.—The twenty-ninth annual Council of the Diocese of West Missouri convened in St. Paul's Church on May 14.

The Council was organized for business by the election of the Rev. Edwin F. Wilcox as secretary. The Rev. Mr. Wilcox was also elected registrar. The following named men were elected as the Standing Committee: The Rev. Messrs. E. J. Craft, C. H. Malony, R. N. Spencer and C. A. Weed. Lay members: Messrs. John Gosling, Horace Stringfellow, A. C. Stowell and Philip Toll. The Council increased the salary of the Bishop from $3,600 to $4,500 per year, effective July 1. The Bishop announced that there would be opened on June 1 a new office for the Diocese at 1400 Locust Street, Kansas City. Announcement was also made of the organization of a Men's Club of the Diocese pursuant to an order of the Council made last year. The club will aid in keeping the diocesan offices open and do other things as need arises to aid the work of the Bishop. Subordinate chapters of the club will be established throughout the Diocese.

The rural deaneries have been abandoned for the present and the Board of Church Extension has been re-formed—the deans having previously been members ex-officio. There are now elected five clergymen and five laymen who, with the Archdeacon and Bishop, form the committee.

On the second day of the Council the Woman's Diocesan Society met in joint session with the Council to hear the report of the treasurer of the Board of Church Extension. This society was organized by the Bishop to do the Women's Diocesan work formerly done by the Woman's Auxiliary, thus enabling the latter body to devote its entire energy to the work without the Diocese.

St. Paul's Church, the host to the Council, provided lunches for all in the undercroft of the church, also a delightful reception to the members and friends of the Council on Tuesday evening. The next Council session will be held in St. Joseph with Christ Church as host.

WOULD DISFRANCHISE DELINQUENT PARISHE

But This Suggestion For Collectin Assessments Is Defeated

ST. PAUL, MINNESOTA.—Business move with a rush at the sixty-first annual mee ing of the Council of the Diocese of Minn sota, held at Christ Church here (Rev. V S. Howard, rector), on May 22. Necessit and the Bishop drove, for but one day ha been allowed as an experiment.

The proceedings may be summarize briefly thus:

The Council congratulated the Bishop t the completion on that day of the first ye of his diocesan Episcopate. Passed a p triotic war resolution. Adopted the bus ness canons of the General Convention, ma ing the financial year coincide with t civil year, but leaving the annual Coun meeting fixed for May. Declined for t present to merge the diocesan fund f Aged and Infirm Clergy with the Chur Pension Fund. Created a diocesan Boa of Religious Education. Contributed as i dividuals $135 with which to purchase portrait of Bishop Whipple to be hung in t new State Historical Building. Adopted proposal to have formed a Committee Publicity by which to place the Church a its point of view before the general publ Declined to entertain a motion which wou have prevented friendly aliens from holdi cures in the diocese. Abolished the pre ent six deaneries, and created three ru deaneries for more effective extension e fort, and approved of the idea of givi rural deans charge of such territories i stead of parishes.

Little or no debate marked the proce ings. There was no time. What there w of argument concerned minor matters, a was soon done with.

The Bishop reiterated his missiona policy, calling for the establishment of ru centres, from which the surrounding co try might be worked and scattered co municants cared for. He further urg that in the larger towns there should be socialization of the Church's message, a that in the cities of St. Paul and Minneapo there should be carried out a suggestion a Bishop's committee of laymen who shou work to strengthen and encourage depende missions.

In the course of business a sharp deba arose over the assessments for dioces missions, and a proposal to disfranchi parishes which do not meet this particul moral obligation. Certain lines of clea age seemed to be developing between t urban and rural parishes through the a sumption on the one hand that the city co gregations were carrying the load, and the other hand that most of the mon was being spent in St. Paul and Minn apolis. It was pointed out that parishes these two cities were responsible for mo than half of the total unpaid amou Eventually the disfranchisement idea w dropped and the report of apportionme adopted as presented.

The delegates selected as a Standi Committee, Messrs. A. G. Pinkham, F. Kramer, F. L. Palmer, and E. N. Schmu clergy, and Messrs. C. B. Lyon, W. Whitehead, Paul N. Myers and J. A. Lat laymen.

WAR HOLDS THE STAGE AT BETHLEHEM CONVENTION

Leonard Hall Placed at Disposal of Bethlehem Steel Company

POTTSVILLE, PENNSYLVANIA.—The Convention met in Trinity Church here May 28-29 with pre-Convention conferences beginning on the 26th. It might well be called a war convention because throughout the entire business sessions a spirit of Church preparedness was uttermost.

Chaplain Karl M. Block, the Church's representative at Camp Dix, Wrightstown, New Jersey, on Monday evening gave a detailed account of how the War Commission had been meeting the problem at this cantonment. His recital of how effective had been the Church's administration convinced the Convention that the War Fund was vindicated many times over. The Rev. Cyrus Townsend Brady, D.D., was to have been the second speaker on Monday evening. He missed his train connections and Bishop Talbot took his place, telling of the unusual opportunities that had come to our own diocese at Camp Crane at Allentown, and the unusually good work of the Church of the Mediator under the Rev. R. M. Merriman.

The value of inspirational gatherings before the actual business sessions of the Convention was justified in the several conferences on Tuesday. The Rev. George C. Foley, D.D., spoke on "The Sermon and Its Preparation"; the Rev. Clarence S. McClellan, Jr., led one on the "Sunday School and the Present Crisis," suggesting some unusually good methods for war-time activities in the Sunday School. A third conference in the afternoon was held on "The Conservation of Spiritual Forces." The Rev. George Lynde Richardson of St. Mary's Church, Philadelphia, led this conference.

At the evening session Tuesday the Bishop's charge made reference to the practical closing of Leonard Hall, where but three students are now living, and these are too young to enlist. Leonard Hall has been placed at the disposal of the Bethlehem Steel Company as a patriotic duty. Bishop Talbot pleaded for business men of leadership and culture to fit themselves by further training either for the ministry or as lay readers. With reference to the war he said: "It is a matter of congratulation that so much has been accomplished in unity of sentiment, in courage, optimism and cheerfulness under heavy burdens. A fine purpose and clear-sighted determination are actuating our people. New problems have been met and solved. The present crisis is a challenge to faith and undying hope. There is no cause for discouragement or failure; only the further development of the spirit of duty and responsibility. When the boys come back they will have a new vision before them, a new consciousness of their own manhood, a new sense of what is due to them and to other men. They certainly will not be satisfied with things as they were before." He referred at some length to the noble example of England in meeting the great missionary opportunity in the face of the great demands made on every side.

Elections at the first business session were: Secretary of the diocese, Mr. D. J. Pearsall, Mauch Chunk; assistant secretary, the Ven. H. E. A. Durell, East Mauch Chunk; treasurer, Mr. Henry Eckert, Reading; chancellor, Rodney A. Mercur, Esq., Towanda; registrar, Professor Preston A. Lambert, South Bethlehem. Standing Committee, the Rev. Messrs. James P. Ware, William B. Beach, D.D., John H. Griffiths, Walter Coe Roberts, S. U. Mitman, Ph.D., and Messrs. Albert N. Cleaver, F. M. Kirby, Edward G. Cleaver, Joseph K. Welch, R. H. Patterson.

Deputies to the Provincial Synod: The Ven. H. E. A. Durell, the Ven. D. W. Coxe, D.D., the Rev. Robert P. Kreitler, the Rev. John T. Ward and Messrs. W. R. Butler, N. H. Hiller, David J. Pearsall, W. R. Coyle.

Social Service Commission: The Rev. Robert P. Kreitler, the Rev. Frederick A. Macmillen, the Ven. H. E. A. Durell, and Messrs. Carl F. Welden, M.D., Fred E. Zerby, Benjamin Kuykendall, Mrs. E. J. Lipps, Miss Frances Kaercher and Mrs. R. P. Gleason.

Board of Religious Education: The Rev. Messrs. S. U. Mitman, Ph.D., H. W. Diller, H. E. A. Durell, A. L. Whittaker, Robert P. Kreitler, H. G. Hartman, J. Talbot Ward, J. A. Glasier, E. G. Holmes and Mr. William H. Warner.

The Finance Committee of the Diocese reported a very healthy financial situation, so much so that an increase of one thousand dollars in salary was granted the Bishop, and an increase of three hundred dollars allowed for a Bishop's secretary. These were made without any heavier assessment for the current year. A recommendation was unanimously passed by the Convention declaring that the stipend of each rector and missionary should be increased at least ten per cent. to meet the advanced cost of living, and the secretary was requested to immediately inform every parish in the diocese of this action, expressing the hope of a quick response to the suggestion.

Following a recommendation of the Social Service Commission, a change in the Canons was made to allow the appointment of three women on this committee.

The missionary work of the diocese has been most encouraging, and the reports show that for an eight-months' period the offerings have been highly satisfactory. In this diocese three sources of financial support tend to make the work of diocesan missions more successful than in some dioceses. Parish offerings are supplemented by the Bishop's Church Extension Fund, together with offerings through the Bishop's Purse. An annual budget and expenditure of nearly $19,000 for missions within the diocese are made possible through a combination of these sources of financial support. The Social Service Commission reported that nearly $19,000 was raised for the Church's War Fund. This Commission offered a resolution condemning profiteering, another endorsing the work of the Federal Children's Bureau, and a third pledging the diocese to a renewed support of the Food Administration in conserving wheat and meat.

SALARIES OF THE CLERGY ARE TO BE INCREASED

Rhode Island Acts in Matter—Votes for Prohibition

PROVIDENCE, RHODE ISLAND.—The annual convention of the diocese was held at St. John's Church here May 21 and 22. A considerable portion of Bishop Perry's address at noon on the first day was devoted to the new responsibilities laid upon the Church by the war.

The inadequate salaries of the clergy of the diocese received sympathetic consideration, with the result of an increase in the salaries of the missionaries where necessary, the increase to be raised by a larger apportionment of the parishes. In the case of the rectors of parishes a committee was appointed to call the attention of all vestries to this matter and to raise an augmentation fund for the relief of such parishes as request it through their vestries.

Elections during the convention were: Registrar of the diocese, the Rev. Joseph M. Hobbs; treasurer, Mr. Fred D. Carr; Standing Committee, the Rev. Arthur M. Aucock, D.D., the Rev. Messrs. Frederick J. Bassett, D.D., George McC. Fiske, D.D., Emery H. Porter, D.D., H. Anthony Dyer, John P. Farnsworth, Rathbone Gardner, James A. Pirce.

A resolution was adopted, after slight discussion, endorsing the National Prohibition Amendment and urging personal activity in the nomination and election of legislators pledged to vote for its ratification.

That part of the Bishop's address dealing with rented pews was referred to a committee to report at the next convention.

The business of the sessions was interrupted from time to time for stirring addresses by the Rev. Dr. Lester Bradner on the future ministry, by Mr. Alfred M. Coates, Rhode Island Food Administrator, on food conservation, and by the Rev. W. H. Easton on the Rhode Island Summer School for Sunday School Teachers.

Women were present and voted in the Convention as delegates from two of the largest parishes of the diocese, Grace Church, Providence, and Trinity Church, Newport. Women also serve on the Social Service Commission, a standing committee of the Convention. JOSEPH M. HOBBS.

ST. BARNABAS' GUILD TO HOLD ANNUAL MEETING

In St. Stephen's Church, New York, June 9-11

NEW YORK CITY.—The Guild of St. Barnabas' for Nurses will hold their annual meeting in this city next week. There will be services in St. Stephen's Church, Sixty-ninth Street, east of Broadway, on Sunday, June 9. This service is especially for the New York Branch. A number of new members will be admitted to the Guild, and several brief addresses will be made. On St. Barnabas' Day, June 11, there will be Celebrations of the Holy Communion at 8 and at 11 o'clock. On June 12 there will be a Communion service at 9, a business meeting from 10 to 1, and from 2 to 4, and luncheon at 1 o'clock. All nurses are invited to attend the services, and members and associates are urged to attend the business sessions as well.

VIRGINIA ADOPTS STRONG RESOLUTION ON UNITY

Sends War Memorial to President and Congress

LEESBURG, VIRGINIA.—The 133rd annual Council of the Diocese of Virginia met in St. James' Church here May 15. The Rev. E. L. Goodwin, D.D., was re-elected Secretary. Bishop Gibson referred in fitting and sympathetic terms to the deaths of the Rev. Edward Wall, the Rev. Dr. Frank Page and Bishop Randolph of Southern Virginia.

The following Committee was appointed by the Bishop to report on a resolution asking for such a Committee to consider Church unity: Bishops Gibson and Brown, the Rev. Drs. E. L. Goodwin, Wallace E. Rollins, J. J. Gravatt, the Rev. W. H. Burkhardt, and Messrs. F. H. Moss, Judge R. Carter Scott and Judge J. K. M. Norton. Their report follows:

"Your Committee to which was referred the resolution asking for an expression of opinion on the vital question of Christian Unity, and for some suggestions as to how best to foster and bring about that Godly union and concord for which we pray, begs leave to report that the Protestant Episcopal Church in the Diocese of Virginia, in annual Council assembled, regards with deep sympathy and hopefulness, and with gratitude to Almighty God, the tokens of a growing discontent with the unhappy divisions among Christ's faithful people, and the sincere and increasing expressions of a desire for the unity of His Church. It is our conviction that this subject—always of paramount importance—is especially vital and pressing at this crisis in the history of the world. The loss of power and of effective witness due to our innumerable divisions, and oftentimes to our selfishness and petty partisanships, has now been made more apparent, and the consequences of such loss are now more disastrous than ever before.

As helpful in bringing about that unity for which we pray and which is so vital now your Committee would suggest:

1. That we carefully refrain from stating the claims of our own Church in terms which of necessity impugn the validity of the Sacraments administered by those who, though not Episcopally ordained, yet hold fast to every article of the Christian Faith as contained in the Apostles' and Nicene Creeds.

2. That we should seek and encourage in all possible ways co-operation with all those who love our Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity and truth—not only as expedient and necessary as a war measure, but also as a matter of principle and of loyalty to our Common Lord. We believe that such co-operation would vastly increase the power of the Christian Church and make more effective our witness at the present time, that it would help to remove misunderstandings and prejudices, and that it would deepen our knowledge of, and sympathy for, Christians of every name.

3. That we should understand, and try to get others to understand, that such co-operation—important as it is—is not an end in itself but that it may, in answer to our prayers and to our obedience, and under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, be the means of leading Christian people towards that goal which our Lord Himself has set as the object for which we must labor and strive and pray.

4. That we call upon all our people to keep this great subject of Christian Unity in their minds and hearts, and, above all, to make it an object of earnest and continued intercession, believing that as Christians draw nearer to their Lord they will also draw nearer to each other.

5. That your Committee does not feel that an adequate presentation of this great subject can be made in the limited time at its disposal, and therefore asks that the Committee be continued and be given authority, by and with the consent of the Bishops of the Diocese, to issue a letter, if this should be deemed advisable, expressing more fully the principles and spirit of these resolutions.

Reports and addresses were made on war conditions by Bishop Brown, Mr. Rosewell Page, the Rev. Dr. Bowie and Dr. Ennion Williams. The Council adopted a Memorial to the President and the Congress which said in part:

"Having supreme confidence in the triumph of right over might, we await with serenity the victory for which noble warriors have consecrated their lives, looking for the regeneration of the hearts and souls of all races of men, the spread of democracy throughout the world, and the establishment of a peace which shall be permanent because, with malice toward none, it shall be based upon justice, mercy and truth and upon the recognition of the rights of all in the spirit of universal love as exemplified in the life of Jesus Christ our Lord."

On Thursday the Standing Committee was re-elected and other committees and commissions appointed or elected were practically the same as last year. Following were elected delegates to the Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. W. H. Burkhardt, James W. Morris, D.D., W. Roy Mason and W. J. Morton and Messrs. Robert Beverley, John B. Minor, E. C. Massie and W. W. Chamblin. The Rev. Dr. Matthew Porter addressed the Council on the needs of the American Bible Society, especially for supplying the soldiers and sailors, and it was resolved that Virginia should raise $2,500, which is the sum asked of this diocese. The Rev. Dr. Smith of Winchester presented the budget of the Diocese for another year and the largest amount ever apportioned, $25,000, is apportioned to diocesan missions. The whole budget amounts to $27,875, exclusive of the apportionment for General Missions yet to be received. The Canon on the Pension Fund was amended so that hereafter payments will be made to this fund directly from the parishes to the Pension Fund.

Given a Loving Cup

DETROIT, MICHIGAN.—Mr. R. McClelland Brady, a leading layman of the Church in the Mid-West and a prominent member of Christ Church, Detroit, was the recipient of a very pleasing surprise on his fiftieth birthday recently when the Sunday School of Christ Church, of which Mr. Brady has been for some years superintendent, presented him with a silver loving cup.

The Bishop of the Diocese was present and in a very clever and humorous address testified to Mr. Brady's splendid life and example in the school.

BISHOP PAGE PLEADS AGAINST SPIRIT OF HATI

Church People Should Take Dow "Business as Usual" Signs

SPOKANE, WASHINGTON.—The Twenty fifth Annual Convocation opened at Al Saints' Cathedral, Spokane, May 13.

Bishop Page in his annual address to Con vocation sounded the dominant note of pa triotism with an appeal for self-sacrific within the Church during these times o stress. He emphasized the thought tha these were critical times for the Churcl which must now centre its efforts on bring ing about real unity of Christendom, whicl is the real test of democracy. Surely w have a right to expect an equal degree o restraint and self-sacrifice within th Church. The greatest sacrifice that Goc asks of us is that we give up our own point of view and our own way for the sake of the larger truth.

One grievous danger which is peculiarly the function of the Church to combat is the growing spirit of hatred toward every thing German; especially toward the Ger man people and all who have Germar blood. "There will be no permanent peac in the world until there is a universa spirit of brotherhood, a condition not easily attained, but it is the ideal of the Kingdom of God, which we are preaching, and if there ever was a time we needed to adjure the spirit of bitterness, hatred and prejudice it is now. It is time for all Christians of every denomination to proclaim their one faith in God, in human brotherhood and in immortality. It is time for us to forget all our differences and, as far as possible unite in the one great cause. There is no royal easy road to Christian unity."

"Not only must the Church make sacrifices, but she must lead in the work Nothing can be more absurd than to say in one breath, 'Win the war,' and in the other, 'Business as usual.' The Church and the Church people should surely lead in everything that embodies the idea of sacrifice, the sending of our men, giving and working through the Red Cross and other kindred organizations for relieving human need, war savings in every form, remembering that true saving embodies sacrifice and self-denial and the going without something that we want that the money may be used for the country's needs."

The Rev. H. H. Mitchell of Colfax was elected secretary and registrar of the district and the Rev. H. I. Oberholtzer of Ellensburg was appointed as his assistant. It was decided to have a series of preaching missions. A resolution introduced by the Rev. M. J. Stevens for Mrs. John R. Neeley, originator of the idea, was adopted favoring the appointment of a diocesan committee, as well as one in each parish or mission, to give out boxes in which pennies are to be placed to be turned over twice a year to the Bishop for work in the district.

George S. Brooke, treasurer for the trustees of the jurisdiction of Spokane, reported total receipts of $12,564.84 for the year and expenditures of $12,495.85. A. W. Lindsay, who has served as treasurer for the district for many years past, was again elected by convocation.

The Woman's Auxiliary held their annual meeting at St. Matthew's Church, Spokane, and Mrs. W. H. Farnham was chosen president for the ensuing year.

New Mexico Convention Closes With Inspiring Patriotic Service

ALBUQUERQUE, NEW MEXICO.—The twenty-fourth Annual Convocation of the District of New Mexico, and Texas west of the Pecos, was held here April 30 to May 2.

The Rev. J. S. Moore, Rector of Las Vegas, was re-elected Secretary of Convocation for the eighth year of service.

A Priest is greatly needed to serve Farmington and the Indian Mission. Bishop Howden appointed the following Officers of Convocation: Chancellor, ex-Governor L. Bradford Prince, whose illness prevented his attendance for the first time in thirty years: Registrar, the Rev. Walter S. Trowbridge, Santa Fe; Treasurer, Mr. Alpheus A. Keen, Albuquerque. Social Service Commission: the Rev. E. J. Hoering, the Rev. E. S. Doan, the Rev. F. W. Pratt, Mr. Francis Tracy, Mr. Charles H. McClenathen. Ecclesiastical Court: The Rev. J. S. Moore, the Rev. C. S. Sargent, the Rev. Fuller Swift, Mr. Charles Cox, Mr. David McKnight, Mr. J. S. Porcher. The following were elected members of the Board of Religious Education: The Rev. E. N. Bullock, Mrs. E. N. Bullock, L. B. Mitchell, Ph.D., the Rev. J. S. Moore, Mr. Charles McClenathen. The Council of Advice elected were: The Rev. Fuller Swift, the Rev. C. S. Sargent, the Rev. W. S. Trowbridge, Mr. David McKnight, Mr. Peyton B. Edwards, Mr. Horace B. Hayes.

The Bishop shows that on the whole the District has made distinct progress. All debts in the District are paid and a local gift of $1,000 with a few smaller ones has been made for the Endowment Fund of the District.

The Bishop, the Rev. W. S. Trowbridge, and Mr. E. E. Veder are the Committee to take action with reference to the Study of the Bible for Credits in the State High Schools.

On Wednesday the general topic was Religious Education, the Rev. E. N. Bullock presiding. The Chairman discussed the need, aim, and practical working of the Christian Nurture Series. Under "The Church and Educational Institutions," Dr. A. B. Mitchell of the State University spoke to "The Church and the Student," and showed how the Colleges are losing ground in Religious Education. The Church must provide for forms of social service which will enlist the students who are eager to serve the community. "The Student and the Church" was assigned to the Rev. Hunter Lewis, who told of one year's efforts at the State Agricultural and Mechanics Art College by which seventeen young men enlisted in the choir were all confirmed before the year's close. The President of this college forbids any religious service being held on the College grounds. The Rev. F. W. Pratt of Carlsbad, who has been tutoring eight boys during the school year, and who received applications from seventy-three boys for admission as pupils, spoke on "The need for a Church School in the Southwest." His intention was that by such schools shall religious training be best conserved.

The election of officers resulted as follows: Delegates to the Synod of the Southwest—The Rev. Messrs. Fuller Swift, E. S. Doan, D. A. Sanford, F. W. Pratt, W. S. Trowbridge, and for the lay delegates, Messrs. David McKnight, ex-Governor L. B. Prince, F. W. Nichols, Joseph DeGraftenreid, J. J. Ormsbee; for the Provincial Board of Missions—the Rev. Fuller Swift and Mr. F. W. Nichols; the District Board of Missions is composed of the Rev. Fuller Swift, the Rev. E. J. Hoering, W. S. Trowbridge, Mr. Alpheus A. Keen, Mr. S. D. Porcher. Treasurer of Convocation—Mr. F. W. Keen, Albuquerque; Standing Committee on Finance—Mr. F. W. Nichols, Mr. F. G. Fischer, Mr. Don Johnston.

On Thursday afternoon a Social Service program was held with the Rev. E. J. Hoering as Chairman. The general topic was: "The Church at Work." The Rev. L. B. Holsapple, civilian chaplain at Camp Cody, spoke on "The Church in Army Camps."

On the last evening was held in St. John's Church, Albuquerque, a patriotic service at which three telling addreses were made by chaplains present. Mr. Holsapple spoke on "Christianity and Patriotism." Dr. C. E. Byram took for his topic "Christianity and Democracy"; while Captain L. R. S. Ferguson, regular army chaplain, talked of "The Church and the Army." W. S. TROWBRIDGE.

COUNCIL OF CHURCHWOMEN CREATED IN WEST TEXAS

CUERO, TEXAS.—The fourteenth annual Council of the Diocese of West Texas was held here May 21-23. Bishop Capers delivered a masterly sermon at the opening service. Among important matters brought before the Council for consideration was a resolution proposing the sale of properties held for educational purposes to the end that the indebtedness of the diocesan schools might be liquidated. Amendments to the canons making women eligible to election as vestry members and delegates to Council were rejected by a small majority. An amendment to the Constitution was adopted which will have the effect of changing the status of parishes unable to maintain clergy to missions under the direct charge of the Bishop. The salary of the Bishop was increased; and certain obligations which he had personally assumed on account of the diocesan school for girls were assumed by the Diocese, the Archdeacon being authorized to raise the money. A "Council of the Church Women of the Diocese of West Texas" which will meet simultaneously with the Council and consist of representatives from all organizations for women existing in the Diocese, was created. A Diocesan Branch of the Girls' Friendly Society was organized.

The following officers were elected: Secretary, the Rev. U. B. Bowden; treasurer, Mr. William Kendall; chancellor, Mr. Ed. H. Wicks. Standing Committee: The Rev. W. Bertrand Stevens, Ph.D., the Rev. Leonard B. Richards, the Rev. Upton B. Bowden, Messrs. Samuel G. Tayloe, Oliver J. Woodhull, A. W. Seeligson. Provincial Synod: The Rev. Messrs. J. W. Sykes, D.D., W. Bertrand Stevens, Ph.D., Leonard B. Richards, Benjamin Dennis and Lee W. Heaton. Messrs. E. Galbraith, Roy Miller, George C. Walker, John C. Sutherland and Tony Ross. The Archdeacon, the Ven. Lee W. Heaton, was appointed Diocesan Treasurer for the General Mission Apportionment.

BISHOP THURSTON URGES INCREASE OF LAY READERS

Pays Glowing Tribute to Woman's Auxiliary at Convention

MUSKOGEE, OKLAHOMA.—The eighth annual Convocation of the District of Eastern Oklahoma was held in Grace Church here, May 26 to 28. At the forenoon service on Trinity Sunday the Rev. Dr. Harry P. Nichols of Holy Trinity, New York, preached a strikingly impressive sermon on "Loyalty," and in the evening he made a second address, at which the other speakers were Archdeacon Spencer-Mounsey and the Rev. H. J. Llwyd, the rector of the church.

The Convocation was duly organized on Monday morning. The Rt. Rev. Francis K. Brooke, D.D., and the Rev. Dr. Nichols were received and welcomed as guests of the Convocation by the Rt. Rev. Theodore Payne Thurston, D.D.

The Bishop declared that his experience in Camp Doniphan was most inspiring, and though his service there took three months from the working year, yet the Confirmations have been more in number, with one exception, than in any previous season.

Regarding missionary obligations, the Bishop paid a glowing tribute to the Woman's Auxiliary in the district; stated that the apportionment of the district had been raised to $1,750 by its own request; and strongly recommended an every-member canvass in the Autumn. He spoke of the necessity in these war-times of an increase in lay-readers; and concluded with an appreciation of the great opportunity which is at hand for the Episcopal Church, with its order, its discipline and sense of authority, if it will raise itself to the high ideals that will be expected of it "when the boys come home."

Conferences were held during the sessions on Missions, with the Rev. Allen Jacobs in charge; and Religious Education, led by the Rev. Philip K. Edwards. The Rev. Dr. Nichols spoke on Theological training and its relation to the Sunday School. At the latter conference it was announced that the "Bishop's banner" for the largest per capita mite box offering of the Sunday schools is awarded to St. Luke's, Ada, in the field of the Rev. Franklin Davis. A report was given on Social Service, by the Rev. William Metcalf of Bartlesville, and Dr. J. C. Johnston reported for All Saints' Hospital.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod were elected as follows: The Rev. Messrs. H. J. Llwyd, C. V. Kling, P. K. Edwards, John Grainger and Allen Jacobs; and Judge Clapp, Messrs. H. K. Reese, T. B. Blake, J. B. Campbell and J. G. Lindsey. Alternates: The Ven. C. Spencer-Mounsey, the Rev. Messrs. Franklin Davis, John T. Foster, Isaac Parkin and William Metcalf, and Messrs. J. W. Cosgrove, H. M. Cross, Fred Struble, Judge Cutler and Hon. Allen Wright.

The Bishop appointed as Examining Chaplains the Rev. C. V. Kling, the Rev. Allen Jacobs and the Rev. Franklin Davis.

A conference of Church women and the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary were held the second day of the Convocation, with inspiring reports and addresses, Mrs. Brooke being one of the honored guests. ALLEN JACOBS.

CHICAGO

Prominent Clergymen Chosen for War Work—The Church War Commission has requested that two of the prominent clergymen of the diocese enter upon war work. The Rev. George Craig Stewart, D.D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Evanston, and the Secretary of the War Commission, will leave for France about the middle of June, having been granted a six months' leave of absence from his parish. The Rev. George Herbert Thomas, the rector of St. Paul's Church, Kenwood, has been granted an eight months' leave of absence and will shortly go to France as an auxiliary chaplain for the American Red Cross.

Marine Sent Home for Ordination—Bertram Smith, who enlisted in the United States Marine Corps as a private last year and was stationed at Santo Domingo, has been given leave of absence and returned to Chicago with the recommendation of Brigadier General Pendleton that he receive ordination immediately. Mr. Smith, who was a member of the Middle Class in the Western Theological Seminary at the time of his enlistment, found no chaplain on his arrival at Santo Domingo. He therefore, with the permission of the military authorities, arranged for religious services, conducting such services and preaching. He also had general supervision of the social work among the men. He will return to Santo Domingo immediately after his ordination to the Diaconate.

Cathedral Organist Resigns—Morris E. Wilson, who has served the Cathedral as organist and choirmaster for some years, has resigned and will enter the service of the country. He will be succeeded by Charles Gordon Wedertz, of St. Alban's Church, a member of the faculty of the Chicago Musical College.

Death of Prominent Churchman—The Church in Chicago has suffered another great loss in the death of William De Latre Cameron Street, Junior Warden of St. Chrysostom's Church. Mr. Street had served faithfully and continuously for the past twenty-five years at St. Chrysostom's as treasurer, vestryman and junior warden of the parish. Mr. Street was prominent in financial circles, having been manager of the Chicago Clearing House for twenty-eight years. He was ill but a few days, having suffered an attack of pneumonia.

Great Bible Conference Meetings—Several thousands gathered from all over the country to take part in the Bible Conferences on the Second Coming of Christ held in this city for three days. One of the remarkable features of all the meetings was the great number of men in attendance; there were nearly three men to every women. Were they clergymen?

As perhaps one might expect, there was a note of discouragement with the Church and organized religion. The Church had failed, the literal words of Scripture had been neglected; and the Coming of the Christ was the one way out of despair.

No date of Coming was set, though the times point to very near time. The capture of Palestine is to pave the way for the return of the Jew to his old land and the restoration of the Kingdom to Israel. The Jew is yet to be the leader of the world: he is to be converted and be ready for the Messianic Kingdom.

Sunday Services on Proposed Site of Cathedral—The first of the open-air services on the Parkway was held on the last Sunday afternoon in May. Bishop Rhinelander preached, and stated that the Cathedral would be built. The first offering for this purpose came from a nurse in the West, a Liberty Bond for $50.

The combined choirs of St. Clement's, St. James' and St. Mark's Churches sang at this first service. The Rev. Dr. Tomkins was the preacher on June 2; and the Rev. Dr. Mockridge on the 9th.

Memorial Day More Fully Observed—The President's plea for religious observance of Memorial Day met with a very great response. Trolleys were stopped—those walking the streets paused—at 11 o'clock every head was bowed in silent prayer. Many united services were held, and the attendance was better than ever before.

Charles G. King—The burial service for the late Charles G. King was held at the Church of St. James the Less on Friday, May 31. Mr. King has been long and actively engaged in religious work in the city. He was one of the founders of St. Clement's Church, superintendent of the Sunday school of St. Mark's Church, and long a vestryman. Bethany Mission of the Presbyterian Church is due in part to the help Mr. King gave Mr. Wanamaker in the task of organizing.

Continuous Intercession—One parish at least in this diocese observed the "Day of Humiliation, Prayer and Fasting" both in the letter and spirit of the President's proclamation. Emmanuel Church, Somerville, made the day one of literally continuous intercession for our country and her soldiers and sailors. Members of the parish divided the day between them, certain groups taking definite lengths of time which they spent in the church engaged in constant prayer for the nation—the next group coming in to pray before the previous one left. In addition to this there was a celebration of the Holy Communion at 7:30, a choral service of the Holy Communion at 10 o'clock and Memorial Vespers at 5 o'clock. The Rev. George Bruce Nicholson, D.D., is the rector.

Archdeaconry of New Bedford—The spring meeting of the Archdeaconry of New Bedford was held in Grace Church, North Attleboro on June 4. The Rev. Emilius W. Smith, who was the second Archdeacon of New Bedford, was a special guest and speaker. This was the fiftieth meeting at which the Rev. George E. Osgood, rector of Grace Church, North Attleboro has been the secretary of the Archdeaconry, making it his twenty-fifth anniversary. Two topics for conference at this meeting were: 1. "The Sunday Evening Service and Other Undeveloped Resources of the Parish;" the Rev. David B. Matthews, rector of St. Paul's Church, Brockton, and the Rev. Charles E. Jackson, rector of the Church of the Ascension, Fall River, led in the discussion. 2. "War-Time Observance and Preaching." The Rev. William L. Clark, rector of St. Paul's Church, Brookline, and the Rev. Henry E. Edenborg, rector of St. Andrew's Church, New Bedford, opened the conference on this second topic.

The Wuchang Hospital—A concerted effort is being made this month in the larger Boston parishes to assist in the final raising of the great fund for the new Church General Hospital in Wuchang, China. Twenty-five thousand dollars is needed to complete the amount of $160,000 which will permit of the completion of the hospital's entire plant before the extreme cold weather. The desperately needed main buildings are already well advanced in their construction. Mr. Sturgis H. Thorndike, the treasurer of the "Boston New China Committee," is receiving all funds for this purpose at 308 Boylston Street, Boston.

The Cambridge Commencement—The annual commencement of the Cambridge Theological School will take place next week, Thursday (June 13). The Very Rev. H. E. W. Fosbroke, D.D., Dean of the General Theological Seminary, and formerly a member of the faculty of the Cambridge School, will be the preacher. "Alumni Day" will be celebrated the day before with a meeting of the Associate Alumni at 3 p. m., a service in the school chapel at 5, with Bishop Jones of the class of 1900 as the preacher. Bishop Jones is now doing pioneer missionary work in the Maine woods and rural districts. The annual Alumni dinner will follow the service.

A War Parish—Grace Church, New Bedford, the Rev. Harry Beal, rector, is making an enviable record both in parish loyalty and patriotism. On the last Sunday in April it was announced that the offerings would go for the purchase of Liberty Bonds which would be added to the parish endowment. $1,000 was given at once for this patriotic purpose, although the Easter offering of four weeks before had reached a figure of $2,000.

The Roll of Honor in this parish now contains 108 names, two of which are represented on the service flag by gold stars indicating lives sacrificed for liberty. 100 persons in the parish, mostly men, are writing at least once a month in the name of the parish to the men who are away, and some of these correspondents have now begun calling regularly on the families of the young men to whom they are writing.

For the Sailors—In addition to the great work of the new Naval Service Club on Beacon Street which the Cathedral helps actively to support, it has extended still further its own older work for sailors at 53 Bromfield Street. These rooms are now open every evening in the week, and are being used freely and gratefully by the men from Commonwealth Pier and the various ships that are in port from time to time.

nch Orphan Adopted — Calvary rch, Ashland, Kentucky, the Rev. G. H. rison, rector, has adopted a French or- ı living at Rennes, France. The orphan amed Juilette Boisrammi.

onia—The Mission at Latonia, re- ly made vacant by the resignation of Rev. Peter Langendorff, has been placed, by Bishop Burton, under the charge of the Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, Secretary of the Diocese and rector of Trinity, Cov- ington.

Pupils of St. John's, Corbin, at Hospital—Two little girls, pupils of St. John s Collegiate Institute and Industrial School, Corbin, Kentucky, our Mountain Missionary School, have been taken to Lexington recently to be operated on at the Good Samaritan Hospital. The operations were serious ones, one for mastoiditis performed by Dr. McClure; the other for appendicitis performed by Dr. Barrow.

Active Chaplain—The Rev. A. H. Marshall, rector of St. Andrew's, Fort Thomas, continues his active services as Chaplain at that post. More than 7,000 men recently have been assembled there. Mr. Marshall accompanies the soldiers even into the operating room, to sustain them by his friendly spiritual ministrations as they approach the ordeal of an operation there.

Building Lot Secured—The congregation of the Good Shepherd, Lexington, the Rev. Dr. Richard Wilkinson, rector, whose church building was destroyed by fire last January, has secured a new lot for its new church building. The architect is preparing plans, and work was to have been begun last month looking towards the laying of the foundation.

Poll Election of Vestry—The annual election of vestrymen of Trinity Church, Covington, was held with polls open from 5 to 8 p. m., for the casting of votes by the members of the congregation. Between 6 and 8 p. m. dinner was served by the Ladies' Aid Society at the nominal price of fifty cents. Previous to the election a list of the members, Communicants, was printed in pamphlet form. At the congregational meeting, held at night, a unique plan for paying off the church indebtedness was put into operation. The plan proposed the selling of 250 "Blocks of Church Indebtedness," a number of which blocks were sold that night, at $10 a block.

WASHINGTON

S. S. Institute Meets—The Sunday-School Institute of the Diocese of Washington met at Pinkney Memorial Church, Hyattsville, Prince George's County, Maryland. The speakers on this occasion were the Provincial Secretary, the Rev. William C. Hicks, and the Rev. Joseph T. Ware, Vicar of Epiphany Chapel in the City of Washington. Mr. Hicks dealt with some of the practical Sunday School problems, like attendance and punctuality, and treated them with such a spiritual touch that he not only gave valuable hints for the right management of Sunday Schools in these particulars, but also showed the deeper questions involved. Mr. Ware read a very stimulating and informing paper on "Religious Education and Personal Religion," a paper of very unusual character, treating with the more intellectual and spiritual aspects of the task of the religious teacher, and showing a deep understanding of the fundamental problems of religion and of education. He made an excellent synthesis of science and learning on the one side and of Christian devotion on the other. Some of his positions, however, seemed to depart from Church principles, and resulted in a warm debate which gave the meeting much vivacity and intensely interested the audience, which was representative of most of the Washington churches, and included quite a number of the clergy as well as a large contingent from the staff of the local Sunday School, and from the members of the local parish. W. L. DeVries.

CENTRAL NEW YORK

Convention—The Spring Convention of the First District was held in St. John's Parish, Cape Vincent, May 14-15. The Rev. J. de Lancey Scovil, rector. The clericus of the district met in the morning and the Church school Convention in the afternoon. Archdeacon Hegeman spoke at night. The Rev. C. Lambert reported a remarkable awakening at Pierrepont Manor. The Rev. Ernest Tuthill spoke on Democracy at the W. A. Service Wednesday morning.

NEWARK

War Work Maintained—The interest in the War Service work of the Diocese is strongly maintained. The Rev. Warren L. Rogers of Jersey City is taking the place at St. George's Chapel, Camp Dix, of the Rev. Edgar L. Cook, who returns to his important work at Hamburg and Vernon. The Rev. John C. Donnell of Newark at Y. M. C. A. Building No. 4, Camp Dix, takes the place of the Rev. Charles W. Popham of Belleville, who returns to the care of his parish.

The construction of the Parish House for Camp Merritt is being pushed to completion and the Rev. Edwin S. Carson of Ridgewood takes the place in Camp of the Rev. Barrett P. Taylor of Morristown, who returns to his work with the beautiful new Church of the Redeemer aproaching completion. The ordinary term of leave of absence on service of the clergy is three months.

It is a pleasure to record that some of the restrictions in the administration of the Holy Communion in the camps have been lessened so that there is a record of many services of the Holy Communion for large or small groups and many Baptisms. The minds of soldiers, especially those who are to go to France, turn to the sacraments above all other religious observances. Many of the clergy are expecting appointments as Chaplains or in service of the Y. M. C. A. or Red Cross Society in France or in our Military Camps.

Clerical Changes—The Rev. Hugh D. Wilson of St. George's, Passaic, has accepted a call to missionary work in Western Colorado, to the great loss of the Diocese and the great gain of the Missionary District. The Rev. Frederick B. Bartlett of West Hoboken also goes soon to work in South Dakota; also a man who will be greatly missed in the Diocese of Newark.

SPRINGFIELD

A Painful Accident—The Rev. H. M. Chittenden, Archdeacon of Alton and Missionary at Salem, Illinois, met with a painful and quite serious accident while on a visit to Greenville May 20. While taking a walk just previous to retiring for the night he stumbled over a rope which he thinks was stretched across the sidewalk and broke his right arm, lacerating it severely also. He received first aid and then was removed to a hospital in St. Louis.

Church to be Consecrated—The date of the Consecration of the new Emmanuel Memorial Church and the blessing of the parish house and rectory at Champaign, Illinois, the Rev. Geo. P. Hoster, D.D., rector, has been appointed for June 26. The rector will preach the sermon. The fine group of stone buildings, the Church and parish house given as memorials by the Polts family, and the rectory erected by the parish are about completed. R. A. Cram of Boston is the architect.

Toward a New Church—About $25,000 has already been subscribed towards the building of the new church, parish house and rectory for Trinity Church, Jacksonville, for which Pridmore of Chicago has drawn plans. The group of buildings will cost about $45,000.

Goes to West Point—Thomas Dresser White, son of Archdeacon John C. White, has successfully passed the examinations and qualified for entrance to West Point. He will graduate for St. John's Military Academy June 9 and will enter West Point with the June class June 14. He has received six gold medals for literary and military work during his four years' course at St. John's and is the ranking cadet officer and editor of Cadet Days at the school. He will be seventeen years old August 6 next.

PITTSBURGH

Clerical Union—The May meeting of the Clerical Union was held out of town this year, taking place at Christ Church, Greensburg, on May 27. At the annual election the Rev. L. F. Cole of the Church of the Incarnation, Pittsburgh, was elected President, and the Rev. S. H. Bishop, Secretary-Treasurer. After luncheon, served by the ladies of the congregation, the Rev. R. E. Schulz of St. James' Memorial Church, Pittsburgh, read a paper on "Social Service," a lively discussion ensuing.

Two Losses—During the week following Trinity Sunday Trinity Church lost two of its prominent lay members, Mrs. Harry Darlington and Mr. Edward T. Dravo. Mrs. Darlington was prominent in Church, Civic and patriotic work in the city. Her son and only child is serving in the United States Army in France. Mr. Dravo was Senior Warden of the Parish, Vice-President of the Board of Trustees for the Diocese, and held many positions of Trust in financial and philanthropic institutions. He was in his eighty-third year, and was able to attend to business up to within a week or two of his death. His funeral took place at Trinity Church on Memorial Day.

Memorial Day Observance—In obedience to the Proclamation of President Wilson, and in conformity to a Pastoral Letter issued by Bishop Whitehead, services were held in most of the churches in Pittsburgh and throughout the Diocese on Memorial Day. Many of them took the form of Celebrations of the Holy Communion, while others were services of Intercession, at various times in the day.

NEW YORK

Cathedral News—The Memorial Day Service was another of those occasions on which New York Church people are grateful for their Cathedral. The Litany and Penitential Office was said, and special suffrages based on the President's Proclamation were used. Bishop Lloyd preached on Christ's ideals from the text "If I Be Lifted Up."

The Bishop has sent out a letter to all the clergy urging them to meet their apportionment for missions as soon as possible. "As patriotic Christians the people of this diocese have responded and responded generously to the patriotic appeals of their country," the Bishop writes in closing, "with a generosity none the less they will I believe respond in this day of opportunity to the missionary appeals of their Church."

The Cathedral Choir School closes for the Summer on Saturday, June 8.

The Consecration of the Church of the Ascension—The Church of the Ascension, Mt. Vernon, was consecrated by Bishop Greer on Memorial Day. Dr. DeLancey Townsend preached a most interesting sermon. The Rev. R. P. Kreitler, a former rector of the parish, was present and took part in the service. Luncheon was served to the members of the parish and their guests.

All Saints' Anniversary—All Saints', which has the third oldest church building in the diocese, celebrated its ninety-fifth anniversary on Sunday, May 26. The vicar, the Rev. Kenneth Guthrie, D.D., preached on "God's Hand in the European War." Last Winter the original seal of the corporation was discovered and all those who attended the service were presented with souvenir seals.

Dr. Manning Receives Canadian Degree—The Rev. W. T. Manning, Rector of Trinity Parish, was given the degree of D.C.L. honoris causa by the University of King's College, Nova Scotia, at its recent Encaenia, though he was not able, owing to military duties, to be present to receive it in person. King's is the oldest university in the Overseas Empire and owed its beginning to New York Churchmen whose first meeting for the purpose was held in Trinity vestry.

The Huntington Vacation House—The G. F. S. Vacation House at Huntington, Long Island, opened its doors on May 29, just in time for Decoration Day. Forty-eight girls and two associates fill the house to capacity. Plans for the reopening of last year's Summer headquarters in the city are under way. Miss Chapin has kindly offered her school again, and the second or third week in June will see the Red Cross classes, the Current Events Class under Miss Miner of St. George's and all the other activities well under way.

Cows for East Side Babies—A most interesting baby-saving scheme is being carried out in the Bronx under the able leadership of one of New York's Churchwomen, Mrs. Charles F. Hoffman, daughter-in-law of the late Dean Hoffman of the General Theological Seminary. One of the most serions questions of the moment is the need of cheap milk in the crowded tenement districts on the East Side. There has been much suffering this Winter. T price of milk has become prohibitive, owi to war conditions, and as a war measu the Mayor's Committee of Women on N tional Defense for the Bronx is arrangi to pasture several hundred cows on t available meadow-land through the Bror Motor trucks will carry the milk daily stations on the upper East Side, where can be sold at a reasonable rate to the people of the crowded tenement section.

Dr. Hall Says Germans Blame Mercier Dr. Edward Hagaman Hall, Secretary the American Scenic and Historic Pres vation Society, spoke last week before t Laymen's Club of the Cathedral of John the Divine on the destruction of t cathedrals and works of art in Europe. said that the Germans have widely distr uted a pamphlet in Spain which states t it was due to "the treachery of Cardi Mercier that the Germans were forced teach the Belgians a lesson." The pamp let adds that seventy-five churches and thedrals were either destroyed entirely rendered useless by the German armies.

Dr. Hall showed stereopticon views of destroyed buildings, of the wanton destr tion of tombs, and the desecration of gra by the Teuton invaders. He showed vie of the Cathedral of Rheims before a after its destruction, and a large num of other French, Belgian, Italian and satian churches.

Dr. Leach at St. Thomas'—The R Floyd S. Leach, Ph.D., has resigned secretaryship of the Diocesan Social Se ice Commission in order to give his wh time to St. Thomas' Church. He has b on the staff for several months, but w the impending absence of the rector France it has seemed necessary for him devote his whole time to the parish.

Home for Old Men and Aged Couple The fifty-fifth annual report of this ex lent institution shows the home in good c dition, but in need of more regular s scribers. The expenses are growing fa than the income. The Rev. Bern Schulte, for many years the chaplain, retired as chaplain. The Rev. Wil Lloyd Bevan, Ph.D., has been appoin chaplain in his place.

Holy Trinity Honor Club—Holy Tri Honor Club was organized in the Autu of 1917 among the young men of church for the purpose of keeping th who are in the service and those who main at home in touch with the chu Meetings are held once a month. Intolerant Tolerance

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

It was with much interest that I read he title of Dr. Delany's article in the umber of THE CHURCHMAN of May 18, A Plea for Tolerance. I heartily agree vith his plea for tolerance toward those vho, as he says, have a burning enthu- iasm for social justice; who feel keenly he cruel injustices of our present social ndustrial order and wish to see that order upplanted by a new order, based not on ompetition, but on co-operation, not on elfishness, but on love. I am in hearty ympathy with his plea for the clergy and aity who find the ordinary traditional re- gion of Protestant Episcopalians too nar- ow and too cold, who long for a richer nd more catholic devotional life, who want ll the power they can get through the acrament.

These two classes of men Dr. Delany eels that the Church is tending to drive ut by a lack of tolerance for their en- nusiasm. Indeed, his plaint is that the rotestant Episcopal Church is losing from me to time some of her most enthu- astic members, both clerical and lay. She losing them because she is driving them ut, and he speaks of three different classes f men whom we are gradually squeezing ut. The third class which he mentions is ose who, in his words, have become rest- ss and impatient under the doctrinal limita- ons of the Prayer Book. For these his mpathy is not so great as for the two rst named classes. He sees no good in e heresies of this class, except as they ay arouse in the Church itself a spirit of holarship to meet those heresies by a ronger and better presentation of the ith. Practically, however, his recommenda- on is sound, that it would be wiser for e Church to permit the heretics to go teaching their heresies, and in the mean- me call upon scholars who hold the old ith to defend it and make all men see at it is rational and true, while the resy in question is irrational and false. he pursuit of such a method is likely to able heresy to make forward progress in ctrine and practice.

His conclusion that we are in grave dan- r of expelling the spirit of power when persecute strong sacramentarians, in- ned to be more religious than the Prayer ok requires, that we are in danger of pelling the spirit of love when we drive t all who are fighting for social and dustrial justice and trying to apply the aling remedies of the Gospel to our dis- sed social conditions, that we are in dan- r of expelling the spirit of a sound mind en we rely upon excommunication rather n upon fearless scholarship in contend- g with heretics (I am quoting him), ets my hearty approval, and must, I nk, meet the hearty approval of all tholics as far as it goes. His plea for erance lacks, however, one most impor- t element of Catholic truth.

We have driven out of the Church many re men for a cause other than any men- ned by him, and seem liable to continue do so; viz., the men who have a fervent l for the spiritual life, but who fail to reciate to its fullest extent the value of tradition and of order in their fervor for spreading the Gospel of Christ and winning souls. For this cause our forebears drove out the Methodists. In more recent years the nagging narrowness of Zanzibar was the immediate cause of the Reformed Episcopalian schism; and still more recently another Zanzibar kicked up the Kikuyu controversy in England, crying with a loud voice that any who ventured to partake of the Holy Communion celebrated by one not in our Orders should be excommunicated. While none doubt that the life of the Spirit is abundantly manifest among some of these other Christian brethren, yet a party within the Church would deny to Churchmen the right to commune with them as brothers. For this tolerance the Anglican Commission, whose report you published in the same issue, pleads.

Dr. Delany's plea for tolerance in the omission of this tolerance becomes a plea for intolerance. He says we need all the Sacramentarians we have; we need all the Christian Socialists we have, and while we do not need the heretics, we do need scholars who can confute their heresies. This should be amended to read: we need all the Sacramentarians we have; we need all the enthusiasm of spiritual life for the conversion of souls which we can get; we need all the Christian Socialists, and we need all the honest heretics who are searching for God's truth. Following this his last sentence might be amended to read somewhat thus: unless we can learn to be more kindly, and loving, and tolerant, we shall rapidly degenerate into a hopelessly provincial and narrowly partisan and pharisaical branch of the Church, instead of the loving, learning, yearning Catholic Church of the living Christ. JOHN P. PETERS.

Church Schools

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I am thankful for the publication in THE CHURCHMAN of Father Sill's article The Kent Plan. It states facts which should be advertised all over the land.

For what is done at Kent can be done in many other places; indeed, I believe is done now at some other places. But it is not known.

Unfortunately, average Americans have the impression that really good boarding schools can exist only by making high charges.

Of course for private enterprises, whose object is to make money, that is true, and it is true where the stress is laid on the mere ornamental features. But, given the ground and buildings, the essentials of a comfortable home and sound discipline and first-rate teaching can, even in these days, be had at a cost which will surprise most people.

Father Sill has told what Kent does for boys. May I very briefly state what the Cathedral School in Orlando does for girls? It has five good buildings on a beautiful site, its faculty numbers twelve, all graduates of high-class institutions. Its four-year course prepares for any standard college, and its charge for room, board and tuition is $300.

During the year just ended the school cared for forty boarding pupils and sixty day pupils—the number of the former being all it could accommodate—and paid its current expenses. Of course it had no surplus for enlargements and improvements, though it sorely needs another building.

When, during the Winter, an occasional tourist visited this school, it was to be astonished.

But our Churchfolk in general know nothing about the school and do nothing for it. Yet there are scores of things, large and small, which could be done to promote its work.

All it asks is recognition of the value of that work, the education of the most important, because by far the largest class of American girls, the daughters of people of moderate means, and by the best methods. For whatever may be argued in favor of coeducational colleges, I think most people will still confess the superiority, yes the necessity, of Church schools for girls.

From a Roman Catholic Priest

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Kindly send me a copy of your magazine. It is quoted in the last issue of The Christian Union Quarterly in an item quoted from The Christian Evangelist, St. Louis. The move towards a reunited Christianity is becoming prominent. All sincere men who wish to save their souls and help poor humanity are seeking it. May God help us to humility and prayer. Then His Kingdom of Truth will come.

Yours for unity,

RAYMOND VERNIMONT.

Denton, Texas.

From Camp Gordon

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

May I ask through your columns that the clergy of Ohio and Illinois, or other sections of the country that are sending men to Camp Gordon, send me promptly the names, and where possible, the addresses of these men?

This office will be glad to hear from the parents of the boys in the camp, especially those who are sick in the hospital, and will respond to any request for information that we can furnish. G. I. HILLER,

Camp Chaplain, Episcopal Church.

Confirmation

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Every year we have to explain to confirmation candidates that they are to be confirmed, although they will incidentally confirm their baptismal vows. The common error that the sacrament is called Confirmation because the candidates confirm their vows arises from the unfortunate use of confirm in the sense of ratify, in the preface and in the bishop's question.

Now, during the present revision of the Prayer Book is the opportunity to prevent future misunderstanding by making the following changes in the order of Confirmation:

Omit the word confirm in the phrase "ratify and confirm the same", of the preface; making it read, "ratifying the same".

Omit the word confirming in the phrase "ratifying and confirming the same", of the bishop's question; making it read, "ratifying the same".

The New Books

Mexican Problems

THIRTY YEARS WITH THE MEXICANS. By Alden Buell Case. New York: Fleming H. Revell Company. $1.50.

Of the three parts into which this book is divided part II alone is worth while. I and III are so profoundly Protestant in attitude that unless one has an acute leaning that way he is apt to be bored. Besides there is nothing in them that has not been said before with more literary grace. Part II, however, is new material. It gives an excellent description of life in northern, war-torn Mexico during the last ten years. What with interviews with Campos, Orozco and Madero and raids by minor guerrillas, and other disturbing incidents the atmosphere of revolution is well sustained. There is a curious misstatement about the Rev. H. Chauncey Riley of New York, the founder of our work in Mexico. "Mr. H. C. Riley, a missionary from South America, being influenced by Miss Rankin opened work in Mexico City" (page 213). Probably he had heard of Miss Rankin but he had been working in Spain and in New York among Spanish speaking people for years before he went to Mexico and it needed no godly Protestant to arouse his sympathies.

The author will also have to alter his advice that American immigrants apply for naturalization (page 281). The Constitution of May 1, 1917, has practically made it impossible for Yankees to secure Mexican citizenship. A. R. G.

THE MEXICAN PROBLEM. By Clarence W. Barron. With Introduction by Talcott Williams, LL.D. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin Company. 1917. $1.00.

"The redemption of Mexico," says Mr. Barron, "must be from the invasion of business, forcing upon the natives—the good people of Mexico—technical training, higher wages, bank accounts, financial independence, and the rights of citizenship and accumulation." This idea is stressed in the foreword, which largely celebrates "Business with a big B." The author has no faith in any scheme of redividing lands or partitioning ranches or haciendas—land in Mexico, he says, can be had almost for the asking. Agricultural development is not first to be sought. "Agriculture is not business. Agriculture is just existence. Business is expanding wages all around—wages to labor, wages to capital; incentive to labor, to accumulation, to luxury". The inreach of capital to develop business is, then, the thing, and the business in Mexico is oil. The book is steeped in oil. This "underground wealth" is what has attracted American and European capital to Tampico, and "this is what will ultimately redeem Mexico and forward her people by industrial opportunity". A very reassuring thing is Mr. Barron's confidence that the Mexican has it in him to answer the call of industry. A. R. T.

Another War Novel

THE EARTHQUAKE. By Arthur Train. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. 1918. $1.50.

The author has never written anything better than this. It is the story of an awakening which comes to Stanton, Harvard class of '86, and his family as the result of the war.

John Stanton, a Wall street broker, with an income from his business of about forty thousand dollars, "spending his money as freely as he made it," is compelled by nervous breakdown to go for a year to the Orient. He has been ordered not to look at a newspaper for three months at least, and he with his wife and daughter go where they are not to be had.

The possibility of this country's entering the war is to him preposterous. Even when the news comes of the President's declaration, the whole affair seems to them away off in their quiet surroundings as far removed from real life as the events of the French Revolution. Then, one day, they receive word that their boy in college has enlisted. That brings them home.

Events proceed rapidly thereafter, and the "earthquake" shakes down many of their preconceived notions, until at last each member of the family is doing his or her bit with all the energy and devotion of patriotic Americans. It is a story which has already been verified in a million homes. G. T. D.

Oh, Money, Money!

OH, MONEY! MONEY! By Eleanor H. Porter. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin Co. 1918. $1.50.

Publishers having flooded us with so many optimistic books on how to be happy on nothing a year, it is refreshing to find something that gives a ray of hope for the millionaire. That life is possible even with twenty millions we are convinced by this last book of Mrs. Porter's. It is the amusingly told story of a rich middle-aged bachelor, Stanley G. Fulton, whose only heirs are some distant cousins, whom he has never seen. He wishes, before leaving them his fortune, to get some idea of what they would individually do with money, so he tries them out by giving them one hundred thousand dollars apiece. Then as Mr. Smith he settles down in the town where they all live, and watches them spend the money. The buying capacity of one hundred thousand dollars seems extraordinary, if one may venture a practical criticism. In every case it proves a misfortune and not a blessing, though the catastrophes are more obvious than the economics. Mr. Fulton's one solace is Maggie Duff, at whose house he boards. It is Maggie to whom they all go for advice, and it is she who teaches them finally how to turn money into happiness. She is undaunted even by millions when Mr. Smith, to whom she has become engaged, confesses that he is Stanley G. Fulton. "Money is nothing; it is only what you do with it that counts", is Maggie's motto. U. H.

Three Welsh Plays

THREE WELSH PLAYS: THE MERRY CUCKOO, THE DEACON'S HAT, WELSH HONEYMOON. By Jeanette Marks. Boston: Little, Brown & Company. $1.00.

The Welsh, although a musical, poetic, emotional people, are almost without any national drama. Both their past and their present, their traditions and their daily living, offer abundant matter for a drama both vigorous and unique. Has religious prejudice interfered? However this may be, the Irish National Theatre has led to a Welsh National Theatre, and this latter movement has given birth to these three little plays by an American. Two of these won a first prize from the Welsh National Theatre in 1911, and all three have been repeatedly presented in America by both professionals and amateurs. This we are told by the author herself in the preface. Perhaps not one of the plays is a masterpiece, but there is true pathos in the "Merry, Merry Cuckoo", and rollicking humor in "Welsh Honeymoon", and probably the three are worth presenting on the stage and worth reading. In this day of the development of nationality in drama, they are mainly significant in their attempt to work a new national vein. If the Welsh ore prove half as rich as the Irish, the attempt will have been justified. M. T.

Cartoons for the S. S.

CRAYON AND CHARACTER. By Bert J. Griswold. Indianapolis, Ind. Meigs Publishing Company. $1.00.

Every pastor, Sunday school superintendent or teacher may be his own artist. Crayon and Character will in an hour show you how. It presents one hundred subjects with "talk and pictures" and complete directions. The introductory lessons for the would-be artist are splendid. Mr. Griswold has made a success of combining the appeal to the eye and the ear, and has his own Sunday school on tip-toe every session. A. L. M.

Books for Boys

THE AZTEC-HUNTERS. By Francis Rolt-Wheeler. Boston, Massachusetts, 1918: Lothrop Lee & Shephard Company. $1.35.

When I received a copy of The Aztec Hunters I was perplexed as to how I could give an opinion as to its value. My problem was solved speedily by the arrival of the son of one of our missionaries to Brazil, for in the slang phraseology of the theatre I decided to "try it on the dog." If this boy would decide it was a good story I was sure I could recommend it. In a letter just received I find nothing but the highest praise. The ten-year-old boy, his father says, sat down and devoured with avidity its thrilling and blood-curdling adventures. Providing us as it does with a boy's book about Latin-America, I hope that many will read it. A. R. G.

THE WOLF PATROL. By J. Finnemore. New York: The Macmillan Company. 1918. $1.50

With the exception of "Printed in the U. S. A." this boy scout story is entirely English, and furnishes a way of acquainting the American boy with the boy life and the boy slang of our ally. Perhaps this feature will retard the interest of some readers as the point of view of the English boy is without doubt different from that of the American boy. To other readers with a zest for seeing life from different angles this story has an advantage often enjoyed by the speaker who comes before us with an unfamiliar accent and a type of character that is perhaps new to some of his auditors. A. L. M.

THE FLAG. By Homer Greene. George W. Jacobs, Philadelphia. 1917.

One of the best boys' books that has appeared for years, a thrilling story full of patriotism and the things that every boy loves. It is wholesome and exciting.

BISHOP TUTTLE APPEALS FOR ST. MARK'S, SALT LAKE

Fourth Time Bishop of Utah, He Asks for $10,000

NEW YORK CITY.—Last week the destruction of the power plant and laundry of St. Mark's Hospital, Salt Lake City, was reported in the news columns. The following letter from the Presiding Bishop has followed the telegram telling of the disastrous fire. Bishop Tuttle, it is interesting to note, is for the fourth time Bishop of Utah. When he was consecrated in 1867 it was as Bishop of Montana, Idaho and Utah. This is the Bishop's letter:

The power plant and laundry of St. Mark's Hospital, Salt Lake City, have been entirely destroyed by fire. The sum of $7,000 for rebuilding is available from insurance. But $10,000 more is urgently needed.

St. Mark's Hospital for forty years has done a blessed work, and it is now filled with patients. It was the pioneer hospital of Utah. The Salt Lake people themselves will help to rebuild. And others outside in the Church at large will, I hope, also help. I earnestly appeal to all.

Please send gifts to me at St. Louis, or to Bishop Touret at Grand Junction, Colorado, or to the Church Missions House, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

DAVID S. TUTTLE,
Presiding Bishop.

Bethlehem Women Hold Annual Meeting

WILKES-BARRE, PENNSYLVANIA.—The thirty-sixth annual meeting of the Bethlehem Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in St. Stephen's Church here May 14 and 15. Bishop Talbot and Bishop Huke were the speakers at the Missionary service Tuesday evening, and Bishop Talbot celebrated the Holy Communion at 9 o'clock Wednesday morning. Dr. W. H. Jefferys was present and addressed the Auxiliary on the "Realities of Life" and "Women and the Church After the War." He also addressed the Junior Auxiliary in their separate session. Routine business was transacted, and the problems of the parish branch of the Auxiliary were fully discussed. The following officers were elected: President, Miss Laura L. Ruddle; vice-president, Mrs. L. O. Emmerich; secretary, Mrs. A. M. Hildebrand; treasurer, Mrs. R. P. Linderman.

For Country

THE Government has planned to erect a thousand houses in Erie for the incoming population. Much war work is being done in Erie. The laymen of the Erie congregations have organized themselves into the Laymen's League to further missionary work among the many people coming into the city. A construction camp of four thousand men is near Erie, without any religious activity among the men. The Laymen's League has already secured options on several lots in various parts of the city and plans are on foot to enable the Diocesan Missionary Board to secure the services of at least one clergyman, until the work becomes self-supporting.

THE REV. R. A. GOODWIN of the Missionary District of Anking, now rector of Johns Parish, Loudoun County, Virginia, has accepted work with the Y. M. C. A. and expects to go to France this Summer to work among the Chinese laborers who are working behind the lines in France.

THE REV. CHARLES W. SYDNOR, rector of Christ Church, Richmond, Virginia, who has been spending a month as Y. M. C. A. secretary at Camp Lee, Virginia, expects to resume his work in Richmond early in June.

THE REV. J. McV. HAIGHT has been appointed by the War Commission of the Diocese of New York a Civilian Chaplain at the Naval Training Station, Pelham Bay Park, New York. He will appreciate receiving the names of any men who are in training here, and if possible their barrack number.

PROFESSOR HORACE R. CHASE, in charge of Spanish at Gordon Institute, Barnesville, Georgia, has accepted an appointment as camp secretary, department of Army and Navy work. His particular duties are with the soldiers, under the auspices of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. He has been assigned to Camp Wheeler. Professor Chase has had considerable experience in these lines, having been connected with the Y. M. C. A. in Mexico. He is a direct descendant of the family of Bishop Philander Chase and a graduate of Trinity College.

A HANDSOME SERVICE FLAG, five by eight feet, was received by Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, and displayed for the first time Sunday, May 12. The flag contains forty-four stars, representing the men who have gone to the front from this parish, each of whom was prayed for by name at the close of the service.

CHAPLAIN A. C. LARNED has been detached from the U. S. S. "Georgia" and assigned to duty with the Sixth Regiment of Marines. His address is care of Postmaster, New York.

THE REV. EDWIN S. CARSON, rector of Christ Church, Ridgewood, New Jersey (Diocese of Newark), is serving as volunteer chaplain in Y. M. C. A. Building No. 1 at Camp Merritt under the direction of the War Service Commission.

THE VERY REV. HENRY F. KLOMAN, Dean of Gethsemane Cathedral, Fargo, North Dakota, has accepted a call to go to France as Red Cross Chaplain and expects to be ready to leave early in June. The American Red Cross in France has cabled through Bishop McCormick to the office of the Red Cross in Washington for the appointment of a number of clergymen to serve as auxiliary chaplains in France and the War Commission of the Episcopal Church has been asked to name twenty-five clergymen for this service at the earliest possible date.

The duty of these chaplains will be to serve in evacuation and base hospitals as needed and also for emergency work in the field wherever commissioned chaplains may not be available. Dean Kloman has been granted leave of absence for a year by the Cathedral Chapter.

CORNELIA GEER, the daughter of the Vicar of St. Paul's Chapel, Trinity parish, New York, is sailing for France as a member of the Barnard Unit.

AT TRINITY CHAPEL, New York, a beautiful silk United States flag was dedicated on Whitsunday. The flag is the gift of Miss Eleanor Greenwood in memory of her father, the late William Greenwood, for many years a devoted parishioner of Trinity parish.

Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co.

Atlantic Building 51 Wall Street New York

Insures against Marine and Inland Transportation Risk and will issue policies making loss payable in Europe and Oriental countries.

Chartered by the State of New York in 1842, was preceded by a stock company of a similar name. The latter company was liquidated and part of its capital, to the extent of $100,000, was used, with consent of the stockholders, by the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and repaid with a bonus and interest at the expiration of two years.

During its existence the company has insured property to the value of $30,949,773,989.00. Received premiums thereon to the extent of $312,671,550.90. Paid losses during that period $152,928,388.68. Issued certificates of profits to dealers $96,523,710.00. Of which there have been redeemed $90,801,110.00. Leaving outstanding at present time $5,722,600,00. Interest paid on certificates amounts to $24,494,668.95. On December 31, 1917, the assets of the company amounted to $18,041,890.25.

The profits of the company revert to the assured and are divided annually upon the premiums terminated during the year, thereby reducing the cost of insurance.

For such dividends, certificates are issued subject to dividends or interest until ordered to be redeemed, in accordance with the charter.

WILLIAM DELATRE CAMERON STREET
St. Chrysostom's Church, Chicago, Illinois

Resolution of the Vestry of Saint Chrysostom's Church, Chicago, Illinois, upon the death of William deLatre Cameron Street, Junior Warden.

WHEREAS, Almighty God in His Infinite Love and Mercy has called unto Himself the soul of His loyal servant, William deLatre Cameron Street,

AND WHEREAS, William deLatre Cameron Street had served faithfully and continuously for the past twenty-five years in the capacity of both Vestryman and Junior Warden of St. Chrysostom's Church,

Be It Resolved: That we, the Vestry of St. Chrysostom's Church, hereby record our appreciation and regard for the life and labors among us of William deLatre Cameron Street and of his devotion and service to his Church and to his community,

And Further, Be it Resolved: That we express our sympathy and condolence in their great bereavement to his family, and that a copy of these resolutions be sent them, and to the Church papers and the city press of Chicago.

(Signed)
NORMAN HUTTON,
Rector.
For the Vestry,
JOHN H. CHEW,
Senior Warden;
EDWARD P. RUSSELL,
Vestryman.

Trinity Sunday, May 26, 1918.

Dedication of Parish House

LOGANSPORT, INDIANA.—On the evening of Ascension Day the new parish house of Trinity Church was dedicated by the Bishop of Michigan City. It is thoroughly equipped and furnished for all parish activities, including an Edison talking machine and a player piano. It was secured through the generous gift of one parishioner, Mrs. Jessie M. Uhl, at the cost of over $15,000.

50TH ANNIVERSARY OF ST. AUGUSTINE'S SCHOOL

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.—The commencement of St. Augustine's School was of particular interest this year, because in connection with it was held the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the school.

On May 28 there was an historical pageant on the campus, showing the growth and development of the school from the time of its humble beginning to the present time. It was a creditable and picturesque presentation.

The treasurer's report revealed two gratifying facts. First, that the students themselves had paid $11,327 for their board and tuition this year. Secondly, that the school would not lose more than $50 from the failure of the students to pay what they promised. There have been 473 students enrolled during the past year, an increase of nine over last year. A number of students have already entered the army and navy, and more are expected to be drafted soon. During the year the school has taken its part in community efforts to conserve food, to promote the sale of Thrift Stamps and Liberty Bonds, to foster home gardens, and to help the Red Cross.

In the evening of commencement day there was held in the city auditorium the celebration proper of the fiftieth anniversary of the school, at which the Governor of the State presided. Other speakers besides the Governor were the Rt. Rev. Thomas C. Darst, D.D., Dr. Robert R. Moton, principal of Tuskegee Institute, and Dr. S. G. Atkins, principal of Slater and Industrial School, Winston-Salem, North Carolina.

Charter St. Hilda Guild

NEW YORK CITY.—At a conference May 30 at the home of Miss Harriet Philips Bronson, The Wyoming, Seventh Avenue and Fifty-fifth Street, arrangements were made to incorporate St. Hilda Guild, which for years has been making beautiful vestments for the Anglican and Roman Catholic Communions.

Seabury Divinity School Commencement

FARIBAULT, MINNESOTA.—The fifty-fifth annual meeting of the Seabury Alumni was held here on May 20 and 21. On the 21st the graduation exercises of Seabury Divinity School were held in the oratory. Seven young men received their diplomas from Bishop McElwain with the recommendation that the B. D. degree be conferred upon ordination to the priesthood. Dr. Tanner made the address which gave a brief history of the school and of the men connected with it. The Bishop Whipple missionary prize was conferred on DeForest Bolles of the graduating class. St. Mary's School closed on June 7; St. James' on June 4, and Shattuck School on June 5.

Confirmation

Substitute confirm for strengthen, in the phrase "Strengthen them, we beseech thee, O Lord", of the first prayer; making it read, "Confirm them, we beseech thee, O Lord".

IRST NUMBER OF ANGLICAN THEOLOGICAL REVIEW OUT

ew Quarterly Is Edited by Scholars of American Church

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—The first issue of e new Anglican Theological Review made appearance last week. It is a quarterly, iblished by the Columbia University Press, ider the editorship of the Rev. Samuel A. Mercer and the Rev. Leicester Lewis, ofessors in the Western Theological minary, in collaboration with representa- e scholars throughout the Church. The sociate editors are Dr. Bradner, Professor ston, Professor Hunt, Professor Jenks, ofessor Dickinson Miller; the assistant itors are Professor Ackerman, Professor ster, Professor Vida Scudder, Dr. F. S. ant, Dr. E. S. Lane, Dr. R. E. Lau. Pro- sor Batten, Professor Foakes Jackson, ofessor Hall, Bishop Webb and Dr. orcester are co-operating editors and an DeWitt, Dean Fosbroke, Dr. Manning l Father Officer are advisers.

The periodical is limited to the discus- n of theological subjects from the glican point of view. In the language the editors, the Review is partisan to y one consideration, namely, to a scien- c and scholarly study and discussion of ological questions. Its editorial board s been chosen with a view to represent- that which is most characteristic and olarly in the Episcopal Church. Five tures are emphasized: long scientific icles; full classified bibliographies; olarly book reviews; short critical notes; l general notes and comments.

n the first issue the initial article by ofessor Dickinson S. Miller of the Gen- l Theological Seminary, The Problem of l in the Present State of the World, is ew and scholarly presentation of an old blem in the light of present world con- ons. The second article, Pre-prophetic rals in the Old Testament, is the first of roposed series of articles on the Morals Israel by Professor S. A. B. Mercer, constitutes an attempt to estimate the nparative value of moral distinctions gressively considered. Professor Lei- er C. Lewis contributes a discriminating ly in Church history epochs under the ding Troeltsch vs. Ritschl. Then follows ew Testament bibliography covering the rs 1914 to 1917 inclusive by the Rev. derick C. Grant, S.T.M. Here the stu- t of the New Testament will find regis- d every book and important periodical cle which has appeared during the period ied, with a brief characterization of n. This is followed in turn by two ellent critical notes by John A. May- l, Fellow of the General Theological inary, and detailed critiques of four nt important theological works by spe- sts in their several fields. The first closes with a series of interesting scholarly notes and comments on per- and events theological of the world.

Bequest of $5,000

ELFAST, MAINE.—St. Margaret's Chapel his place has received a bequest of 00 from Ralph Cross Johnson of Wash- on, District of Columbia, who has a mer home here. The investment is in mortgages, five per cent, bonds. Mr. nson was a former Belfast inhabitant.

Fascinating Reading for Sunday or Quiet Hours

OF recent years various expeditions, American and foreign, have been at work in Bible lands, unearthing all sorts of astonishing facts regarding the life of the early Christians. The result of their labors is now reported in an intensely interesting volume,

The New Archeological Discoveries

by Prof. Camden M. Cobern, who is not only an expert at unearthing buried treasure, but a master of fascinating narrative. His pages are as thrilling as romance and as readable as a novel and they bring you facts of the most surprising kind regarding the life and times of the primitive Church.

ASTONISHING PARALLELS BETWEEN ANCIENT AND MODERN LIFE

First and second century manuscripts found in Egypt, personal and business notes, love letters, contracts, mortgages, etc., reveal to us that

Preparedness Was a Slogan in Pharaoh's Day
and conscription was advocated by many as being a better safeguard than reliance on a volunteer army.

Excess Profits and War Taxes Worried the Ancient Jews
Trusts flourished and made huge sums while taxation to carry on the imperial government was levied even on necessities.

The Servant Question a Burning One When Cleopatra Reigned
They demanded days off and other privileges or refused to work, and were quite as independent as the help of to-day.

Graft and Corruption Ran Riot Under Caesars and Ptolemies
Politics was a recognized road to wealth, and frauds of all kinds were constantly worked on the toiling masses.

The High Cost of Living Was Enormous in Biblical Times
Three days' earnings went for a bushel of beans, and a month's wages of a laborer would not purchase a small chicken.

Millionaires Dodged Their Taxes in Rome and Alexandria
by making false returns and got out of paying their inheritance duties by employing shrewd lawyers to prepare their wills.

Nero's Palace Had Elevators and Hot Air Heating
to say nothing of a revolving dining-room, a mechanical water-pump, and an elaborate organ with pipes, stops, etc.

Woman's Rights a Two-Thousand-Year-Old Problem
A newly discovered play of Euripides tells us how suffragettes of his day revolted against man, seized the government, and of the result.

The Seamen's Number has been made possible through the interest and co-operation of the superintendent of the New York Seamen's Church Institute and his assistants.

P. H. W. Ross, who contributes our leading article, "Jack and the Parson," is the president and founder of The National Marine League.

Born in Bombay, India, of a military and naval family, Mr. Ross early developed interest in maritime matters. He spent six years in Hawaii and in 1889 settled in the state of Washington, the "El Dorado of the Pacific." There for twenty-two years he engaged in banking and commercial undertakings. He was instrumental in establishing there a Chamber of Commerce and developing various community enterprises. Mr. Ross, sensing the vital need of a Merchant Marine for the United States, to which country he has given his thoroughgoing citizenship and allegiance, gave up his business affairs on the Pacific Coast and now devotes himself exclusively to The National Marine League, whose purpose it is to arouse the entire Nation to the vast privileges and opportunities in maritime pursuits.

Mr. Ross is a Churchman and for some years held a lay reader's license under Bishop Wells in the missionary district of Spokane. Once for six months, during the time the mission was waiting for the coming of a new rector, Mr. Ross acted as locum tenens, doing the work of pastor, Sunday School superintendent and vestry combined.

The Rev. Charles P. Deems is the superintendent of the Seamen's Church Institute in San Francisco. Before even beginning his studies at the Episcopal Theological School in Cambridge he had decided to devote his life to work among seamen. Immediately after his ordination he became Dr. Mansfield's assistant at the New York Institute. A year ago, when Bishop Nichols needed a superintendent for the San Francisco Institute, he naturally turned to New York and called the man whom Dr. Mansfield had trained for this work. Mr. Deems' father, it is interesting to note, who is a Presbyterian minister, is the chaplain of Sailors' Snug Harbor. Since Mr. Deems reached the Golden Gate, the Institute on the San Francisco waterfront has been booming at a great rate.

The Rev. John White Walker, who describes the work in The Port of Philadelphia, is one of those born missionaries about whom one would like to write several columns. He has been a missionary in Connecticut, in Southern Florida, in South Dakota and in Philadelphia. It was only ill health that induced him to leave the church and rectory (with garage), hospital and parish house that he built largely with his own hands in Winner, South Dakota, and return to Philadelphia as the vicar of the Memorial Chapel of the Holy Comforter. He has been in charge of St. Peter's Church as well since the rector, Dr. Jefferys, went to France a year ago with the Pennsylvania Base Hospital Unit. Mr. Walker is one of the Board of Managers of the Philadelphia Mission for Seamen.

The Venerable Ernest J. Dennen, who describes Sailors and the War, is the Archdeacon of Boston and superintendent of the Episcopal City Mission. He has spent all of his ministry in the Diocese of Massachusetts with the exception of two years in Newport. He is the author of several books.

The Church Flag flying at the masthead of the battleship "New York" may easily be copied. The General War-Time Commission of the Churches, 612 United Charities Building, 105 East Twenty-second Street, New York City, will send to any one who desires a circular giving a description of the flag with measurements and proportions and suggestions for use.

SATURDAY - JUNE 15 - 1918

On the Seas

THE growth of America's sea power through the exigency of war gives wings to the imagination. There was a time in our nation's history when America as a maritime power was a force to be reckoned with. We dared to contest the seas with England; we swept the pirates from the Barbary coast; we rounded the Cape and enriched our ports with the wealth of the East. Ships were building in many a harbor and Maine, Rhode Island and Massachusetts raised up a rugged, venturesome race of seamen. Those were days which Americans like to dwell upon.

Then came the era of timid Jeffersonian diplomacy. America's sea power began to wane. From that day to the outbreak of the great war our shipping steadily declined. In 1914 we were selling our few remaining ships to our rival upon the Pacific. America withdrew from the seas.

The war is likely to make the United States the greatest sea power in the world. The newspapers are expanding this thrilling theme with ardor. The commercial aspect of the question is not likely to be slighted by our people. But the Christian Church also has something at stake in the problem of America's sea power. The moral welfare of the seamen is a responsibility which only the most daring statesmanship of Churchmen can adequately meet. As the weeks go by, the responsibility expands by leaps and bounds. Thousands upon thousands of American seamen are being added month by month to our Navy and merchant marine. When the United States entered the war, 187,921 men were employed on American vessels of all kinds. Approximately 60,000 were used to man the ships in foreign trade. If we are to increase our tonnage fivefold, it follows that nearly 300,000 men will be required to operate the fleet of merchantmen afloat at the conclusion of our building program. These fellow-citizens will be sailing from our ports and returning from their voyages. Shall we equip the Seamen's Church Institute of America to do for these men what it is so admirably fitted by experience and consecration to do? That is the present problem.

For many years the Church as a whole and the American people have neglected to recognize the seriousness of the sailor problem which we are under obligation to solve, in view of the service rendered by those who man our ships. It is not the shipowners' problem alone in any sense. William C. Redfield, Secretary of the Department, says: "The intimate association of a merchant marine under the national flag with all forms of our national life has been brought home to the American people during the past two years. Shipbuilding and shipowning, it has been demonstrated, are on a different and higher plane than other industries, for in a measure all others are more or less dependent on them, and there is need, accordingly, for a large and intelligent consideration of their welfare."

For years our people have been content to leave the sailor problem to a few shipowners or citizens of our ports, who, in turn, were satisfied so long as they provided a small reading room, a hall for services, with here and there a small chapel or church. As a result of this system there can be found remarkable cases of individual conversions, but in no case has this method proved an effective instrument for bettering the general physical or moral status of the sailor class as a whole. At the present time a movement is under way to meet the sailor problem on a larger scale, more in keeping with its proportions. The Seamen's Church Institute of New York has constructed the largest building in the world for work among seamen. It cost over $1,250,000. The Sailors' Haven in Charlestown, Massachusetts, constructed at a cost of over $400,000, is also playing an important role in behalf of seamen and plans have been considered to rebuild more extensively. These great ports have set a splendid pace for the rest of the country. But the nation as a whole is yet to be aroused to its responsibility. We have yet to provide for and protect the sailor satisfactorily, especially where he is ashore in all our ports.

There is just one reason why America is not adequately providing for seamen ashore. Namely, lack of men willing to devote the best of their lives to the sailor problem. Scores of our young clergymen hear the call of the foreign mission field. Hundreds turn eagerly to the problem of the institutional parish or the struggling parishes in home missionary fields. Few have considered entering the field in behalf of the sailor.

Why is this? Largely because it has not been brought to their attention. The Seamen's Church Institute of America, in which are affiliated those institutions and missions for seamen which are directly or indirectly associated with the Episcopal Church, has undertaken to foster as far as possible the up-building of adequate institutions in every port of the nation where sailors' work is not already being carried on effectively. The task is an enormous one. The great need at present is not money, nor buildings, nor equipment. Men are needed.

We urge the bishops of the Church throughout the United States, and any others whose vocations may bring them in contact with young men considering their field of life work, to point out the magnificent opportunity for unselfish creative, patriotic and Christian service offered in the fulfilment of the vision of the Seamen's Church Institute of America

For Those Who Died in the Service

BISHOP REESE has compiled a Service of Commemoration and Thanksgiving for those who died in the service of their country. The service has been authorized for use in the Diocese of Southern Ohio. Its purpose, as it is stated by the compiler, is to lift the people from the heavy atmosphere of sorrow to a more Christian and triumphant attitude of thanksgiving, from the thought of death to life. Through the sentences, the selection of Psalms and passages from the Scriptures rings the clear and true Christian note of triumph. We find the Te Deum has been given a place and we are glad to see the Battle Hymn of the Republic.

As a community service it seems to us an admirable compilation. It is quite free from sentimentality, and is designed to bring comfort and courage to mourners and renewed consecration in the community. There will be in the hard months that are coming requests in every parish for the burial service in commemoration of the death of soldiers whose bodies lie in the soil of Flanders and France. The Prayer Book service for the burial of the dead is ill adapted to this purpose. We think that Bishop Reese has compiled a service which suits the mood of the community as well as that of mourners whose sorrow is very personal. One cannot accurately judge the effect of such a service until one has shared in the act of worship which it directs, but it occurs to us in reading it that the compiler has shown nice feeling in avoiding the temptation to sound too persistently the patriotic note. In making this statement one is open to misunderstanding. We are aware that such a service as this does not attempt to take the place of our Prayer Book service for the burial of the dead. It is rather the community's expression of gratitude and thanksgiving. And yet it is bound to be more than that. It cannot escape being a service that reflects the meaning of the passing of a soul from this life to life eternal. The little group of mourners in the front pews will inevitably direct the worship to their personal needs. There is a very clear vision of values at such a time among Christian mourners. Sacred as is the love of country, precious as is the memory of brave deeds, and dominant as is the thought of the world war in our mind, yet in coming into the presence of death the soul is open to a larger thought than even that of country. A thousand years in God's sight are but as yesterday—years which compass the rise and fall of nations—and death is always seen in the old setting that never changes. It is difficult to harmonize the assertive note of patriotism and the feeling of humility and awe that should mark a Christian treatment of death. If there is any lack in this regard in the service which Bishop Reese has compiled, a careful selection of prayers would make the service satisfying.

In passing we might add that we wish that the lesson from the Book of Wisdom might have been left in the accustomed form. "The souls of those who have done their duty on earth," sounds so much more self-righteous than "the souls of the righteous are in the hands of God." The less familiar reading is harsh and unbeautiful and invites attention to its unchristian sentiment. "The souls of the righteous" has mellowed with use into a meaning which appropriates treasures hard to define. "Those who have done their duty" is painfully precise.

But we would not cavil at details. The service is as a whole satisfying.

THE WEEK

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

Prizes for Journalism

EVEN the thrills of war must have given place to another kind of thrill when Harold A. Littledale, a reporter on the staff of the New York Evening Post, who is on leave of absence, fighting with a British Tank Corps in France, heard that he had won the Joseph Pulitzer journalistic prize of $1,000 "for the best example of the reporter's work during the year, the test being strict accuracy, terseness, the accomplishment of some public good commanding public attention and respect." To win that prize, which this reporter so well deserves, is no mean accomplishment. After investigation Mr. Littledale reported the abuses in the New Jersey State prison, which resulted in a thorough reform.

No less discerning was the award of the $500 gold medal to the New York Times "for the most disinterested and meritorious public service rendered by any American newspaper during the year, in having published in full so many official reports, documents and speeches by European statesmen relating to the progress and conduct of the war."

The debt which American journalism owes to Joseph Pulitzer increases as the years go on. His discriminating knowledge of newspaper work at its best was never more effectively shown than in the methods he adopted to stimulate the men of his craft after his death.

Heroes of the Press

TWO bits of news during the past week have shown again that experts are often mistaken. In the early days of the war that most picturesque of war correspondents, Richard Harding Davis, announced that the days of the war correspondent were over. He had suffered severely at the hands of the modern censor. Last week came the story that "Jimmie" Hopper, of Collier's, had gone over the top with the Americans. A few days later followed news of the wounding of Floyd Gibbons of the Chicago Tribune. He had said to a friend a few months before, as they talked of the terrors of the censorship to newspaper men: "I'm getting sick of it. I'm going over the top with the boys at the first opportunity." He was severely wounded by an enemy machine gun last Thursday, suffering a fractured skull, a flesh wound in the arm and the loss of an eye. But no doubt he "got his story."

Each of these men has written brilliant narratives from the front. Let us not forget these heroes of the press, who are willing to go over the top unarmed that we, in our comfortable homes, may know what our boys are doing for the saving of civilization.

Sailors' Snug Harbor

IT is always a pity when those to whom a generous man has entrusted the realization of a vision conceived by him for the use of his wealth after his own death have not imagination equal to that of the deceased. When Robert Richard Randall made a will leaving the bulk of his great fortune for the creation and maintenance of Sailors' Snug Harbor, he made no provision for the men of the engine room. The reason is logical. The will was made in 1801, six years before the Clermont steamed up the Hudson River.

But the trustees of the Harbor have never had imagination sufficient to see that had Captain Randall been gifted with prophetic vision, he would undoubtedly have included the firemen and donkey men and oilers and engineers, who are as truly seafaring men as those who spend their days on deck. One is encouraged to believe that where there is a will there is a way even in matters legal, by the fact that when the Gloucester fishermen brought suit against Sailors' Snug Harbor which had heretofore shut its doors on them, they won their case and gained admission to the Harbor. A Cape Ann fisherman has to be a pretty good seafarer or he would not be there at all, and the chances are that the law if consulted would decide that the men of the engine room and the steward department, now without any refuge except the bounty of individuals or the poorhouse, are seafaring men just as much as the men Captain Randall knew.

There is another place, however, where the imagination of the Harbor trustees is wanting where no legal barriers stand in the path of improvement. Requirements for admission to Sailors' Snug Harbor are so devised that a clever and unscrupulous man may sometimes gain admission, while a dull old salt whose memory is not altogether reliable may fail. The sailor at the end of his tether who looks longingly toward the Snug Harbor, if American born, must prove five years' service on American deep-water or coasting vessels, and if foreign born must prove ten years. Lucky is the tar who has his discharge papers intact! Generally some of them have been lost, others stolen, others kept by some careless captain. If he can not back up his list of ships on which he has sailed, with his discharges, he must compile a list of ships, captains' names, dates of joining and of discharge, etc., from memory. A single slip means that the records of the Commissioner of Shipping can not verify his statement. Moreover, this process of verification takes weeks, even months, for letters frequently have to go to Pacific ports; commissioners are not required to answer such inquiries; records of schooners and coastwise vessels are not kept in some ports.

Meanwhile the needy sailor has, not infrequently, no money, no shelter, no food. The Seamen's Church Institute of New York is often the Good Samaritan. Many a down-and-out old salt has been kept for weeks as the guest of the Institute, while one of the chaplains with infinite pains tries to draw him out and prepare his application to verify his statements.

The admissions department of the Snug Harbor consists of a single agent in a tiny box of an office who has to interview applicants, typewrite their records, and write any letters each application involves. There is not a single room in the Harbor where the applicant can find shelter while he waits for the red tape to be wound and unwound. There is no fund to provide for his destitution.

Why not sufficient clerical help in this department to prevent a man's starving while the agent waits for opportunity to prepare and typewrite his report? Why not a cottage in the harbor where applicants whose papers indicate that they deserve such consideration could wait? Why not two cross-examining lawyers who could determine in half an hour whether a man was an experienced seaman or a fraud, instead of recourse to references by not always and altogether responsible persons where the records of shipping commissioners are not procurable? Why admit, as has happened, for instance, a German who had kept a delicatessen shop for years in Brooklyn because a clever lawyer "fixed" his papers, and exclude an old tar whose memory and discharge papers were equally deficient but whose conversation revealed him a sailor from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet?

Why? Because the trustees of Sailors' Snug Harbor lack vision, because in administering the great wealth entrusted to them they stick to the letter rather than to the spirit of Captain Randall's will.

Bishop Brent on Unity

AMONG the many judgments which have been formulated by clergy and laity alike in regard to the war and its effect on Church unity, there is none which will be read with deeper interest than that of Bishop Brent. The following paragraph is quoted from the letter sent by the Bishop to the recent diocesan convention of Western New York:

There is no lesson which the Churches are learning in the war zone of greater importance than the impotence of our divided Christianity. It is absurd to aim at a united mankind, or even a united Christian civilization, and to be content with a divided Church. Many are feverishly anxious for something to be done to bring us together, but the moment for action is slipping by without action. The Archbishop of Upsala, all honor to him, has appealed for an ecumenical conference. Our own movement for a Conference on Faith and Order has not been silent or idle. But surely, surely there must eventually be two peace tables, one of the exhausted nations, the other of the exhausted Churches. To have the former without the latter would mean that the spiritual vision and the moral conscience of the nations was superior to that of the Churches. So far as the Churches are concerned, if all of them will not gather at call in the name of Christ, the only solid foundation for the present, the sole hope of the future, at least those should gather who are ready and willing. There is enough Catholic love, scholarship, impartiality and intelligence in our ranks to safeguard and present the position of any absentees. The broken soul of the broken human family must give place to a whole soul in a whole family. Unity in a real sense according to the mind of Christ, and not according to my mind or yours, is so elemental a phase of the Gospel that without it the Gospel is a force making not for order but for confusion. A confused Church will be a potent factor in maintaining a confused world. I see no glimmer of hope for permanent and fraternal peace among the nations without at least as permanent and fraternal a peace among the Churches.

The Children's Year

IN 1916 the infant mortality rate in England was brought down to the lowest figure it has ever known. This was the result of war measures taken by the Government. The effort has been made to see that "no woman is ignored and no child forgotten." The number of health visitors, trained women doing welfare work, has been almost doubled. In spite of the great need of nurses, the War Office does not accept for military service those who are acting as health visitors. In Paris it is said that mothers and babies have never before been so well cared for. In all the European warring countries the effort to protect women and little children in spite of the difficulties due to the calling into military service of so many physicians and nurses has been redoubled.

In the United States the second year of the war sees a well-planned Children's Year Campaign under way. The federal Children's Bureau and the Child Welfare Department of the woman's committee of the Council of National Defense are working together in the matter. They ask the co-operation of the women of the Nation in doubling, if possible trebling, the work for children and mothers.

American women are called upon daily for endless war work. Yet in it all it would be difficult to find anything more vital, more appealing and more necessary than this. Humanity and a due sense of responsibility towards the young fathers who have unhesitatingly gone into the national service compels us at home to care for their little families. Realization of the terrible drain of her life-blood which the Nation is already beginning to suffer; wise foresight; an appreciation of the pitiful limitations of fatherless homes urge us to enlist in service for the babies and their mothers.

Resignation of the Rev. A. J. P. McClure

THE news of the withdrawal of the Rev. A. J. P. McClure from official connection with the Church Pension Fund will be received by the Church with regret.

At the last General Convention, the Joint Committee on the General Clergy Relief Fund, in consideration of its approaching merger with the new Church Pension Fund, thought it timely to "review the record of the past fifteen years under the able and efficient leadership of its Secretary and Treasurer," and their report closes thus: "Your Joint Committee recognizes that the Church Pension Fund must be conducted on business principles, but feels strongly that the beneficial and tender relations of the work, the relief of our clergy, their widows and orphans, must not be overlooked. We are of the unanimous opinion that there should always be on the staff of the Church Pension Fund a clergyman as one of the secretaries. In no other way does your Committee believe that the corrections of those inequities which necessarily result from the application of a general and inflexible law to so complex and varied conditions can be safely provided. We congratulate the Church that the Trustees of the Pension Fund have accepted this principle by retaining the services of the present Secretary and Treasurer of the General Clergy Relief Fund."

The indebtedness of the Church to the Rev. Mr. McClure for what he designed and accomplished in behalf of the Old Clergy during the fifteen years of his connection with the General Clergy Relief Fund is very great. To him more than to any other one man is due the working out, in face of general apathy and much discouragement, of that educational process through which the Church has been progressively aroused to a realization of its duty to its old servants, an educational process which paved the way for the magnificent success achieved, through the masterful leadership of Bishop Lawrence, in the establishment of the Church Pension Fund. It was due to his indefatigable efforts that the Pension interests and systems of sixty-seven Dioceses and Districts were merged with the General Clergy Relief. It was he who coined the phrase "Automatic pensions at sixty-four," enlisted interest in the plan and laboriously gathered the nucleus of the fund "To be administered without regard to dues or fees, or infirmities, or localities, or years of residence, or contributions or physical examinations, but simply by right of years of honorable service." The first $5,000,000 fund project had its original inspiration from Mr. McClure, who interested his Trustees of the General Clergy Relief to move for the creation of a Commission to raise endowment for their work, and from whose treasury more than a quarter of a million of dollars was paid over to increase the "Automatic pensions at sixty-four."

During the Triennium in which Mr. McClure became Financial Secretary and Assistant Treasurer, the relief extended to beneficiaries was only about $76,000 for the three years, divided among 387 clergymen, widows and orphans. In their report to the last Convention, this Triennial sum had been increased to $321,000 to 698 beneficiaries, making a total distribution for fifteen years of $1,147,982.

It is a noble record of achievement, and best of all is the long list of gladdened ministerial homes, of hard experiences lightened, sufferings relieved, anxieties dispelled, while the whole administration and correspondence of the General Clergy Relief was conducted always in the spirit of that loving sympathetic helpfulness which to the one who needs it is above all price.

"Jack and the Parson"

By P. H. W. ROSS

THERE is an old-time song, "Pat and the Parson," which tells of a poor little waif who, attracted by the warmth and shelter of a fashionable church, managed to evade the terrors of the beadle and snuggled up in his rags in the corner of some dark pew.

There he heard the most ravishing account of how the hungry were to be fed and the naked clothed. Looking up, he saw the kindly face and snowy white hair of what must surely be the father of all angels. Clad in white robe, this heavenly being bent over him and promised all that poor little Pat so sorely needed.

After the wonderful music had ceased and the "quality," which was Pat's word for the well-dressed congregation, had passed out, Pat ran for the Parson and asked for his dinner and "a jacket, I need it quite badly."

Of course the overfed, liveried beadle had to "butt in" with his usual officious brutality and try to kick the poor little starveling out into the street before ever he could reach the Parson, but luckily for Pat, the Parson was a man of another kidney. He rang true. Instantly appreciating the supreme importance of never letting a trusting human heart go forth dismayed from His Master's House, he gathered the child to his arms, fed and clothed him and thereby forever sealed that boy's soul to the service of others.

Now, Mr. Parson, what are you going to do for Jack?

So often is the question asked: "What can the Church do for the sailorman?" The answer is not so very easy because there are so many different kinds of sailors and they do not by any means respond to the same kind of approach. Of course, eventually they will all melt under the influence of a pursuing love, like that in Francis Thompson's Hound of Heaven . . . . .

"Fear wist not to evade as Love wist to pursue."

And so it is that often and often we must put up with distrust and rebuff when nothing is in our minds but the desire to serve and to be of use. There was a time when the old-fashioned sailor was very suspicious of any overtures from what he used to call a "Holy Joe." Why, I do not know, unless it be that in the English navy and passenger ships the clergy rather overdid the thing in ordering Jack around. At all events the fact remains that the parson, forty years ago, was looked at very much askance by the general run of seamen and was by no means the guide, philosopher and friend of the forecastle.

Perhaps it was because the clergyman could not be serious without being solemn and that is something a man must learn if he ever expects to hold the interest of his fellow men. So few people realize the fact that an uneducated person can be bored more easily than one who is well educated, and that if you have once started your man on the road to boredom you have lost him, and worse yet, the longer you continue the more you madden him.

Fortunately, however, such an astonishing change is coming in the personnel of our merchant marine that the Church will be able to do much for the sailor of the immediate future that it could not have done for the illiterate and crimp-impressed sailor of the past. It will have to be careful, however, and must remember that the sailor has his idiosyncrasies and very intense likes and dislikes. The sailor loathes being patronized. He hates to be addressed "de haut en bas," but on the other hand is quick to perceive the spurious camaraderie of the person who assumes a hail-fellow-well-met manner that does not ring true.

Therefore if the Parson wishes to "get" Jack, all he has to do is to be absolutely unaffected and sincere, button his collar in front, avoid the "long swinging jimmy"* and be just man—man-ready-to-serve, and serve in Jack's way and Jack will swear by him and die for him. This I know to be true, for there is a hunger in Jack's heart for some one in whom he can repose, some one he can trust. He has been so infernally (infernally is the exact word here) tricked, imposed upon, incited to drink and cheated by land sharks that he shies at every human approach until his mental ways have been greased by drink, and then the launching of his barque on Dismal Bay is swift enough.

Recalling as I do the several occasions of a ship's arrival in port, and the paying off of the crew, I am wondering if the adoption by the Episcopal Church of some of the Y. M. C. A. methods of semi-military aid would not be practical. The Y. M. C. A. boys have a uniform and convey the idea of a responsible and absolutely trustworthy institution. Moreover, "they never rub-it-in about the religion part of the game," as a sailorman once remarked to me, and that means a whole lot.

I believe that if the Episcopal Church wishes to do

*i. e., a long tail frock coat—don't wear it, the sailor hates it.

Welcoming Strangers

From a Sermon Preached by Dean Robbins in the New York Cathedral

IN all honesty, I believe that nothing but the Christian Church, and the influences which go forth from it unceasingly, can save great, rich, worldly, luxury-loving communities from decadence. "Ye are the salt of the earth," said Jesus. His Church is the salt that stays the processes of corruption, and without its presence and its influence prosperous cities like this of ours would soon be like those ancient cities of the plain, whose doom still sounds its warning. Sodom was judged by its reception of strangers. Except for Christian influences, would New York's welcome of them be much better? What about the sailor, landing on a foreign shore, met as soon as he lands by those who lure him into vicious haunts, demoralize him, drug him, rob him, and cast him out into the streets as though he were a dog? That was what happened in this seaport not once but ten thousand times before Christian influences brought into being the magnificent work of the Seamen's Church Institute, which has converted this from one of the deadliest to one of the safest ports at which the men who go down into the sea in ships can touch.

Or take the case of the unprotected girl who comes to us as an immigrant, friendless, lonely, innocent of evil, unprotected by knowledge of our ways or of our speech. I have in my possession a book made up of records of experiences that such girls have undergone in the days when panders met them. Delegates from the City Mission Society, or the Young Women's Christian Association, or other kindred organizations meet them now.

These are two examples of Christian activity. You can think of hundreds more. If there is any virtue in this city of ours, if there is any grace of hospitality, if there is any pity for the friendless, it is because the Church has been in this community what it has been throughout the world, a cleansing and saving power.

ffective work among the sailors of the American Merhant Marine they must take a leaf out of the Salvation rmy's book as well. The sailor knows that the Salvaon Army people won't rob him, but on the other hand e shies at the fife and drum on the street and he doesn't ant to "go it quite so strong on the straight and narrow s all that." Therefore if, say, the Brotherhood of St. ndrew, at all sea ports, were to adopt a merchant marine nic uniform, not too much "brass bound," and offer to ke care of the sailor's money when he is paid off, I ink it would do no end of good. Let the sailor have the surance of absolute safety and also that he is not being orked" by some one in the pay of owner or captain d that the only restriction put upon him is that he shall t draw any of his money, even by written order, while is drunk, and the sailor himself will be a Brotherhood an in essence, if not in form.

Unfortunately for the reputation of the Episcopal hurch in America it has generally been regarded as a iend of the saloon. Being myself an Episcopalian I am l the more free to clean my own home in this regard, if can. This I know, that unless the Episcopal Church America, in at least so far as it attempts to ameliorate e seaman's lot, absolutely cuts out the last vestige of mi-approval of the use of beer, wine and liquor, it ight just as well stop before it begins and leave the uestion of helping the sailor to the Y. M. C. A., Chrisn Endeavor people, Salvation Army, Young Men's ebrew Association or other worthy institutions that ve the sense to recognize the first principles of the biogical necessities of a sailor's life.

To take a fine, healthy man-creature bursting with one and vitality, chock-a-block with energy and "pep," esh from the world's storehouse of clean air and let n "tank up" with vile liquor on the fatuous assumpn that "a little drink won't do him any harm" is a ime against the Holy Ghost, against that temple which e sailor has of God, his body; a crime that words fail to properly denounce.

In New York we have, so far as I know, absolutely e best Seamen's Institute in all the world. Mr. Baylies d his co-directors and Dr. Mansfield and his staff have ne the thing just about as "right" as could be imagined.

Most fortunate is it for the Episcopal Church that se sensible men happened to be Episcopalians and not man Catholics or Baptists or of some other denominan, because if the Episcopal Church really means to low out our Lord's injunction to Simon Peter and Anw to "follow Me and I will make you fishers of men," our Church really means that, all I can say is that in Seamen's Church Institute of New York we have got nighty good start.

Moreover, if we are ever to jar loose from the hidebnd, self-complacent, authoritative smugness of the ofessional Churchman and get right down to serving manity as our Lord did, as the Parson in the song ved Pat, then must we open our eyes to the fact that incoming phase of American evolution is maritime. "There is a tide in the affairs of" Churches, also, hich, if taken at the flood, leads on to fortune." Therefe if the Church is wise it will specialize its humanities maritime activities. It will increase its store of sailordom, its scope of sailor-service.

Last month the "Tuckahoe," a 6,000-ton ship, was lt in twenty-seven days. Call it thirty days for good asure. Say there are 300 working days in a year. ere could be, therefore, ten ships launched every year m this one ship-way that the "Tuckahoe" was built n. There are over 404 steel ship-ways in America all ng "lickety-split." Therefore there could be over 00 launchings in a year. Say the average ship is 6,000 s: the United States could float no less than 24,000,000 s of new ships in one year. Cut that in two to let out super-charge of optimism; it leaves twelve million, e 50 per cent. off that for good measure and we can reasonably sure that the United States will launch at t 8,000,000 tons of new ships which, at that, is 2,000,0 tons more than the most wild-eyed dreams of English builders ever soared to.

Query? Where are we going to get the men to oper these new ships which are coming forward so much quicker than are the sailors to man them? Of course the men will come because the Government will have to impress them for the Merchant Marine just as the English had to in the Napoleonic wars. The men will probably be drafted and regularly enlisted as in the United States Navy—but the point is that United States sailors will be provided and they must be ministered to. By whom? By The National Marine League, of course, to the best of its limited ability, by the Y. M. C. A., the Salvation Army, and many other splendid organizations, but chiefly, I trust, by that Church that stresses its apostolic succession from the originally delegated "Fishers of Men."

The Seamen's Church Institute of America

IT was in the General Convention of 1889 that a group of those interested in the welfare of seafaring men first presented a resolution looking towards the establishment of a national mission for seamen. In accordance with their report, in 1892 the matter was referred to the Domestic and Foreign Missionary Society, there to be buried until brought to life in 1904. At the Boston Convention Bishop Potter, Bishop Nichols, Bishop Lawrence and the Rev. A. R. Mansfield put so strongly the need for co-operation between existing agencies, and for the creation of new agencies in dioceses without such work, that a Joint Commission on work among seamen was created. An interesting part of the preamble to this resolution is the sentence "That as the General Convention of 1907 is to take note of the three hundredth anniversary of the founding of Jamestown, one suggestion in that connection is that under that true pioneer priest, Robert Hunt, our Church forefathers with their faith and worship went down to the sea in ships as they brought that faith and worship to the new land."

At each subsequent Convention some progress has been made. At first the Seamen's Church Institute of America was created as an auxiliary to the Board of Missions, but in New York in 1913 the Board of the Institute was made a standing commission of the Convention itself. Finally in St. Louis in 1916 a national organization was practically completed and the "Articles of Affiliation of the Seamen's Church Institute of America" were adopted.

Its methods are outlined as follows:

1. To initiate and arouse interest in religious and philanthropic work at every port where such work has not already been established.

2. To support, as may be advisable, such work in ports where local interests and resources fail to meet the need.

3. To develop interest in such ports, to the end that each local agency may become self-supporting as soon as possible.

4. To unite, so far as practicable, the several independent agencies operating in a single port.

5. To co-ordinate agencies at all ports by establishing common methods, activities, seamen's organizations, means of dealing with undesirables, general standards of conduct, etc.

6. To affiliate all existing church agencies to the end that the aforesaid methods, and such others as may be agreed upon, shall be carried out, due regard being had for the local autonomy of each affiliated agency.

The members of the present board are: The Rt. Rev. William F. Nichols, D.D., president; Edmund L. Baylies, vice-president; the Rev. Archibald R. Mansfield, D.D., secretary; Mr. Henry L. Hobart, treasurer; the Rt. Rev. George Herbert Kinsolving, D.D., the Rt. Rev. William Lawrence, D.D., the Rt. Rev. Charles P. Anderson, D.D., the Rt. Rev. David H. Greer, D.D., the Rev. Philo W. Sprague, the Rev. Edwin B. Niver, D.D., Ven. John A. Emery, the Rev. Henry H. Sneed, the Rev. Charles H. Young, Mr. William W. Frazier, Mr. Francis J. McMaster, Admiral Charles Pond, Mr. Bernard Pelly, the Rev. Charles P. Deems, corresponding secretary.

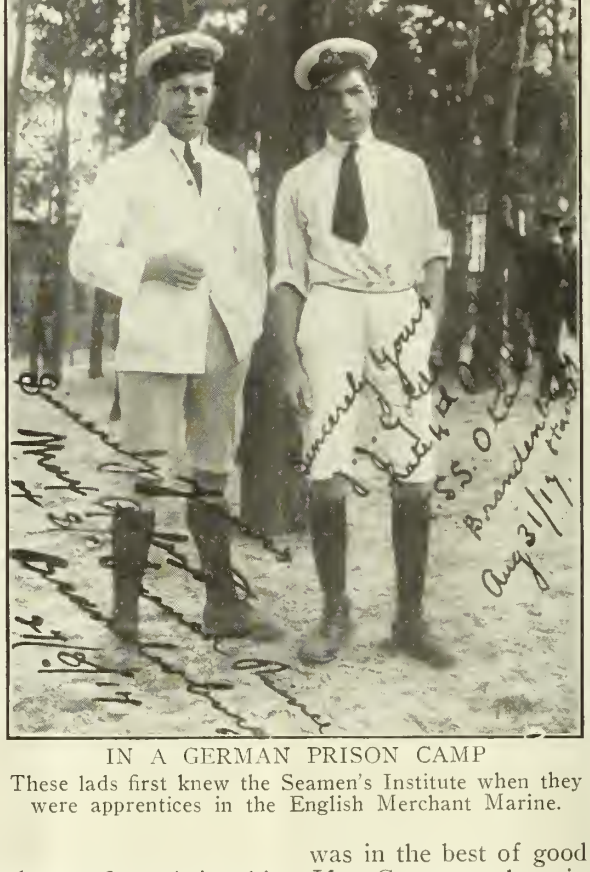
The Institute flag flies now from the Institutes in Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Charleston and San Francisco.

A Giant Friend to Men of the Seas

By THE REV. GUY EMERY SHIPLER

WHILE New York was devouring headlines last week, gathering in groups before the newsstands to watch for the latest word from that new battle front—a battle front which the submarines had suddenly shifted to a few miles down the harbor—one of the Church's great institutions was taking another reef in its belt, and trying to stretch its accommodations for housing sailors. Already Uncle Sam had worn the telephone girl at the Seamen's Church Institute to a frazzle through the preceding weeks. Incessantly he had been asking for just a few more beds for his gallant men of the merchant marine. Already Dr. Mansfield had tested his never-ending resource, and burned an excessive amount of electricity, as he plotted and planned to keep the door swinging in with its friendly welcome to those men who ride the deep.

What is one to do but ignore impossible limitations when one has friends who need a shelter? And if one be a Dr. Mansfield what chance has a limitation, anyway, of keeping its self-respect?



IN A GERMAN PRISON CAMP

These lads first knew the Seamen's Institute when they were apprentices in the English Merchant Marine.

The week before the Hun had seen fit to bring his pleasant little pastime to the doors of New York I had sat up in that immaculate office where "the doctor," a "sky pilot" loved by unnumbered multitudes of the pilots of the sea, spends days that were never intended to be long enough for a man who has so large and so international a family. I had listened while he told me of the hundreds of men he housed every night; of the ends to which he had gone to put in beds enough to take care of more and more, even to the extent of using "double deckers." (During the last year the Institute had tucked 200,000 sailors in bed!) Some weeks before that I had stumbled over innumerable cots crowded into the vast auditorium, the scene of so many gay evenings of vaudeville and dancing arranged for those men from all the world, transformed into a dormitory. I had walked through corridor after corridor, on a seemingly endless number of floors, and looked into the clean, inviting rooms, each with its immaculate white bed. I marveled to think that even a brain like that of Dr. Mansfield could uncover another bit of a place to stow a Jackie. But when there's a heart that measures up to the brain, impossible things are bound to happen as a part of the day's work.

And, besides, when those blond devils from across the water turn themselves loose off your front yard, and set the boys you love adrift in open boats to battle through the night in wind and heavy seas, what are you going to do about it when they make shore, and ask for a berth? Why, you're going to take them in, whether you can or not.

So it happened that parts of the crews of seven of the ships that Germany sent to the bottom last week made the harbor of the Seamen's Church Institute. They had had harsh experiences. They had rowed mile upon mile through the night; they had gone hungry. Many of them were men who never had thought of any other place in New York as home; who had always, as soon as their feet touched land, headed f the Institute. A good be good food, g o o d smok friendly chat and pleasa games awaited them—and t sunny smile of the Hou Mother and "the doctor," a those other delightful peop who give off kindness a good cheer.

In spite of all those limit tions about which the doct had discoursed to me so el quently, and I may add, piteously, I suspected, as so as I read that the crews some of the submarined shi were making for New Yo that many of them would tu their steps to the good c home. So it came about th I found myself, one afterno last week, listening to a thri ing story from the lips of Ca tain R. K. Lowry of t Texel, and Danville, Penns vania, and the Elks and t Episcopal Church, while sat together in one of the comfortable offices at the I stitute.

"You've told the story s eral millions of times alrea since yesterday," I said to hi "but—won't you tell it again

I wish I could put smile on paper—a smile t was in the best of good humor through all his narrati If a German submarine captain had pulled me off ship, no matter with what propaganda politeness, a allowed me to stand by in an open boat while I watch her blown to kingdom come, I should have bitten na for months after. Not so the Captain—for you can't b nails while you smile. I suspect, however, that he ha few thoughts on the subject which he chose to keep the future—especially as he had had three other sh blown from under him by the Imperial German Na since the war began. I suspect this the more because is a good Episcopalian—and we have a fashion of beli ing in justice—sometimes.

The Captain, who was, I am sure, under twenty-f and who was good to look upon, told of the hesitation had shown in slowing down, until the submarine had three shots over him, the last of which had come unco fortably close to the pilot house.

"The captain of the submarine came aboard with detail of men and a gun on each hip. He was young than I am, and looked so much like me that I thought was my double. He pulled out the gun on the left, a held out his right hand. He spoke English better tha do—like a regular Yankee, with one of these down-e accents—the broad 'a,' you know. He said he was so to do this, but we were at war. I shook hands with t free hand and said, 'I'm glad to see you, captain.' smiled and said, 'Like —— you are.' Well, I smile little, I guess, and told him I'd change it and say I w glad to make his acquaintance, but not under those con tions.

"He told me I'd better get any valuable instrume I had aboard, because he was going to blow up the sh I said, 'Do you know anything about New York?' know your New York better than you do,' he said. was first officer of the American-Hamburg line.' I s to him, 'Then you know the ethics of the merch marine—that a master's not supposed to abandon his s until he has evidence that she's in a sinking conditi

Well, there's all the evidence you want in that bag,' he aid, pointing to a potato sack lying on the deck beside im. 'That's not evidence enough for me,' I said. 'If ou're going to put those things around the ship, will you et me go with you and watch you do it?' So he took me round while he planted those bombs, uncoiling the wire s he did so. Then I got into a boat and pulled away. In bout four minutes she went up. That must be a mighty weet spot out there—6,000 tons of sugar."

Through his whole narrative I heard no word of hard- ıip or self-pity. I was amazed at the utter nonchalance f his attitude. Evidently it was all a part of the game, ıough this last exploit was not in his reckoning. I asked im what he'd lost of personal belongings.

"About a thousand dollars' worth of clothes," he said -and smiled. "You see, I wasn't looking for this. The ıipping board put me on this coast job after I'd lost ıree ships. Maybe they wanted to give me a rest. And) I took along all my clothes, because I wanted to look ght when I was ashore."

I could see, even ter his loss, the evi- ence that he cared or good clothes. I ked him where he'd st the other three ıips.

"One in the Med- erranean—the first ar of the war. One the Bay of Biscay -those two were tor- doed — and the her in the Straits of agellan."

Many more things told of his life at a, but there is no ace for them here. e had been at it for ght years, and I was rious to know what otives led this clean- t young American a career on the ep. Again the gay ıile played over his ce.

"Well—they talked little bit about making a minister out of me. Maybe ıt was the reason. Anyway, when I was back in Dan- le I read about one of the training ships running out ɔm Philadelphia. It sounded sort of good, so I took a r at it. A few months after I got home I got word that ıad made good—so I went back and I've been on the ı ever since."

"Tell me," I said, "how big was that submarine?"

"She was easily 350 feet—bigger than that one lying t there." I looked from the window, opposite which at ɔier lay a cargo steamer of monstrous size—so it seemed my landlubber eyes when I thought of it in terms of a ɔmarine. "She looked to me to be longer than we re," added the captain, "and the other one standing by s the same size."

MICKEL, THE MASCOT OF THE TEXEL

When the crew of the Texel landed they brought with them this little friend. They went back to rescue the kitten, which had been forgotten, after they had left the ship.

All the while I suspected his nonchalance reflected an adventurous joy that he got from this picturesque life at sea in the days of modern piracy. Like a straight line it ran back, I was sure, from fulfilment to those days of boyhood dreams and the ceaseless lure of the sea for boyhood—dreams the most colorful of which must have seemed pale pink in contrast to the actuality of these days. What dream could have visioned a record of four ships shot away, and a polite German captain, with a gun, a smile, a Boston accent and a bag of bombs?

I wondered what he really thought of the Institute. He had been coming there for years, he had said; always when he made the port of New York.

"It's the finest there is in any port in the world," he replied. "Sailors are hard fellows to handle. It's the most natural thing for them to get drunk—you can't expect anything else. I had to bail six of my crew out in Havana not long ago before I could sail. They couldn't keep sober. I don't know as you can blame them. You see, they are at sea a long time, and they get all sort of pent up. They've got to have some outlet. They see the same things every day, and the same people. It's like looking at the same wife every day for fifty years. And so an institute like this is what they need. They can have a good time here and get a good bed and have friends. Why, when I first used to come into this port I used to pay a dollar for a bed at the old —— Hotel —and I got plenty of bugs thrown in. Here I can get a good room and a clean bed for a quarter—and it's like home."

I asked him about some of the other ports along the coast.

"There's no place like this. All the men can do is to go to a saloon and get drunk."

Of course, there are seamen's homes in other ports—but truly there are no others "like this."

What a place it is! And how little our Church people know of its wonders! And what a marvelous need it is filling in this war! Down there at the waterfront, in that queer part of New York, the building itself towers its sixteen stories like the giant friend that it is. With a strange precision of alignment the great sky-scrapers of lower New York have stopped and left the old waterfront to all its fantastic shabbiness. As you look down upon it to the north and east from the iron balcony footing the government light atop the Institute, there is a grim old-fashionness about it that seems doubly strange in contrast to those towering (Continued on page 794)

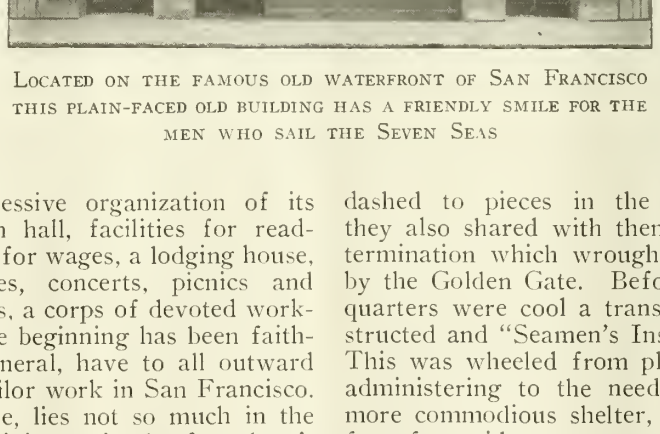
The Church and the Sailor in San Francisco

By THE REV. CHARLES P. DEEMS

FOR over forty years after the famous days of '49 the waterfront of San Francisco was known on all the seven seas as possessing the material and moral equivalent of Hell to a remarkable degree. Boarding house masters, shipping masters, runners, beach combers and crimps of every sort flourished as nowhere else; saloons were built wall to wall the block around; not one of the Ten Commandments was held in respect by any one with whom the sailor came into contact from the days when the first clipper ship furled its sails inside the Golden Gate until the first Seamen's Institute sign graced the front of the building at No. 33 Steuart Street. Then and there was war declared upon the most unwholesome moral environment into which a sailor might be cast.

This event was due to appeals which had been sent to the Missions to Seamen, London, by three devoted English women whose personal interest in the British apprentices disclosed an intolerable situation. For some time their beseeching was in vain. The English society feared that the American Church in California might resent intrusion. The reverse proved, however, to be the case. When it was learned that the work in behalf of seamen would be welcomed and supported in San Francisco, the first chaplain, the Rev. James Fell, was appointed and in February, 1893, came out from England to undertake its supervision.



LOCATED ON THE FAMOUS OLD WATERFRONT OF SAN FRANCISCO THIS PLAIN-FACED OLD BUILDING HAS A FRIENDLY SMILE FOR THE MEN WHO SAIL THE SEVEN SEAS

To the casual observer the history of the Institute has not been unusual. The advantages which it has offered and its general activities have been those which may be found in any progressive organization of its kind. A chapel, a recreation hall, facilities for reading and writing, a safe deposit for wages, a lodging house, a regular program of services, concerts, picnics and entertainments of various sorts, a corps of devoted workers and a staff which from the beginning has been faithful to its duties; these, in general, have to all outward appearances constituted the sailor work in San Francisco. Its unique character, therefore, lies not so much in the creation of new phases of activity as in the fact that it has been able to exist and grow in the face of difficulties which to any ordinary institution would have spelled ruin.

At the outset of the work there came a wave of malicious resentment from the organized forces of evil on the waterfront. Through the effective influence of Chaplain Fell and his staff and a well-equipped plant affording protection and diversion for the sailor, the number of desertions among the seamen suddenly fell off to a very marked degree. This in turn deprived the boarding-house master and his associates of a rich harvest of blood money and other profits derived from trading in the bodies and souls of those who manned outgoing ships. At the same time the existence of the Institute made shanghaing much more difficult. On the one hand, the sailor had a haven of refuge where he might avoid those pitfalls which were laid for him by those who sought to drug or beat him into a state of unconsciousness during which he could be bought and sold at will. On the other hand, he had in the chaplain a friend who feared nothing and dared everything when a sailor needed help. At the same time a distinct step had been taken to afford the man or boy who wished to be decent a "good time" which did not begin with the allurements of the Barbary Coast and end in slavery. That which began with whole some pleasure and ended in worship had been substituted effectively.

Of course the retaliation was intense! Every mean was taken to keep men out of the building. The chaplain was spied upon, followed, threatened and several times suffered personal injury from bodily assault. The building was attacked and on one occasion a plot to burn it to the ground very nearly succeeded, but the attempt to defeat the work in this manner gloriously failed. Instead of collapsing under opposition, the influence of the work grew, not only in intensity but in scope. In March, 1900 a branch was opened at Port Costa and the following September, with the aid of the San Francisco chaplain, work was commenced in Portland. Two years later a lay assistant was appointed by the Missions to Seamen head of the Institute in Honolulu. It surely appeared that the day of bitter struggle for existence was passed and that ahead was clear sailing.

Then came April 18, 1906—earthquake and fire laid San Francisco in ruins—among the most complete, the Institute. Only the frame work of the front door stood sentinel above the smoldering pile of wreckage which a day before was the center of great work for seamen.

As the founders of the Institute had shared the experience of all other pioneers of western enterprise so their successors drank the bitter dregs of disappointment when the citizens of San Francisco beheld the work of years dashed to pieces in the twinkling of an eye. But they also shared with them that spirit of faith and determination which wrought the resurrection of the city by the Golden Gate. Before the ruins of the old headquarters were cool a transportable shack had been constructed and "Seamen's Institute" nailed on its doorway. This was wheeled from place to place among the ruins administering to the needs of seamen until a slightly more commodious shelter, twelve feet long and twenty four feet wide, was temporarily loaned Chaplain Stone who was then in charge of the work.

The city was crowded with seamen for shipping was disrupted and employment difficult to find. Time after time services and entertainments had to be repeated to one section of the crowd after another because of the very limited nature of the temporary home of the Institute. But these inconveniences served to speed rather than retard progress. The cry for a modern building and equipment was so intense and appealing that help came from every quarter. The old friends of the work in San Francisco gave liberally, funds came pouring in from across the sea where the supporters of the Missions to Seamen were determined their representatives in the stricken city should not suffer defeat. Bishop Nichols who had in hand funds from all over the country, came royally to the rescue with generous gifts and loans. Thus it happened that one of the first and most complete buildings to be re-erected on the waterfront was dedicated to the use of seamen while acres of devastated city blocks still showed other institutions in the grip of disaster.

The work in the new home prospered. Reorganization was admirably completed and again the influence of the Institute began to extend its boundaries. In 190

Chaplain Stone, whose remarkable success had won respect on every hand, was given supervision over the sailor work in Tacoma and Portland. Thus, with administration which affected practically every western port of North America, the English authorities saw fit to appoint the head of the San Francisco Institute honorary secretary of the Northern Pacific work of the Missions to Seamen. This move was in anticipation of the shipping activity which the opening of the Panama Canal seemed to promise. Could any outlook have been brighter?

From the beginning the English Society had born the brunt of the financial burden, always hoping for the time when the American Church might see its way clear to assume it. It had been hoped that Chaplain Stone might achieve this, but the burning of the Institute and the struggle to rebuild, which ended in his breakdown, postponed this important step until the Church in California had sufficiently recovered from the shock of 1906 to dare attempt it. At last, in 1913, with the Panama Canal nearing completion and a general increase in shipping activity, the time seemed ripe for the change. Rev. Matthew Mullineux, the English Chaplain in charge, was appointed the first chaplain of the Institute as an American organization completely dependent upon the generosity of the Americans.

Once more, however, a series of misfortunes all but swamped the Institute craft. First came legislation prohibiting the use of railroad-owned ships through the canal. This prevented much western shipping from entering that trade route. Then came the series of slides which blocked the canal. The Seaman's Act was passed, which materially increased the cost of running ships. Finally, the war broke out and shipping was temporarily paralyzed.

An attempted amalgamation with the *Port Society of San Francisco fell through. And, to cap the climax, before the Americanizing process was completed, Chaplain Mullineux felt constrained to resign for service with the British forces. Once more it seemed almost impossible to go on with the work.

This was the situation which confronted the writer in 1915 when he accepted a call to leave the New York Institute and endeavor to save the work in California. After eighteen months of conscientious endeavor he feels free to say that the Seamen's Church Institute of San Francisco as an American organization is established. Many things combined to make this achievement easier than might have been expected. The fact that an American came to direct the work naturally accelerated American support. Six years of experience under Dr. Mansfield during the days when New York was building her magnificent Institute fitted him with a knowledge of methods and a vision of sailor's work in the West corresponding to that in the East. Furthermore; the stimulus which came to shipping on the Pacific, as on the Atlantic, with the advancement of the war aroused a deep interest in the merchant seamen.

Marine profits and the indirect general business acceleration made money raising easier. By a combination of circumstances the Port Society felt compelled to withdraw from the field and turned over its equipment and property to the Church Institute. This included a valuable lot in the heart of the shipping district. Then by a happy turn of fortune Mr. E. L. Baylies, president of the New York Institute, came to spend his vacation in California. At a luncheon attended by a large number of prominent businesss men he told the story of the work in New York. A wave of enthusiastic support for the San Francisco Institute followed. Simultaneously the society was incorporated and sixty representatives of the best commercial and professional ability in the Pacific coast were elected charter members.

Today the Institute, reorganized and renovated, faces the future with the same hope and faith which characterized its founder. Its traditions are noble, its vision is broad. It has the good will of the people. It has at its heart the life which flows from the Church as it reaches out through the Seamen's Church Institute of America to relieve, befriend and inspire the sailors who come to every port in the land. It cannot fail. The day WILL come when the Christian people of our land may point to an Institute in San Francisco with the same pride which now stirs their hearts as they behold the achievements of our sister institutions in the East. God speed the day!

*This society, the oldest in San Francisco, which was from the outset purely a religious work and not active to any extent along social lines, shared the generosity of the port. During the unsettled state of shipping at the outbreak of the war the shipping interests refused to contribute to both societies.

NOTE: Subsequent to the writing of the above the San Francisco Institute has succeeded in raising $10,000 to remove a mortgage from its property. The land and building which has been the headquarters of the work since 1907 has also been sold and the proceeds of the purchase are to be used for the construction of a new building on the lot presented by the Port Society mentioned above.

The Port of Philadelphia

By THE REV. JOHN WHITE WALKER

THE reports of the various institutes for seamen in Philadelphia show that war conditions have largely interfered with the regular lines of welfare work. Philadelphia is chiefly a port of call and the sailors are not often discharged or shipped from this port. Therefore the shore leave of the men is the opportunity for the Church. This shore leave, however, has been greatly lessened. The ships are in port for only a brief stay and often the sailors are not allowed on shore at all. Also the work of visiting the ships is difficult on account of stricter rulings. Still the old methods of work are continued and a large number of men have been ministered to. And this work still continues under the leadership of the Rev. G. S. Gassner, chaplain.

These difficult times also present the Church with a special opportunity. The Rev. Percy R. Stockman, rector of Gloria Dei Church, saw the opportunity and was speedily at the work. His home and church lie close to the waterfront and within two squares of the Seamen's Institute. From his congregation he has drawn volunteers; and under his leadership, and with the use of rooms in the Seamen's Institute, there is now a "Club Room Canteen for the Guard and Fire Company and the Gun Crews of the Delaware River Waterfront."

One of the nearby city piers has been taken over by the Government, and this pier with all the accumulated stores awaiting transportation is guarded by a specially organized company of the Army called "The Guard and Fire Company, No. 309." This company is not affiliated with any other unit, and there was real need of a club for the men. The work was taken up by Mr. Stockman under the auspices of the Diocesan War Commission, and a small appropriation made for the work. There is much need for a large appropriation if the opportunity is to be fully grasped. The Board of Managers of the Church Missionary Association for Seamen granted the use of available rooms and equipment at its buildings at Front and Queen Streets, and the club was started. Special entertainments and dances are given every Wednesday night and a private dancing class is conducted every Thursday night. In addition to these army men, the gun crews on the cargo boats and transports coming in to the Government pier, as well as other navy men, are more and more making this club a rendezvous; and it is proving to meet a real demand of these men of the Delaware waterfront. It is also found that the British seamen from the boats coming to adjacent piers are increasingly attracted to the Institute because of this new life. These men are particularly in need of encouragement and friendship at this time, and a nightly lunch is served them in recognition of the fact that their own fare is scanty, and that on the other side they are not able to get some of the little comforts which at present it is possible to supply to them here.

This new work promises interesting developments and may foreshadow the greater work which the managers of the Institute are hoping to undertake after the war, when an effort will be made to house and shepherd the sailor after the pattern set in New York.

Sailors and the War

By THE VEN. ERNEST J. DENNEN

BOSTON, the second largest port of entry in the country, has been alive to the changing situation in shipping conditions since the outbreak of the great war in August, 1914.

At the very beginning, when some ships were interned, the problem arose of shaping a new policy for seamen's work. New duties and in some respects greatly increased activities were made necessary by the new conditions. On one hand many sailors without work had to be helped to find employment and to establish different living conditions on this side. On the other hand, with the reduction in shipping due to submarine activity, merchant seamen came in fewer numbers to the rooms of the various agencies dealing with sailors' welfare work. But this decrease was offset by a great increase in the number of blue-jackets who flocked to the halls of the seamen's institutions. While the personnel, therefore, of the attendance upon these institutions changed, the number was not affected except to be increased by the blue-jackets.

Boston has two stations which are outposts of the Episcopal City Mission, one in the neighborhood of the Cunard docks—St. Mary's—has been noticeably affected by the war. The Cunarders, many of them, have been destroyed and their crews have been broken up. Old faces and old friends no longer come back and the ships which not long ago were familiar sights on the East Boston side of the harbor will be seen no more. St. Mary's House, however, has remained open and a welcome has been extended to the men as they have come and gone as of yore, many of them new, many of them scarcely more than boys; while at the same time the hospitality of this institution has been thrown open to state guards patrolling the water front. The guards have come in numbers for their games, for their baths, and for their periods of rest.

In Charlestown along the water front at No. 46 Water Street is the Sailors' Haven, an institution known the world over. Its doors have been open day and night. Many sailors have come into the Haven and have left its doors never to return. From the docks in this section, also, boats that were once familiar sights now lie at the bottom of the ocean, and thousands of merchant seamen who manned these ships have found watery graves.

There have been, however, a good many seamen present at the concerts, the Sunday night gatherings and at other times. They have been, however, outnumbered by the blue-jackets for whom ventures have been undertaken quite new to sailor work in Boston.

Every afternoon groups of ladies from Boston and suburbs have gathered to serve tea and to converse with the men, blue-jackets and merchant seamen alike. At these gatherings the men have had an opportunity to tell of their homesickness and of their adventures. Great comfort has come to them and great moral support from their wholesome relationships with some of the ladies of Boston, who have given extensively of their time and energy to serve the sailor.

Regularly on Thursday nights throughout the Winter, a first-class concert has been provided for the men which they have enjoyed to the full, ending the evening always with refreshments. Saturday nights a dance, carefully supervised and well conducted, has given the men a chance for wholesome recreation. Sunday nights the Bible class has struck a different note and brought many men to the Haven for instruction and for the social hour of music and song following.

Summer comes and while the work at the established institutions may slow down, it will be speeded up in other quarters. The sailors are here. The people are here who want to serve them. The work will go on.

Sea Fever

I must go down to the seas again, to the lonely sea and the sky,
And all I ask is a tall ship and a star to steer her by;
And the wheel's kick and the wind's song and the white sail's shaking,
And a grey mist on the sea's face, and a grey dawn breaking.

I must go down to the seas again, for the call of the running tide
Is a wild call and a clear call that may not be denied;
And all I ask is a windy day with the white clouds flying,
And the flung spray and the blown spume, and the sea-gulls crying.

I must go down to the seas again, to the vagrant gypsy life,
To the gull's way and the whale's way, where the wind's like a whetted knife;
And all I ask is a merry yarn from a laughing fellow-rover,
And quiet sleep and a sweet dream when the long trick's over.

CHURCH PENNANT FLYING FROM THE BATTLESHIP NEW YORK

This flag has been adopted by the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, in agreement with the National Catholic War Council and with the consent of the Government, as a flag for all the churches to be used as a symbol of their patriotic faith.

Our shipbuilders, during May, delivered to the Government forty-four vessels, completely equipped, an average of nearly a ship and a half a day, including Sundays. The record for the five months of the present year, while not quite so high, is still of more than one ship a day, the total being 170. Evidently we are getting into our stride. Soon ships will be built faster than they can be sunk. There is something to be said also for the psychological effect of reading every morning of so many new ships, so much new tonnage. We are not yet out of the woods, and it would be foolish to begin hurrahing, but there can be no harm in a little quiet satisfaction over the headlines one sees nowadays in contrast with those that one used to know he would see the moment he found courage to open his newspaper—New York Evening Post.

"It is imperative that we should stand together. We are being forged into a new unity amidst the fires that now blaze throughout the world. In their ardent heat we shall, in God's providence, let us hope, be purged of faction and division, purified of the errant humors of party and of private interest, and shall stand forth in the days to come with a new dignity of national pride and spirit."—John R. Mott.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

NEW DAY FOR CHURCH WORK IN THE COLLEGES

College Workers Gathered at Howe School Make Effective Plans

HOWE, INDIANA.—At the invitation of the Collegiate Department of the General Board of Religious Education twenty-eight Church workers in college towns gathered at Howe School at the generous invitation of Dr. McKenzie, to discuss the problem of the college student as that problem so vitally concerns the Church.

For three days the conference worked under the able chairmanship of the Rev. J. M. Page of the University of Illinois, and guided by the hand of the Rev. Paul Micou, the Collegiate Secretary of the G. B. R. E. Bishop Reese and Dr. W. E. Gardner were also present. Each one gave the conference a splendid address.

The most important action that was taken to meet the Church's responsibility to the student was the formation of "The National Student Council of the Episcopal Church." This council is to consist of two Bishops, three representatives of each province, who are communicants in good standing in this Church, one a clergyman in a college community, one a faculty member, and one a student; and two representatives each of the General Board of Religious Education, the Board of Missions, and the Joint Commission on Social Service. The Secretary of the Collegiate Department of the General Board of Religious Education is to be the President of the Council. Any Collegiate organization of Episcopal students may become a unit of the Council by agreeing to fulfil the minimum program set forth by the Council. It was strongly felt that this action marked a new epoch in the work of the Church among college students.

The Rev. Morton C. Stone, from the University of Wisconsin, read a splendid paper on "The Religious Education of the College Student." Mr. W. H. Tinker of the Student Department of the International Committee of the Y. M. C. A. spoke of the work that body is doing among the students of the country in Mission Study classes, recruiting men and women for the ministry and the mission field, and in raising money for missionary purposes. The conference voted to co-operate in every way possible with the Y. M. C. A. in Mission Study classes and recruiting.

Bishop Reese, fresh from work in the cantonments, gave the conference a splendid address on the challenge to service and sacrifice that the war puts upon every one of us, and the vital need of giving the college men the spirit of service, the ideals of democracy, and a loyalty to Christ. Dr. Gardner also gave an exceedingly helpful address on "The Spiritual Aftermath of the War."

The following men were present at the conference: The Rt. Rev. T. I. Reese, D.D., Bishop Coadjutor of Southern Ohio; Prof. B. W. Bond, Purdue University; the Rev. William Burrows, University of Indiana; the Rev. Spence Burton, S.J.E., Harvard University; the Rev. J. M. Collins, Michigan Agricultural; the Rev. Richard Cox, Kansas Agricultural; the Rev. C. B. Cromwell, Valparaiso University; the Rev. Graeme Davis, University of South Dakota; the Rev. E. M. Frear, University of Arkansas; the Rev. S. M. Hayes, University of Nebraska; the Rev. J. R. Hart, University of Pennsylvania; the Rev. S. N. Kent, Lehigh; the Rev. R. M. Marshall, University of North Carolina; the Rev. J. M. Page, University of Illinois; the Rev. F. C. F. Randolph, Ohio State University; the Rev. Paul Roberts, South Dakota State College; the Rev. F. B. Roseboro, Yale; the Rev. M. C. Stone, University of Wisconsin; the Rev. C. L. Street, University of Chicago; the Rev. G. C. Stewart, Northwestern University; the Rev. G. L. Tucker, Province of Sewanee; the Rev. H. M. Walters, University of Colorado; the Rev. J. Watson, University of North Dakota; the Rev. Robert Williams, Princeton; the Rev. G. E. D. Zachary, Pennsylvania State; the Rev. W. E. Gardner, General Secretary G. B. R. E.; the Rev. Paul Micou, Collegiate Secretary G. B. R. E.; the Rev. M. Doswell, Tulane University.

ARCHBISHOP OF YORK'S MESSAGE AND OUR REPLY

LONDON.—The Archbishop of York, speaking at Middlesbrough on his recent visit to the United States, said that the message he had tried to take to America was:

"We are thankful beyond words to the Providence of God which brought this great people, dedicated to freedom, into the struggle for the freedom of the world. We ask you to come quickly to our aid and pledge ourselves to hold on until you arrive."

The answer the Archbishop said he had brought back was:

"We rejoice that we have seen the greatness of this struggle. We are eager and ready without stint to offer our resources to this sacred cause. We will redeem our promises, fulfil our pledges, and stand by you until the end."

Columbia Gives Dr. Noble Degree

NEW YORK CITY.—Among the well-known men who received honorary degrees from Columbia University at its 164th commencement was Dr. T. Tertius Noble, organist of St. Thomas' Church, on whom was conferred the degree of M.A.

Dr. Noble is known throughout the Anglican communion by his church music. The first position which he held was at Colchester, England, when only twelve years of age. Subsequently, before going to St. Thomas', where he has been for five years, he was in London, at Trinity College, Cambridge, at Ely Cathedral and at York Minster.

For the Southern Slavs

NEW YORK CITY.—A special memorial service for the Southern Slavs and oppressed nations will be held in the Cathedral at 4 p. m. on Sunday, June 16, Kossovo Day, the Serbian national anniversary. Representatives of these nations will attend.

FIRST OF OUR CLERGY TO BE KILLED IN ACTION

The Rev. Hedley H. Cooper Loses Life in Bearing Stretcher

PIERMONT, NEW YORK.—The Rev. Hedley H. Cooper, recently rector of Christ Church, of this place, and engaged in war work as a Y. M. C. A. hut secretary, was killed at the front about two weeks ago during the performance of his duty. It has been reported that he was killed while assisting in bearing a stretcher.

Mr. Cooper is the first of our clergy to fall in action, and he will therefore long be remembered as the one who has set an example of unselfish loyalty.

In letters received from France since his arrival there Mr. Cooper often spoke of his joy in being able to serve for so great an end, and of his willingness, if need be, to give his life for that cause.

WANT AUTOS FOR SOLDIERS

Churches Purpose to Carry Convalescent Men to Hospitals

NEW YORK CITY.—Calvary Church announced Sunday that it intends to purchase an automobile to be used in carrying wounded soldiers arriving from France from the transport to the hospitals to which they are assigned.

Also automobile dealers have proposed to the Institute of Applied Christianity that when a machine is offered for service an emblem be pasted on the wind shield indicating that that machine is giving a health ride to a convalescent soldier or sailor, or that its owner is willing that it be used.

GRADUATION AT WEST POINT

"June Week" Opens With Baccalaureate Sermon in the Chapel

WEST POINT, NEW YORK.—The "June Week" exercises were ushered in Sunday last with the baccalaureate sermon, delivered at 11 o'clock that morning by the Rev. H. Percy Silver, chaplain of the Military Academy. The big church on Chapel Hill was well filled with the corps of cadets and their friends. A feature of the services was the music by the cadet choir.

BIG PRESBYTERIAN PROJECTS

To Raise $600,000 for War Work and Get 1,000,000 New Members

NEW YORK CITY.—Announcement was made in Presbyterian churches of this city Sunday of two big Presbyterian projects, in which churches of New York are expected to take part. One is the raising of $600,000 for war work. Of this sum $100,000 is to go to the equipment of Presbyterians who are now in the service or who may be appointed as chaplains. The other $500,000 is for the general fund of the Presbyterian churches of the Northern States in behalf of winning the war.

FIRST CHINESE BISHOP ELECTED IN HANKOW

General Theological Seminary Also Organized as Synod

HANKOW, CHINA.—The General Synod of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui, "Chinese Holy Catholic Church," at its third triennial meeting in April, confirmed the election of the Venerable Archdeacon Sing, as assistant Bishop to Bishop Molony in the Diocese of Chekiang. As soon as certain formalities connected with the English Bishops in China have been complied with, Bishop Graves, as chairman of the House of Bishops, will take order for the consecration of Archdeacon Sing, and our Communion will add another, the twelfth, to the number of its bishops in China, and the first native of China to be received into that number.

The Synod also established a general theological seminary, to be called the "Central Theological School." Our American Bishops had already organized one seminary in the mandarin language for the three dioceses, at Hankow; and this institution was offered and accepted, for the present at least, as the basis of the new central school of theology, in the main language of the country.

Nothing exceeded in interest the full day's joint session of the two Houses, when the Synod sat as the Board of Missions. Christian Unity was included in the scope of the Synod's labors. The Standing Committee on this subject reported progress towards the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order; on the effect of the war on unity; on co-operation, where possible, in Christian work; and included an account of a movement in which Christians of our own and many other Communions were drawn together, in connection with the proposal of a reactionary political group in Peking to adopt Confucianism as the state religion of China, and as the basis of national education.

To keep in touch with the many congregations of Chinese Churchmen abroad, in all continents of the world, a letter of greeting and fellowship was sent by the Synod.

A feature of this Synod, of by no means inconsiderable interest, was the presence of important visitors, official and unofficial. The Bishop of Kyoto and the Bishop of South Tokyo (the Right Rev. Cecil Boutflower) attended throughout the sessions, and brought informal greetings from the sister Church of Japan; a deputation of two clergymen and a layman from the Chinese student church in Tokyo, composed of students from all parts of China studying in Japan, came over especially to connect the 180 members of that congregation more closely with the Church of their native land. A third deputation to the Synod consisted of three representatives of the Society of Church of England Congregation in China, namely, the Judge of the British Supreme Court, the Dean of Holy Trinity Cathedral, Shanghai, and a prominent layman. They came to present the aims of their organization to the Chinese Church for sympathetic consideration, and to express recognition on the part of English Churchmen in China of the Chung Hua Sheng Kung Hui as the church of the land; and to seek means by which Chinese and non-Chinese members of our Communion can be mutually helpful to one another. Of the elected delegates, 17 were "foreigners," 48 Chinese. Of the 34 clergy, 18 were Chinese; and of the 30 laymen, 29 were Chinese. Their grasp of vital issues, and of the proper procedure in considering them, was a real advance over former attainments, and give us increasing hope for the future. S. HARRINGTON LITTELL.

"Real Cream These Days"

I HAVE not received my copy of THE CHURCHMAN for the past two weeks. There have been times in the past when I would have been indifferent to this mistake, but you are giving us real cream these days, not skimmed milk.

(REV.) DOUGLAS MATTHEWS.
Nutley, New Jersey.

"Better Than Ever"

I MOST certainly do not wish to give up THE CHURCHMAN at this time. To my mind it is a far better paper than it has ever been since I have known it, and I am most favorably impressed with the good strong editorials which give us some hope of leadership, and indicate a background of honest faith and sincere conviction, even if one cannot always agree.

THE CHURCHMAN is now a real newspaper with live news in it, and I am glad to send this word of appreciation.

TO SPEAK FOR U. S.

Dr. Freeman Will Tour Camps at Request of Secretary Baker

MINNEAPOLIS, MINNESOTA.—The Rev. James E. Freeman, D.D., rector of St. Mark's Episcopal Church, will leave Minneapolis late in June on a speaking tour which will take him to several American army camps. The tour, to be made at the request of Secretary of War Newton D. Baker, will have the double purpose of carrying a message to the men in camps and of gathering information on those camps and the manner of life there for the benefit of the folks at home.

The request resulted from Dr. Freeman's action in placing before the public data he collected in previous speaking tours of army camps. Secretary Baker wrote Dr. Freeman that he was impressed by this means of keeping the public informed and asked that he make another trip, officially.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS

Subscribers wishing to change the address at which their paper is being delivered must let us know two weeks in advance of such change. Both old and new addresses must be given. These rules should be observed if the receipt of the paper is not to be interrupted.

CHICAGO WILL ESTABLISH PAROCHIAL BOUNDARIES

Convention Votes for War Prohibition and Motion-Picture Censorship

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—The Eighty-first Annual Convention of the Diocese of Chicago met in the Cathedral of Sts. Peter and Paul May 28 and 29.

Bishop Anderson, instead of reading a formal address, delivered a "Charge to the Convention," the main feature of which was a plea for the defining of parochial responsibility in cities and towns containing more than one parish of the Church. He displayed a map of the city of Chicago with the boundaries indicated tentatively. A resolution was passed providing that the Bishop be requested to establish the boundaries of parochial responsibility in all places containing more than one parish. An Amendment to the Constitution changing the date of the Convention from the fourth Tuesday in May to the fourth Tuesday in January was adopted and will come up for final ratification at the next convention. Christ Church, Joliet, proposed an amendment to the Canons giving women the right to become members of Vestries. The matter was referred to a special committee with instructions to report at the next Convention.

St. Margaret's Church, Windsor Park, Chicago, was admitted into union with the Convention.

The Rev. Frank E. Wilson, Chaplain at Camp Grant, addressed the Convention. A resolution was passed unanimously commending with "joy and satisfaction" the work among the men in the service of the country at Camp Grant and the Great Lakes Naval Training Station.

A Special Committee was appointed to consider the whole proposition concerning adequate moving picture censorship in the city of Chicago. On the motion of the committee a resolution was passed unanimously that the Church take a definite stand in demanding such censorship in company with other Churches and welfare organizations in the city.

A resolution was passed unanimously requesting that President Wilson, in view of the enormous amount of grain used, prohibit the brewing of beer during the period of the war.

The following were elected to the Standing Committee: the Rev. Messrs. John H. Edwards, Charles H. Young, and Edwin J. Randall, as clerical members; and Messrs. William Ritchie, E. P. Bailey, and J. H. Chew, M.D., as lay members.

Deputies to the next Provincial Synod to be held at Gambier were elected as follows: The Rev. Messrs. William C. DeWitt, D.D., H. W. Prince, Peter C. Wolcott, D.D., Leslie F. Potter; and Messrs. C. A. Seley, Wellington Twombley, A. F. Crosby, and T. I. Stacey.

ALBERT E. SELCER.

To Lecture at Summer School

ASBURY PARK, NEW JERSEY.—The following will lecture at the Summer School June 17-22, at Ruth Hall: The Rt. Rev. I. P. Johndon, D.D., the Rt. Rev. F. J. Kinsman, D.D., Dean Fosbroke, the Rev. F. F. Kramer, D.D., and Dr. Ralph Cram.

DUTIES OF VESTRIES AND OF PARISH COMMITTEES

Considered at Lexington Convention, Which Met at Ashland

ASHLAND, KENTUCKY.—The Twenty-third Diocesan Council of the Diocese of Lexington met here, in Calvary Church, May 28. The Rev. J. Howard Gibbons, rector of Trinity Church, Covington, was elected secretary, the Rev. Henry P. Manning, rector of Trinity Church, Danville, was made assistant secretary. There was a special Service of Intercession on May 30, in accordance with the proclamation of the President of the United States, for which service the Council adjourned that morning. Bishop Burton conducted the service, having set forth a special form, in which place was given for the reading of the proclamation. The Scripture lesson was taken from II Chron. 20: "The battle is not yours, but God's."

Amongst the recommendations of the Bishop of the Diocese were those looking toward a larger Episcopal Endowment Fund, the preparation of an abstract of diocesan and general canons relative to the duties of vestries and church committees, improved requirements concerning the preparation for and admission to the ministry, the regulating of the pruning of communicant lists, and larger support for the missionaries in the domestic fields.

Interesting reports were received from the Diocesan Social Service Commission, St. Andrew's Colored Kindergarten, St. John's School at Corbin, and Margaret College at Versailles, all showing great progress. Due credit was given Miss Margaret Hummons, the faithful principal of St. Andrew's, the only kindergarten in Lexington for colored children. At St. John's School, Corbin, Wentworth Farm, the recent personal venture of Archdeacon Wentworth, progress has been such that plans have been made whereby the diocese, in the interest of which the farm was started, will assume part of the obligation. The report on Margaret College gave credit to the Rev. J. M. Maxon for making it the accredited school that it is.

The Rev. C. L. Pardee, D.D., corresponding secretary of the American Church Building Fund Commission, addressed the Council upon the work of the Commission, and offered its aid in the erection of buildings and in the making of certain kinds of repairs.

CHURCH MAKES FRIENDS WITH MERCHANT SAILORS

BOSTON, MASSACHUSETTS.—The Government has commandeered three large coastwise passenger ships formerly sailing from the port of Boston—the Calvin Austin, the Governor Dingley, and the Governor Cobb. These vessels, tied up at Boston wharves, have received young men from every port of the United States who have come to make application for training as merchant seamen on the new merchant fleet.

The Sailors' Haven of the Episcopal City Mission here has been asked to help make it pleasant for these young men while in training. Every Wednesday evening the Haven provides an entertainment on the deck of one of these ships. Instrumental music and vocal music are features of the very pleasant two hours that are whiled away.

The outstanding part of the evening's entertainment is the "chanty" singing, by which is meant the old-time, sea-hauling songs used in the day of sailing ships. The Superintendent of the Sailors' Haven, himself an old sailor, is the "Chanty Man," who as chorus master leads the young men as they strenuously haul, pull and sing.

The learning of chanties is of no immediate help, but looking into the future when this war is over the sailors who are stationed on our merchant fleet and now and then sing their chanties, will remember the Sailors' Haven and proclaim the good work it did for them. And whenever they are in Boston they will feel that the Haven is their home—their headquarters. Thus the Church in Boston is making friends with the merchantmen who are to man the fleet of the future.

NEW JERSEY AUXILIARY MEETS WITH CONVENTION

Reports Show the United Offering Ahead and Progress Everywhere

ASBURY PARK, NEW JERSEY.—At the annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary of the diocese of New Jersey held at Asbury Park April 14 and 15, the constitution of the diocesan branch was amended, making various important changes. All the officers will from now on be elected for a term of three years, and shall not be eligible for more than two full consecutive terms. The plan will be put into operation in such a way that four of the twelve elected officers will go out each year, thus always insuring a majority of the old officers on the Board. The president appoints the recording secretary, the corresponding secretary and the treasurer for the duration of her term. Mrs. Arthur S. Phelps of Plainfield, New Jersey, was re-elected president. She appointed as recording secretary Miss F. M. Roberts of Trenton, as corresponding secretary Miss Zella L. Kelly of New Market, and Miss H. B. Driggs of Metuchen as treasurer.

The Woman's Auxiliary, on the first day in the afternoon, a joint meeting with the diocesan convention at which reports were made by the archdeacon of the diocese, by the president of the Girls' Friendly Society, by the president of the Woman's Auxiliary and by the chairman of the Woman's War Council. Addresses were also made by the Rev. Dr. Mockridge of the War Commission of the Church, and a missionary address by the Rev. Percy Silver. Financial reports showed all pledges paid and the United Offering way ahead of what it was three years ago.

In the evening a beautiful pageant was presented by some of the young people of Trinity Church, Princeton, in a most impressive manner, and all the delegates met at a reception in the parish house after the service.

ORDINATION

DURAND, MICHIGAN.—On Thursday, May 17, at 10 a. m., Bishop Williams ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Reginald M. Blachford in St. John's Church.

Mr. Blachford, who was formerly assistant in St. Philip and St. Stephen's Church, Detroit, is now minister in charge of St. John's Mission, Durand.

ONLY SAFE GOVERNMENT PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY

Bishop Funsten Tells Convention—Inspiring Sessions in Boise

BOISE, IDAHO.—The eleventh annual Convocation of the District of Idaho convened in St. Michael's Cathedral here, May 23, the Rev. W. H. Bridge of Moscow preaching the convocation sermon.

The Bishop's address delivered at this time was both interesting and inspiring. "May we not hope," he said, "that after this awful suffering, when the last gun has been fired, and the battle flag has been furled, that then the nations of the world will become in reality the kingdoms of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ? Men will then, as a whole, build their social, religious and industrial systems on the precepts of the Holy One. The only government which is going to be safe for the world is practical Christianity. There is no sacrifice too great for us if we accomplish this."

Among the noteworthy features of the year's work the Bishop mentioned the building of a new church at Glenn's Ferry, the paying off of mortgages on St. Michael's Cathedral, Boise, and Grace Church, Nampa, and the splendid class of forty-four presented by Dean Chamberlaine at St. Michael's Cathedral, the largest ever confirmed there.

Immediately after the service, the Convocation convened in the Bishop Tuttle Church House, and elected the following officers: Secretary, the Rev. Thos. Ashworth; treasurer, Geo. H. Hackett. The Bishop appointed the following Council of Advice: The Very Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, the Venerable Howard Stoy, the Rev. Martin Damer, R. M. Davidson and Geo. H. Hackett.

The following clergy were elected delegates to the Synod of the Province of the Pacific which will meet in Seattle: The Very Rev. Alward Chamberlaine, Boise; the Rev. S. W. Creasey, Fort Hall; the Rev. D. J. W. Somerville, Lewiston; the Rev. J. R. Dickinson, Pocatello. Alternates: the Rev. W. H. Bridge, Ven. Howard Stoy, Martin Damer, the Rev. Thos. Ashworth; lay delegates: F. S. Randall, Lewiston; D. W. Church, Pocatello; R. M. Davidson, Boise; C. L. Longley, Twin Falls.

The sessions of the Convocation were full of interest, and several patriotic resolutions were offered and adopted bearing on the Church's work in supporting the Government in this crisis.

On Trinity Sunday, May 26, an ordination service was held in St. Michael's cathedral in the presence of the clergy of the district and a large congregation. Andrew Luscombe Bramhall was ordained deacon, and the Rev. Thos. Ashworth and the Rev. Homer Ellis Bush were advanced to the priesthood, the presentors being the Ven. Howard Stoy, the Rev. Martin Damer and the Rev. D. J. W. Somerville. The Bishop preached the sermon.

A very interesting commencement took place at St. Margaret's Hall from May 24 to 26, culminating in the delivery of diplomas to the two graduates on Sunday evening. The Rev. Mr. Somerville of Lewiston preached the baccalaureate sermon.

SMUG MATERIALISM A THING OF THE PAST

Says Bishop Fiske in Address to Convention

SYRACUSE, NEW YORK.—The Fiftieth Annual Convention was held in Trinity Church here, May 28 and 29, May 28 was the ninety-ninth anniversary of the birth of the first bishop of the diocese, the Rt. Rev. Frederick Dan Hunting. Special arrangements were made for celebrating the Semi-Centennial, a committee having been appointed a year ago to take the matter in charge.

In his address Bishop Fiske opened by referring to the opportunities presented by the war. In this connection he said in part:

"The opportunity is great in many ways. The war has given to life a note of deep seriousness and more resolute earnestness. Face to face with the great realities of life and death, of sin and suffering and sorrow the world is crying for utter reality in religion. We clergy must heed the cry. The day of smug material ministerialism is over, with its glibness of speech about sacred things and its ready and perfunctory moralizing. Now we must have among the clergy men who are big-hearted, big-minded, straight, frank, genuine and sincere, with a real love of souls and a real desire to help men and women both within and without their fold. We shall never be satisfied with any other type in the ministry when the war is over.

"The war is bringing the same demand for reality to the laity. It will become increasingly impossible to be content any longer with a mere nonchalant acceptance of Christianity. Donald Hankey defines religion as 'just betting your life there is a God'—that is, staking something on your faith, showing that it is something worth sacrificing for and working for, and if need be suffering for. We are discovering that those who profess to have faith must be dead in earnest.

"Two other things we are discovering through the war. First, it is making us understand the real religion of men and women outside of the Church—to use another phrase of Hankey's, we have begun to learn that there is a 'religion of the inarticulate.' Men have stayed outside of the Church because they thought that Christianity was only a belief in a book or acceptance of a creed."

At the business session of the convention on the following day the stipends of the missionary clergy were increased 20 per cent.

At 6 o'clock in the evening a dinner was held under the auspices of the Laymen's Conference at which special addresses were made by Dr. Sturgis of the Church Missions House and the Hon. Charles S. Fairchild of Cazenovia.

The anniversary sermon was preached in the evening by the Rev. Dr. van Allen of the Church of the Advent, Boston who spoke on the subject: "The Church Proclaiming Liberty." The Bishop of the Diocese at the Convention Service on Wednesday morning preached an historical sermon.

The following is the personnel of the Standing Committee elected: The Rev. Edward H. Coley, D.D.; the Rev. A. R. B. Hegeman, D.D.; the Rev. James K. Parker, and the Rev. Richmond H. Gesner, S.T.D.

The Hon. George Underwood, the Hon. Edgar C. Emerson and Messrs. George T. Jack and J. T. Doolittle were elected to be the lay members. The Rev. Walter E. Jones was elected secretary of the diocese and the Rev. Walter E. Cook to be assistant secretary. Mr. Frank L. Lyman was elected treasurer. WALTER E. JONES.

MISSIONARY SALARIES ARE RAISED TO $1,200

West Texas Convention Shows Church Busy With Overwork

CHARLESTON, WEST VIRGINIA.—The forty-first annual Council of the Diocese of West Virginia met in Zion Church, May 29 to June 2. Nearly all of the clergy and a goodly number of the laity were present, which, together with the Woman's Auxiliary, brought many representatives of the Church to this justly renowned part of the diocese.

Bishop Gravatt, in his address to the Council, urged the imperative necessity of supporting the Government and the Church in the present crisis, and recommended action for increasing clerical missionary salaries, and for entering the Third Province of the Church. The Council voted unanimously to accept the Provincial system and become a member of the Province. The salaries of the missionary clergy were raised to $1,200. The matter of the election of a coadjutor was definitely postponed for the present, and plans suggested for relieving the Bishop of some of the work not confined to the functions of his office. The members of Council enjoyed a very pleasing entertainment by the girls of St. Hilda's Hall in the presentation of "Endymion."

The Rev. L. N. Caley of Philadelphia delivered a telling address to the Council on Religious Education. The Rev. Mr. Betticher of the Church Missions House delivered a very instructive address on Alaska, and the Rev. Dr. Birkhead of Baltimore made a strong address on the War at the closing service on Sunday night. The Church throughout the diocese is loyally engaged in the various war activities, and although some of the clergy have entered the service as chaplains, every parish and mission is manned.

Memorial Day at Camp Bowie

CAMP BOWIE, TEXAS.—A unique celebration of Memorial Day was held that morning in front of the headquarters of the 132nd Field Artillery here, the entire regiment of 1,600 men being drawn up in front of regimental headquarters.

The celebration began with the reading of President Wilson's proclamation and a talk by Colonel Arthur R. Sholars, commanding officer of the regiment.

After the singing of "Columbia, the Gem of the Ocean," to the accompaniment of the regimental band, religious services were conducted by the chaplain, who also gave a brief address appropriate to the occasion, in the course of which he extolled the memory of all the departed heroes of the Republic. "The Battle Hymn of the Republic" was then sung by the entire regiment, and the religious services terminated with the benediction pronounced by the chaplain, who is the only clergyman of the Episcopal Church holding a commission as regimental chaplain in the 36th Division of the United States Army station at the camp.

FROWNS ON DEACONESSES "CONSIDERED CLERGYMEN"

Missouri Keeps Them Out of Convention as Delegates

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—The Seventy-ninth Convention of the Church in the Diocese of Missouri convened in Christ Church Cathedral on the morning of May 28. Bishop Tuttle, during the progress of the Convention, was heard many times to remark that there was an unusually good attendance of Church folk from the country districts. In his opening address, speaking of the war, the Bishop said: "We take no high-stomaching pride in the war. We make no boast of bravery for going into it. We have not gone into it to seize land or to get spoil or to make gain. Nor to vent spite or to appease anger or satisfy hate. No blot of selfishness or stain of sordidness defaces our flag uplifted on the battlefield. It is a war for the rights of humanity, for the sacredness of promises, for the supremacy of honesty and truth. We could not stand aside. We would not count ourselves out, whatever be the cost and hurt. The God of might and right will guide the issue and ensure the end." As successor to Mr. McMaster in the Chancellorship the Bishop nominated Mr. George C. Hitchcock, a conspicuous lawyer of St. Louis, and the nomination was later confirmed by the convention.

The Bishop Coadjutor in his address in the afternoon of the first day called attention to the fact that the Committee on Assessments would ask the diocese this year for an appropriation of practically $13,000 for Diocesan Missions, as contrasted with the $9,000 which was asked for the year that the Coadjutor came to the field; the increase being accounted for by the fact that many new stations have been opened in the rural field, many clergy of high efficiency have been added to the rural staff, and, because the cost of living has so much increased, the salaries are rightly larger than they used to be. Later in the session of the Convention the amount requested was voted with enthusiasm. The Coadjutor reported that gifts of kindly people within the diocese for the help of his work were this year more than twice those of a year ago; notwithstanding the constant "drives" which are so generously responded to for the prosecution of the war. He predicted that there would be great difficulty in keeping some of the mission places on the map the coming year. "As we look this goodly company of Missouri missionaries in the face," said the Coadjutor, "we have a right to realize that there are heroes here as well as in Flanders and Picardy.

The Committee on Canons had fair weather with its proposed alterations and changes until it came to a proposal to change the article of the Constitution providing for membership in the convention. By constitution the convention is now "composed of clergymen and laymen." The committee proposed that the membership should consist of clergymen and deaconesses and laymen; and that, in voting a deaconness should be "considered as a clergyman." After a debate which added no little to the heat (although it was most good-natured throughout) of an already super-heated summer day, the resolution was defeated. HARRINGTON ROGERS.

Our Weekly News Letters

BOSTON

Archdeaconry of Lowell—The Forty-seventh meeting of the Archdeaconry of Lowell was held at Trinity Church, Melrose, on June 6. The day began with the Holy Communion at 10.30 a. m. After a business session there followed addresses by Bishop Lawrence and by the Rev. Alexander Mann, D.D. Dr. Mann described the work and possibilities of the Provincial Synod.

A Conference on "The Need and Training of Laymen for Church Work" produced great interest and spirited discussion. Bishop Babcock and the Ven. Ernest J. Dennen, Archdeacon of Boston, were the appointed speakers who opened the Conference.

After luncheon—at which the archdeaconry delegates were the guests of the rector and people of Trinity parish—a Conference on "War-Time Observance and Preaching" was led by the Rev. Francis E. Webster, Rector of Christ Church, Waltham, and Secretary of the Convention, the Rev. Angus Dun, Rector of St. Andrew's Church, Ayer, and Mr. F. Nathaniel Perkins, Executive Manager of the Naval Service Club.

At the Cathedral—On Memorial Day more than 800 people attended the Cathedral for the 9:30 a. m. service in observance of the national "Day of Humiliation, Prayer and Fasting." In the solemn procession of choir and clergy about the church, the flags of Great Britain, France and Italy followed the Stars and Stripes—all led, of course, by the great processional cross. A large proportion of the congregation was made up of the soldiers and sailors of our country and of her allies.

"The Son of God Goes Forth to War" was sung lustily by the whole congregation. Bishop Lawrence preached on the ideals with which our country entered the war and of the pre-eminent duty of each American to live worthily of them. There were special intercessions for a repentant spirit, for the President and all in authority in the allied nations and in our own land, for the armies and navies, for victory, for those who have died in service, and for the spirit of sacrifice. Then Dr. Taylor's new hymn, "March Together, Brothers," was sung to the Sir Arthur Sullivan tune for "Onward, Christian Soldiers."

Conscription of Laymen—Bishop Lawrence has appointed, in accordance with the action of the last Diocesan Convention, a highly important committee to study the whole question of the availability and active use of laymen in parish work, particularly with reference to the acute war-time needs due to the fast increasing shortage of clergy. It will quite probably be found necessary for certain laymen to undertake the entire pastoral care of some missions and parishes—calling in priests only for the essential sacerdotal functions. Such laymen would have to be definitely trained and would probably be set apart—somewhat as a deaconess is set apart—by a formal religious service for this special emergency work of the Church. The membership of this committee is: the Ven. Ernest J. Dennen, chairman, the Very Rev. Edmund S. Rousmaniere, D.D., the Rev. William L. Clark, Mr. Charles C. Coveney and Mr. F. C. Folsom. The committee is already at work upon its problem.

In Memoriam—The following poignantly beautiful verses appearing in one of the Cathedral leaflets are inscribed "To Lieutenant Richard Ashley Blodgett, Aviator; Dead on the Field of Honor, France, May 17, 1918. Age 20 Years."

"How could you let him go?" they said,
But I, "How could he stay?"
My young crusader whose the task
To turn black night to day.

Christ-like he lived and like Christ died,
O God! forgive the cry.
Of mothers proud, and desolate,
And happy, such as I.

NEW YORK

Dr. Slattery's Columbia Baccalaureate—The Rev. C. L. Slattery, D.D., rector of Grace Church, was the baccalaureate preacher at Columbia University this year. His sermon, delivered on Sunday, June 2, was on the subject, "Not When the War is Over—But Now," and he took as his text "But God said unto him, Thou fool, this night thy soul shall be required of thee."

"What I wish to urge upon you this Summer afternoon," said Dr. Slattery, "is that no high dreamer with God's hope in his heart may dare to wait till the war is over. The world is today plastic and fluid. Without for one moment losing sight of the insistent demand of the hour that democracy free itself from the cruel snares which autocracy has planned for it, the courageous spirit must at the very same time see that this melting world be thrown into such new form, moment by moment, that, when the war is over and the hardening process sets in, there will be indeed a new world, more glorious than the old, wearied, saddened by grievous losses, yet triumphant because out of its pain has been born the joy of the future. . . . Can you imagine that nature spoke soothingly in volcanic ages when the heat within the earth distorted the surface pleading that when all was quiet the hills and the valleys could be set in order by the gentler influences of the sun and the rains?"

Dr. Slattery found the first gain of the war in the fact that men with real souls are demonstrating the greatness of the human spirit. His second point was that the war was a contest between two conceptions of unity, that under autocracy and that under democracy. In speaking of Christian reunion, he said: "If it is to be more than a hazy, hopeful dream, it must be transmuted into generous Christian statesmanship during the war."

The new dream of liberty and the new sense of dependence upon God are the other great contributions which Dr. Slattery thinks the war is making to the world. "The consummation of ultimate happiness to the world," he said in conclusion, "shall be given because those who see visions of the right and the true shall not have waited till the war is over to do their best and to be their best, but, standing in the service of Christ their King, shall have begun to put their visions into reality now."

Columbia Chapel Has New Bell—A 2,000-pound bell, made at the foundry of the Meneely Bell Company, Troy, New York, and recently installed in the chapel of Columbia University, was formally dedicated at Commencement last week. The bell is the gift of the class of 1893. The Meneely Company also furnished the bell that was recently placed in the new cupola of the New York City Hall, and is soon to make shipment to the Cadet Chapel at West Point of what it is said will be the most costly chime of bells in America.

Fiftieth Ordination Anniversary—On Sunday, June 9, the Rev. Joseph Warren Hill marked the fiftieth anniversary of his ordination to the priesthood by celebrating the Holy Communion at the 11 o'clock service at Trinity Church. "Father Hill," as he is affectionately known throughout Trinity parish, was ordained by Bishop Horatio Potter in 1868. His ministry has been confined to service in St. Luke's Church, New York; the Church of the Advent, Boston, and Trinity Church, New York, where he has been curate since 1881. His beautiful voice has made his singing of the choral service one of the features of the Trinity service for thirty-seven years.

Dr. Manning Preaches Before the Ottawa Synod—On Monday, June 3, the Rev. William T. Manning, D.D., rector of Trinity Church, preached the opening sermon at the Synod of the Diocese of Ottawa, Canada. "The ties between Canada and the United States are stronger than they have ever been," were his opening words. "Today we are not only neighbors and friends, but allies and comrades in arms in the greatest battle of history." He spoke with admiration of the splendid spirit and courage of the Canadians and of the deep respect and affection with which the people of the United States regard them. "It is our high hope and purpose that out of this experience of common suffering and trial shall come, indeed we feel that out of it has now come, that true union and fellowship of the English-speaking peoples which shall be the guarantee of justice and right and freedom to men everywhere." He issued a ringing call for the Church to speak out boldly against false pacifism, to stand openly for the right and to preach the full Gospel of Jesus Christ. "The battle we are fighting," he concluded, "is the battle of the Son of God."

Death of Mrs. Irvin—Mary Morris Irvin, widow of Richard Irvin, Esq., died in New York on June 5. She was a well-known figure in the diocesan life and a strong supporter of the Cathedral. Her burial service was held in the Cathedral on June 8.

Congregational Singing—At Trinity Chapel during Lent the informal Wednesday evening mission service was preceded each week by a singing lesson conducted by Dr. Felix Lamond, the choirmaster. The result was that on Memorial Day at the morning service the congregation sang the choral Communion service without help from the choir, and sang it extremely well.

This new found ability to sing unaided has given the congregation an increased sense of responsibility and a greater joy in the service.

At the Church of the Holy Apostles—Bishop Paddock of Eastern Oregon preached a most interesting sermon to his friends and former parishioners at the Church of the Holy Apostles last Sunday. On Sunday nights in June the Rev. William Wilkinson, popularly known as "the Bishop of Wall Street," will conduct the service. The following note about the Boy Scouts appears in the parish leaflet:

The Scouts have taken on new vigor and are preparing to do great things in the future. The number of the Troop has been changed to 338 Manhattan instead of 138 New York. We now have a full Troop of thirty-one Scouts, one of whom is First Class, fourteen Second Class, and the remainder Tenderfoots. Two of the Scouts are now in active service, one on the other side and one at Fort Hancock. During the recent Liberty Loan campaign, nine Scouts secured more than ten subscriptions each. MARGARETTA MILLER.

ALBANY

Union Services Held—The seven parishes in the City of Albany united in a noontide service in St. Peter's on Memorial Day. In opening the service the rector, Mr. Harriman, stated it was plainly the intention of the President that the service should be rendered as far as was possible by the congregation. He urged each one present to accept his individual responsibility for the prayers and praises which were about to be said and sung. No choir was present and there was no sermon. Eleven of the clergy were present and the congregation numbered about five hundred.

Service of Intercession—A service of intercession for the Nation was held in St. Paul's Church, Albany (the Rev. Roelif H. Brooks, rector), on Sunday evening, June 2. The military of the state was represented by some of the leading officers of the State Guard and the Mayor and his cabinet represented the civil authorities. The sermon was preached by the Rev. Arthur J. Gammack, rector of Christ Church, Fitchburg, Massachusetts, who is now serving as voluntary chaplain at Camp Devens.

Clerical Changes—Two clerical changes will take place at the end of this month. The Rev. Tage Teisen, for the past three years curate of St. Peter's, Albany, will become the rector of St. Paul's Church, Kittanning, Pennsylvania. The Rev. Alaric J. Drew, now rector of the Church of the Messiah, Rensselaer, will assume charge of St. Luke's Church, Cambridge, New York.

SOUTH DAKOTA

A Gift from Three Guilds—An oak reredos, the gift of three women's guilds in the parish, has just been placed in Calvary Cathedral, Sioux Falls. It was designed and carved in the shop of Mr. J. T. Coxhead, at Yankton, and is a worthy and dignified work, showing careful and artistic handicraft. Its central panel is recessed and surmounted by a cross, giving a baldichino effect. This is flanked by large panels, separated by pillars and capped by Gothic arches, with alternate crosses and fleur-de-lis, carrying out the previous designs on the Bishop's seat and Dean's stall and credence table. It completes the furnishings of the chancel, after many years of bareness, and adds greatly to the impressiveness of the cathedral interior. At the same time a chapel has been furnished in the crypt, providing a comfortable and reverent place for week-day and Lenten services.

Ordination—On Trinity Sunday Bishop Burleson ordained Stanley Parker Jones to the Diaconate. Dean Woodruff preached the sermon and presented the candidate; the Litany was read by the Rev. Ian Robertson, Mr. Jones' room-mate at Seabury. Mr. Jones will have charge of Lake Andes and Armour during the Summer and complete his course at Seabury next year.

UTAH

Appointed Principal—Miss Eloise Ruthven Tremain, for the past year principal of Rowland Hall, has resigned to accept the position of principal of Ferry Hall, Lake Forest, Illinois. At the same time the announcement of the appointment of Miss M. M. Buckner, of Havergal College, Toronto, as Miss Tremain's successor was made.

Rowland Hall Commencement — The commencement exercises of Rowland Hall were held June 5 at St. Mark's Cathedral, Salt Lake City. Bishop Touret of Western Colorado delivered the address and presented diplomas to a class of six young women.

Going to France—Deaconess Phelps has been accepted by the Friend's Unit of the Red Cross for service in France and sails from an Eastern port about the middle of June. The Deaconess was visitor at St. Peter's Mission. Archdeacon Reese has been accepted for overseas work by the Y. M. C. A. in an executive position. The Archdeacon has been in Utah for seven years, first as rector of St. Paul's Parish, which he resigned to accept his present position. H. E. HENRIQUES.

RHODE ISLAND

Open House—St. Andrew's Industrial School, Barrington, kept open house on Memorial Day, as has always been its custom. It was the twenty-fifth anniversary of the founding of the school by the Rev. William M. Chapin, its present warden. There was no formal observance on account of war conditions. It had been planned to inaugurate a campaign to raise $25,000 for a chapel. At a general meeting in Hardy Memorial Hall Bishop Perry made his annual address, and the yearly prizes were awarded. St. Andrew's League, an auxiliary organization of young men in fifteen parishes of the diocese, got together as usual for its annual business meeting, with luncheon and athletic sports.

A Bequest—By the will of the late Anna M. Sessions, St. Elizabeth Home, Providence, and St. Mary's Orphanage, East Providence, are residuary legatees of one-fourth each of the estate, which consists largely of real estate in the business section of Providence. The estate is left in trust, each institution receiving one-fourth of the income, and if sold the proceeds are to be divided in the same proportion.

J. M. HOBBS.

ATLANTA

Memorial Day—On Memorial Day material things were laid aside for a while at 12 o'clock and a great prayer service was held at Five Points in response to the proclamation of the President.

Bishop Mikell of the diocese suggested to the Mayor that it would be very appropriate to have such a service, and the Mayor adopted the suggestion and immediately went ahead with arrangements for it. All business was set aside practically all day.

A platform was set up at Five Points. On the platform were representatives of various religious bodies. A number of men in khaki were present, and there were men from the Y. M. C. A. There was a Jewish rabbi and a Roman priest.

The Governor of the State was there. The meeting was conducted by the Mayor of Atlanta. Three cheers were given for each of the great generals "over there" and for President Wilson. There was a tremendous crowd. Street cars were stopped or took another route, and likewise automobiles. There was a moment of silent prayer; familiar hymns were sung, and finally the "Star Spangled Banner." The prayer was offered by Bishop Mikell. The Bishop made an address on the subject of the reason for the war and why we must fight and win. RANDOLPH R. CLAIBORNE.

COLORADO

Anniversary—Trinity Church, Greeley, the Rev. B. W. Bonell, rector, celebrated its 48th anniversary Trinity Sunday, in a most delightful manner. It was an all-day service with the home coming of the various missions of Trinity. The choirs of Trinity, St. Alban's, Windsor and St. Andrews, Ft. Lipton, combined in singing the service. In spite of the dark day and impending storm, nearly a hundred came from the mission, some driving thirty-five miles. The Rev. C. H. Shutt of Fort Collins preached a forceful and inspiring sermon. After the service the guests and over a hundred members of Trinity had a picnic luncheon in Bonell Hall served by Trinity Guild. At 2 o'clock patriotic hymns were sung and an address made by Prof. Geo. Barker of Teachers' College. At 3 all gathered in the church for a short service and an organ recital. In the evening the Rev. C. H. Brady of Fort Lipton preached a splendid sermon and the anniversary came to a close. The offerings for the day, a large part of which was in Thrift Stamps, was given to diocesan missions.

NEWARK

Diocesan Assembly Meets—The annual meeting of the Newark Diocesan Assembly was held at Trinity Cathedral, Newark, Saturday, May 25. The afternoon opened with a meeting of the Juniors, followed by the business and conference meeting, at which addresses were made by Horace W. Graves, Brotherhood Secretary at Camp Merritt; William G. Stonham of St. Luke's, Montclair; Arthur E. Barlow of St. Paul's, Newark; Thomas W. Dennison, St. John's, Montclair. Walter Kidde, chairman of the Brotherhood's National War Work Council, presided. Both Bishop Lines and Bishop Stearly were present and made brief remarks. The election of officers resulted in Mr. Barlow being made president of the assembly; H. S. Wiltshire of St. John's, Jersey City, secretary. Mr. Wiltshire also was elected an additional member of the National Council. Nearly fifty men were present, and it was a very helpful meeting. In the evening, in the cathedral, Mr. Randall, Executive Secretary of the Brotherhood, made an address on "The Threefold Work of the Brotherhood."

Students Ordained—Three students completing their studies at the General Theological Seminary this year have been ordained to the Diaconate: Robert S. Hooper by Bishop Lines on Ascension Day at Holy Innocents' Church, Hoboken, presented by the Rev. G. Ernest Magill; the sermon preached by the Rev. Prof. Francis B. Blodget. George F. Collard, at Grace Church, Madison, by Bishop Stearly on Trinity Sunday, presented by the rector, the Rev. Victor W. Mori, with the Rev. Prof. Dickison S. Miller as preacher. Peter R. Deckenbach by Bishop Lines at St. Mark's, West Orange, on Trinity Sunday, presented by the Rev. Dr. Frank B. Reazor, the preacher the Rev. Prof. Charles C. Edmunds.

CONNECTICUT

Memorial Day—The President's proclamation that the Nation observe Memorial Day as a day of prayer and fasting was splendidly responded to throughout the diocese. Many notable union services were held and in many cases churches were well filled with their own congregations. Trinity, New Haven, held a joint service for the whole city. In St. John's and Trinity Churches, Hartford, the congregations were fully as large as at Sunday services.

A Good Record—St. John's Church, Bridgeport, deserves great credit for its splendid record made in Sunday School mite box contributions during the Lenten season. By individual effort on the part of every member of the Sunday School the extraordinary total of $1,850.05 was contributed. How notable an achievement this will be the more readily seen in comparing records in other parts of the diocese. The Diocesan Banner which is awarded to that Sunday School making the best record in Lenten giving has for some time been won by Trinity Church, Hartford, or St. John's Church, Waterbury. These churches were close to their usual record with $570.25 for St. John's, Waterbury, and $700 for Trinity, Hartford. St. John's, Bridgeport, not only sets a new record for any Sunday School in the diocese, but clearly indicates a new epoch in Sunday school missionary giving.

W. T. Hooper.

MISSOURI

Missions Discussed—The diocese of Missouri provides by Canon that the second afternoon of every annual Convention shall be given over to the discussion of missionary matters. This year adjournment was taken from the cathedral to the beautiful suburb of Kirkwood. Here a splendid farm of twenty acres, beautifully situated, has been acquired for the conducting of a Country Home for Convalescent Women. The women of the Guild of Grace Church served delicious refreshments at the farm in the afternoon. In the evening a missionary rally was held at Grace Church. The Bishop Coadjutor presided. An address of delightful welcome was made by the rector, the Rev. Dr. Wilkins. Addresses outlining the plans and purposes of the home were made by Dr. Clarence H. Shutt, Hospital Commissioner, of St. Louis, and Thomas Q. Dix, Esq., of St. Philip's parish, St. Louis, a prominent insurance man of the city and secretary-treasurer of the home. It is hoped that twenty women may be admitted to the home in June. The cost of securing the twenty-acre farm and buildings has been about $20,000. H. D. Condie of St. Louis is president of the board of directors. The vice-president is Frank C. Thompson of Webster Groves.

Bishop's Reception—In connection with the Convention of the diocese a delightful reception was given by Bishop Tuttle and Mrs. White at the Bishop's house the opening night. On Memorial Day the President's proclamation was observed by a big service in which many parishes joined, held at the cathedral. Bishop Tuttle was the preacher. Services were held also in many of the parish churches.

Nurses' Home Opened—In connection with the annual meeting of the St. Luke's Hospital Association, the new Home for Nurses was formally opened. This has been built to connect with the hospital and is a beautiful and much-needed addition. The cost has been about $150,000. Its opening will set free many beds in the hospital in space formerly occupied as lodgings for the nurses of the training school. On the same evening the exercises in connection with the graduation of nurses were held. The Rev. George E. Norton, chaplain of the hospital, presided. Diplomas were presented to a class of twelve by the Bishop and an address was made by Dr. Arthur E. Bostwick, city librarian.

WESTERN MASSACHUSETTS

A Reception—A largely attended reception was recently held in Stockbridge in honor of the twenty-fifth anniversary in the ministry of the Rev. George Grenville Merrill. Under the direction of Mrs. Charles Evans, organist of St. Paul's Church for thirty-five years, a special musical program was given, after which the Senior Warden, Mr. James Punderson, presented in behalf of the congregation a handsome silver coffee pot and spoke most feelingly of Mr. Merrill's rectorship. After the reading of a congratulatory letter from Bishop Davies the Rev. Stephen Keeler of Pittsfield spoke in behalf of the clergy present.

On the following Sunday there was a special musical program in St. Paul's Church and in the chapel of the Good Shepherd, South Lee. Mr. Merrill read messages from his former churches.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Community Service—In accordance with the President's proclamation a notable Community Service of Humiliation and Prayer was held in St. Paul's Church, Concord, the Rev. W. Stanley Emery, vice-rector, on the evening of Memorial Day. This service was held at the request of the Ministers' Association and consisted of the Litany and Penitential Office with hymns, lessons, the reading of the President's proclamation, Lincoln's Gettysburg address, a list of Concord's wounded, prisoners and dead in the war and a sermon by the Rev. Archibald Black, a Congregationalist minister. There were also times of silence for thoughts of penitence and for thoughts of patriotism and for remembrance of Concord's representatives in the war. The ministers of the various congregations in the city were there with large numbers of their people.

Dr. Drury to Return—The Rev. Dr. S. S. Drury, rector of St. Paul's School, has been ill for several weeks and has been absent from the school, but it is expected that he will return to the school in the near future. At the Anniversary Day at St. Paul's School the names of fourteen old boys who had lost their lives in this war were read at Memorial Day exercises.

BUFFALO

Patriotic Service—All Buffalo parishes joined in the Memorial Day observance of our President's call and the service was held in St. Paul's Church at noon. The church was filled and the number of young men worshiping was striking. All of our rectors were in the processional. Dr. Jessup read the prayers, a large choir led the hymns and the Ven. H. J. Cody of Toronto brought us a greeting from the sister Church and neighboring province. His address was listened to intently. His hearers surely in their hearts responded to his first warm words of salutation—"My Brothers." Solemnly and eloquently the speaker drew the picture of Canada's willing sacrifice and ringingly he challenged us to stand fast to the end, cost what it may. "Better, a thousand times better, that we be obliterated than that we be subjected, but please God we shall not be obliterated, we shall not be subjected," said the Canon. And how earnestly and with what iteration he begged us to pray for our soldiers, our sailors, our aviators and—with a note of peculiar pathos in his voice—for our men taken prisoners.

Western New York Church School Convention—The writer has not attended a Church School conference for many years, but certainly this one was far and away the best within her observation; and those who have been working closely with the Board of Religious Education seemed of one mind that a high water mark had been reached at the Convention gathered in St. John's Church on May 28 and 29. St. John's, Grace and the Church of the Ascension united in entertaining the conference. The Rev. J. W. Denness Cooper, secretary of the board in our diocese, presided at all the sessions, and an excellently planned program was well carried through. The subjects chosen were big and vital and they were discussed in a big and vital way. There was a refreshing absence of insistence upon petty detail and rules and a strong reaching forth to grasp the basic principles.

At least two leaders in the discussions were selected from other communions and they made a distinct contribution to the Convention. When I said to an un-Anglican friend of mine that we were acknowledged to be well in the lead now in the work of our Board of Religious Education her look was so incredulous that I admitted it might be a case where the sickest many needed the "skilliest" doctor! But I did wish she had been in St. John's to hear the many good leaders prove my statement, and notably to listen to the Rev. Phillips E. Osgood unfold the Christian Nurture Series. Mr. Osgood gave the closing word and his address on the Spiritual Home Fires easily repaid those who had arranged the program and those who had come from far and near to attend the Convention. It carried a world of comfort as well as suggestion and stimulus.

LOS ANGELES

Dean MacCormack Honored by Parish—In honor of the tenth anniversary of the Very Rev. William MacCormack's assuming the rectorship of St. Paul's Pro-Cathedral, two affairs of interest occurred lately at the parish house on South Olive street. The first was a dinner given by the Men's Club. This was also ladies' night, and more than 100 guests were present.

Then followed a general reception by the parish, in the upper hall, which was beautifully decorated with roses and greenery. The program was presided over by A. C. Leigh, president of the Men's Club. D. Zelinsky was in charge of a musical program of excellence, including vocal, piano and violin solos. Several readings were given, and Mrs. Andrew Stewart Lobingier gave the address on behalf of all the organizations of the parish. The notable progress of the work of this parish was reviewed, and the broader fields in which St. Paul's has made its influence felt were touched upon, especially the patriotic efforts of the church and its rector. A feeling response was made by Dean MacCormack.

Back of the speakers' platform was a great American flag, with patriotic emblems at either side. Near the close of the program this flag was raised, and it disclosed a tableau with a soldier on one side, a Red Cross nurse on the other and the Goddess of Liberty in the centre. They presented an anniversary cake for Dean MacCormack. With appropriate remarks, Judge Finlayson delivered the cake to the dean; it was cut open, and inside it were miniature representatives of the people of the mission fields, in which St. Paul's parish is to have its own representative in the immediate future. This has long been the desire of Dean MacCormack, and with the little people of the cake was a letter setting forth that the finances of the parish are now in a condition to warrant providing for this field of mission work.

ERIE

Summer School—The Summer School for Sunday School Workers which has been under the direction of the Board of Religious Education of the Diocese of Erie for the past three years will be under the joint direction of the Boards of Religious Education of the Dioceses of Ohio, Pittsburgh, Erie, and the Province of Washington this year, and will become the official Summer School of these dioceses and province.

The Summer School will be held, as formerly, at Exposition Park, Conneaut Lake, Pennsylvania, from July 8 to 12. The program has been published, and excellent leaders have been secured for every department of Sunday School work.

English Church News

Clergy Combatant—The logic of facts has been a little too much for our consistency in the matter of the clergy undertaking combatant service. Many of our priests are doing it with a good conscience. There are others who are quite as prepared to risk their lives, but who hold that they are still bound by the ancient canons forbidding a priest to shed blood. A timely and scholarly article by Bishop Browne reminds us that this is really the case: he writes as an historian to say that the old canons are still in force. This is not the first time that this aged Bishop, now relieved of diocesan cares since he resigned the See of Bristol, has given us the results of his historical knowledge. He traces the whole history of the Canon, and gives his judgment that the declaration of the Archbishop of Canterbury, acting in accordance with the home episcopate, and with the King's advisers, does actually dispense the clergy from their obedience to the Canon.

Appointment of Bishops—The Church Times is well entitled to claim the credit of suggesting a practical way out of the difficulty which the recent appointment to Hereford has brought upon us, and it is a pity that the speakers at the meeting of the Church Reform League, held to consider the question, did not acknowledge this. The Prime Minister is to be asked to advise the Crown to appoint a small Commission of Churchmen to assist in the exercise of its ecclesiastical patronage. The Bishop of Oxford (Dr. Gore), who moved the resolution, had some useful things to say as to present tendencies to what he described as "ecclesiastical Bolshevism"—a general chorus of "scrap this!" It was a dangerous thing: authority might go altogether, and he wanted to avoid destructive revolution because it always led to reaction. In past ages the Church had had its warnings, which were only half-accepted, so that nothing was done. Three reforms were pressing, the revision of the Prayer-book, liberty of action, and the appointment of bishops. As to the first, he would like to shut up those concerned, like the body which elects the Pope, till they produced a residuum on which they were at one. The second, self-government, was the foundation of everything. As to the third, with which they were then dealing, he did not approve of Diocesan election. But the present system could not live. "If another appointment occurred in the immediate future similar to that recently made, it would bring the whole fabric of the concordat tumbling to the ground." Of course the audience cheered loudly at this reference. Dr. Gore did not know that Dr. Henson was listening to him, though it would have made no difference if he had. The remark had its sequel, as will be seen presently.

Personal Considerations—Dr. Gore was amusing on the historical precedent of King William III. While his Queen lived, she looked after the business. But William was a foreigner, hence the "Commission" of that day, which it was now proposed to revive. There must be no political basis; indeed, the present appointments are often free from it. He himself was nominated by the late Lord Salisbu though he was violently opposed to hi politically. And the Dean of Lincoln (D Fry), who is chairman of the Leagu claimed that the "Commission" must representative of the whole Church. T advice of personal friends of the Prir Minister would not do.

It was not asserted that the present sy tem was wholly bad. The Bishop of Lo don, who presided at the meeting, said th under any other system we should pro ably not have had Bishops Temple a Creighton—the latter indeed was wont say so. Mr. Gladstone, Lord Salisbu and Mr. Asquith had taken great trou to make suitable appointments. It wou have been interesting if the Bishop of Lo don could have been as autobiographical his brother of Oxford. We should ha liked to learn the story of the influenc which resulted in his own appointment. is curious also that no reference was ma to the notorious activity of Queen Victo in episcopal appointments, with which M Wells makes so much play in "The Soul a Bishop."

Painful Scene in Convocation—T sequel to Dr. Gore's statement took pla at one of the meetings of the Canterbu Convocation. He there brought up t same question as he had discussed at t Church Reform League on the previo evening. He wanted the question of t appointment of bishops to be referred to committee, which should consider t various proposals for giving more effectu expression to the mind of the Church. T present position was one of intoleral humiliation. The Church's officers mig be appointed by one who was her avow enemy. The system had indeed work well in the past, and he wished to spe with the utmost respect for the prese Prime Minister. But it was felt that th might not be a continuance of the sa type. This proposal brought the Bishop Hereford to his feet in great wrath. H could not believe that the Bishop of O ford was dealing with the question in t abstract. He referred to what he h heard Dr. Gore say at the meeting on t previous evening. The latter had to i tervene to explain that it was not the a pointment to Hereford in itself to whi he referred, but any appointment whi brought about the same degree of excit ment would precipitate a crisis. Dr. He son then made a violent attack on the pri ciple that Church people should have an thing to do with such appointments. T worst selections were invariably made them. He maintained that by the "Churc in this instance the E. C. U. was mea What did the opposition to his appointme to Hereford represent? Not the dioce itself, for he had been everywhere receiv with enthusiasm.

Convocation was startled at a type speech quite out of its experience. the relief of all, the Bishop of St. Asa (Dr. Edwards) proposed that the moti be put at once. He had never, he sa listened to a discussion less edifying. T Archbishop accordingly put it, and it w carried by 13 to 6. JAMES CAIRNS.

PETITION LEGISLATURE FOR NEW MARRIAGE LAWS

Easton Also Celebrates Two Anniversaries During Convention

EASTON, PENNSYLVANIA.—Celebrating the fiftieth anniversary of the founding of the Diocese and the thirty-first of the episcopate of Bishop Adams, the convention met at Christ Church, Easton, June 4 and 5 with a large attendance. The adoption of the plan of the Social Service Commission of the Church, for the first time, memorializing the Legislature for more stringent marriage and divorce laws, and a jubilee celebration of the anniversaries marked the progress of the work of the Church in the Diocese.

With his accustomed wit and genial nature, yet with vigor even at eighty-six years of age, Bishop Adams presided at every session and in his annual address gave an encouraging keynote of the work of the Church and a fervent appeal for a close pastoral oversight of the parishes in wartimes.

The laymen took a prominent part in the Convention proceedings. Mr. Henry Constable of Elkton introduced the resolution unanimously adopted pledging every clergyman in the Diocese to refuse to marry any runaway couple of immature years unless advised by the parents. Another resolution was unanimously adopted appointing a committee of one from each county of the Diocese to appear before the next Legislature and urge a better marriage and divorce law.

The report of Mr. Travers L. Ruark of Salisbury, chairman of the Pension Fund Committee for the Diocese, showed an encouraging condition. Plans were also discussed for increasing the salaries of the clergy in the Diocese.

All the officers of the Diocese were unanimously re-elected. The following were elected deputies to the Provincial Synod: the Rev. Messrs. George C. Sutton, J. D. Cummins, L. L. Williams and S. A. Potter, Messrs. William M. Cooper, F. L. Bonneville, S. E. Massey and Hopper Gibson. The next Convention will meet at Elkton.

Charged with memories and traditions covering the eastern shore of Maryland as comprised by the Diocese of Easton, a crowded church paid their homage to the history of the Diocese of Easton for fifty years and their respect and devotion to the Venerable Bishop, the Right Rev. William Forbes Adams, who for thirty-one years has been their diocesan. At the conclusion of the interesting addresses and reminiscences given by Judge James A. Pearce of Chestertown and the Rev. George Lay of Raleigh, North Carolina, a purse of approximately $300 in gold was presented to the Bishop by the laity of the convention.

Judge Pearce in a reminiscent yet inspiring manner traced the history of the diocese for fifty years, paying a tribute to those who had gone before and presenting the future as one of hopeful progress. The Rev. George Lay of Raleigh, North Carolina, son of the first bishop of the diocese, in a very interesting manner described the diocese as he remembered it.

As he concluded Bishop Adams stepped to the chancel steps to address the congregation, his voice trembling with emotion. He was halted by the Rev. Dr. Sutton and asked to withhold until Dr. Davies had spoken. Dr. Davies then presented the purse on behalf of the laity.

St. Stephen's College Commencement

ANNANDALE, NEW YORK.—Commencement was held this year in perfectly glorious June weather which brought out all the beauty of the well-wooded campus and the ivy-clad buildings. Notwithstanding war conditions and the smaller number of students, the attendance of friends, alumni and former students was considerable. The sermon in the morning of Commencement Sunday was preached by the Rev. Dr. Lawrence T. Cole, Rector of Trinity School, New York. The baccalaureate sermon in the afternoon was delivered by the Rev. Dr. Dickinson S. Miller, Professor of Christian Apologetics in the General Theological Seminary. At the later service the choir, under the direction of the Rev. Cuthbert Fowler, sang Gounod's "Gallia," in commiseration of sympathy with the people of France for whom this great work was written when the German army surrounded Paris fifty years ago.

On the evening of Tuesday a Special Memorial Service of thanksgiving for the life of the Rev. George Bailey Hopson, D.D., late Professor of Latin, was held. By this time many sons of St. Stephen's College had gathered on the campus as well as a large number of visitors. The service was brief. Psalm XV was sung, and special lessons were read by the Rev. Dr. F. W. Norris. Brief addresses were made by the Rev. Dr. W. C. Rodgers, president of the college; the Rev. Dr. F. W. Norris, an alumnus and trustee, and the Rt. Rev. Charles S. Burch, D.D., Suffragan Bishop of New York. On Wednesday, at 7:30 a. m., the Alumni Celebration of the Holy Communion took place, and at 11 a. m., after the usual academic procession and a brief service, the degree of Bachelor of Arts was conferred on Harold Beach Adams from the Diocese of Vermont; Frank Vaughan Anders, from Maryland; Leonard Wallace Steele, from Albany; Walter Raymond Whitmore, from Western Massachusetts.

The luncheon in Preston Hall closed the proceedings. A very large company was present, consisting of trustees, alumni, former students, undergraduates and their guests. The prizes were given and President Rodgers made an informal report of the past year, which was very satisfactory and included the statement that under the present excellent housekeeper the college would finish the financial year with hardly any deficit.

Commencement of St. Mary's School

RALEIGH, NORTH CAROLINA.—This famous old school has just held its seventy-sixth commencement. On Saturday night, June 1, the elocution department, or the Dramatic Club, presented "The Princess," by Tennyson. It was surprisingly well done. The baccalaureate sermon was preached in the school chapel on Sunday by the Rev. W. W. Meminger, rector of All Saints' Church, Atlanta. Monday morning the class-day exercises were held in the beautiful school grove; in the afternoon were the art and domestic science exhibits; and in the evening the annual musical concert. On Tuesday were held the graduating exercises.

COMMENCEMENT IS HELD AT BERKELEY SCHOOL

First Men Graduated Under the Administration of Dean Ladd

MIDDLETOWN, CONNECTICUT.—Unusual interest attached to the Commencement exercises at Berkeley this year, owing to the fact that they were the first under the administration of Dean Ladd. In spite of the war, a very large number of the alumni and others were in attendance. An innovation in the program was the special graduation exercises held at 3 o'clock on the afternoon of Tuesday, June 4. Certificates of graduation were bestowed by the Dean upon the eight seniors who have just completed their three years' course in the school, and upon one non-graduate of the class of 1912.

A feature of the service was the delivery of eight-minute extemporaneous addresses by three members of the graduating class—H. Daniels, R. L. Scofield, and L. W. Pitt. The prize for the best rendering of the church service was announced by the Dean as having been awarded to L. W. Pitt. The graduation address was given by the Rev. F. S. Luther, LL.D., president of Trinity College. Acting as president of the school, Bishop Brewster then conferred the degrees of Doctor of Divinity upon the Bishop of Pennsylvania (a former professor in the school), and the Suffragan Bishop of Connecticut, and of Bachelor of Divinity (in absentia) upon the Rev. Ralph Birdsall, of Cooperstown, New York, the Page Lecturer for 1918.

The Alumni Service was held at 5:30 and was presided over by the Rt. Rev. E. S. Lines, president of the Alumni Association. The sermon was preached by the Rev. E. H. Coley, D.D., Rector of Calvary Church, Utica, New York, of the class of 1887.

The Alumni dinner was held in Stueck's Modern Tavern, Bishop Lines presiding. Among those who spoke were: Bishop Brewster, Bishop Acheson, Bishop Rhinelander, the Rev. G. K. McNaught, '93; the Rev. C. O. Scoville, '90; the Rev. F. B. Barnett, '09, who had recently returned from a year's service as chaplain with the American forces in France; Professor D. S. Miller and L. W. Pitt for the graduating class.

The annual Alumni meeting took place the next morning at 9 o'clock, its chief item of interest being the passing of a resolution proposed by the Dean for a Joint Committee on Finance of the Alumni and Trustees. The nomination of the alumni members of the committee was entrusted to the President of the Alumni, Bishop Lines. The committee is expected to make a thorough examination and reorganization of the financial affairs of the school.

The sixty-fourth annual ordination service was held in Holy Trinity Church, at 11 o'clock in the morning, when Bishop Brewster, assisted by Bishops Acheson and Olmsted, ordained to the diaconate five candidates from the Diocese of Connecticut, four of them having graduated the previous day from Berkeley—Messrs. Edwards, Johns, Pitt, and Scofield, the fifth being Mr. H. S. Olafson, B.A., of Bridgeport, a graduate of the General Theological Seminary.

Church Unity and Church Efficiency

To the Editor of The Churchman:

Church unity and church efficiency are two questions that church people are thinking much about nowadays. I have a tentative proposal to lay before the readers of The Churchman that might do something to make unity more possible with some of our Protestant brethren and at the same time make for greater efficiency in the management of the church.

My proposal is that bishops should be elected as at present but to serve for a limited number of years, say ten years, at the end of which time another election should be held, the bishop being of course eligible for re-election. If he failed of re-election, he would still retain his seat in the House of Bishops but without a vote.

There would be three advantages in this plan to my mind.

(1) It would make for greater efficiency in the management of the diocese. Everyone knows that often a man who is a fine preacher or parish priest does not make a good bishop. Why keep a man permanently where he can not do his best work and who is not proving a good leader in the diocese? I believe that the Church would have grown in influence and numbers more rapidly in some places if it had been possible to make some change.

(2) This plan would make the Church more progressive. Churchmen of all types of churchmanship are saying that something is vitally wrong with the Church. In many respects the place of moral leadership and vision seems to have been taken by the labor movement. We have reached an age of change and reconstruction in the Church as well as in the State. The present organization of the House of Bishops makes it improbable that we shall find the necessary leadership there. It is too extremely conservative, too afraid of new ideas. As at present constituted, it is inevitable that a great many members of the House of Bishops are men who have passed beyond their creative age when they are open to new ideas. It does not mean that old men are never creative or progressive, for every one knows examples to the contrary, but in general this is true. A man is usually elected bishop when he is in his prime, but by the very nature of the case a great many of the bishops are beyond their prime. According to Stowe's Clerical Directory for 1917 there were last year five bishops over eighty years old, eighteen over seventy, and eighteen between sixty-five and seventy. This makes forty-one out of a total voting membership of one hundred and twelve. Among these older men some stand out conspicuously as leaders, but there is little danger that the Church would have lost their leadership under the proposed system as they would have no doubt been re-elected.

(3) This plan is democratic. It seems to me to be in harmony with the democratic spirit of the age. In the famous quadrilateral offered by the Lambeth Conference as a basis of reunion to our brethren of other communions one of the four things held to be necessary was the historic episcopate, adapted to local conditions or needs. If I understand the feelings of many of our Protestant brethren in this country towards the episcopate I think some such proposal would be more apt to gain their approval than our present system, which grew up in a monarchical age under very different conditions.

I know that at first it would be hard on a bishop who failed of re-election, but when this became very general it would not be so hard. Often the bishop himself would see that a younger man was needed to carry on the duties of the office. The bishop thus without a see might, if he cared to, become the rector of a parish. In many cases he would have reached the age when he would receive the benefit of the pension fund. He could be honored in some suitable way in the diocese so that the dignity of his office would be upheld and his labors would receive due respect and gratitude. He would no doubt often be called upon by a bishop in charge of a diocese to exercise episcopal functions, and this assistance would often be greatly needed, and might in some cases make unnecessary the election of a suffragan.

I shall be interested to know whether this plan gains the approval of others and should be glad if some one else would make a better proposal.

Presbyter Americanus.

Another View of Mr. Urban's Resignation

Abridged

To the Editor of The Churchman:

In an article in The Churchman of May 11, regarding Mr. Urban's resignation, the writer, the Rev. C. E. Hill, concluded with these words:

"What then is the offense of Mr. Urban? What indeed?"

The writer seems to have missed the real crux of the whole matter.

No one questions the unexceptionable character of Mr. Urban any more than they did that of Bishop Jones. What Mr. Urban and all of his class lack is not personal integrity but moral and spiritual vision.

Several hundred million people, in divers nations, speaking different languages and professing different faiths, see clearly that the present war differs from all former wars in being an essentially moral, righteous and even Christian conflict.

They are united in the conviction that the war does not spring from any conflict of intellectual opinions or even of political ideals. It is not a brawl in the dark nor a mere struggle of material forces, but a battle of ideals, a clash of spiritual forces, a call to hold up the great Christian ideals and maintain them at all costs lest our Christian civilization be lost.

Now in Mr. Urban we have a moral and religious leader, a man set to illumine and guide his people, and we find that the ideals which have inspired the nations to arm themselves against Germany inspire him not to arm but to sit still.

The call to "put down the mighty from their seat" and to "scatter the proud in the imagination of their hearts" awakes no echo in his soul. Is it not patent that for a time at least this man's usefulness is gone? One who, when blind, shoul discourse on the beauty of the Louvre Ga lery, a soul empty of harmony that shou seek to describe Debussy's Pelleas an Melisande, would be in no worse pligh than this man, deaf and blind to the splen did, the immortal inspirations of this wa should he attempt to lead his people any where but into a moral fog-bank. That ma be the only trouble with a man like M Urban, but, like Mercutio's wound, it enough.

Prohibition and Unfermented Wine

To the Editor of The Churchman:

With the increasing progress of prohibi tion thoughout this country the use of fe mented wine in the Holy Communion coming more and more before our peopl Sometimes it is impossible for a clergym to get any fermented on short notice an he is compelled to use unfermented wine forego the service. Only last week my su ply of wine was nearly exhausted and I w unable to get any from our local drug stor and was furthermore told they would unable to get fermented wire for tw months—having used their allotment for specified time. Now it is unlawful to get through the mail from any nearby town the State, and under these circumstanc what is a priest to do? Why, just what did, use unfermented wine. I have had do this occasionally in such emergency cas and have always found the service sat factory. Canons and Rubrics are silent the matter. Some bishops think it unlawf to use unfermented wine without permissi of General Convention, although I am to of others who do permit its use. Now the u of unfermented bread is quite general in t Church and that change was made witho action of General Convention. If we m use unfermented bread, why not unf mented wine?

The teaching in our public schools, general trend of public opinion, the attitu of our Government in regard to the Ar and Navy is against the use of ferment wine. Why should the priests of t Church in the holiest moments of worsl give to her people that which is being generally condemned. Why should a prie who would not tolerate fermented wine his own table, give it to his children at t Lord's Table? Some of the laity have e pressed a wish for a change and I am su it would be welcomed by many others.

OUTDOOR MYSTERY PLAY FEATURE OF GENEVA SCHOOL

Miss Lindley Will Prepare Trainers for Advent Call

NEW YORK CITY.—Miss Lindley is to each a course in preparation for The Advent Call, the war plan of the Woman's Auxiliary, at the summer conference to be held at Geneva, New York, from July 1 to 2, according to the final bulletin of the conference just issued. This course is primarily for diocesan trainers, but it will be open to any others who are interested. Another interesting course announced for the first time in this bulletin is the Junior clinic. His Star in the West, the Junior textbook by Miss Dorothy Giles, is to be tried out in a class presided over by Dr. Arthur J. Gray. Ten or twelve children will be invited to attend this class, and the first thirty minutes of the session will be devoted to telling them the stories contained in the book. Canon Elmendorf announces a class in War Time Ministeries of the Church, the purpose of which is to acquaint the student with diocesan, parochial and individual opportunities for war service. Social Justice in the Light of the War also promises to be of great interest. This course will be taught by the Rev. S. Glover Dunseath of Jersey City and is described as a "search for the definition and content of essential justice, studying schemes and organized plans for effecting and insuring the fullest and highest measure of justice for the units of society and society as a whole, before and in the light of the war." In the department of Religious Education are courses that will attract most attention are probably those by Miss Withers on the "New Junior Plan" and by Dr. Bradner on the first unit in Teacher Training, The Pupil.

A mystery play will again be presented out of doors under the trees on William Smith Campus. The play chosen is The Great Trail, and already the parts are assigned, and the younger members of the conference are learning their parts and in some cases rehearsing in the various cities where they live. There is only one week for rehearsal in Geneva, but last year this was sufficient to insure a remarkably smooth and reverent production of Conquering and Conquer.

Bishop Stearly is conference pastor and preacher at the Sunset Services and on Sunday. The Rev. Wallace E. Rollins of the Theological Seminary of Virginia will conduct the conference Bible class. His subject this year is Spiritual Studies in the Pauline Epistles of St. Paul.

A large number have already registered. All correspondence in regard to the conference should be addressed to the secretary, Miss M. J. Hobart, 381 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

KNIGHTS OF COLUMBUS MAKE GIFT TO RECTOR

WEST PITTSTON, PENNSYLVANIA.—On Tuesday night, May 23, a community service was arranged for the retiring rector, the Rev. J. A. Glasier of Trinity Church, West Pittston, and sixteen different organizations, religious and otherwise, were represented. The Y. M. C. A. loaned its hall. Judge O'Boyle, a county judge, presided, and Father Jordon of the Roman Catholic Church made one of the addresses. The Knights of Columbus presented Mr. Glasier with a silver table service in recognition of the many helpful ways by which the rector of Trinity Church had assisted them. A gold-headed cane and a purse of $250 were also given Mr. Glasier. The most representative people of the city joined in this unusual demonstration of esteem for a clergyman of the Church who had served the whole community so well. Nothing short of such a recognition seemed proper. Mr. Glasier left for Bethlehem on June 1 to take up the work of Trinity Church in that city.

NOON-DAY WAR PRAYERS

St. Paul's Church, Kansas City, Tolls Bell Each Day

KANSAS CITY, MISSOURI.—How the inauguration of the custom of tolling the church bells at noon impressed the people of this city is told as follows in the Kansas City Star:

A bell tolled at noon today at St. Paul's Episcopal Church, Fortieth and Main Streets. Persons on the streets nearby, children at their Saturday play, women in homes within hearing, men at their occupations, paused and bowed their heads. A moment later the echoes of the bell had died away and the heads were lifted and the children and women and men were again about their business. They had been praying silently for victory in the world war against despotism.

Each day the bell at St. Paul's will sound the call at the same hour. Each day those to whom the bell sounds familiarly will accord the same response. And each day the circle of prayer will widen, for more and more persons will hear and understand and turn from every other thing to silent supplication.

The brief prayer period is not only for those of St. Paul's Church, or even of any one denomination. It is for Americans all.

St. Paul's is the first church in Kansas City to take up the custom, which already is observed in several other large cities.

An Interesting Summer School

LYNCHBURG, VIRGINIA.—The Summer School of Religious Education of this place has secured a strong faculty and announces exceptionally attractive courses of study.

Lectures will be given on: The English Bible, by Dr. Berryman Green, Dean of the Virginia Theological Seminary; Social Service, by the Rev. Mr. Elmendorf of the Social Service Commission of the Diocese of Newark; The History and Interpretation of the Prayer Book, by the Rev. Dr. E. L. Goodwin, Editor of the Southern Churchman; Methods of Teaching, by the Rev. Dr. Mitman, Field Secretary of the Board of Religious Education of the Third Province, and Lecturer on Pedagogy in the Philadelphia Divinity School; Child Study, by Miss Helen Jennings, Superintendent of Elementary Grades, Trinity Church, Pottsville, Pennsylvania, known throughout the Church for her extraordinary gifts in this work.

In addition to the usual conferences for Sunday School teachers which will be led by men and women of large experience in teaching, a conference will be held every afternoon for leaders of mission study classes, conducted by Mrs. Geo. Winthrop Lee, Vice-President of the Woman's Auxiliary of the Diocese of Massachusetts, and formerly Instructor on Missions in the Normal School of Trinity Church, Boston.

Hawaiian Auxiliary Meets

HONOLULU, TERRITORY OF HAWAII.—At the sixteenth annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary held here recently an Iolani scholarship was established in memory of Mrs. Kawaihoa, an officer of the Auxiliary whose death occurred during the recent year. This action was taken at the suggestion of Mrs. Restarick and received a hearty response from all present. The secretary announced that the Junior Auxiliary of the Cathedral Hawaiian congregation was again the banner branch, having contributed $577.53 to missions, St. Andrew's Woman's Auxiliary coming second with $510.89 and St. Clement's third with $269.78. Over one hundred delegates from twenty branches were present at this meeting. The reports were encouraging. Interesting addresses were made.

Mite Boxes

Well now, since children, for the most part, love bright colors, would it not be well to have all the mite boxes made in bright colors? And, since children have a keen sense of rivalry, would it not be well to have the boxes in two bright colors—say red and blue—and send an equal number of each to each Sunday school? The superintendent could give half of each color to each class, which would result in having the whole school equally divided. This would cause a friendly competition in each class, and also between the two colors in the whole school. The satisfaction which this would give to the children and the increased offering which it would stimulate would more than make up for whatever additional cost the scheme would entail.

I should like to make one further suggestion. Where a clergyman has two or more schools, would it not be cheaper, instead of sending the boxes in two or more parcels to as many different addresses, to send them all in one parcel to the address where the clergyman lives? The parcels sent to the other addresses usually lie in the post office for weeks, and sometimes are never delivered at all.

sky-scrapers. Block after block of four-story buildings of another day hover together as if in defiance of the most modern of modern cities. In and out of their doorways goes merchandise to and from ships of the seven seas.

And all the while, set in their very midst, the most modern of buildings spells home to thousands of men from those same seas—a building fashioned by the wizards of present-day construction whose brains conceived the Grand Central Terminal.

In the spacious game rooms, one for officers and engineers, one for apprentices and one for seamen, the sailor may find pool and billiard tables, checkers, chess, shuffle-board and bagatelle. I shall not soon forget the sight of one of these rooms as I saw it not long since. Scattered around, busily at play, were a dozen dusky sons of India. There was about their clothing an amusing internationalism. Gaily colored turbans topped the heads, while very American overalls, and overcoats or sack coats of questionable nationality completed the outfit. They were part of a crew of sixty-one sailors from Calcutta whose ship had been rammed by one of its convoy and sunk—with their clothes. The Government had asked the Institute to put them up.

The war, as may be imagined from what I have said, has brought many experiences and changes to the Institute. It has brought also a sixteenth story to what was once the roof, where the Navigation and Marine Engineering School students—over a hundred of them at present—learn the mysteries for their important careers—careers so important now that Uncle Sam gives his heartiest recognition to this Institute school.

And it has brought letters and pictures bearing marks from the ports of all the seven seas to Mr. Howard O. Wood of the Institute. They come from the apprentice boys of the English merchant marine, to whom Mr. Wood is father and brother and everything else that is wholesome. All this is another story which I shall tell in these columns at a later day, but a line of it must go here.

The picture at the head of this article came to Mr. Wood on Christmas Eve, the best Christmas gift, he says, which he received. At different times through many years these two English lads had been at the Institute with Mr. Wood, but had never met. In a German prison camp at Brandenburg, as they swapped yarns of past adventures, there must have come a precious thrill when each discovered that the other belonged to the great family of the Institute, and claimed a common kinship with a certain Big Brother. So they did what sailors love to do—had their picture taken and sent it to Mr. Wood.

From such strange places run the heart lines of the men of the seas to the big red building on Coenties Slip.

BALTIMORE

Dedication at Camp Meade—The new chapel of the Epiphany at Camp Meade, to which reference was made in this column June 1, has now been completed, having been only sixty days in building. It was solemnly dedicated by Bishop Murray, assisted by Bishop Garland of Pennsylvania upon the third of June. A number of the clergy and a large congregation of military men and civilians were in attendance. Amongst these were the daughter of General Meade, for whom the cantonment is named, and his nephew, Major Meade, commander of the Remount Depot, which forms a part of Camp Meade. Bishop Murray and Brigadier General Nicholson in their addresses agreed that the chapel will be a great source of spiritual comfort and inspiration to the men in camp. In addition to the chapel itself there is a large dormitory in which some fifty men can be accommodated. Thus many visitors to the camp can be provided for over night or over Sunday. There is a staff of four clergy representing the three dioceses by which the work is sustained—the Rev. Messrs. James M. Magruder and S. Tagart Steele of Maryland, Stanley R. West of Pennsylvania, and William C. White of Washington, living together and working under the leadership of the Rev. Dr. James A. Montgomery of Philadelphia. The communion silver will be provided by the Daughters of the American Revolution.

WASHINGTON

Commencement Season—The numerous and beautiful exercises and services of the Commencement season of the National Cathedral School for Girls were held with no abatement in this war year, except in the simplification of the food hospitality provided, and in the omission of elaborate floral decorations. The senior dramatic in St. Hilda's Woodland Theatre, after dark on the evening of May 31, a charming and amusing fantasy, "The Maiden Over the Wall," by Bertram Bloch; the Flag Day exercises, Hon. John Barrett orator; the Baccalaureate and Commencement Services, Bishop Harding and the Rev. Dr. McKim being the speakers; each of these in its own special way touched deep notes and gave color and beauty to the occasion. Religion and patriotism, God and country, those were the cords that bound all in one. In the spirit and achievement of service, this was a notable year in the history of the school, work in behalf of food conservation, the Red Cross, war sufferers, the Liberty loans, the War Savings Stamps, in addition to the usual extensive labors for missions, have been very intelligent, continuous, and fruitful. There were twenty-nine honor students in the National Cathedral School this year; the chief honors in scholarship went to Louise Huntington Kondolf and Margaret Devereux Lippitt; in conduct to Edith de Bremond, Mary Skinner, Frances McLean and Fannie Grainger.

Free Pews

From Bishop Perry's Convention Address

"The spirit of democracy for which half the world is giving its life will soon bring the Church to judgment. It will find the spirit of the Church congenial. It will hear the message of the Church pronouncing in no uncertain terms the principles of human liberty and brotherhood. It will find at the same time, in certain parishes, practices which are altogether contrary to the Christian spirit, yet are adhered to for old associations' sake.

"The institution of rented pews had once a place in the order and economy of parish life. Today it is no longer defensible. The ownership of pews is intolerable. It is time for the Church to ask whether it can continue to buy and sell places of privilege in God's house, claimed by our Lord as the house of prayer for all people. I appreciate the legal complications involved and I offer no recommendation. I simply point to the fact, now at hand, when the few parishes in the land that still adhere to the traffic in pews will be required by the public conscience to break with the custom, or will themselves be relegated to the past."

Personals

THE REV. EDWARD S. TRAVERS, rector of Trinity Church, Pittsburgh, received the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity from the University of Pittsburgh at their commencement. His Alma Mater, Trinity College, Hartford, Connecticut, also conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon him on June 17.

THE REV. CHAS. H. POWELL, Postoffice Box 147, La Grande, Oregon, has been appointed secretary of the missionary district of Eastern Oregon, and should be addressed accordingly.

THE REV. JOS. EDMUND THOMPSON has resigned the rectorship of St. John's Church, Covington, Kentucky, and accepted a call to become rector of St. Timothy's Church, Ola, and Ascension Church, Burlington, Kansas. He will begin his duties about the middle of June.

THE REV. EDWIN K. BUTTOLPH is now locum tenens at Grace Church, Mt. Clemens, Michigan, and should be addressed at Grace Church rectory.

THE REV. WILLIAM FARRAND LIVINGSTON, for many years the efficient and faithful secretary of the Diocese of Maine, while making steady recovery from his recent severe illness, has requested release from some of his duties. The Diocesan Convention recently held in Bangor has therefore elected the Rev. Arthur Thomas Stray, for several years Mr. Livingston's assistant in the Convention, to succeed him as secretary. He should accordingly be addressed at The rectory, Auburn, Maine.

THE REV. S. H. RAINEY, hitherto rector of St. John's Church, Huntington, has accepted a call to the Diocese of Pittsburgh. He began his work there June 1.

THE REV. E. H. ECKEL was appointed by Governor Hobby to represent the State of Texas at the National Conference on Social Welfare in Kansas City, Missouri, but was unable to go because the date conflicted with that of the diocesan council.

THE SUMMER ADDRESS of the Rev. Roman Harding is: Chapel of the Intercession, Broadway and 155th Street, New York City.

THE REV. WALTER BRANKAM CAPERS, D.D., after fourteen years President of Columbia Institute, Columbia, Tennessee, has resigned to enter parochial work; and the Institute will open next fall under the care of the Rev. Charles Kenneth Thomson, now rector of St. Alban's Church, Evanston, Illinois.

THE REV. J. C. WETTERHOHN, a postulant of the Diocese of West Missouri, has been placed in charge of Holy Trinity, St. Joseph, and St. Oswald's, Mound City.

THE REV. EDWIN JARVIS RANDALL recently celebrated his twenty-fifth anniversary at St. Barnabas' Church, Chicago. This is Mr. Randall's first and only parish, he having served successively as lay-reader, deacon and priest-in-charge. He became the first rector upon the organization of St. Barnabas' Mission as a parish. Some two years ago a beautiful and commodious church was erected. Bishop Anderson preached the anniversary sermon.

DULUTH UNITED OFFERING BIRTHDAY PARTY HELD

DULUTH, MINNESOTA.—The Woman's Auxiliary branch of Trinity Cathedral, Duluth, has just completed its tenth year of "The Birthday Plan" of getting the United Offering. Each year the Woman's Auxiliary gives a "Birthday Party," generally in the nature of an afternoon gathering, with a big "Birthday Cake," surrounded by as many candles as the plan is "years of age." It may seem to some to be a childish way of doing things, but it brings the women out, and they hear some United Offering talks, renew their Blue Boxes (the contents of which are sent to the U. O. officer upon the date of their own birthdays), and enjoy a social hour.

This year a noonday luncheon was served, when sixty women were guests. A good program was given at the close, as the women sat about the tables, and after the program and the ceremony of "Cutting the Birthday Cake." Many new boxes were given out, and a reception followed in honor of Mrs. E. N. Couper, the wife of the new vicar of the Cathedral. Further plans are to be discussed at the Annual Diocesan Meeting on June 4.

St. Alban's School Closes

KNOXVILLE, ILLINOIS.—The twenty-seventh year of St. Alban's School came to a close the first of June. At 10 a short intercessory service was held in the chapel, and special prayers were said for the sixty boys who have enlisted. The Rev. J. M. D. Davidson, D.D., of Macomb, Illinois, gave the short patriotic address. The rector presented each of the three boys finishing their work with a pocket prayer book and gave the boys the blessing of the Church. They left on the following Tuesday for the Great Lakes Naval Training Station.

The more formal exercises were held in the gymnasium at 11. Dr. Leffingwell presented the diplomas and certificates to the members of the graduating class. The rector presented the prizes and the head master, Mr. Harry N. Russell, presented the certificates to the members of the graduating class of St. Columba, the Lower School. This class numbered eleven. The Rev. Harold L. Bowen, St. Paul's, Peoria, Illinois, addressed the school. Representatives from the faculties of Knox and Lombard Colleges were present to present their respective medals, the one for Latin and the other for Spanish.

The spirit of patriotism has been most intense all the year. The boys have given generously for the care of their French orphan and also to the Red Cross. They also have bought three fifty-dollar Liberty bonds and two one-hundred-dollar Liberty bonds for the school. They have conducted a most successful Thrift Stamp Drive, having brought into the school $600 worth of stamps.

The twenty-eighth year will begin on the sixteenth of September. On account of the great increase in the cost of living there will be a 20 per cent. increase in the rates for the duration of the war.

Missionaries Still Endure Hardships

NEW YORK CITY.—In a letter received recently at the Church Missions House from Bishop Colmore, he describes the hard times the Rev. and Mrs. William Wyllie of Santo Domingo are having as follows:

"I had a letter from Mrs. Wyllie on Monday in which she says that they have been unable to get any flour for two months and that there is no prospect of any for another thirty days. There is no meat, no potatoes, not even 'sweets,' and no milk. (The Wyllies have four children.) They have to forage on bicycles in the country for food, fruit or whatever provision is to be had."

DIOCESE SENDS GREETING TO ITS BISHOP IN FRANCE

GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN.—Routine business occupied the time of the Forty-fourth Annual Convention of the Diocese of Western Michigan which met in St. Mark's Pro-Cathedral, Grand Rapids, Michigan, June 11 and 12. The report of Bishop McCormick, in charge of the Red Cross Hospitals of our army in France, was read by the chairman.

A resolution offered by Dr. Charles Hooker and passed by a rising vote assured President Wilson of the Convention's unswerving loyalty, and another sent to Bishop McCormick contained affectionate greetings.

Elections resulted as follows: Standing Committee, the Rev. Messrs. L. R. Vercoe, W. J. Lockton, G. P. T. Sargent, F. O. Granniss, Dr. Charles E. Hooker, and Messrs. Jacob Kleinhans and Thomas Hume; Board of Missions the Rev. Messrs. Harold Holt, G. P. T. Sargent, B. F. P. Ivans, W. J. Lockton, and F. O. Granniss, and Messrs. H. C. Angell, R. H. Buckhout, C. R. Wilkes, W. Hatton, and Dr. Dennis Murray; Deputies to the Provincial Synod, the Rev. Messrs. L. R. Vercoe, W. J. Lockton, G. P. T. Sargent, J. E. Wilkinson, and Messrs Charles Hooker, C. L. Dibble, A. A. Anderson, and W. D. Marsh.

On the recommendation of the Rev. L. R. Vercoe the Convention voted that 1,000 copies of the new Soldiers' and Sailors' Prayer Books be published by the Church Literature Press to be sent to Bishop McCormick in France.

ADVERTISE YOUR WANTS IN THE CHURCHMAN

Our Contributors

Romney Reynolds, one of our regular contributors, has the fourth of his Sketches from Life this week, a vivid pen picture of a Minnesota Doctor.

Roger Daniels is the "publicity man" of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Winnefred Hitt, a New York writer, makes her first contribution to THE CHURCHMAN in this number, The Lifted Veil. Clara J. Denton, whose verses A Refuge appear in this issue, is a Los Angeles contributor.

The Rt. Rev. Arthur Selden Lloyd, D.D., President of the Board of Missions, as most Church people know, is just back from his journey to Liberia. "Our first definite impression with regard to Liberia was that every idea concerning the country or its people must be readjusted and as the days passed the impression grew until it became a conviction," said the Bishop in his report to the Board of Missions. In his article A People Come to Their Own, Bishop Lloyd tells THE CHURCHMAN readers some of the new ideas he has formed in regard to Liberians and their country.

The Prayer for the Allies is written by Bishop Brent. Dean Beekman sent it to THE CHURCHMAN with the following letter:

"I am enclosing a Prayer of Bishop Brent's which seems to some of us particularly good and we are using it almost every Sunday at the American Church of the Holy Trinity where we often see the Bishop."

OUR PLACE IN THE PRESENT CRISIS

From Bishop Darst's Convention Address

There has, perhaps, never been a period in the history of the world when the responsibility of leadership was greater than it is today. There has never been a period when the leader's opportunity was greater than it is now. Admitting this unquestioned fact, the opportunities and responsibilities before us and upon us as pastors and teachers, priests and prophets are wonderful and compelling. Great and mighty movements are sweeping by with bewildering swiftness; we will join with, and direct these movements toward God, or we will continue to sit in selfish isolation by the side of the road. The one way means the chance to grow, to develop, to share God's plans, to share God's power. The other way means the stagnation that comes to those who, safe in their sheltered exclusiveness, will not see that the stream of life is passing not through, but around them.

Back in the old easy days, indifference to your baptismal and confirmation vows was sinful; today, it is treasonable. God's Church is on the firing line; God's Son is in the war. We are either holding our part of the line or we are slackers. The cause for which we fight is a righteous cause. Victory has not come as yet, not b cause we fight against the purpose of G but because we are not ready for victo As citizens and as Churchmen, we mu come back to fundamental principles; must consecrate ourselves anew to His se ice. We must throw from our paths t ugly barrier of self that has kept so ma of us marking time down in the vall while the battle raged upon the hill. T call of Israel's great King comes as a rin ing personal appeal to the hearts and liv of men and women today. "Who, then, willing to consecrate his service this d unto the Lord?" The consecration must willing, it must be entire—all we have—we are—it must be now.

President Schurman of Cornell the oth day stated a few bald facts that so people have been trying pretty hard dodge.

"The time has arrived," he said, "wh costly entertainments should cease, wh gasolene, which is needed for milita operations, should in general be denied civilians for mere luxury motoring. T time has arrived when every man a woman who spend on themselves more th is absolutely necessary should be taboo as robbers of the public treasury.. T spendthrift of today is a traitor."

Church Going In Summer

PEOPLE are not in a mood this year to drop worship because they have gone into the country or to the seaside for the summer; they will feel the need perhaps as never before for going regularly to church. It has been remarked that church people who have been accustomed to go to the country at the first signs of approaching spring have lingered in town much longer this season than usual. Our city churches, which have usually taken on a depleted appearance during the first days of May, continue to be well filled in June.

Churchmen are not accustomed to drop the habit of worship when they leave their parish. They generally find their own church awaiting them with its services wherever they may go. People of other communions frequently remark about the fine loyalty of Episcopalians. It is good to believe this to be true. But we wonder if many of us are not likely to take too much for granted when we attend church away from home. After a winter overcrowded with work we think that we have earned immunity from responsibility. There is a welcome sense of relief in knowing that we are not liable to conscription in the affairs of the little community in which we spend our summers. It is good to feel that somebody else must carry the load and we settle back gratefully to live as guests.

We recall attending service one Sunday morning in an Episcopal church in a community crowded with hotels at many of which only the well-to-do could afford to stay. The congregation of the little church was largely composed of people who were spending upon their vacation pleasures from fifteen to twenty-five dollars a day. The rector of the church made an earnest appeal for the support of the church. There were no rented pews and the church was dependent upon the weekly offerings for its support. It is hard to see how this appeal could fail to touch the conscience of every person in the congregation, yet when the alms were presented there were only a few bills in the alms basin. These selfish or thoughtless people contributed dimes and quarters after enjoying the privilege of sharing the impressive service and hearing a virile, Christian message.

We say that they could not have been "good church-people." Undoubtedly they were not. But a good many of them would have been considered such at home. Somehow when they entered into the vacation mood they thought it proper morally to relax.

The lot of our clergy who are spending twelve months a year in rural communities is often cheerless. It is hard for the country church to make ends meet. The workers are few and often discouraged; so they look forward to the summer months for the help and good cheer that visitors can bring. Why not make the country parson feel that he, too, is our rector and his church as truly our home parish as is the city church on whose communicant list our names belong? We can lighten his load and enhearten him for his work. This is, after all, not merely our duty, it is our Christian privilege.

Fuel Saving In the Churches

THE Fuel Administrator is preparing the American people for some stern months of self-denial and perhaps of serious discomfiture and suffering. He invites us to a willing co-operation with the Government for the saving of fuel and he warns us that later under the duress of actual famine such conservation may become compulsory. The mines of the country are being pushed to the limit of their production. This year it is not a problem of transportation but one of labor. Every pound of coal is being mined and transported that available labor can effect, but the stupendous program of war industry to which America has committed herself demands coal and more coal, coal in quantities heretofore not conceived of even by an industrial nation like ours. Shipbuilding must go on, the implements and munitions of war must be manufactured, armies must be clothed, fed and transported. The civilians must do the saving, for the war machine cannot be stinted. Mr. Garfield issues an early warning. It may be that some of us basking under summer suns will not be in a mood to heed the warning. We shall refuse to worry.

But there is a winter ahead of us. Some of us know the suffering which the poor, the feeble and the sick were called upon to undergo last winter because of the lack of fuel. The Fuel Administrator has thrown out hints that things may be even worse during the coming year. Churches are beginning to fill their cellars with coal. They propose to keep warm during the coming winter. But why not meet the Government half way in its appeal for fuel conservation? There was some bitter protest last winter in some quarters because of the rather arbitrary rulings of local fuel administrators. The city of Washington had a touch of this autocracy. But it is reasonable to suppose that Government officials who have upon their shoulders the burden of keeping the nation warm as well as providing fuel to keep going the war machine will not be in a mood to look kindly upon the waste of coal involved in keeping open in some small town several sparsely filled churches when a decent measure of Christian fellowship could easily find a way out of this extravagance and waste.

We have no plan to propose, but we suggest that diocesan authorities enter into counsel with one another, before the coming of winter, to work out some plan whereby two or three Episcopal churches may during the winter months combine their services. Incidentally such a plan might alleviate the problem of the dearth of clergymen in which the war has involved us.

In small communities, where there is a group of churches of different communions, if the Christian as well as patriotic mood prevails doubtless some plan for getting together can be devised. It is none too early now to begin to act, for fuel is being purchased and stored in the cellars of our churches. By beginning early we can act with deliberation and so forestall Government pressure. We humbly commend this subject to the churches.

The Question of Health

WHILE Mayor Hylan of New York was playing the bull in the china shop with the Health Department of a city of six millions of people, it occurred to a good many citizens to ask whether the health of a nation should be left a prey to party politics. Mr. Hylan was reported as saying "While I am Mayor of this city, I will do as I please with the Health Department."

Of course he didn't and perhaps he couldn't, but he could do lamentable damage not only to the city of which he is the Mayor but to the whole nation, for New York is a port of entry into which pours a steady stream of immigrant peoples. Our democracy has never appeared to take its health so seriously as it has taken commerce and industry. England right along made the same mistake. The gravity of the mistake was revealed by the war statistics of the physically unfit. Even if all these human interests are to be reckoned in terms of dollars and cents, our medical experts have proved again and again how expensive it is to a nation to neglect the bodies of its citizens. Tuberculosis has cost the nation more than its wars.

The most effective agent for dealing with a nation's health is the national Government. Disease germs are interstate carriers. No village, town or state can regulate the activities of the organisms that produce disease.

A bungling, ignorant or vicious local official can be a menace to a whole nation. He ought not to be given the power to work such irreparable harm, as, for example, Mayor Hylan might have effected, had public opinion of a great community not forced him to change his mind.

Dr. Charles H. Mayo of Rochester in his inaugural address before the American Medical Association last year made, incidentally, the statement that our country should secure a medical cabinet officer in the near future.

One wonders why so excellent a suggestion has not been made before. Every city and state has its board of health. The health of more than one hundred million men, women and children is vital enough to the nation socially and economically to warrant the employment of a cabinet officer. It has seemed in the past that the really important matters that affect the life and happiness of the millions were not the matters that most concerned our American legislative bodies. Somebody else could be trusted to look after the essentials. Congress would do very well if it kept out of mischief and took care of the financial interest of its several clients. We have long ago left that rudimentary stage of national life. It is not infrequently we read that serious matters, serious to American family life, are discussed intelligently by members of Congress. Pension, river, harbor and tariff bills have been squeezed into smaller space and while not relegated to the background at least do not take all the time. We can conceive of a gifted medical officer, one like Dr. Mayo if he could sacrifice the time for this work, doing invaluable service to the nation. At the President's council table could sit a man who after the Department of Agriculture had talked about crops and the Postal Department about letters and the Treasurer about the mints, a disinterested man of science could claim a little time for the health of our people. But there is every reason for encouragement, for as a people we are moving fast towards a more humane view of government functions. The centre of interest is shifting from commerce to manhood.

THE WEEK

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

Thrift Week

IF thrift is not a Christian grace, like cleanliness it comes very near to being one. Among the spiritual by-products of the war, economy, if it gets to be a national trait, will be an asset of almost inestimable worth. It was good to hear one of our small storekeepers say the other day that his business, which has been dependent upon the pennies and five-cent pieces that our school children spend during recess for gum and candies, has been reduced much more than half. Thrift stamps having become a juvenile passion, sweetmeats have gone to the board. What an amount of money children can waste! What an amount of money can be squandered by parents in attempting to make children happy when they merely succeed in making them sluggish by pampering!

We hope that the thrift drive will be as intelligently and as enthusiastically conducted as was the recent Red Cross crusade. A little pamphlet lies on our desk issued by the National War Savings Committee containing suggestions for citizens of New York. The pamphlet is entitled "War Work at Home." Every American city and village is doubtless receiving the same instruction. The Committee directs us to search our homes, our attics and cellars, our store closets and yards, bureau drawers and cupboards for some score of articles which are of no use to the owner, but are of incalculable value to the Government just now. There must be no more throwing away of discarded rubbers, pieces of wearing apparel, papers and bits of metal and old linen. Every worn-out thing has a use. The Government knows what the use is.

We hope that this instruction in economy will be so popularized that every citizen will receive the message. Our rectors will not be departing far from the prescribed paths of moral leadership when they give hearty endorsement to every such lesson in thrift.

Speaking to Mexico

DURING recent years democracies have been learning that a free press does not automatically make for freedom. The press may be as free as air and sunshine and yet in effect be vicious and degenerative by obscuring the truth. Mr. Wilson's handling of Mexican publicity is a startling and significant move in American diplomacy. The thoughts and purpose of America have thus been interpreted by our best leadership to a neighboring people, who it is highly important should understand precisely what America means to do. There is another way that one nation may convey to another the aims of its national life. We have seen that means used heretofore in our relationship with Japan. Our most insidious and debasing vehicle of news has been permitted to carry on anti-Japanese propaganda for years. It has fanned the fire of jealousy and hatred; it has furthered the plans of German diplomacy by fostering ill will between two friendly nations whose trade routes lie on the Pacific. Little has been done to counteract this influence and to insist that the Japanese and American peoples understand each other. Mr. Wilson has spoken directly to the Mexican people. He has not permitted Mr. Hearst to be our spokesman. We hope that our President will also speak to the Japanese people. Mr. Hearst has heretofore had the floor pretty much to himself.

A free press without moral restraint can no more safeguard liberty than can free brigands. Truth alone makes for freedom.

The New Unwritten Law

FROM time to time we have seen and recorded glimmers of hope that America was outgrowing its taste for lynch law and might return to the honorable paths of a law-abiding people. Here and there the better opinion of the South has expressed its sense of shame over the horrible atrocities which race hatred has wreaked upon the Negro, but such opinion has not yet accumulated sufficient force to prevent the frequent recurrence of these outrages.

When the eleven men were placed on trial in Illinois for the lynching of Robert Paul Prager the event was hailed as a happy omen. But alas! a new unwritten law was invoked in behalf of the murderers and they were released. This is discouraging. We agree with the New York Evening Post that it is a disgrace and a scandal. The question arises how many more unwritten laws are likely in the course of time to enter into the procedure of our courts. It is an evil that grows by what it feeds on. For a nation that has been so tolerant of legal technicalities blocking the path of justice, we seem to be developing a generous patience with law of a free and easy variety. If a passionate public sympathy can bend the interpretation of the law to its desires we are in a bad way.

But we think it ought to be made clear that America's concern in this matter is entirely for her own self-respect. Germany has no grounds for complaint. She has made atrocities legal. With us, they are still considered by the great body of public opinion to be atrocities. We must keep our conscience keen to feel this, lest we be found imitating our enemies.

Free Pews

BISHOP PERRY and Bishop Rhinelander in their Convention addresses this year spoke with conviction on the subject of rented pews. Bishop Rhinelander in his strong appeal that "the Church make all things new" to meet the day that is at hand, laid it down as a first necessity the abandoning of the present pew system. Bishop Perry spoke even more emphatically:

"The institution of rented pews had once a place in the order and economy of parish life. Today it is no longer defensible. The ownership of pews is intolerable. It is time for the Church to ask whether it can continue to buy and sell places of privilege in God's house, claimed by our Lord as the house of prayer for all people. I appreciate the legal complications involved and I offer no recommendation. I simply point to the time, now at hand, when the few parishes of the land that still adhere to the traffic in pews will be required by the public conscience to break with the custom, or will themselves be relegated to the past."

Any one reading the signs of the times will not, as it seems to us, long remain in doubt that the present pew system in the Episcopal Church is doomed. We believe that Bishop Perry is on firm Christian ground when he says that it is no longer defensible.

Down the Centuries

IN Gilbert Murray's translation of Euripides's "The Trojan Women" are some lines which ring with a familiar meaning in the experience of many a nation these days:

"Had He not turned us in His hand, and thrust
Our high things low and shook our hills as dust,
We had not been this splendor, and our wrong
An everlasting music for the song
Of Earth and Heaven."

"We had not been this splendor!" Shall not every man's heart respond to that? He is truly a hardened soul in these days who is not asking great things of God.

The Soul of a French Sailor

ONE Sunday morning early in May a New York man was walking along upper Broadway and noticed a young French sailor standing alone on the corner of the street. He was a mere boy, not more than nineteen, and there was a homesick longing in his eyes. The man addressed the youth in French and asked him if he would not like to come to his home and have a cup of tea. He seemed overjoyed at hearing his own language, and accepted the invitation.

Upon learning that the sailor was a devout Catholic, from the upper coast of Brittany, the man prevailed upon his Irish cook to make a present of her rosary to the young man. The simple soul of the sailor was deeply touched by this act of kindness, and he proceeded to unbosom himself of all that was troubling him. He was homesick and very sad, for he had lately received the news that his beloved father had been killed in action on the French front. His host thereupon suggested that they attend mass together at the French Church of Notre Dame, which was only a few blocks away on Morningside Drive. The youth responded gladly to this suggestion.

As they knelt together, the sailor prayed with great intensity of devotion, with his head thrown back and his eyes uplifted, as if he were beholding his Divine Saviour in glory. Finally, as the older man turned to see if the youth were ready to go, he observed a great tear on the boyish cheek. As they were leaving the church, the sailor took the arm of his friend and exclaimed with a sigh, "Why couldn't they leave us alone? We were so happy!" —American Church Monthly.

From the Diary of a City Missionary

"AT the Morgue service this morning I am accompanied by two of my brethren of the staff. The crucifix and candlesticks recently provided by Mrs. ——— made the Burial Office solemn and impressive. The old keeper and the engineer were both present and their eager interest was much more than perfunctory. They kindly offered to see that these additions to our weekly service are properly cared for when not in use. We are to be congratulated upon being provided with these useful instruments of our weekly effort of devotion in behalf of the city's unknown and random dead. Where could it be more fitting to surround the office of the dead with such sacred dignity than here among those cast up by the surging tide of a big city? Today beneath the newly provided crucifix, receiving the soft light of the freshly lighted candles full in their silent faces, lay the bodies of three of the great city's typical unfortunates. One was that of a drowned man, wretchedly barefoot; another was entirely unknown, but human; and the third was that of a young colored woman, who lay upon her side as in sleep, just as she had been found upon a couch in a rough section of the city; poverty stricken and almost unclad she lay in her last sleep, and from her mouth and nostrils oozed a strange and ghastly foam as if from drugs. Beneath the cross with its divine Sufferer they lay, the light of its candles falling on their faces. May they rest in peace, poor souls, and in God's great mercy may light perpetual shine upon them!"

Fellowship and Evening Services

AS TOMMY SEES US, by the Rev. A. Herbert Gray, has as much wholesome and constructive criticism of the churches as we have found in any of the books that have been born from experiences at the front. One wonders whether if we applied ourselves to it, if we used more imagination and were less prim and starchy, we might not solve the problem of the dismal Sunday night service. The author of As Tommy Sees Us approaches the question from the angle of Christian fellowship:

In scores of churches in our cities there are evening services, attended by congregations numbering anything from twenty to two hundred. Is their value so very great? Is it not possible that the real work of Christ might be better done if at least occasionally they were turned into informal social gatherings, including perhaps an address from a layman or a minister, and finishing up with family prayers? We want more time for study circles and small fellowship meetings, so would not those Sunday evenings be well employed in such ways? Do we not have too many meetings altogether for platform talk, and too few for getting to know each other and helping each other?

The early Church was evidently poorly regulated from our point of view and very informal in many of its ways. But it was unquestionably a fellowship, so that souls who wanted friendship never failed to get it within the Church's borders.

The real life of many churches today lies more in Study Circles, meetings of Girls' Auxiliary, Bible Classes, Work Parties than in regular Sunday services, and that just for the reason that the element of fellowship enters into all these minor organizations. But the world inevitably judges us by our ordinary Church services, and it is from these that fellowship has been so largely excluded.

. . . . . .

We must get fellowship of a new intensity and a new gladness into our churches, if we are to do Christ's work.

Thinking in Terms of the Whole Race

THERE are indications that men are beginning to think in terms of the whole race. For instance, the announcement at base camps in the British Expeditionary Force, where there are huge aggregations of men, that a missionary subject will be presented, insures packed audiences of men who listen breathlessly to the last word. This is the record of a common experience and not a snap judgment from exceptional occasions. As a matter of fact one explanation of missionary apathy in the past is that men have not been educated in the school of necessity to think in terms of the race. Our American custom has been too much to think sectionally for three years, nationally for one and internationally only when compelled to do so. For the first time in history entire nations are beginning to think internationally. We have a great distance to travel yet before this becomes a universal and controlling habit of mind, but it has gone far enough to preclude the possibility of any democratic country's sinking back into habits of insularity. America is beginning to think and act internationally. She can no more cease from progressing in this direction than she can revert to colonial life. Our principles of government are so deeply set that our State Department is bound to be affected tremendously in all future handling of foreign affairs by a nation which in a first hand way is rapidly becoming interested in and acquainted with international affairs. The Society of Nations will be an impregnable guardian of peace only when or if the conduct of foreign affairs is as much and as intelligently democratized as the domestic departments of government. The purity and truthfulness of the daily press is in this connection of more vital importance than its freedom.

The Spirit of America

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

A FEW days ago the people of London were afforded the opportunity of giving a public welcome to a small army of American soldiers who marched through our streets to the sound of martial music and were reviewed and complimented by our King. These represented a greater army which, according to the official statement of the United States Secretary of War, has already landed over seven millions of its numbers upon the shores of France. So many astonishing things have happened in the past four years that perhaps the full significance of the fact thus evidenced has not yet been grasped by the general public in either of the countries thus linked in a common cause. Unless some wholly unforeseen reversal of tendencies takes place, what is thus made dramatically manifest amounts to this: For the first time in history and for all time to come the English-speaking races of the world have joined forces for the express purpose of securing that their own ideals of liberty and good government shall prevail throughout the earth. It has often been said that if America and Great Britain chose to make alliance they could give law to the rest of the world. Well, at last they have done it, and we shall see what we shall see. They have no wish to give law to the rest of the world, but if they can establish universal respect for law in place of international anarchy and reliance upon brutal might they will do all they have set out to do. Let us pray God that the present good understanding happily realized between the vast North American Republic and ourselves may never be dissolved. Upon it depends nothing less than the whole future of civilization.

And yet the wonder of it! The entry of America into the war is an event for which publicists have never prepared us in the past, a complete break with America's own tradition, and a step which can only mean in the long run the end of all old-world tyrannies and feudal survivals; for it is inconceivable that the strongest nation on earth and the richest in resources, a nation moreover consisting of a hundred million people trained in the freest of free institutions, should ever be content to withdraw from the work which it has taken in hand until humanity everywhere has come to share in the blessings itself enjoys. Americanism, in the noblest and fullest sense of that word, has invaded Europe; and it has come to stay. It will have Europe as itself soon or late; nothing can stop the process once begun. Kaiserism, Junkerism, militarism, and every other form of bondage for the souls and bodies of men must inevitably disappear before it in time. It may not be today nor tomorrow that our gladdened eyes behold this consummation. Races that have dwelt in slavery for ages cannot quickly become accustomed to the idea and atmosphere of freedom; they cannot envisage their lives in terms of it, do not readily understand what it involves, as is conspicuously the case in Russia today. But there can be no turning back. The goal of American effort, as President Wilson and all who thought with him very well knew when they decided upon this venture, is the complete emancipation of human society on earth from the hoary despotism and cruel hereditary caste systems which have cursed it for so long.

The stages of this development on the part of the American Commonwealth are well marked. Its first triumph was gained over us a hundred and forty years ago when the fathers of the Republic drafted the Constitution of the United States. They determined that on that one spot of earth at any rate men should be free and equal and entitled to liberty, justice, and the pursuit of happiness unimpeded by the exercise of any authority not of their own setting up. But the spirit in which they resisted British monarchy at that time, and laid the foundation of a democracy destined by and by to the august function of assimilating to itself all the other political societies of the world, they drew from British sources; it was and is ours. When the present writer was in America fifteen years ago he visited President Roosevelt at Oyster Bay and learned some things about American statesmanship which were pleasant to British ears. One observation of the President's he has not forgotten and is not likely to forget. Mr. Roosevelt declared that American democracy derived from two main lines of spiritual ancestry, English Puritanism and the French essayists of the eighteenth century. Of the two, he continued, the former had proved by far the more potent; it had supplied the deep and strong moral quality which distinguished Americanism from some other types of popular government. "Do not judge us too hastily by our methods of electioneering," he concluded, "or by the political corruption of which you hear so much in England and which you have only just outgrown yourselves. These things are after all only on the surface of our national life; when any great moral issue is defined the whole American people rise passionately to the full height of the demand it brings as was proved both in our own Civil War and in the Spanish-American War just ended."

That this was perfectly true we are relearning today. The springs of Americanism are to be sought in the old English Puritan passion for public righteousness which the Pilgrim Fathers carried with them to New England. The sons of the Pilgrim Fathers had to fight their British kinsfolk for its vindication; they have never drawn the sword for any other principle; today they are fighting with us to secure its triumph on the scale of the entire habitable globe.

We ought not to be surprised that it was only after long hesitation that American public opinion swung fully and finally to the side of the Allies in the present struggle. The issues were not so plainly seen there as here, and the decision to interfere in a European war was a tremendous departure from precedent. But it had to come; there was no room left in the world for both Prussianism and Americanism; and, despite all prejudices and new misunderstandings, American citizens realized that the cause of Britain and France was the cause of democracy from which they themselves could not in honor stand aside. As President Taft said recently, Britain and France had been fighting American battles as well as their own; now Americans have come to fight theirs. We forget the delay in our admiration of the stupendous effort they are making and the splendor of the achievements which already stand to their credit. A story is going the round of London which may or may not be true, but General Pershing is said to be telling it against himself. When the American Generalissimo first arrived in England a young lady motor driver was told off to drive him to the various camps and Government departments he had to visit. One morning she arrived with her car three minutes late and was admonished by General Pershing who was standing waiting for her, watch in hand. "Ah, well," replied the unabashed offender, "it is better to be three minutes late than three years late, anyway." General Pershing's comment upon this episode is said to be to the effect that he heard that English girls were not so ready-witted as their American sisters, but that he considered the former were quite smart enough for him.

After all, why should we have expected America to help us sooner? Would anyone before the war have ventured the prophecy that America would be in it at all or have reasonable ground for considering the cause of the Allies to be her cause? Events have sharpened her vision —and ours.

Grace Over Meat in Time of War

BLESS, O Lord, this provision of Thy bounty to our use, and us to Thy service; prosper the forces of our Country and of our Allies; bless our Soldiers and Sailors, and all who labor on their behalf; through Christ our Lord. Amen.

Sketches from Life. IV

By ROMNEY REYNOLDS

A Minnesota Doctor

DURING the first Fall which I spent in Minnesota I went to a convocation in Red Wing. Red Wing is a town among the hills on the Minnesota River, a picturesque situation with beautiful outlook. In the early days of the town three graduates of Hobart College decided to throw in their lot with its history—a clergyman named Edward Randolph Welles, and two physicians, Augustine Boyer Hawley and Charles Nathaniel Hewitt. The two physicians were, with a lawyer, Eli T. Wilder, the chief pillars of the parish of which Mr. Welles was the rector. Four strong and able men, they were typical of the young professional men who were coming in those days from the Northeastern States of our country to make the substantial citizenship of the great Northwest. They stood for old American traditions, education, refinement and character. They made Red Wing an enviable neighborhood, and they made of Christ Church one of the notable churches in a whole group of dioceses. With the vision which might have been expected of such men, a triangular plot of ground in the very centre of the town was secured, and a stone church, on good Gothic lines, was built. No one who entered Red Wing could fail to see Christ Church, and, seeing it, stop to marvel at its commanding situation and its reverent appeal.

With the limitations of Massachusetts still upon me I was frankly surprised to find in a community only a score or so of years older than myself a sense of history and a people's pride in its past. Mr. Wilder had become a judge, was recognized as the chief layman of the diocese, and for many sessions had been a leader in the General Convention. Dr. Hawley, who had studied medicine in Edinburgh and Paris, and who had given an affectionate ministry to the sick and suffering of Red Wing, had been dead eighteen years. Mr. Welles had become Bishop of Wisconsin; he, too, had been long dead. The remaining member of the distinguished group was Dr. Hewitt, of whom I wish especially to speak in this chapter.

Dr. Hewitt was my host on this my first visit to Red Wing. I knew by hearsay that he was full of interest and charm, but I was not prepared for the real man. In the late afternoon I went up to his gate. I found myself before a low wooden house among the trees. Instantly even the house bristled with individuality: it had what we strangely call atmosphere. With all its modesty and simplicity one knew that somebody who was somebody lived within it. It is more than twenty years ago that I made that visit. But I have still the vivid impression of the dining-room where a group of people, the nicest of the nice, sat down for dinner—a little early because the first service of the convocation was to be that night. There was the sparkle of friendliness and humor passing over the table, with now and again a brilliant, half-caustic flash from the host, which made me at least wish that convocations would never have opening sessions the first night, and that we might sit indefinitely at that feast of fast-flying talk, where eating was of little moment.

After the opening session of the convocation the men went into the library for more talk, which lasted far into the night. This room was the typical room in a house full of personality. Books were everywhere, and among the books at one end of the room were the pipes of an organ. The host told the story of the organ. He loved the music of the Church, and around this organ he had, on Sunday afternoons, gathered the boys of the town who could sing. He had taught them hymns and canticles—and good manners. He had scolded them, laughed at them, loved them. Christ Church, Red Wing, was a conservative parish, and it did not believe that boys should lead the music in the Church; but the day came at last when the boys in Dr. Hewitt's library were told that they might put on surplices, march into Christ Church, and sit in the choir. And then the whole parish knew what Dr. Hewitt had been doing through the Sunday afternoons of many years. I doubt if any choristers ever had such thorough preparation as these boys of Red Wing before their first appearance in a chancel. I have often thought that I should like to have seen Dr. Hewitt's face that first Sunday morning when his own boys sang the music of the service in the Church which he and his friends had built.

After all the years I can remember some of the things Dr. Hewitt said that November night. One of the guests in the house was an enthusiastic mountain climber, and described the perils from which, during the past Summer, he and some friends had narrowly escaped. I remember asking about a college friend who had lost his life in the mountains two years before. The same guest knew every detail of his exploit. It was a thrilling description, and we sat spellbound—all but Dr. Hewitt. He sat stiffly in his chair, a look half of pity, half of displeasure on his face. "Do you call that heroism?" he asked. "I call it waste of life. A man has no right to run such risks except for a worthy object—an object which helps someone, or pushes on some great cause." Arguments were brought up to plead for the spirit of adventure, the advance of scientific discovery, the inculcation of courage in a soft age—but he would have none of them. Life to him seemed so full of necessary perils that the strong man must save himself scrupulously for the inevitable crisis. He bit savagely into the subject; and the enthusiast for the mountains allowed the conversation to come down to the inhabited valleys.

Soon we were talking about sermons, and this was by Dr. Hewitt's own choice. He began to talk about preachers who ventilated their intellectual processes. "I trust my clergyman, " he said, "I want him to settle all his doubts and difficulties at home. When he stands up to preach his sermon I want him to give me the conclusions he has reached. I want to know what he believes." We smiled; for we suspected that if the trusted rector happened to hit upon conclusions which were not fairly in harmony with the conclusions which the vigorous and thoughtful doctor had reached in his library there would be a brisk asking of questions in front of the post office the next morning, and peppery argument interspersed with amusing flings, now at things too old, and again at things too new.

Dr. Hewitt had been at one time the chief executive officer of the State board of health. In a certain epidemic of smallpox he made it his task to see that every man, woman and child in Minnesota was vaccinated. He told us that night of his experience in visiting a monastery, the brethren of which had thus far refused to submit to the order of the board of health. Dr. Hewitt himself went to the monastery to see that every monk was vaccinated. He reached the remote building one bleak Winter evening after a long railway journey. He was admitted to a hall which was just a little colder than the world out of doors. He was told that in due time the abbot would see him. Cold and hungry, the doctor waited for more than an hour, expecting every moment that the tomb-like hall would open and he should be admitted again to life. When at length the door opened and a brother announced that the abbot would now see him Dr. Hewitt's temper was running high. He did not know exactly what he would say, but he was sure that such an abbot as this, who certainly knew of his waiting guest, should receive some punishment. The abbot received the physician with a dignity several degrees more frigid than the hall. He evidently wished to impress him with the folly and temerity of any interference of the State with Holy Church. This dignity of the abbot was quickly punctured by Dr. Hewitt, who took up the parable: "I want to tell you," he said, "that I am familiar with the rules of your order. The first rule is hospitality. You have grossly disobeyed it. You have kept me waiting in a cold hall for more than an hour." One could instinctively feel the collapse of the abbot as the story was told. Immediately the abbot apologized and begged forgiveness: there was no more effort to play Canossa. "Everything will be done to make you comfortable," said the abbot sweetly, "and tomorrow you will meet the brethren in the chapter and we shall confer about the object of your visit."

The next morning the doctor found himself in a large room with the monks seated about the walls, the abbot in his seat of authority. When all was ready the abbot announced, "One of the brethren will now read a paper which will convince you, Dr. Hewitt, that vaccination is not only useless, but wrong." First amazed, then indignant, the doctor gradually fell back upon the humor of the situation. Suddenly a thought came to him, and he smiled with great joy; for he saw that the monastery was delivered into his hand. The last part of the paper he did not hear. He was thinking of more cheerful things than smallpox. When the reader sat down there was a hum of approval, and all seemed satisfied that nothing could be said in reply. Dr. Hewitt waited a moment, and then rose calmly. "This has been very interesting," he said, "I, a physician, have listened to a paper about medicine written by a theologian. Now I propose to do for you what you have kindly done for me. I ask you, as theologians, to listen to me while I, a physician, speak to you on a grave matter of theology. There is one of your doctrines which I as physician know to be wholly impossible and I can prove it to you. I am sure that I can make clear to you its utter . . ." With that there was a shout from every corner of the room, "O doctor, vaccinate us!" From abbot to youngest brother, there was a throwing up sleeves, and arms were made ready for the officer of the State. The doctor, saying no more of theology, fell to work.

In course of time the migration from Northeastern America ceased, and a new migration began—from Northwestern Europe, especially Scandinavia. When members of the Church of Sweden entered Red Wing they found a dignified church with a well-ordered service, which seemed more like home than anything else in the new world. Thus new parishioners mingled among the old, and the foundations laid by four good men with generations of Americans behind them served for the happy superstructure in which Americans of a newer citizenship have shared.

Dr. Hewitt was the last of these founders to finish his work in this life. Eight years ago he joined his three friends; perhaps they together have sought out some celestial frontier which they can, by their presence and their deeds, make happier for men, who, through them, shall become joyfully eager to give worship to God.

Stoking at the Central Office

By ROGER DANIELS

THE central office of the Army and Navy department of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew is the home base for the secretaries in the camps and training stations. Here the results of their work in the camps are gathered together, not merely for statistical value, but for their real worth. The central office is not content with knowing the name, military address and home parish of a Churchman in the service. That is merely the beginning of the Brotherhood's work.

"We are organized for service to the men," says Frederick S. Titsworth, executive secretary. "And if we can help them in any way we want to do it. So far we have been able to fill every request that has been made of us. The Brotherhood has always kept before it a definite plan to inspire, encourage and stimulate the men in the service, not only to be upright themselves but also to accept responsibility for the other fellow. What our secretaries are doing in the camps by personal work the central office by correspondence is doing in the more remote training stations where we have no secretary, chaplain or clergy. When men are found our plan of prayer and service is put to them and when possible we put them in touch with our secretary or with the chaplain and clergy."

Another of the functions of the central office as the home base is to supply the subsistence for the secretaries in the field. Reports are made weekly by the secretaries and a resumé of the success of the various secretaries have made is incorporated in a weekly letter of help and encouragement which is sent out by Mr. Titsworth. One of the features of this letter is the weekly summary which gives a statistical report of all the work accomplished to date so that each secretary may know just what the Brotherhood is accomplishing.

But the central office is bigger and broader than statistical returns. It seeks to emulate the splendid efforts of the secretaries in the camps. And it is the personal touch with the men in the service which above all else, according to Mr. Titsworth, makes the central office a worthwhile institution. He says:

"The most interesting and absorbing part of the work of the central office is found in the individual personal touch through correspondence with the men. It is most gratifying to see the enthusiasm and real happiness which the boys express in letters on being made to realize their Church is behind them and is interested in them personally.

"One of the most interesting experiences which has come to my attention is that of a member of the Brotherhood stationed at a naval training camp who through correspondence was encouraged to live up to his Brotherhood vows. The central office has kept in close personal touch with this man and subsequent to our first formal acquaintance through correspondence he was sent to France as one of the crew on a naval tug. The Christian fortitude he displayed amidst unchristian surroundings was worth all it cost the Brotherhood to maintain its entire program. This fine sailor has been the means of hope and spiritual comfort to hundreds of his associates and on his return to this country he immediately stimulated the Church work in the port where he was located, reorganized the Brotherhood and interested many in bringing Christian hope as well as material comfort to the many sick sailors at the 'sick bay' (the naval hospital). It is altogether impossible to figure out the unlimited influence one man can and will exert if he is properly stimulated and inspired to do his full duty as a disciple of the Master."

The work of the Brotherhood centres about the individual. It aims to seek out the strong men of the company and squad. By personal interviews where there are Brotherhood secretaries and by personal letters where there are no secretaries it seeks to show to these strong men the need for clean speech and clean living. It aims to have these strong men take up the work among their fellows. In this way groups of personal workers are formed with the strong men at the head, or keymen as they are called in the Brotherhood plan. The names of these young men are turned over to the chaplain, commissioned or voluntary, wherever possible, and the young men are urged to attend the services of their own Church. Many of these young men are not members of our Church. But there is no proselytizing. The work of the Brotherhood is to spread Christ's Kingdom among men, especially young men. It realizes the bulwark of this work lies in the Church, so all its labors are to lead young men to the Church.

Insofar as the writer knows the central office of the Brotherhood holds a unique place among all agencies working for the material and spiritual welfare of the men in the service. It is the only agency which is keeping a personal touch through correspondence with thousands of earnest young Christians in the service. The Brotherhood has been able to put its secretaries only in the larger camps—but its hundreds of keymen are everywhere. These men who are striving and by God's help are living upright Christian lives are bringing God's word to the men about them in far distant out-of-the-way places where there is no chaplain, clergyman nor Y. M. C. A. worker. There is not a mail that does not bring letters from these men, from Cuba to the Philippines; France sends her quota; letters come from isolated logging camps where outposts are on guard, and from inaccessible coast defense forts. All this is the work of the central office.

Mr. Titsworth has been untiring in his efforts to build up a complete list of the Churchmen in the service. To index these names, to get in personal touch with these men is a work which occupies a large part of the central office staff.

"If the Church is to follow her men she must first of all know their names. For this purpose the registration at the central office has been started. This work is being done for the entire Church at the request of the War Commission. At the present time more than 37,000 names have been listed and correspondence encouraged with the men. Chaplains, the clergy and the Brotherhood secretaries are advised of the presence of Churchmen in their respective fields so that they may be looked up and extended a warm greeting in the name of the Church. Rectors are given news from camps of their parishioners and opportunity is thus made for the rector to link up the home church and the enlisted Churchmen. In not a few cases we have discovered that enlisted men claim to be connected with parishes to the delight and surprise of the rector in charge, who, prior to advice from this office, had no record of such men."

The letter which goes from the Brotherhood on receipt of information giving the military address of an enlisted Churchman extends him warm greetings in the name of the Church and the Brotherhood. With the letter is sent a copy of St. Andrew's Cross and the offer to send the magazine regularly free of charge. The letter also asks the man if there is anything else the Brotherhood can do for him.

These requests are many and varied. One company down on the Border had received a number of phonograph records but no phonograph. When the days passed by and no machine appeared the record pile took on the attributes of the proverbial white elephant. Then came a letter to the central office. A phonograph was on its way to the Border in short order.

A detachment of Marines came up from Cuba to Quantico in mid-Winter. The Marines were not prepared for the weather change. There came an urgent wire from the Brotherhood secretary. The next morning saw the Marines outfitted with sweaters and comfort kits.

Hundreds of Bishop White Prayer Books have been distributed to the men in the camps and New Testaments without number. The call for periodicals comes with each mail. As the central aim of the Brotherhood lies in prayer and service one might wonder how these requests can all be filled. The answer lies in the hearty cooperation of the Church and other agencies.

The phonograph was furnished through a Brotherhood man in Philadelphia to whom the request was passed on. When word came calling attention to the need of warm clothing for the Marines the central office despatched a telegram to the Red Cross headquarters in Virginia and the sweaters were sent post haste. The Brotherhood meets the call for Bishop White Prayer Books. Willing Churchmen and Churchwomen have volunteered to fill other special requests of various kinds. The Church Periodical Club has gladly supplied every request made upon it through the Brotherhood.

"On the job" expresses the activities of the Brotherhood's central office and the man who directs its work. Yet, underneath all the efficiency, underneath the "on the job" spirit which has met every request, there lies the strong spiritual note which Mr. Titsworth emphasizes as the whole strength of the Brotherhood's program.

"When war was declared last Spring I was full of a desire to do something, to throw myself into the work," says Mr. Titsworth. "But it was not until I came in touch with the Brotherhood of St. Andrew that I felt that call was for me. And why? Because it stands for the only thing in this world that is worth while—the spiritual Christian life."

The Lifted Veil

By WINNEFRED HITT

TO me my Beloved is more than a mother, more than a father, more than a good friend, more than riches, gold and silver. He is the One and the only One, to whom I cling with unflinching faith, and everlasting hope. I lay this down before, to let you know that it is Jesus Christ of whom I speak, what He is to me, and how many are the manifold blessings I have received by His great mercy and great love for the sinner that repenteth. To leave Him for any time, however small, is to me, as I feel it, slow death to the soul, which is felt undoubtedly through the physical being.

I will now describe how I see Jesus Christ through The Lifted Veil. His Personality came to me especially in the Holy Eucharist; of course, we know His presence is always there. But what if the Veil should be drawn from our eyes—Oh! wonderful vision, inspiring, lifting us far above the sordidness of this worldly world. We are enrapt! although we are surrounded by human life, yea, even the dead themselves, we see them not, we hear them not. Only before our eyes stands the wonderful vision: That great Personality, the Blessed hope in whom we have trusted now, and for ages past, Jesus Christ, the Son of God made man.

As the Veil has been drawn away, the first thing that strikes me is His childlike simplicity, His eagerness to find out what is in the hearts of men. He seems to ask this question: Do you love Me, as I love you? His very bearing denotes the sacrifice He has made. His awful purity which gives us that lifting up from the sordidness of the world. We are gazing at the Lamb, spotless innocence, yet knowing all—forgiving all; the manifold sins of mankind. He is the Great Lover, and verily I say the most greatly beloved indeed. We need hardly look back to call to remembrance the lives that have been given, that are now giving, and will be given, for His Dear Sake. But nothing is this, not even a speck, compared to the immeasurable love that He has given, and is continually giving.

I see Him as Hope, His gentle words to the listening soul: "Fear not, be steadfast, believe although the wolves would tear thee away from the fold. Come to me, seek me, I am always there, hidden from the rude eyes of the world, but there in reality to the childlike soul that loves me. Come to me as a child, ask of me as a child, love me as a child, follow me as a child. The wounds that seem so great, the cares that seem so many, the world that seems so hard, life that seems unbearable, all will melt away." Gaze steadfastly at His loving form, put your trust in Him, cast yourself at His precious feet, and ask His pardon. All is yours, my friend: "Peace, Love, Hope, Life. Above all, forgiveness, within The Lifted Veil."

A People Come To Their Own

By THE RT. REV. ARTHUR SELDEN LLOYD, D.D.

ON the west coast of Africa a drama is unfolding, silently and without observation, but when it is complete mankind will exclaim, Behold what God hath wrought. In His providence the God of heaven and earth permitted those who were strong to carry Africans to America and sell them into slavery. After years he put it into the heart of men who owned their bodies to send back to their own land a small company of these people in whom God had lighted that light which we call the love of liberty. These had been given no part in solving the problems which beset the establishment of free institutions in America. They had merely looked on while others labored, but they had dreamed of their beauty and longed for them. By what we call accident they were sent to the richest spot on the western coast of Africa; and, left to themselves in Liberia, they confronted the difficulties and dangers which had hitherto foiled those who had tried to possess themselves of that continent. In the face of obstacles which were all but insuperable, men who had been slaves set themselves to establish in Liberia a republic. A hundred years has not yet elapsed since the experiment was launched. Many obstacles have been overcome. Malicious influences which have combined to defeat the Liberians have so far been successfully combated. In a territory having a population of about two million, of whom less than fifty thousand are civilized, the Republic of Liberia which the first immigrants dreamed of is an established entity, as clearly defined as was our own country when its constitution was framed.

Liberia is by no means a state where irresponsible people are playing at government and trying to imitate the methods of white men. On the contrary, it is a land where serious and courageous men have devoted themselves to the task of establishing Christian civilization. This statement of fact should be constantly kept in mind, since perhaps the most dangerous, because most insidious obstacle that has confronted Liberia has been the good-natured cynicism with which the civilized world has looked on while she struggled—the matter of course fashion in which the nations have refused to take her seriously. All of us have taken what we heard for granted when men for their own purposes circulated slanders which left the impression that the case of Liberia was hopeless because her foundations were rotten. When men have talked of the inherent incompetency of Liberia's men we have all accepted it, no one taking the trouble to find out what was the truth. Meanwhile, refusing to be discouraged, and shutting their ears to calumny, the Liberians with splendid courage and real ability have labored patiently with the result that they have actually created a country in which a black man naturally, and as a matter of course, dependent upon no man and free to develop normally, bears a man's responsibility because his manhood is devoted to that which is his very own and sacred because it means liberty for him and his children.

No man may dare to prophesy, but it is safe to expect that when by God's help Liberia shall have passed safely through the present distress material development and general education attended by universal regard for law and order will be established throughout its borders. The whole world will see in operation that which until now the whole world has declared to be impossible. Black men will have established themselves under a free government administered by black men. Life and property will be secure. All men will have to confess that the African is a man like other men. The candle which has been lighted in Liberia will shine to the Cape. Meanwhile Liberia needs the friendship and counsel of a strong nation to show her how to meet her problems and to make her resources available. It goes without saying that America should be that friend.

But Liberia needs still more the help of the Church, not only that her character may be fixed, but that she may be made able to develop the uncivilized tribes within her borders. These constitute Liberia's richest asset, but she is not able unaided to make this asset available, and God seems to have seen fit to accord this high privilege to the American Church. The blessing not only to Liberia but to herself as the fruit of the help she has rendered in the past seems to be witness that the work the Church has done has been in accordance with His pleasure. The number of Liberians whom this Church has trained for service in their country is surprising, and the honorable record of these men is ground for reverent thanksgiving. In addition the Church has made large contribution towards developing the national conscience and toward keeping before the people's eyes the ideals upon which democracy will at last be built.

Yet however much Liberia needs and deserves help politically, she needs still more the assistance of the Church that the character of the civilized may be established; her standards fixed, and all her people made able to understand the value of Christian institutions. The most difficult and important task confronting her is that of assimilating the uncivilized tribes. These are all virile people and appreciate the profit that attends the security of life and property which civilized government assures them, but they need to be instructed that they may be able to share the responsibility of citizens of a free country; and to be taught the arts of civilization that they may help develop the country's abundant resources. Above all they must be instructed in the faith upon which all good citizenship depends. To accomplish this would test the strength of a people possessing all the appliances of our age, and rich in material resources. Unfortunately Liberia is weak in both. She has men and women capable of doing all that is required; indeed none but Liberians should do it if all the people are to be welded together into one. But the teachers must be made ready by those who already possess the strength which Christian development affords. Only Christians can bring this to them, and God seems to have conferred the privilege on the American Church. The work already done in Liberia by this Church has gained for us the confidence and goodwill of the uncivilized as well as the civilized people. A few white men and women properly equipped would have little difficulty in training enough Liberian leaders to establish the good work already begun. And when we remember that the planting of the mission in Liberia was the first practical expression of this Church's faith in the Mission committed to her, and how that first adventure tempted our fathers to plant those branches in the East which today are so vigorous and full of promise; gratitude to God for His favor should be enough to make us keen to finish in Liberia the work which remains to be done before that country can render to Africa the service which is easily within her reach.

During the past twenty-five years the Church in Liberia has been practically left to work out her own destiny. Now she is well established among the civilized and is ministering to the uncivilized tribes of her hinterland more generously than any diocese in the American Church is ministering to the Indians who may dwell within its borders. Nor should it be forgotten that anyone of these dioceses is stronger than the Church in Liberia. Her clergy are clean and devoted men. Her schools are good in spite of the Church's poverty. Her people are worthy and well instructed and considering their poverty are notably generous. In one town a man who occupies a high place in the state and whose time is devoted to important interests has at his own charges carried on continuously through twenty-five years a night school for boys and young men, and he has had the satisfaction of seeing not a few of these establish themselves as positive factors in society. This school has more than a hundred pupils.

Hitherto the help which the American Church has provided has been barely enough to keep the Church in Liberia alive. The time has come when the American Church is challenged to provide such help in men and money as will enable the Church in Liberia to fulfil her mission in Africa. There seems to be nothing to oppose this or prevent the desired end from being accomplished. The whole people, whether civilized or uncivilized, is kindly disposed towards the American Church on account of the service her men and women have rendered. The genius of the Church answers to the ideals of Liberia as to those of America, so that her help will be the more valuable in this, the formative period of the Republic. It was not accident which decreed that our own bill of rights and our constitution were the creation of Churchmen. The words of Henry Clay will be true for Liberia as for America: "Her institutions will be safe as long as she has the Book of Common Prayer and the Constitution."

Moreover the conditions attending the Church's mission in Liberia are unique. In every country not Christian the work for the enlightenment of mankind is carried on by sufferance. This work is regarded as negligible by the Government. It is tolerated so long as it advances and does not militate against the policies of the Government. It receives the Government's support and countenance when the Government's representative happens to be a man who understands the truth in which civilization rests. In Liberia, on the contrary, the Government's interests square exactly with the Church's purpose in establishing her mission, since that Government confronts the obligation to reduce to practical application the principles which the Church was sent to proclaim. All that the Church does for her own strengthening must add strength to the Republic. As she fixes Christian standards the Republic's problems will be more easily solved. The result is that, instead of working in the hope that some day those in authority will understand and accept the Revelation she interprets, the Church in Liberia has the opportunity to help a nation which has received Christianity to realize its ideals. In every other mission of the Church, her endeavor is to select and train individuals who may be made able to interpret the principle of life to people whose mode of thought rests in a different concept. In Liberia those who must lead the people have already the Church's point of view and need only to be shown how to apply principles which are already received; with the result that Liberia is ready to furnish competent evangelists and teachers in any number needed for the work, once these have received proper training. Reasonable help through a short term of years in skilled workers and equipment will enable Liberia to realize her aspirations, and schools and industrial training will remove the causes for most of the obstacles which remain in the way of her development.

Interesting as is the challenge to help Liberia in the fine fight she is making on her own behalf, one finds oneself regarding this almost as a detail, as one looks beyond and considers what it will mean to that continent when Africans see a nation expressing the highest human development created and administered by Africans. It happens that Liberia is surpassingly rich in material resources. As might be expected under such conditions, the uncivilized tribes who inhabit Liberia are virile, intelligent, and, though enveloped in the darkness which must prevail where men do not know the Father, are lovers of liberty. They are related in race and language to the strong peoples of Central Africa. Their contacts with these are natural and might easily be very near. The effect of what befalls Liberia will be immediately felt among the really great peoples in the interior of Africa. It is thrilling to think of the time when the institutions which Christianity makes possible shall be brought face to face with the institutions of Mohammedanism, where both are expressed in the life of the Africans. The misery which always attends Mohammedanism must disappear just as darkness yields to the light, once the people have seen the fruits of Christian living. Nor is it easy to conceive of any other means by which the cruelty of that system may be rationally met than by showing to the people who suffer under it the difference between human life bound by ignorance and superstition and the same life when it has been developed in the light of the Revelation which has illumined the world.

To make Liberia ready for this beautiful adventure is the privilege of the American Church. In spite of the solemn responsibility laid upon the Church to help our nation successfully meet its obligation to civilization she must not turn away from this almost romantic undertaking. Nor should it be delayed. When peace comes and small nations have their safety secured, and nations have at least gained the privilege of working out their own development unmolested, the Church should be seriously at work in Liberia helping that country to be ready for the new and larger tasks which will devolve upon her. The only thing that is needed, as men speak, is that she should take hold of the task generously and with a ready will to support the work. The bishop whom the Head of the Church will teach His Body to choose for Liberia should take with him to meet immediate needs at least as much money as the Church gave the first bishop she sent to Manila. The men and the women who must go with him to help and to guide the Liberian Church should be generously provided for. No undue apprehension need be felt on account of the health of these if proper provision is made to enable them to live in conditions that are not impossible. Liberia presents no menace to health which does not of necessity go with a tropical climate. Indeed it is free from many of the most dreaded forms of tropical disease. The impression we have received with regard to the deadliness of Liberia's climate is largely due to the ignorance of the Church which sacrificed her sons and daughters by not making proper provision for their welfare. Fit habitations and short terms of service will meet successfully the difficulties and dangers, and these may be readily provided for.

Prayer for the Allies

O GOD, Who hast appointed a day when the kingdoms of this world shall become the Kingdom of God and of His Christ, mightily move the Allied Nations that we may now and always chose Thy will as our will, Thy way as our way, Thy peace as our peace. So lock our fortunes to Thy purpose in these days of storm and battle that we may rise through courage to victory and, in abiding fellowship win for the world that freedom and peace which will enable all nations to bring their glory and honor into Thy Kingdom, through Him Who came to set men free, Jesus, our King. Amen.

A Refuge

By CLARA J. DENTON

WHICH love I more,
The mountains or the sea?
You ask of me.

When near the sea I stand
And hear the breakers' roar
And beat upon the shore,
As in defiance proud
Of all the firm-set land,
I mark each snowy crest,
And think, of all earth's charms
I love the ocean best.

But when beneath the mountain's ruggedness I wait
And life my eyes
In rapt surprise
To where they've stood so silently
Through ages long,
My heart awakes in happy song,
And for that time I love the mountains more.

Dear Largess of Nature,
Belittling all life's vanities,
Its bitter pain and tears,
Its pigmy hopes and fears,
While even ruthless war,
Rolls backward, backward far,
Until in God's white light of peace and love
I rest secure.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

CHURCH ADVERTISING NOW ESSENTIAL FOR SUCCESS

First Bulletin Is Issued by New Kansas Bureau

PITTSBURG, KANSAS.—Mr. Charles Haynes, advertising expert of the new Diocesan Bureau of Advertising and Publicity, has sent out to the clergymen of the diocese his first bulletin on church advertising. In part it follows:

The Episcopal Church has the greatest commodity in the world—spiritual satisfaction. To advertise this intangible, indescribable feeling that one has when he gets the real benefits of the service is a difficult task. First, we must convince our own Church people, and get them into the spirit of the movement—get them to realize that what they have others have not—that their Church is not for private, selfish worship, then the results will come.

The public is open to, and can easily be swayed by, advertising, but the advertising is merely an introduction; it simply creates a desire to know more, or raises curiosity, and that gets people into your church. When you get them into your church, then it is the time to open their eyes and touch their souls. The appeal to the intellect is the thing that gets results.

As a drop of water, followed by other drops, continually dropping wears away a stone, just so will publicity and advertising wear away the prejudice of the public for the Episcopal Church, and more and more people realize that the Church offers what they are seeking—Religious Truth, and, above all, Spiritual Satisfaction.

Spiritual Satisfaction is our product. Spiritual Satisfaction comes only with a whole-hearted belief; Spiritual Satisfaction comes with a true understanding of what you need, and a real way of getting it. Believe in our Church, believe in advertising, get your parish in the attitude of progress, and open the eyes of the public.

AMERICAN COMMITTEE IN DESPERATE NEED

Funds for Work in France Totally Exhausted by Drive

NEW YORK CITY.—The American Committee for Devastated France, 16 East Thirty-ninth Street, received the following cable on June 8, 1918:

June 5, France—War Zone.—In the field we are evacuating refugees, running dispensaries, feeding thousands of refugees at our rest stations. Army has called upon us to establish mobile canteens in six places.

We are also helping hospital work and furnishing supplies to American wounded. Paris depot clothing refugees as they pass through. Situation grave but everyone calm and confident with supreme faith in American support. Our American troops magnificent. Our bank account totally drained. We are moving with events but in desperate need of funds. American Red Cross heart and soul with us but their transportation greatly overburdened and we have advantage in having workers and motors already in war zone. Need for immediate financial assistance greater than ever. Vital we should be able to buy supplies wherever available and distribute immediately in this emergency. Our children's colony now moved out of war zone. This is one of the most important ends of our work and must be maintained at all costs. Cable even small sums without delay. Inform all families safety of every member carefully watched.

DIKE-MORGAN.

"No assistance that America can render at this moment can be more effectual than to help the men who are fighting for us to be sure that their helpless ones are being ministered to," said a bishop in New York last week.

CHAPLAIN ROLLINS GETS THE CROIX DE GUERRE

For Distinguished Bravery in the Battle of Seicheprey

MARBLEHEAD, MASSACHUSETTS.—The Rev. Lyman Rollins, chaplain of the 101st Infantry, rector of St. Michael's Church of this place, has been awarded the French war cross for distinguished bravery on the firing line. It is supposed that his services which merited this recognition were in connection with the battle of Seicheprey from April 18 to 20.

Mr. Rollins, both in France and also two years ago on the Mexican border, has been one of the notably effective chaplains, displaying a remarkable teaching power and possessing at the same time a strong and intimate influence with the men of the regiment. Both in Mexico and in France—as also in the cantonment here—he has maintained the most intimate co-operative relations with his fellow-chaplain of the 101st, the Rev. Michael O'Connor.

KILLED BY STRAY BULLET

Member of This Year's Class at General Seminary Loses Life

SCRANTON, PENNSYLVANIA.—As the result of a stray bullet, death came last week to Clayton J. Rutter of Bloomsburg, well known to the Episcopal clergy of this city, and the people of St. Luke's Church. He was to have been ordained deacon Friday of last week, and his death ends the promising career of an exceptionally bright young man. He was in charge of the Episcopal chapel at Glenburn, near Scranton, last summer.

Mr. Rutter was graduated a few weeks ago from the General Theological Seminary of New York. He was twenty-three years of age. He had been offered a charge at a salary far beyond his expectations, but in order to offer his services to his country, enlisted in the Naval Reserve Flying corps. He was awaiting a call for service.

The bullet entered the head at the left eye, ploughed through the brain and lodged near the base of the skull. He regained consciousness only for a short time, immediately after being removed to the hospital.

When you notify The Churchman of a change in your address, both the old and the new address should be given. Kindly write, if possible, two weeks before the change is to take effect.

WANTS MEDICAL MEN TO WORK FOR PROHIBITION

President of American Association Compares Drink Evil to Slavery

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.—The annual convention of the American Medical Association was held last week at the Auditorium. Dr. Arthur Dean Bevan of Chicago, who was installed as the new president of the association, made a plea for national prohibition.

"Each member of the medical profession," he said, "should take an active part in the propaganda against drink and secure national prohibition not years from now, but now, when it is so badly needed and will accomplish so much good, not only for our boys in khaki and in blue, but for the nation in arms. And when it has once been done away with, it could no more be resurrected after the war than could slavery.

"There can be no doubt of the injurious effects of alcoholic drinks on both the physical and mental well-being of our population. There can be no doubt that the greatest single factor we can control in the interest of the public health of the nation would be the elimination of alcoholic drink.

"I want to plead for the united action of the organized medical profession of the country to secure protection by law against the injury that drink is doing to our people, not as a political measure but as the most important public health measure that could be secured. In this crisis, when we and our allies are fighting not only for ourselves but also for humanity and civilization, we must organize the entire nation in the most efficient way possible, and this cannot be done without eliminating drink."

Dr. Bevan described Germany, the state of mind of the German Government and the German people. He compared it to a man suffering from the final stages of "a horrible disease, leading to insanity, with delusions of grandeur and magnificence." He urged doctors to refrain from dealing with German scientists after the war until Germany has purified itself.

RELIGIOUS CO-OPERATION

Episcopal Chaplain Arranges Quarters for Jewish Worker

CAMP BOWIE, FORT WORTH, TEXAS.—The field representative of the Jewish Welfare Board at Camp Bowie, Julius B. Gluck, now is established at his office at the Knights of Columbus hall.

Through the courtesy and at the invitation of Chaplain Earle of the Hundred and Thirty-second Field Artillery, Mr. Gluck now has living quarters in camp at the chaplain's quarters, Hundred and Thirty-second Field Artillery. The association of the Jewish worker with the chaplain and the K. of C. is an expression of the spirit of co-operation of all denominations in war work.

OUR WORK AMONG SEAMEN IN ONE SOUTHERN PORT

Harriott Pinckney Home Has Completed a Large Addition

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA. — The Harriott Pinckney Home for Seamen is a rare combination of the old work done by the Charleston Port Society, which maintained a home for seamen and supported a chaplain for many years, and a work growing out of the bequest of the daughter of General Charles Coatesworth Pinckney of Revolutionary fame.

She saw hundreds of seamen on the streets of Charleston from the windows of her home, which was near the water front, and she knew that the churches of the city were filled with people every Sunday, so she left it in her will that the money coming from a certain property should be used to build a "free church" for seamen and that a clergyman of the Episcopal Church should always be the rector of the church, which she named the Church of the Redeemer.

This general port society and the holders of this particular fund for seamen came together and built this beautiful home for seamen, and the church.

Shipping conditions have changed so much in the long time which has elapsed since Miss Pinckney's days that many people thought that the building of even a house which would accommodate twenty-five seamen was a waste of good money. But experience has shown that this home fills a real need.

Somehow the old idea of a seamen's home carried a sense of pauperism which kept seamen who really needed a good place to stay away from the homes—and a class of men who are ever in want and use any help offered seemed to hang about such places. But now, by having a home into which we invite men to come, and often bring them before ugly influences have led them to old haunts, we find that the seamen appreciate the comfort and respectability of a nice home.

This home has been so much used during the last two years that now we have just completed an addition with eighteen more rooms, with the certainty that those rooms will always be filled as these are.

Services are held every Sunday in the Church of the Redeemer, and the Home cares for its shifting family every day, and it is all done with the assurance that both are helping to keep up the self-respecting manliness of our men whose home is on the great deep.

UNIQUE RURAL SERVICE

Visiting Day for Many Neighboring Parishes a Great Success

HARRISBURG, PENNSYLVANIA.—On the fifth of this month a notable service was held at the old St. Gabriel's Church, Coles Creek. It was a country church service par excellence. It is about eighteen miles distant from Bloomsburg and a generation ago services were supplied there by the rector of St. Paul's, Bloomsburg. Within the past few years more regular services have been held there than had been the case for several years previous.

The minister in charge of Christ Church, Berwick, the Rev. M. H. Ake, has been holding services there with excellent effect. He arranged for a visiting day on which Church people in the neighboring parishes and missions were asked to be present. And they came from Bloomsburg, Berwick, Catawissa, Danville and Milton, by train and by automobile. The Bishop was present and the Archdeacon of Williamsport, the Rev. F. O. Musser, and the Rev. Messrs. Barlow, Fliedner and Bedell. The Holy Communion was celebrated by the Bishop, assisted by Messrs. Musser and Fliedner. Mr. Bedell preached the sermon. Eight adults were confirmed.

A luncheon was served on the lawn, at which time one other candidate was confirmed, who for some reason was belated for the earlier service. The time, place and service were redolent with the memory of the Rev. Mr. Rockwell, who was rector of this church for many years and for a part of the time was the local postmaster. This church is located in a grove of fine old trees, one of which is used as a bell tower.

TOO LATE IN DAY TO DEFEND RENTED PEWS

From the California Churchman and Church Messenger

It is too late in the day, and the principle for which we contend has been too generally recognized, for any one to defend rented pews as a perfectly proper way of securing support for the Ministrations of Christ's religion. The only justification for the system lies either in the position that a lot of people would not be contributors to the Church's funds in any other way, or that it is but right that people should have a selected place in Church where they may always sit, and so be the better able to enjoy the Service and Sermon than they otherwise could do.

Both of these positions are indefensible, if they are not, indeed, a sad commentary upon the utter denial of a Christian's obligations to God, and to his fellow men; and we have no doubt but that their claim has had much to do with the alienation of the masses, and so the growth of the sects, and lies at the root of the weakness of the Church among those who are not rich in this world's goods, who have been driven elsewhere to worship God. It is not complimentary to us to have it said that we are the Church of the rich, and favor the rich at the expense of the poor, and to have this matter of pew-rents made the proof of the allegation. And yet this is the result of a system so out of sympathy with God's Word and the Message of our Divine Lord.

We may well rejoice, then, that we have reached a point when 6,010 out of 6,808 of our Churches in the United States are "free and unappropriated," and that this ten per cent. of the appropriated pews largely represents the Churches of our earlier history whose pews were sold (think of it!) to the highest bidder a great many years ago, and whose heirs still claim to own them as of legal right.

WAR IS DISCUSSED AT THE NEBRASKA CONFERENCE

Every Mission in Western Nebraska Has Its Service Flag

HASTINGS, NEBRASKA.—The twenty-eighth annual Convocation of the missionary district of Western Nebraska opened here June 4 with a meeting of the house of Churchwomen at 10 o'clock at St. Mark's Church. There were about fifty visiting clergy and church society delegates in attendance and a most inspiring meeting was held.

The first day was taken up with short discussions of work throughout the district, followed by an address in the afternoon by Dean Budlong on "War Work and Church Work." Both local conditions and wider relationships of the Church to the great world struggle were exceedingly well set forth by the Dean.

A delightful reception was given by the Dean and Mrs. Budlong at the deanery, 747 North Lincoln Avenue, Tuesday evening. A large number of parishioners and friends of the parish were able in this way to meet the visiting delegates. The lawn was prettily lighted for the occasion.

Bishop Beecher delivered his annual address at the Wednesday morning session. Although this address necessarily dealt partly with circumstances throughout the district the Bishop also gave a clear discussion of the war situation.

A missionary rally was held on the first evening. The missionary clergy of Western Nebraska cover the ranch land surrounding their little parishes for hundreds of miles, ministering and holding services in homes and school houses. Trips are made in cars, on horseback or in rigs, sometimes traveling forty or fifty miles on the prairie in blizzard weather to hold services—real missionary work.

All through this district the people are enthusiastic workers; well attended women's meetings are held regularly at various ranch homes and Red Cross garments are being turned out in great quantities. Every mission has its service flag and, no matter how isolated from the centres of national life, these people are well informed on the war situation and are more than anxious to help in every way possible.

Elections and appointments were as follows:

Council of Advice—Clerical: The Rev. L. A. Arthur, Grand Island; the Rev. J. M. Bates, Red Cloud; the Very Rev. J. S. Budlong, Hastings; lay: Dr. E. A. Messervey, Kearney; Dr. J. T. Steele, Hastings; Dr. H. Hatfield, Grand Island; Raymond Tibbets, Hastings.

Chancellor, Hon. R. R. Horth, Grand Island; secretary, the Rev. Wm. Carson Shaw, Alliance; assistant secretary, the Rev. Henry Ives, Sidney.

Examining chaplains: the Rev. L. A. Arthur, the Rev. J. M. Bates, the Rev. Wm. C. Shaw, the Rev. W. W. Wells.

Delegates to the Provincial Synod: Clerical: The Rev. Wm. Carson Shaw, the Rev. Louis A. Arthur, the Rev. J. M. Bates, the Very Rev. Jay Scott Budlong; lay: Messrs. Fred Holsten, Hon. R. R. Horth, T. C. Patterson, Dr. E. A. Messervey, Judge Chambers.

CHURCH HYMNS ARE SUNG IN OJIBWA LANGUAGE

At N. A. Meeting in Convention with Duluth Convention

DULUTH, MINNESOTA.—The twenty-third annual Convention of the Diocese of Duluth was held in the Cathedral June 4 and 5.

In the Bishop's address he spoke forcibly on the war, its causes and history; and declared emphatically that the cause of right was sure to win.

In the course of the address, the Bishop said he would ask the Convention at the next annual meeting to elect a Bishop Coadjutor for this diocese. He stated that he would relinquish half of his present salary to be used toward paying the salary of the Bishop Coadjutor. The Convention acceded to the Bishop's request.

During the Convention the following Standing Committee was elected for the coming year: The Rev. A. W. Ryan, D.D., Duluth; the Rev. J. G. Ward, of Virginia; the Rev. E. S. Murphy, of Wadena, and the Rev. W. E. Harmann, of Duluth. The laymen elected were: W. E. Magner, F. W. Paine, Duluth; Jas. A. Brown, Fergus Falls; Thos. S. Wood, of Duluth. The Rev. J. G. Ward was re-elected secretary, and the Rev. J. S. Hedelund assistant secretary. The Bishop appointed as Deans of the Diocese, the Rev. W. E. Harmann, of Duluth Deanery; the Rev. T. C. Hudson, of Mississippi Deanery, and the Rev. S. J. Hedelund, of Red River Deanery.

A telegram was sent to President Wilson and Governor Burnquist, pledging support.

The annual meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held in Trinity Cathedral, June 4. In her annual address the president spoke of the growing importance of a United Offering, and asked that a definite attempt be made this coming year to introduce the "Blue Box" into every home in the diocese. She suggested that this accomplishment might be made as a kind of memorial of her twenty years' work here as president of the Auxiliary.

The afternoon meeting was devoted to the election of officers and a Round Table discussion in two sessions. The following officers were elected: President, Mrs. J. D. Morrison; vice-president, Mrs. M. F. Jamar; deanery vice-presidents, Duluth, Mrs. C. T. Fitzsimmons, Mrs. J. G. Ward; Mississippi Valley, Mrs. H. F. Parshall, Mrs. T. C. Hudson; Red River Valley, Mrs. W. B. Windsor, Mrs. D. Gallagher. Extension secretary, Mrs. G. E. Renison; recording secretary, Mrs. O. S. Kempton; corresponding secretary, Mrs. A. H. Brocklehurst; United Offering treasurer, Mrs. W. E. A. LeQuesne; secretary of Junior Auxiliary, Mrs. Neil B. Morrison; treasurer of Junior Auxiliary, Mrs. T. S. Wood; secretary of Little Helpers (appointed), Mrs. G. H. Miner; assistant secretary, Mrs. H. H. Quandt.

A special meeting for the Indian women attending the Convention was held Wednesday morning at St. Paul's Church. By means of an interpreter the president addressed the women, as did Mrs. LeQuesne, who has many reasons for being especially fond of the Indians, as a Sioux, many years ago, saved the life of her husband after finding him almost buried under snow and completely "snow blind." The Indian took him home to his tepee, put him in his own bed, fed him wisely, treated his eyes till well, and then putting him upon his own horse, took him to the fort.

One feature of the meeting was the singing of familiar church hymns in the Ojibwa language.

W. COLORADO CONVOCATION MEETS AT GRAND JUNCTION

Stirring Addresses Made at Dinner for Men

GRAND JUNCTION, COLORADO.—The Eleventh Annual Convocation of the Missionary District of Western Colorado met in St. Matthew's Church on May 24. The usual routine business was gotten through on the first day. The second day was devoted to conferences on Sunday School and other matters connected with the work of the Church in the district. On Friday evening the men of St. Matthew's Church entertained the clergy and male delegates at a dinner at the Hotel La Court, at which telling addresses were delivered by the mayor of the city, the Bishop, the Rev. C. Blodget, rector of Grace Church, Colorado Springs, Mr. Merle D. Vincent and others. At the same time the women delegates were entertained at a supper at the residence of Mrs. Easley, wife of the missionary in charge.

On Saturday afternoon a meeting of the Woman's Auxiliary was held, presided over by Mrs. Touret. In the evening the Bishop and his wife gave a reception to the members of Convocation and of the Woman's Auxiliary.

The sessions, which were the most enjoyable remembered by the writer during six years of work in the district, were closed with well attended and enthusiastic missionary service in the church, at which addresses were delivered by the Rev. H. Rice, of Durango; the Rev. P. Nelson, of Meeker, and the Rev. P. A. Easly, of Grand Junction.

The Bishop appointed the following as members of the Council of Advice: The Revs. W. B. Magnan, president; E. Johnson, secretary, and P. A. Easley. Lay members: Messrs. V. E. Northrop, Dr. G. R. Warner and E. Fordham. Examining chaplains: the Rev. W. B. Magnan, P. A. Easley and W. M. Ford. The Rev. Edwin Johnson was re-elected secretary and Mr. V. E. Northrop treasurer. During the year four new priests have been added to the working staff of the district, viz., the Rev. H. C. Rice to Durango and the adjacent missions, the Rev. P. A. Easley to Grand Junction, the Rev. W. M. Ford to Montrose and Olathe, and the Rev. H. D. Wilson to Delta and Paonia.

Spanish Pieces for Liberty

Even the Igorots of the Philippines are taking part in the Liberty Loans. Far up in the mountains of Luzon, in the neighborhood of the school where Deaconess Anne Hargreaves represents the American Church Mission, they dug up ancient Spanish pieces and other relics from the ground and brought them out of other hiding places peculiar to these mountain people, in order that they might do their bit for liberty.

NEW ARGUMENT ADVANCED AGAINST VESTRYWOMEN

Husbands Would Adopt Attitude of "Let Georgiana Do It"

DENVER, COLORADO.—Delegates to the Diocesan Council of Colorado began to gather on Tuesday, June 4, which was the day appointed for the meetings of the Woman's Auxiliary, and there was a strong representation, both lay and clerical, of the diocese when Wednesday's proceedings commenced.

Nearly all officers of the diocese were re-elected, including J. H. Pershing, chancellor; J. H. Bradbury, treasurer; the Rev. Messrs. H. S. Foster, A. N. Taft, H. M. Walters, and Messrs. Fairbanks, Hudston and Rattle on the Standing Committee. Trustees reappointed for the diocese were the Rev. Messrs. Thos. Casady, C. H. Shutt and Messrs. Peters, Hudston and J. M. Kennedy, Jr. The latter was elected secretary and the Rev. Jas. McLaughlin assistant secretary.

A lively discussion was started by the Rev. A. N. Taft, who advocated representation of women by delegates in the Council, quoting the Archbishop of Canterbury as favorable to female representation on vestries and Bishop Tuttle as supposedly of opinion that the word "laymen" used in this connection referred to order and not to sex. Mr. Taft was strongly supported by the Rev. Thos. Casady, but the general opinion seemed to be that if women delegates were permitted their husbands would adopt the attitude of letting "George do it" and one more opportunity for service would be closed to men.

Lots worth $2,500 were contributed by the diocese towards the purchase of the old Crittenden Girls' Home for the Church Convalescent Home, and the Bishop's speech suggested that 2,500 persons should contribute $1 a year for the support of the home, which has done splendid work.

Changes were made in the Canons to bring them into line with the General Canons setting the date of the end of the fiscal year December 31, and it was arranged that the date of the next Council should be left to the Bishop with the idea of setting it nearer the end of the year, probably about the first week in February.

A splendid report by Lucius Hallett on St. Luke's Hospital, claiming that no hospital could be self-supporting without certain necessary extensions which would be carried by the same overhead expenses, also showed that the endowment had been recently doubled by the legacy of $75,000 from the Rev. Dr. Hitchings. In Mr. Hallett's opinion 65 percent of the work of such a hospital ought to be able to be charitable.

The College of St. John the Evangelist has been partially revived by Canon Bonell at Greeley in a school for candidates for Holy Orders, with two men already in residence and two more to be taken, some being refused for various reasons.

An annual conference of Church workers of the Diocese of Colorado was suggested, to consist of members of the Woman's Guild and Auxiliary, King's Daughters, Girls' Friendly Society and so forth, to take up various matters of general Church interest.

PROBLEM OF SOLDIERS' SUNDAY NIGHT SOLVED

One Community Meets Difficulties Through Episcopal Churches

An interesting side-light on the sane leadership of the Episcopal Church in certain kinds of war work is revealed in the appreciation evident in the following story sent to the press by the War Camp Community Service, 1 Madison Avenue, New York City. Another story of this work appeared in these columns a few weeks ago.

New York City.—Scores of towns and cities of the United States have in the last year grappled with the problem of what to do on Sunday evenings for a great visiting population of soldiers and sailors. In many the difficulties were intensified by the Sunday ban on commercial amusements. This is the story of how one community combined Christian spirit with practical ingenuity and met the situation.

Charleston, South Carolina, saw in its streets on Sunday nights hundreds of men in the service of the nation who idled on the corners or wandered aimlessly in search of amusement. There were no moving pictures, no theatres. Public opinion long since had decreed that such places must be shut on the first day of the week. So nowhere could the uniformed men turn for the relaxation that meant to them the difference between a dismal and an enjoyable evening.

Agitation began for the opening of the theatres. It was proposed to have at least a vaudeville show for the soldiers and sailors. Public opinion still was opposed to Sunday amusements, but the pressure was strong. It looked as if Charleston must abandon its traditions, though bringing this to pass threatened to cause strife and bitterness.

Then it was the city solved its problem—solved it to the satisfaction of all concerned befittingly, and without rancor. With the aid of War Camp Community Service, the recognized agency under the War and Navy Department Commissions on Training Camp Activities for dealing with the welfare of uniformed men outside camps and training stations, a plan was worked out which violated none of the city's traditions but provided the relaxation craved by guests in khaki and blue.

Eight Episcopal churches united to hold a Sunday evening service in Artillery Hall, a building conveniently and centrally located. War Camp Community Service cooperated; and the result was the establishment of a fine and natural relation between the uniformed men and civilians, under well-nigh ideal circumstances.

These meetings have been going on for months. The program consists of music by a military or naval band, which plays outside the hall for twenty minutes; then within previous to and after the services. The services, which are very simple, include the singing of hymns, a short sermon, addresses by laymen and military and naval officers. Afterward there is a social gathering for enlisted men, their friends and others in attendance, at which light refreshments are served. These occasions are described as unusually delightful and pleasurable affairs.

While it is carefully concealed, elaborate machinery is needed to make these Sunday night meetings the success they are. In general charge is an executive committee of three clergymen, one of them an army chaplain. There is a central committee of women, made up of members from each church. A similar committee of women looks after refreshments. Girls from the churches assist the two committees. A committee of men, headed by the Chairman of the War Camp Community Service Committee, provides ushers for the religious services and hosts for the social hour. The arrangement enables the soldiers and sailors to meet under conditions peculiarly happy the best men and women of the community.

The Artillery Hall meetings have the active backing of the Army and Navy, the enthusiastic indorsement of the civil population, and the warm commendation of the enlisted men. Before these services were started, King Street (Charleston's principal thoroughfare) was alive with soldiers and sailors on Sunday nights. Now not a handful will be found loafing there. For Charleston, facing the apparent necessity of going counter to the sentiment which frowned on Sunday amusements, devised a highly efficacious substitute in keeping with the spirit of the day and of the city.

Our Foreign Churches

To the Editor of The Churchman:

As Chairman of the Commission on American Churches in Europe, I am constrained to draw the attention of your readers to the great need of sympathetic help, especially for Holy Trinity Church, Paris, and St. James' Church, Florence. Letters from Bishop Israel and the Rev. Mr. Wadleigh tell of the inevitable deficit in the receipts for the work of those parishes, unless an appeal is made to Americans who have enjoyed the privileges of those parishes when they were journeying abroad, to come to the rescue in this emergency. So many persons belonging to those parishes are no longer there, and so extensive has been the help given by our clergy and people in Paris and Florence, not only to refugees, but also to soldiers who attend the services (especially in Paris in large numbers), that with the utmost economy, cutting down all expenses, the vestries of these churches find themselves facing great difficulties.

The Commission on American Churches in Europe, at a meeting in January, appointed a committee to further the interests of these parishes, of which Mr. Francis Lynde Stetson, 15 Broad Street, New York City, is secretary.

No doubt many have read the letters of Bishop Israel and the appeal of the Rev. Mr. Wadleigh, both of which the Commission emphatically endorses, and prays that some contributions may be made in order that our work in their foreign lands may not come to naught. $15,000 is needed this year for the Church of the Holy Trinity, Paris, and at least $5,000 for St. James' Church, Florence. Are there not some who will gladly and generously respond?

Cortlandt Whitehead.

MISSION OFFERINGS SHOW DECREASE OF $46,559

June Meeting of Executive Committee of Unusual Interest

New York City.—The treasurer's report, read at the June meeting of the Executive Committee of the Board of Missions, showed a decrease in offerings of $46,559. This decrease can be traced almost entirely to falling off in parish offering, which may in turn be traced to the extra months in the fiscal year.

In the domestic field the resignations of Miss Frances M. Young as United Offering worker in Arizona, and Miss Myrtle Candill in Asheville, were accepted. The appointment of Miss Florence L. Everett as teacher in St. Elizabeth's School for Indians in South Dakota was approved. Arrangement was made for the continuance of the training in the Philadelphia Deaconess School for the year 1919 of Miss Virginia L. Page, Miss Helen N. DeHaven and Miss Elizabeth L. Haun.

In the Latin-American field, a loan of $3,000 from the $100,000 fund set aside from the Undesignated Legacies was granted the Bishop of Porto Rico to enable him to complete the second wing of the new buildings for St. Andrew's School at Mayaguez. In Brazil, arrangements were made to enable the Bishop to pay off all the indebtedness on the Southern Cross School at Porto Alegre. Miss Katharine P. Gass, stepdaughter of the Bishop of Mississippi, was appointed as missionary teacher in the Cathedral School at Havana, Cuba. The retirement of Miss E. H. McCollough, who has been a worker at Mayaguez, Porto Rico, since June, 1908, was accepted, and a suitable pension provided from the United Offering of the Woman's Auxiliary.

In the foreign field, an offer of the China Medical Board of $17,625 for the equipment and improvement of St. James' Hospital, Anking, was accepted with much appreciation. The China Medical Board also assured the Board of its readiness to appropriate $4,200 a year for five years for the salary of a physician, a stenographer, and toward the maintenance of the hospital. Dr. Harry B. Taylor was authorized to appeal for $10,000 to add to the amount granted by the China Medical Board to secure the necessary equipment for the hospital.

The Rev. T. M. Tong, one of the ablest of the younger clergy in the District of Shanghai, who has been in this country taking post-graduate work at the Philadelphia Divinity School to better equip himself for teaching in the theological department of St. John's University, expressed his desire, approved by Bishop Graves and urged by Dean Bartlett, to remain in this country another year. Permission was given and arrangement made to secure the services of Mr. Tong as speaker on behalf of the Board during the present summer.

The Bishop of Shanghai was authorized to sell certain property which is not now needed in Shanghai and to use the funds to establish permanently All Saints' Parish in that city.

THEOLOGICAL SCHOOL HOLDS ITS COMMENCEMENT

"Our Seminaries Are Gloriously Empty," Says Bishop Lawrence

CAMBRIDGE, MASSACHUSETTS.—Alumni Day at the Cambridge Theological School was observed on June 12. Bishop Jones was the appointed preacher, having been chosen by popular vote of the alumni a year ago. The Executive Committee of the Alumni Association, however, asked him to withdraw, and on his acceding to their request secured Bishop Lawrence as the preacher. At the business meeting before the service a resolution was introduced from the Rev. John Howard Melish, rector of Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, condemning the action of the Executive Committee in asking Bishop Jones to withdraw. This was strongly supported by various influential alumni, but the final action of the association was to endorse the action of the committee. Bishop Lawrence's sermon was informal and addressed primarily to his fellow-alumni as parish priests.

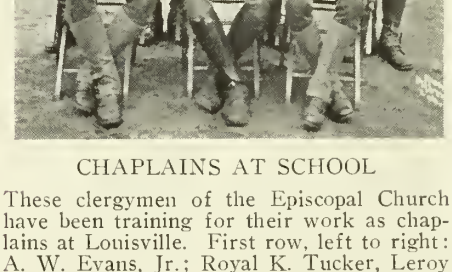
Speaking of his recent tour of the camps of the country, Bishop Lawrence said that he saw American Christianity represented there in three distinct ways: First, by the Roman Catholic Church through its religious ministrations in the K. of C. huts. It is most impressive. This Church has the great advantage of standing definitely, four-square, for certain religious facts,—the Mass, Confession, Absolution, Extreme Unction. Second, the Y. M. C. A. hut. So far as religion and the teaching of religion goes, here is a very different story. What the soldier gets there, religiously, is, to our way of thinking, vague and in no way continuously gripping. The Y. M. C. A., as an association of laymen, is admirable in its effective social work. But it is "entirely inadequate to lead men in worship, spiritual direction or Biblical instruction." Third, the work of our own Church. Small numbers at early services; seldom an officer present. Then, continuous personal, pastoral work throughout the day all over the camp. We have a clear contribution of our own to make. We must teach definite religious truth. This is quite as essential in our parishes as in our camps, though the crying need has been revealed in the camps and on the firing-line.

We've got to teach religion in different language. It must be made more vital and directly applicable to the life and problems of today and tomorrow. "I can't imagine our boys coming back and being interested in the exhortation, 'Dearly beloved brethren.'"

Finally, the ministry and its recruiting. "Our seminaries are gloriously empty." We would not have it otherwise today. Our best hope for the future is to watch, chiefly through the chaplains, individual men of the Army and Navy who show some of the spirit necessary for the ministry. Those of them who live to get home we will want to fill up the ranks in the Church's ministry. It will be a risk. They will jolt some of us out of long and deep ruts. But we must take the risk and be ready, too, for both new spirit and new methods in the days to come. "These are the days of great adventure." And these are the days for each one of us to reconsecrate himself to higher ideals and nobler visions.

At the annual dinner in the school refectory Dean Robbins of New York presided. Bishop Lawrence, in a short speech after dinner, spoke of Bishop Jones in the highest and most affectionate terms, commending his fine spirit throughout the trying days of his publicity, his admirable attitude in the House of Bishops and his devotion to the Church's work. A resolution was unanimously adopted assuring Bishop Jones of the high regard and cordial feeling of his fellow-alumni for him.

The Rev. Henry Bradford Washburn, Professor of Ecclesiastical History and Executive Secretary of the Church War Commission, made the principal speech of the evening,—a thrilling presentation of the Church's work and opportunities in war. Professor Washburn had conferred on him the next day the school's degree of Doctor of Divinity,—the first member of the faculty to be so honored by his own school.



CHAPLAINS AT SCHOOL

These clergymen of the Episcopal Church have been training for their work as chaplains at Louisville. First row, left to right: A. W. Evans, Jr.; Royal K. Tucker, Leroy W. Doud; second row: D. T. Gillmor, W. L. Kinsolving, J. B. McCormick, J. P. Anschutz.

At Commencement, the following day, Dean Fosbroke of the General Seminary was the preacher. He stressed the sacredness and supreme importance of the individual soul. As to the Church's "failure" of which we have heard much in these days of war,—her failure is not in her principles, but in her application. "She has failed to make that Faith live intensively in the lives of individual men and women."

In addition to the degree of Doctor of Divinity conferred upon Professor Washburn, the following men of the Senior Class were given the degree of Bachelor of Divinity: Percy T. Fenn, who will become assistant at the Church of the Good Shepherd, Brooklyn, New York; Albert N. Gilbertson, who goes to St. Luke's, Malden, as priest-in-charge; Paul M. Huntington, assistant at St. Paul's Cathedral, Boston; Alfred S. Priddis, in charge this summer at the Seaside Chapel, North Scituate Beach; Robert G. Rogers, who goes to the Diocese of Long Island, and Frank T. Weil, who will become curate at Grace Church, New Bedford, Massachusetts. Mr. Priddis and Mr. Gilbertson were awarded their degrees "with distinction."

KOSSOVO ANNIVERSARY OBSERVED AT CATHEDRAL

Brilliant Service Marks Day of Hope for Slavic Peoples

NEW YORK CITY.—The past disasters and prospective resurrection of the Serbian people were commemorated Sunday afternoon at the Cathedral of St. John the Divine on the anniversary of Kossovo Day, the date when the mediaeval Serbian Empire was overthrown by the Turks. There was a special service for the Serbs, their kinsmen of the other Southern Slav races, and other oppressed nations now looking forward to deliverance as a result of the war.

Clergy of the Episcopal, Presbyterian, Serbian, and Russian Churches took part in the service; Serbian war veterans, French, British, and Italian officers and a detachment of American troops were present, and the sermons, delivered by the Very Rev. Howard C. Robbins, Dean of the Cathedral, and the Very Rev. J. Krapnovitch of the Serbian Church from Johnstown, Penn., dwelt upon the long subjection of the Serbian people to the Turk, the brief liberation of part of them in recent years, and the second flood of conquering barbarism from Germany, Austria-Hungary, and Bulgaria, which again overwhelmed the nation.

But this year Kossovo Day was celebrated as a festival of rejoicing, for the union of the Allies, and particularly the recently expressed sympathy of the United States and the other Allies for the demand of the other Jugo-slav races for union with Serbia in an independent kingdom, has convinced the Serbians that the day of liberation of the whole people is at hand.

The Cathedral was crowded Sunday afternoon when at 4 o'clock, the hour set for the beginning of the service, a detachment of American soldiers from General Hospital 1, headed by a colorbearer, entered the edifice and advanced to front of the congregation. They were followed by a body of men from the Jugo-slav Sokol societies, in khaki uniform with red shirts, and headed by a Serbian flag.

Dr. Michaelovitch and various members of the staff of the Serbian Ministry, with the officers of the American and allied armies, a group of Serbian veterans of the Balkan campaigns of 1914-1917 in uniform, and members of the Kossovo Day Committee sat beside the troops in the front of the congregation. As the processional hymn, "Onward, Christian Soldiers," was sung, the officiating clergy entered: Dr. Robbins and the other cathedral clergy, the Rev. Dr. Lubeck of the Church of Zion and St. Timothy, the Very Rev. Mr. Krajnovitch, the Rev. Dr. Peter J. Popoff, acting dean of the Russian Cathedral of St. Nicholas, accompanied by the Rev. Father Nicholas of that church, the Rev. H. G. Mendenhall, Moderator of the Presbyterian Assembly, and the Rev. Dr. William P. Merrill, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church.

Dr. Mendenhall read the first lesson and Dr. Burrill the second, and Dr. Lubeck also took part in the service. In the prayers read by Canon Robert Ellis Jones of the Cathedral, besides the usual mention of the President of the United States and the heads of the other allied Governments, as well as the armed forces of the United States and its allies, there were special prayers for King Peter of Serbia, King Nicholas of Montenegro, for the Serbian soldiers who have fallen in battle, for the sick and wounded, and for the Serbian people.

In his sermon Dean Robbins said:

"But Israel proved, and Serbia also proves, that there is something in the world stronger than brute force—that indestructible thing, the spirit of a nation that remembers. At Kossovo Serbia stood in the face of the Turks, between the Turk and Europe. She fell, but the Turk suffered so heavily that Europe had a breathing space and time to prepare. What Belgium did in the first month of this war Serbia did on the field of Kossovo.

"But we should not be gathered here in an American cathedral to celebrate the anniversary if this were all. Within the last three years history has repeated itself. This time it was our enemy as well as hers to which Serbia offered heroic resistance; it was our freedom as well as hers which was menaced by the foe. Serbia did what Belgium did, she has suffered all that Belgium has suffered. Let us see to it that we demand for Serbia at the conclusion of this war all that we demand with so good a right for Belgium."

NURSES IN ANNUAL COUNCIL

War Work of St. Barnabas' Guild Shown in National Meeting

NEW YORK CITY.—The Annual Council of the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses was held in this city on Wednesday, June 12, in St. Stephen's Church. There was an excellent representation of delegates and members from the Boston, Hartford, Lawrence, Orange, Philadelphia, Providence, San Francisco and other branches.

Reports from the Secretary-General, the Chaplain-General, the Executive Committee, and the War Secretary showed how the Guild is organizing to reach the U. S. Nurses at the camps near the various branches and also to keep in touch with all members who are abroad. The Chaplain-General, Bishop Burch, commented on the effect of the war upon the Guild, and how the increased responsibility is arousing new life and greater activity.

Condemn Hearst Papers

NEW ROCHELLE, N. Y.—At the thirty-fifth annual session of the International Missionary Union in the First Presbyterian Church here today this resolution, introduced by the Rev. H. F. LaFlamme, Secretary of the union, who presided at the meeting, was adopted unanimously:

"The International Missionary Union, in session at New Rochelle, and representing 2,500 men and women from Canada and the United States in the medical, educational, and evangelistical service of all foreign countries of the world, commends the fine influence of the leading high-class press of the country in advancing and strengthening the international bonds that link this nation with its near neighbor of the East.

"At the same time we decry and condemn that section of the American press, led by the Hearst combination, in their vicious and indefatigable propaganda that seems perniciously determined to sow the seeds of discord and suspicion between the people of this land and the people of Japan."

JAPANESE LEADING MEN SCOFF AT AMERICAN TALK

Disbelieve Statements of War Aims, Says Dr. Gifford

SOUTH PORTSMOUTH, RHODE ISLAND.—American ideals in the war are entirely misunderstood by the Japanese people, according to the Rev. Frank D. Gifford, of St. Paul's College, Tokyo, Japan, who addressed the Rhode Island Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary at its quarterly meeting at St. Mary's Church.

"The leading men in Japan," he declared, "scoff at the American talk about fighting for humanity and democracy and do not believe us. The Christian schools and missionaries today are working to make Japan understand our ideals in this war, and the support of missions is therefore a war measure."

Bishop Perry also made an address on the religion of the men in service, asserting that the very influences that subjected them to the worst subjected them to the best, and that nowhere was worship more sincere than where the soldier and sailor kneel before God. This all-day meeting of the Auxiliary at the Newport end of the diocese was an interesting pilgrimage for the members from Providence and vicinity, who journeyed down in special cars to beautiful St. Mary's and were carried in automobiles at noon to the Church of the Holy Cross, Middletown, where lunch was served and the afternoon service was held.

New Zealand Soldiers at Church

NORFOLK, VIRGINIA. — Five hundred Church of England soldiers from a New Zealand transport in port over Sunday attended Christ Church in a body at their own request recently. They filled the entire nave. Most of the congregation took some of the men home to dinner.

The New Zealanders brought with them their own British flag. Borne by their color sergeant, it was carried in the procession of choir and clergy abreast of the Stars and Stripes, always carried in the procession in Christ Church. During the service the flags of the two Anglo-Saxon Allies were set on the two sides of the chancel. After the benediction and before the recessional both were presented before the altar with the processional cross between them, while the national airs of the United States and Great Britain were sung, all standing at attention.

From their ship the men were brought to the church in special trolley cars and about fifty automobiles supplied by the church, the Red Cross and the Rotary Club.

Receives Loving Cup

COLUMBUS, OHIO.—On the evening of May 25 the vestry of St. Paul's Church presented to its choir director, Hon. Willis G. Bowland, a very beautiful and artistic loving cup, commemorating more than thirty-six years of faithful service as member and director of the choir.

Mr. Bowland has been director of the choir without compensation for more than twenty-five years, rendering during all these years a most unselfish service, and has also been a very large contributor to the support of the choir and the church. Many critics, who have heard the choir at St. Paul's Church, consider it one of the best, if not the best, in the Middle West.

Our Weekly News Letters

BOSTON

Roslindale Dedication—The parish house of the Church of Our Saviour, Roslindale, was dedicated on Wednesday, June 5. Bishop Lawrence, Bishop Babcock and Mayor Peters made addresses, Bishop Lawrence officiating, and the rector, the Rev. Charles C. Wilson, presiding. The completion of this large parish house is the first step toward the new church building which is already planned and under way.

Trinity Red Cross—The Red Cross Branch at Trinity Church, Boston, reports $1,939.04 expended on the work during the past year, 920 garments sewed, 1,672 articles knitted and 36,707 surgical dressings made. There has been an average attendance of between fifty and sixty.

KENNETH RIPLEY FORBES.

NEW YORK

Bishop Paddock Preaches in New York—Bishop Paddock of Eastern Oregon spent Sunday in New York on the eve of his departure for France to engage in work among the soldiers under the Y. M. C. A. In the moring the Bishop preached a spirited sermon at St. James's Church. He spoke of his experience in one of the war camps where over fifty thousand soldiers are congregated, as fine a body of men as were ever trained to bear arms. He was especially impressed by their interest in religion. When the surface reserve has been broken through these boys in their eager questions go straight to the heart of religion. Many and many a time after his addresses, not always upon religious subjects, soldiers would approach the Bishop to ask what he thought about heaven and prayer. In this part of his address the Bishop paused and solemnly addressed the congregation before him. "Your boys," he said, "are thinking about immortality and about prayer. Are you interested in these topics; are you asking these questions of your rectors? When these boys come back from France, transfigured by their experience, shall we be worthy to meet them?" Then the preacher asked the congregation to kneel with him to rededicate their lives to God that they might be worthy of the great sacrifice which the youth of the land was making for the cause of justice and liberty.

Trinity Cuts Budget—As one part of its War Service, and in response to the call of our Government for measures of economy, Trinity Parish has carefully revised its budget and reduced expenditures where this was possible without lasting injury to the work. Many things valuable and useful but not wholly indispensable have been given up for the period of the war. The Clerical Staff has been reduced to set free more of the clergy for direct war service. In several of the chapels there will for the present be only one curate instead of two as heretofore.

Dr. McComas as Vicar—The Rev. Dr. McComas has been elected Vicar of St. Paul's Chapel and will enter upon his duties when Dr. Geer retires, October 1. In addition to his new duties as Vicar of St. Paul's, Dr. McComas will continue to fill the post of Senior Curate at Trinity Church.

Board of Religious Education Meetings—The Westchester conferences on teacher-training, held under the chairmanship of Dr. S. W. Patterson, closed on May 25 after a series of eight addresses with an average attendance of forty-five.

The parishes co-operating were Trinity, St. Paul's and St. John's, in New Rochelle; Ascension and Trinity, in Mt. Vernon; St. Thomas's, Mamaroneck; St. John, Larchmont; Redeemer, Pelham; Christ, Pelham Manor, and St. Paul's, Eastchester.

The topics were: Methods in the Class-Room, Sunday-school Discipline, The Child's Mind and Its Training, Educational Ideals, Teaching the Prayer Book, Teaching the Old Testament, Teaching St. Paul's Life, and Teaching the Life of Christ.

The staff of lecturers were: The Rev. Melville K. Bailey, Mr. Stephen F. Bayne, Mr. John W. Tietz, Dr. S. W. Patterson, Miss Ethel M. Robinson and Miss Ruth Sayer. The local committee in charge were: Mr. William Drake, New Rochelle; the Rev. Wilbur L. Caswell, Mamaroneck; Mrs. J. B. Getchell, Mrs. W. L. Odell.

WASHINGTON

Ordinations—Holding his Trinity ordinations in his Cathedral as usual, the Bishop of Washington, on the first Sunday after Trinity, made Mr. Frank N. Fitzpatrick a deacon, and gave priest's orders to the Rev. Messrs. Charles E. McAllister, Sidney W. Wallace, and Harry S. Cobey. He was assisted in the service by Canon Talbot, Dean Bratenahl, Canon De Vries, and Canon Myer, the last named preaching the sermon. Mr. Fitzpatrick goes at once to Oklahoma to take charge of the development of a mission to colored people under Bishop Brooke. Mr. McAllister becomes rector of Pinkney Memorial Church, Hyattsville, Maryland, in the Diocese of Washington, which he has been serving as deacon. Mr. Cobey continues in Rock Creek parish in the District of Columbia, in which he has been serving his diaconate, and becomes vicar of the Chapel of the Holy Comforter in that parish. Mr. Wallace, by special permission of the Bishop of Washington, continues as curate of St. John's Church, Waterbury, Conn., so as to permit its rector, the Rev. Dr. John Lewis, to serve in France.

Soldier Misses Cathedral—On Monday afternoon, June 10, the Bishop of Washington, assisted by Canon De Vries and Canon Myer, dedicated the great bronze cross which terminates at the east ridge pole of the roof of the National Cathedral and is located about one hundred and ten feet above the surface of the ground and directly over the High Altar It is in such a position that it will be visible from all open portions of the District of Columbia, and is itself some ten feet high. It is very handsomely floriated, having been designed by the Cathedral Architect, Mr. Henry Vaughan, before his death to fit in with the French type of the apse which forms the eastern portion of the Cathedral Choir. A soldier, writing recently from a distant camp, a man not a member of our Church nor of any, and who was quartered for some weeks at Camp Meigs in the District of Columbia, about five miles east of the Cathedral, said to one of the Canons of the Cathedral that he missed very much his early morning glimpses of the beautiful structure glimmering in the sunshine atop of the hills to the west of his camp.

Cathedral School Commencement—St. Alban's, the Natonal Cathedral School for Boys, held its Commencement exercises on June 9 and 10. The baccalaureate was preached this year by the Bishop of Pennsylvania, and, as usual, was held at four o'clock Sunday afternoon at the Peace Cross. A great and representative congregation was present, including many officers and enlisted men, in addition to the Cathedral clergy, the pupils and faculty of the School, of whom about one hundred and thirty were in line. The procession as it passed through the green groves of Mount St. Alban and was joined at the Lane-Johnston Building by the School, the masters in their academic gowns and caps, the boys in black coats and white trousers, and then, punctuated by Cross, the Stars and Stripes, and the Cathedral banner, passed through the beautiful archway of the All Hallows Gate to the lawns surrounding the Peace Cross, made a most wonderful effect on a radiant June afternoon.

On Monday afternoon, as usual, the Commencement service proper was held in the Bethlehem Chapel. The exercises of the day and of the year were concluded by the graduates' reception at the School.

W. L. DeVries.

NEWARK

United Offering Service—At the United Offering Service of the Woman's Auxiliary in Trinity Cathedral, Newark, the sermon was preached by the Rev. Luke M. White of Montclair, the offerings presented amounting to $4,566, making with last year's offering $8,898 for the two years of the present triennium, indicating good increase from the same period in the last triennium and a larger united offering than ever at the next General Convention.

Clerical Notes—On Sunday, June 2, in St. Peter's Church, Morristown, Edwin S. Ford was ordained Deacon by Bishop Stearly; being presented for ordination by the rector, the Rev. D. M. Brookman. Mr. Ford is a graduate of Princeton and a member of the Senior Class at the Episcopal Theological School, Cambridge.

The Rev. Alfred Q. Plank has become curate at Grace Church, Newark; the Rev. Roy J. Riblet of Oberlin, Ohio, has accepted the rectorship of Christ Church, Harrison, to begin his work September 1. The Rev. Louis W. Pitt of the graduating class at Berkeley Divinity School takes charge of Christ Church, Newark, July 1 The Rev. James D. Kennedy of Long Island has taken charge of the Church of the Epiphany, Allendale. The Rev. Barrett P. Tyler and the Rev. Burnham N. Dell have been ordered to the Chaplains' Training School at Camp Zachary Taylor, Louisville.

Church School Commencement—Nine young women, members of the class of 1918 of the Church school of the Church of the Holy Communion, South Orange, received diplomas at a special service held in the church on Sunday afternoon, June 2. This class has completed a four years' course in the senior department in "The Life of Our Lord Jesus Christ, Church Doctrine, Bible Truth, the Book of Common Prayer, and Leading Facts in Church History."

TENNESSEE

Educational Work—Under the Diocesan Board of Religious Education the Sunday Schools of the Diocese of Tennessee are making good progress towards reorganization as graded Church Schools. The report of the Committee on Parochial Education, submitted through the Board to the Diocesan Convention in May, is being printed for distribution in aid of the work of reorganization. It is full of helpful suggestions to all who are engaged in the work of Church Schools. In accordance with the plans of the Board St. Mary's Cathedral Church School, Memphis, held its first Annual Commencement on the second Sunday after Trinity, and graduated with honor five seniors, who had successfully passed all the tests applied to them. These graduates will now take the Teachers' Training Courses offered to them this summer and qualify as teachers in the school next year.

The Rev. Walter D. Buckner, LL.D., rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, and president of the Standing Committee of the Diocese, has been offered the appointment of U. S. A. Chaplain to Base Hospital No 57, which will be the first regular army base hospital to leave America for France and will be generally known as the Memphis unit, because made up entirely of volunteers from that city and vicinity. It will have 400 enlisted men attached to it and 150 nurses, as well as thirty-seven physicians, and have charge of a hospital providing 20,000 beds—an army hospital not a Red Cross organization. The appointment, if accepted, will be for the period of the war, which makes it exceedingly difficult for Dr. Buckner to decide between the two classes of duties which confront him.

CENTRAL NEW YORK

Ordination—At St. Peter's Church, Auburn, New York, on St. Barnabas' Day Messrs. Edward Stanton Tabor and Condit Nelson Eddy were ordained to the Diaconate by Bishop Fiske. The candidates were presented by Dean Houser and the Litany was said by the Rev. Ralph Bray rector of St. John's Church, Auburn. Mr Eddy read the Gospel. The sermon at the request of the candidates was preached by Bishop Fiske, the occasion being the anniversary of his own ordination to the Diaconate and to the Priesthood. The Rev Mr. Eddy is to take charge of the work at Elmira Heights and Horseheads and the Rev. Mr. Tabor is to be in charge at Willowdale and Romulus.

Missionary Work Done by Laymen—An example of what young laymen, studying privately for Orders, are doing in the missionary work of the Church was shown at Bishop Fiske's visitation to Grace Church Copenhagen, recently. This mission church and that at Champion are in charge of Mr F. C. Ransier. Last year Mr. C. H. Schantz another layman, presented eighteen candidates for Confirmation at the two places This year another class was presented at Champion and nineteen were confirmed at Copenhagen. These places have a celebration of the Holy Communion each month During the year Mr. Ransier has presented twenty-two children and adults for Baptism War Service—A great many Churchmen from the diocese are leaving for service at the front and service flags are found on almost every church and patriotic service are the order of the day. Instances of enthusiasm in the prosecution of war work are constantly coming to notice. For instance, at Dryden every adult male communicant is away on war service. At Bainbridge our parish has more men in service than all the other churches combined.

Memorial Day—Memorial Day was generally observed throughout the diocese. At Trinity Church, Syracuse, the Rev. Dr. vanAllen of the Church of the Advent, Boston, was special preacher. St. Paul's Parish, Syracuse, and Calvary Parish united for a service on that day. Many of the prominent organizations of the city were present in a body. The rector of St. Paul's was the preacher. At Mexico the Bishop Coadjutor made an address at a large union meeting. Over two thousand people came together from the town and the surrounding country. The largest hall would only hold 500, so that overflow meetings had to be held. WALTER E. JONES.

PHILADELPHIA

Services In New Church—There was a large congregation at the first service in the new Church of the Epiphany on Sunday morning, June 9. The rector, the Rev. William Newman Parker, preached. The new church was completed at a cost of $110,000, and is regarded as the best specimen of Tudor Gothic architecture in this country. The stone used is broken into small pieces, giving the effect of mosaic work.

Mobilization for Missions—At the monthly luncheon for the clergy at the Church House on Monday, June 10, the speakers were John W. Wood of the Board of Missions and the Rev. Dr. R. W. Patton. The speakers told of methods of getting the laity together in teams to call on parishioners. There is to be such a campaign in the early fall.

Graduates of Deaconess' School—The seven graduates of the Philadelphia School for Deaconesses have chosen many varied fields for their future service. Miss Duke and Miss Williamson are going to the mountains of Virginia. Miss McKenzie plans to work for a time in North Carolina, and later hopes to serve in Africa. Miss Nuno has had experience and training as a nurse: she has volunteered as a war nurse, and has been appointed at Ellis Island to receive the wounded and send them elsewhere for fuller care. Miss George has gone to Wind River, Wyoming. Miss Gordon has entered the Pennsylvania Hospital for training as a nurse. Miss Truesdall is to stay at Church Training and Deaconess House here in the city.

College Notes—Bishop Rhinelander preached the graduation sermon at the University of Pennsylvania this June. Commencement took place on Wednesday morning, June 19.

Swarthmore College has decided not to afford any military training to the students this year: the trustees felt that such an action would not be in accord with the principles of the founders of the college.

The University of Pennsylvania is to turn its grounds and building over to the Government for military training this summer.

The usual graduation exercises of the College of Pharmacy will take place at the Church of St. Luke and the Epiphany. The rector, as is his custom, will preach to the graduating class.

Gospel Mission Fakers—The Chamber of Commerce has issued a warning against many who have solicited for gospel missions. Of forty-three missions investigated, only fourteen were recommended as worthy of support. The Chamber urges all who are wont to give to any of these missions to communicate with them for a clearer statement of needs and worth.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

The Cathedral Farm—The Cathedral Farm at Newton, New Hampshire, is again open for business. Some fifteen boys and girls, under the supervision of the Deaconess, will spend their vacation here. The daily routine will include regular hours for prayer, for work and for recreation, and the children are pledged to give five hours a day to the farm and to running the house. Boys as well as girls will be taught food values, and will take their turn in cooking the meals. Food conservation will be explained, so that even the children may cooperate more intelligently in the Government's plans.

BALTIMORE

Hannah More Academy—The Diocesan School for Girls, Hannah More Academy at Reisterstown, has just closed an excellent year's work. Bishop Murray presided and the address was made by Mr. Charles O. Scull of Baltimore. The graduating class numbered twelve. Following the exercises there was a military drill upon the campus and a musicale.

On Ordination—Mr. Clarence Edward Wolfe was ordained to the diaconate by Bishop Murray at St. Thomas' Church, Baltimore, May 29. He was presented by the rector, the Rev. Charles E. Perkins, and the sermon was preached by the Ven. Edward T. Helfenstein, Archdeacon of Annapolis. Mr. Wolfe will officiate during his diaconate as assistant to the Archdeacon of Frederick, the Ven. Douglas Hoof, working at Thurmont and adjacent points.

War Work at St. Paul's—At a recent meeting of the Red Cross Auxiliary of St. Paul's, Baltimore, the Rev. Dr. A. B. Kinsolving, rector, it was reported that 43,000 surgical dressings have been sent forward by this branch during the winter and that the work has received the highest grading. About seven thousand soldiers and sailors have been entertained in the parish house on Saturday and Sunday afternoons and evenings and a great deal has been done for the men. Several have been baptized as a result of personal contact and several presented for confirmation. The attendance has been from 200 to 300 a week.

Clerical Changes—The Rev. Edward Pinkney Wroth has become rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Baltimore, beginning his duties upon the first of June. He succeeds in this position the Rev. William D. Gould, who has become rector of Christ Church, Cambridge, Diocese of Easton. WYLLIS REDE.

MAINE

Heads Neighborhood House—Mrs. C. B. Davis has been appointed by Bishop Benjamin Brewster to the charge of St. Andrew's Neighborhood House, Vinalhaven, where it is the aim to make the influence of religion felt in social life, in suitable amusements, as well as in more direct instruction.

Work for Children—At the House of the Good Shepherd, Gardiner, the home for children of which the Rev. Canon R. W. Plant, rector of Christ Church, Gardiner, is secretary, there are nineteen children at the present time. Fifteen of the children attend the public schools. Four of them are to sing in the annual school concert.

To Visit Summer Chapels—Bishop Brewster will make special visitations during July and August to churches and summer chapels along the Maine coast at summer resorts. W. F. LIVINGSTON.

WESTERN NEW YORK

Ordination—At Trinity Church, Geneva, New York, Bishop Courtney ordained to the priesthood the Rev. Richard Warne of Buffalo, the Rev. William A. Nixon of Gowanda and the Rev. W. A. Brown of Phelps. Mr. Fred Goldsmith, Mrs. Squire Schofield and Mrs. Charles A. Dowdell were ordered deacons. Five of the candidates are graduates of the DeLancey Divinity School, and one of the General Theological Seminary. Three of them were until recently in the ministry of the Methodist Church. J. W. T. COOPER.

DALLAS

Memorial Day at Fort Worth—Two services were held in St. Andrew's Church, Fort Worth (the Rev. E. H. Eckel, rector), on Memorial Day. The nave of the church was quite filled at 3 p. m., when large representations of the Confederate Veterans, Daughters of the Confederacy, G. A. R., and Women's Relief Corps were present by special invitation. A strong sermon was preached by the Rev. F. R. Godolphin, Rector of Grace Church, Oak Park, Chicago, and volunteer chaplain at Camp Bowie and the aviation fields near Fort Worth.

The stars on our national service flag increase almost weekly. They now number 38. The ministrations of St. Andrew's Church to the 30,000 soldiers here are constant and various, and evidences of appreciation are abundant.

CONNECTICUT

Dedication Service—The Bishop of Connecticut visited Christ Church Parish, West Haven, Connecticut (Rev. Floyd Steele Kenyon, rector), recently and dedicated a chancel window, sedilia and bishop's chair. The window is in memory of the Rev. Henry Zell, former rector of this church, from 1853-1863. It is the gift of Mrs. Emma Matilda Aimes and was designed and executed by Heaton, Butler & Bayne of London, England, and New York.

The bishop's chair and sedilia are of carved wood designed by the architect of the church, Mr. Bertram Goodhue. The design was beautifully executed in harmony with the interior of the church. The woodwork of the chancel was carried around the sanctuary so as to complete and harmonize the sedilia and bishop's chair. The chair and the woodwork on that side of the sanctuary was given by Mrs. Elizabeth Chamberlain in memory of her husband, LeRoy M. Chamberlain. The sedilia was given by the Society of the Good Will Workers of the parish.

EASTON

Summer School Plans—Programs have been distributed for the Peninsula Summer School to be held at Ocean City, Maryland, June 24 to 28, for the Church workers of the Peninsula and especially the nearby dioceses. The program was arranged by the Rev. Thomas Getz Hill of Smyrna, Delaware, and the Rev. Sidney A. Potter of Berlin, Maryland. The courses, which include those on the Bible, Child Study, Sunday School Methods, will be given by the Rev. George C. Foley, D.D., of the Philadelphia Divinity School, Mrs. Mary K. Hawks of Philadelphia, Mrs. John Loman and Miss Helen I. Jennings of Pottsville, Pennsylvania. The Rev. Kensey Johns Hammond of Culpeper, Virginia, will also give courses. The enrolment fee is the same as in other schools and the courses similar.

Parishes Combined—For the duration of the War Shrewsbury Parish and I. U. Parish, both in Kent County, have been combined under the Very Rev. S. S. Hepburn, dean of the convocation. This action was ratified by the convention.

LONG ISLAND

Memorial Service at St. Bartholomew's—An impressive service was held at St. Bartholomew's Church, Brooklyn, recently, when the occasion was a memorial to the veterans of the Twenty-third Regiment, National Guard, N. Y. The rector, the Rev. Frank M. Townley, is chaplain of the regiment.

The church was a picture with the flags of the Allies, the State, the Service, the Church and the American, and the procession carrying these was most imposing.

The reading of the names of the deceased comrades was followed by taps, after which the hymn, "Now the Laborer's Task is O'er," was sung by all, everyone being on his knees, and eyes and hearts were full as they listened to the soft refrain:

"Saviour in thy mercy keeping,
Leave we now thy servants sleeping."

Communion for Soldiers—Bishop Burgess is chairman of the Army and Navy Committee, which consists of laymen representing some of our churches on Long Island.

This committee is caring for all enlisted Churchmen, and is organized through the Diocesan Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew. Names are registered, and the work divided into two parts, parish corporate communions and correspondence clubs.

In the majority of parishes services are held on the third Sunday of each month, and similar services under the direction of chaplains at the several camps. Funds are supplied through the Army and Navy committee. After the service breakfast is served and the soldiers are guests of the chaplain or secretary.

Celebrates Its Golden Jubilee—St. James Church, Brooklyn, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary on Whitsunday. It was founded 1868 by the Rev. Charles W. Homer, D.D., who continued as rector until 1902, when he became rector emeritus. The Rev. Thomas J. Crosby was the second rector, the Rev. George T. Dowling, D.D., the third, the Rev. Charles W. Naumann the fourth, and the present rector, the Rev. Edgar Morris Thompson, the fifth.

A parish celebration of the jubilee was held through the week.

Church Charity Festival—Under the direction of the Woman's Board the spring festival and "Foundation Day" of the Church Charity Foundation of the Diocese of Long Island was held in the new Home for the Aged and Blind.

Plans are being considered for a drive for the large sum of money required to replace the present hospital building, the orphanage destroyed by fire, and the chapel, which is now transformed into a hospital ward for sick and wounded soldiers and sailors.

MARY E. SMYTH.

MONTANA

Churches Dedicated—The Bishop recently dedicated the new St. Matthew's Church at Columbia Falls. The walls are of concrete blocks and the building is a very neat and substantial structure which does great credit to the little band of faithful workers, through whose self-sacrificing efforts it has been built and paid for with but little outside help. Five persons were confirmed at the time of the dedication.

The Bishop has also dedicated the little Church house at Troy. This building, which stands among the pine trees with mountains towering all around, is arranged so that the chancel being curtained off it can be used for social purposes when not in use for church services.

NOTES

The Rev. J. Phillip Anshutz of St. Luke's, Billings, has received his appointment as army chaplain and has left for active duty.

The Rev. Laird W. Snell began his work in St. Peter's, Helena, on Sunday, June 16.

The Rev. G. G. Bennett of the Church of the Incarnation, Great Falls, has been spending a month with the soldiers at Camp Lewis.

S. D. HOOKER.

PITTSBURGH

Open Air Services—The sixth year of Open Air Services, under the auspices of the Episcopal Churches of Pittsburgh, Sunday afternoons, on the corner of Smithfield Street and Second Avenue, began on Sunday, June 2. The attendance proved the best of the six years. The Mayor of the city has recognized the movement of such importance as to issue an order closing the street for the hour. The Rev. William Porkess, Chairman of the Committee on the Convention in charge of the work, presided. Gospel solos were sung and religious literature freely distributed. A new feature this year is the appointment of a Director of Singing. Well known hymns in very large type are fastened on the wall, and all who stop are urged to look and sing. Addresses were delivered by Archdeacon C. J. De Coux and the Rev. W. N. Clapp of the St. Mary Memorial Chapel. A large proportion of the clergy of the city and diocese have enthusiasticaly entered into this movement.

JANE CUDDY.

VERMONT

Woman's Auxiliary—Annual Meeting—The fortieth annual meeting of the Vermont Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary to the Board of Missions was held in Windsor, Vermont, May 28-29. Bishop Bliss presided. About fifty delegates answered to the roll call. The treasurer's report showed that $465 are needed to complete the appropriations voted last October of $1,400.

The elections resulted in only two changes in the list of officers of last year. These changes were in the Rutland and St. Alban's Districts, in which Miss L. W. Lewis of Poultney was elected president to take the place of Mrs. C. I. Brown of Brandon, and Mrs. John Cassidy of Enosburgh Falls was chosen president in place of Mrs. F. S. Hutchinson of East Berkshire. Deaconess Louisa was elected educational secretary.

Miss Dorothy Mills, a missionary in the District of Hankow, China, spoke of the work among women in China, and especially of the rescued children in St. Hilda's School, Wuchang. The Rev. James W. Tripp of Richford was the preacher at the opening service.

CHICAGO

Church Chaplain Heads School at Rockford—Lieutenant Frank E. Wilson, the Chaplain for the Episcopal Church at Camp Grant, Rockford, has, at the direction of Division Headquarters, organized and is conducting a School for all the Chaplains of the Division. The School opened on June 3. The following topics are covered in the curriculum: Army Organization and Regulations, Articles of War Procedure of Court Martial, Military Discipline and Courtesy, Welfare Aid, First Aid, Military Sanitation, Handling of Mail, Games and Recreation, Lessons in French, and Religious Standards and Methods. Officers in the Division who are experts in the various subjects are detailed to lecture in the School according to the schedule arranged by Chaplain Wilson. A bibliography has been issued in connection with the School work, and a report on one book each week is required from each Chaplain. One hour each week is devoted to a conference on Religious Work in the Army.

Social Service Speaker—The Field Secretary of the Diocesan Social Service Commission, the Rev. James B. Haslam, has received and accepted an appointment on the bureau of speakers of the Social Service Department of the Illinois State Council of Defense. The special work of this Council at present is the recruiting of one thousand volunteer workers, including both men and women, to take the places of those who have gone to the front or into some branch of war service.

Rector Given Leave of Absence—The Vestry of Christ Church, Winnetka, has given its Rector, the Rev. Edward Ashley Gerhard, an indefinite leave of absence for war service. He has therefore applied for a Chaplaincy, overseas service.

Gold Star at Church of the Advent—John Strauss, who died at the Great Lakes Training Station, was buried from the Church of the Advent with full military honors. He had enlisted in the First Infantry, I. N. G., in 1917, and had gone to Texas with his regiment. After six months' services he was given a discharge on account of his youth. He enlisted for training at Great Lakes a few weeks ago. Within a few days of enlistment he contracted pneumonia and died in the Navy Hospital. He had served faithfully as a Troop Leader of the Boy Scouts.

Mission Church People Buy Bonds—The young people of St. Philip's Church, a missionary parish on the South Side, recently gave a patriotic entertainment, at which time it was announced that the people of the Mission had subscribed for nearly four thousand dollars' worth of Liberty Bonds.

Rector at Chicago Heights Resigns—The Rev. George Dudley Barr, who recently assumed charge of St. Ambrose's Church, Chicago Heights, has broken down in health, and found it necessary to resign his Work. He has gone to Colorado Springs.

Special Sermons at Evanston—Bishop Weller, of Fond du Lac, was the preacher on Sunday, June 9, at St. Luke's Church, Evanston, when he presented the last in a series of Special War Subjects, "Religion During the War and After." Professor Lewis of the Western Theological Seminary presented the subject, "American Women and the War"; the Rev. Paul Micou, "The College and the Colors," and the Rev. George Atwater, "The Teens in Khaki." Dr. Stewart is awaiting final word to proceed to France, having received word from Red Cross Headquarters to be ready about the second week in June. During his absence the Rev. Fred Grant will be in charge of the parish.

Church Club Meeting—The annual meeting of the Church Club of Chicago was held on the evening of the first day of the Eighty-first Convention of the Diocese. Angus Hibbard, in summing up the year's work, reported that the club had raised about $33,000 of the $50,000 fund for the Western Theological Seminary. One thousand six hundred dollars was raised for war work, of which about $1,400 was given to the Bishop for the war work of the diocese, and $200 used to purchase a portable altar and equipment for a priest in France. Charles W. Folds, who is compiling the Honor Roll for the Church Club and diocese, reported a total of 1,152 enrolled. Officers elected for the new year are as follows: President, Angus Hibbard; vice-president, Frederick T. West; secretary, W. N. Murray, and treasurer, Ernest Rickitt.

Tank Captain at Evanston—The annual meeting of the Men's Club of St. Luke's Church, Evanston, was held on May 29, a war dinner being served. Dr. Stewart, the rector, presided and acted as toastmaster. The speaker of the evening was Captain Bevington, of the "Princess Pat Regiment," who had charge of the tank "Britannia." During the evening a new silk service flag containing 112 stars, to be used in the church, was presented by St. Margaret's Guild.

Thrift Stamps to Choir Boys—The Vestry of St. Peter's Church, feeling that it was necessary that St. Peter's as a parish inculcate a spirit of war-time economy, decided at its last meeting to present the choir boys with Thrift Stamps in lieu of a choir camp during the present summer.

ALBERT EDWARD SELCER.

English Church News

Convocation and Labor—The Lower House of Convocation is not a body which is held in great esteem, whether that of Canterbury or of York. It awaits the reformer's hand, to make it more representative of the whole Church, instead of representing so largely the "official element." The Bishops, of course, sit apart as the Upper House, and their deliberations at least indicate what our spiritual rulers are thinking about. But the country is only mildly interested in what the Lower House thinks. Somehow the debates seem always to fall into the hands of the Archdeacons and Deans. Or they used to do so, for just lately the representatives of the clergy, few as they are, have been waking up the Lower House of Canterbury. There is now the redoubtable Mr. Temple, a champion of "Life and Liberty," and his able seconder, Canon Garbett of Portsea, Mr. Maynard Smith, a comparatively young clergyman from the midlands, and others. It was not surprising therefore that the House, like the Upper House, had something useful to contribute to the "Demands of Labor" discussion. Canon Garbett led off with a motion which boldly stated that the Minimum Wage, State provision against Unemployment, and recognition of the Status of Workers in Industries, were in accordance with the principles of Christianity, and that the Church should support them, as well as all efforts to promote fellowship between employers and employed. A little of the edge was taken off the resolution which was finally carried: the phrase "in accordance with the principles of Christianity" was dropped. The House, instead of committing itself so far, simply expressed itself in sympathy with Canon Garbett's program, added the "housing reform" item, and called upon Churchmen to support it.

Mr. Temple in a New Role—Some of the admirers of the Rev. W. Temple are a little exercised at his latest step. He spoke in Convocation as a member of the Labor Party, under the new rule made recently by which non-manual workers are qualified for membership. A Guardian correspondent points out that Canon Garbett, as incumbent of a Labor parish, knows the facts, but that Mr. Temple is teaching us on the slender authority of a week's membership of the Labor Party. It is a good debating point, but surely nothing more. Everybody knows the main facts, and Mr. Temple knows what he is about. Whether he was wise in his fierce attack on the Guardian, in his Convocation speech, is another matter. He thinks the attitude of this paper "horrible." The article in question said: "Good pay and good treatment on the one side must be balanced by honest work and sincere endeavor on the other." "Partnership, in the widest sense of the word, should take the place of feud." Recalling these views, the Editor drily remarks that "the peculiar horror of these words escapes us. We can almost imagine them being written by Mr. Temple himself, and if he disowns them we can only say that he is untrue to his own position." But Mr. Temple will not have it that the worker should have to depend on the other side, whether they meted out to him kind treatment or not, and he claims that this is the attitude of Labor.

"Drastic Proposals"—So the Times describes the report of the Committee of the National Mission dealing with the administrative system of the Church of England. The committee were to consider in what way the present administrative system, including patronage and endowments, is a spiritual hindrance, and how the reform or the removal of such hindrances could be best effected. The report does not temporize on any of the main issues: the sale of advowsons to private buyers must go; only corporations such as Cathedral Chapters, Diocesan Trustees, or Patronage Boards, or officials such as Bishops, should be allowed to purchase the right of appointing incumbents. Appointments should be for ten years at most, unless renewed. Incumbents should have a minimum stipend of £400, and assistant curates of five years' standing £200. Two small benefices should be united under one incumbent, and the endowments generally redistributed. All Church property should be vested in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, which body would act through a local diocesan board of management. The system of ecclesiastical judicature should be thoroughly overhauled. A pension scheme should be compulsory, and all clergy, including bishops, should retire at the age of seventy at the furthest. Bishops should have enlarged rights in their cathedrals. An advisory councils, including two members from the diocese, should have its say in the appointments of bishops. Dioceses should be subdivided so as to include not more than 300 parishes. Convocation should be reformed so as to make the Lower House more representative, and Canterbury and York Convocations should be legally empowered to sit together.

May it all come to pass! But there are lions in the way.

Forthcoming Retirement of the Dean of Exeter—Anyhow, there must be some possible exceptions to the seventy years limit. It would have sent Bishop Earle to his villa at Torquay twenty-one years ago, instead of this year. I heard him deliver a most vigorous sermon not long ago in his cathedral, and it is only a matter of months since he had to give up preaching. Only at ninety-one has he reached the "armchair" stage, and his friends will hope to see him attain his century.

A Welsh Service to Be Held at Westminster—In spite of his many duties, Mr. Lloyd George found time to go over to the Abbey to consult with the Dean of Westminster and Sir Frederick Bridge about the selection of Welsh Hymns to be sung at a special service to be held on Coronation Day, June 22. In the end, the Premier left a list of fifteen hymns, from which a final selection will be made. The Bishop of St. David's is to preach the sermon, and there will be a collection on behalf of the Welsh prisoners of war. And Westminster is promised a unique experience, if the statement on newspaper authority should prove correct, which is that Mr. Lloyd George will himself read the Lessons.

GREEK METROPOLITAN SAYS OUR CHURCH MUST BE LINK

Ready to Be Our Fellow-Worker for Christian Unity

In spite of all distractions, the world is still interested in the World Conference on Faith and Order. The Eastern Churches are awakening to its possibilities. The following letter from war-torn Greece addressed to the Secretary of the Preliminary Commission in America bears striking witness to this fact:

I have carefully perused the appeal of the Commission in which you have the honor to serve as Secretary. I pray with all my soul for the success of the most holy purpose which the Episcopal Church in America has conceived and for which our Church has never ceased praying in her daily converse to the Lord. Such an attempt would now more easily than ever fulfil the common desire of all who examine things from a lofty standpoint, who are above prejudices and selfish interests, and who have a deep insight into the true spirit of the teaching of our Chief Shepherd Saviour Christ.

The terrible confusion of the world, which has been brought on by deviation for the most part from the spirit of the Gospel with its incalculable bad consequences, cannot fail to act upon the hearts of Christians of all social strata and of every Christian persuasion. It cannot fail that all will seek a haven of salvation. For who in these critical times is not laboring and heavy-laden, and who besides the Saviour can give us rest? And the undertaking so opportunely begun, which more than once in the past many people in many places have vainly undertaken, is now taken up under favorable auspices, altogether by divine providence, by the Episcopal Church, commonly regarded as a link which alone can unite Orthodox, Catholics and Protestants. You live in the pre-eminently free republic which reveres human rights, liberty and truth. You can guide safely its Christian majority and indirectly all the civilized world. Who in his sober senses would offer a stubborn refusal of the desired co-operation in a Christian spirit? We are convinced that the frank discussion of all the questions concerning Faith and Order which separate us is now desired eagerly by all, and all are expecting great benefits from a world-wide Christian union. Let us hope in the Lord that the fields are white already to harvest and that He will vouchsafe to enlighten the leaders of all the Christian persuasions unto evangelic collaboration with you for the success of the most Christian end you seek. For our part we shall not fail with entire good intent to strive for the unimpeded progress in our Church of your work.

Finally, holding the conviction that no evil is unmixed with good, we think that even the present frightful war will, in the power of the Almighty, be the cause of lasting peace for the good of humanity, which only when it becomes one flock and one Shepherd will attain the ideals for which it now undergoes such terrible things, and for which in particular Hellenism in these last days comes out shoulder to shoulder into the contest and with the entire sympathy of the majority of the leaders and other functionaries of the national Greek clergy which, springing ab antiquo from the vitals of the Greek people, feels and lives by those ideals.

Praying from the depth of my heart for the fullest success of your work, I beg you to regard me henceforth as a ready fellow-worker to the extent of my weak powers.

With much love and respect,

† Hierotheos,
Metropolitan of Sisanion-Siatista.

FAMOUS EDUCATOR RESIGNS

Dr. Lay, Head of Largest Girls' School, Gives Up Rectorship

Raleigh, South Carolina.—Announcement has recently been made that the Rev. George W. Lay, D.C.L., is resigning the rectorship of St. Mary's School here, which he has held since 1907. Dr. Lay is one of the most distinguished educators in the Church. For many years he was a Master of St. Paul's School, Concord, and was widely known throughout the Church, before assuming charge of St. Mary's School. In his new position he became at once a leading spirit in Southern educational circles, and a prominent figure in the city and State of his residence.

Under his progressive administration St. Mary's School has been very greatly enlarged, both in the attendance of students and in its buildings and material equipment. It has become the largest Church school for girls in this country, and gives promise of continued growth and expansion. The principal buildings, when Dr. Lay became rector, were old and ill adapted to meet modern demands. The many improvements are very largely due to his intelligent and constructive leadership.

They also serve who buy War Savings Stamps—if they save and buy to the utmost of their ability, and buy in time.

Name of Diocese Changed

Elkhart, Indiana.—The Twentieth Annual Council of the Diocese of Michigan City was held in St. John's Church, Elkhart, with an unusually large attendance.

A resolution was adopted to change the name of the Diocese from "Michigan City" to "Northern Indiana," which is more accurate and descriptive. All apportionments, as suggested by the finance committee, were adopted. Recorded that Council heartily favored the plan for a House of Churchwomen.

The Standing Committee elected was as follows: The Rev. J. H. McKenzie, D.D., the Rev. E. W. Averill, the Rev. L. C. Rogers, the Rev. W. W. Daup, the Rev. W. J. Cordick.

The Auxiliary meeting was held on the two days following. After welcoming the delegates, Bishop White introduced Bishop Griswold, who conducted the Quiet Hour, from which came new inspiration and spiritual refreshment. Archdeacon Long presented the plan for the House of Churchwomen, but definite action was deferred. The principal speaker was Miss Helen Littell of New York, who spoke on Wuchang Church Hospital in China. Upon motion the Auxiliary agreed to give $100 for furnishing a room in the hospital and voted to co-operate with women throughout the Church in a season of prayer the first week in Advent.

AMERICAN CHURCH AGENT HAS BEEN SENT TO FRANCE

Dr. Macfarland Will Be Guest of French Government

New York City.—In response to an invitation from all the Protestant organizations in France, conveyed through the French High Commissioner, M. Andre Tardieu, the Rev. Charles S. Macfarland, General Secretary of the Federal Council of the Churches, has just sailed for France to confer with the French Federation of Protestant Churches and its United Committee, representing all the Protestant organizations, and to bring back a report concerning the needs of the French churches. During his stay in France Dr. Macfarland will be the guest of the French Government, in accordance with an invitation conveyed by the French Foreign Office through the French High Commission, in a cablegram received on the eve of his departure, reading: "Please advise Dr. Macfarland that the French Government asks him to consider himself as its guest during his stay in France."

Unique Gift to Old Trinity

New York City.—A ciborium of great value and unique design has been presented to Trinity Church by Louis V. Bell of this city in memory of his mother, Adelaide Mott Bell.

The ciborium is of silver gilt, and was used in a cathedral in Spain in the XVI Century. Set in the ciborium there are many precious stones. Surrounding the cover there is a wreath of green enamel grape leaves with pearls and diamonds, a gift of Louis Philippe, King of France, made in 1836 to Louisa D. Mott, mother of Adelaide Mott Bell.

A star of rubies and some of the other rubies and diamonds set in the ciborium were given by the Sultan of Turkey to Dr. Valentine Mott, father of Adelaide Mott Bell, in recognition of a successful surgical operation. The diamond marguerites and the diamond leaves surrounding the support were given to Adelaide Mott Bell by the Prince de Joinville, son of Louis Philippe. The Prince served for two years as an officer in the Civil War. The flower sprays with emeralds and diamonds on the base of the vessel were Dr. Valentine Mott's wedding present to his wife, Louisa D. Mott. The arrangement of the jewels was designed by Mr. Michael Dreicer of New York.

The Northfield Conferences

East Northfield, Massachusetts.—Mr. William R. Moody, president of the Northfield Schools and Conferences, has completed plans for the following Conferences and Summer Schools, to be held at Northfield as usual this season. He invites the Christian public to meet here for the various gatherings.

June 13-21, Student Conference (Y. M. C. A.); June 25-July 2, the Young Women's Conference; July 9-17, the Summer School of Women's Foreign Missionary Societies; July 17-25, the Women's Summer School of Home Missions; July 20-27, Summer School of Sunday School Workers; August 2-11, the General Conference of Christian Workers; August 14-21, the National Convention of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew.

The Open Forum

Attention is called to the fact that The Open Forum is designed for letters and not for articles. No letter exceeding 350 words in length can be published, except under very special circumstances.—The Editor.

American Fund for French Soldiers

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

After my trip through France in 1915 visiting the small military hospitals, I came back saddened by the pitiable conditions that existed in them, and at once started an active campaign in the American fund for French wounded for "hospital shirts", those being the garments then most needed by the soldiers returning from the front.

Your paper generously published several appeals for us, and our "shirt fund" received its start through the contributions of your readers.

War-relief work was then in its infancy. Since then our fund has grown into one of the largest American war-relief organizations, with over 500 committees and 500,000 workers; has been recognized and approved by the French Government, and is today working in co-operation with the American Red Cross, but as an independent organization.

Over 4,000 French hospitals have received our supplies, and today they look to us not only for our help and supplies but our sympathy and interest. They call us their "First American Friend".

Never before has greater service been demanded of us.. We need workers in our work-rooms at 73 Park avenue, New York, but above all we need money to be cabled to France to help our Paris depot supply at once the articles urgently needed as the thousands of brave men are sent to the hospitals. Transportation is difficult and for that reason Americans can help best today by contributing money to be cabled over for "Emergency" work. The Red Cross has assigned to the American Fund for French Wounded the care of certain large French hospitals back of the firing line "Somewhere in France", where our American boys will be sent for care.

Come and work with us, and share with us all that you may spare at this most tragic moment in the war.

Do this for the love of France and her brave men. WILLIAM L. STOUT.

The Citizens' Association

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In your interesting leader on the "Red Cross Drive" you express the hope that "men like Mr. Davison and his associates" may organize "a drive to clean up our city slums." Allow me to remind your readers that men like these did organize such a drive in 1863, and it has been kept up with success ever since. Hamilton Fish, John Jacob Astor, August Belmont and their associates organized the Citizens' Association in that year. They promoted wise legislation to regulate the construction of new tenement houses, and to improve those then in existence. They watched the execution of these laws, educated public sentiment to support them, amended them as occasion required, procured the organization of a Tenement House Department which is vigilant to enforce these laws.

Later when it became clear that it was necessary to provide local centres where men and women of different race and education could meet and help each other, men like these took active part in the creation of social settlements. One of the first, the East Side House, was founded by a committee of the Church Club in 1891. J. Pierpont Morgan, Cornelius Vanderbilt, Seth Low, William A. Read were its friends and supporters, not to speak of others who are yet among us. We induced the city to lay out John Jay Park, on the East River, between Seventy-sixth and Seventy-eighth Streets, and to establish a public bath on the west. On the north and west are improved tenements of the City and Suburban Homes Company, the Open-Stair Tenement Company and the Vanderbilt Flats, adapted especially for those threatened with tuberculosis. To the south is our Settlement House, provided over by the wise and tactful Miss Trenholm.

Other settlements have sprung up till now there are over forty. The good they do is incalculable. There are very few slums left in New York City. There remain some dirty and vicious people whom we try to reform. Our East Side House needs workers and money. Come and help us.

Send the Names

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

May I appeal, through your columns, to the reverend clergy and to the relatives and friends of both officers and enlisted men in this camp, to send me their names and to what squadron or company they are attached? I ask this as Field Representative of the Church, being anxious to come into personal contact with every Churchman here. However, since this is a concentration camp, the men coming and going almost daily, information is needed at once. MORGAN S. GRIFFITH,

Publishing House Wanted

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

The Presbyterians and Methodists have their own publishing houses, and the Congregationalists also maintain an excellent library of missionary literature. Many Sunday School teachers would gladly buy missionary biographies as gifts for their pupils. The Church Missions House has fine leaflets, but has it books? If we have not facilities for handling books by our many Church writers, can we not expand? The Church of England has its own plant, why have not we?

Small Wage Earners

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In your editorial on Small Wage Earners you referred to the inadequate salaries of many of the clergy. You have rightly pointed out that the rector in a country parish, doing fine and hard work, would prefer to struggle on with increasing expenses rather than explain to any vestryman how inadequate his income is. It is part of his self-effacing devotion which keeps him silent.

You have said that there is no organization within the Church which can compel a hearing. I wondered, as I read your striking editorial, if we really did not have the organization in the brotherhood of the Christian ministry. There are some men in every diocese who do receive salaries which are adequate or more than adequate. These men could speak to the vestrymen of the parish of a friend without being misunderstood and without in any way compromising that friend's sense of proportion. The only requisite is that such a pleader should know the facts. I am sure that there is no city rector who would not be glad to be told by his friend in the country when conditions are hard, and, in the spirit of brotherhood and friendship, to see what could be done. However busy the man in the city may be, he would feel that such a confidence imposed upon him a primary duty not only to listen, but to act. The mere fact that the two men so conferring live in the same diocese satisfies the claim which in his modesty one man hesitates to make upon another. When the tale is told, the humility is reversed, for the prosperous man discovers how much more an unselfish man, willing to work in quiet places, deserves the freedom from anxiety which happens to have come to him and not to his brother. With admiration for another and with humility for himself, the city rector may be able to say a word to some layman, which, first opening the imagination, will then make a way for an adequate salary. Every self-respecting clergyman means to try his hardest to earn more than he is paid; but every self-respecting vestry must intend sharply to discover whether the rector of their parish can see the bills fall upon his breakfast table the first of the month without bewildering anxiety.

There is, of course, another outcome possible. It may be that the country rector deserves a larger parish. Perhaps no one has suspected that he is secretly longing for an opportunity which will make severer demands upon his time and ability. Vestries without a rector sometimes come to a city rectory for advice. After such a confidential talk between two clergymen as I have described, the visiting vestry might be given hope that they could secure a man who is now a successful rector in such and such a town. If they protested that he would not come, they might be cheered if they were told to try to get him. So difficulties about inadequate salaries might be adjusted—and some other things besides.

May I thank you for THE CHURCHMAN week by week. Both in editorials and in articles it is full of suggestion and help for us who try to preach and to work.

The Bishops and Church Unity

To the Editor of The Churchman:

The dignified silence of our bishops under the denunciations which have been heaped upon them for their rejection of the proposal of a novel kind of Church unity which came through the Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth is both gracious and impressive!

But these denunciations seem to come from quarters in which there has never been any enthusiastic emphasis laid upon the "Historic Episcopate," and in which the verities of the "Faith once for all delivered to the Saints" have been all too lightly held! This, at any rate, is the judgment of many of us.

Had the bishops consented to the proposal, however, a cyclonic storm would have been raised throughout the Church, and the denunciations would have been fiercer and more prolonged.

We have sufficient confidence in our bishops to believe that they are as fully convinced of the impotence of our divided Christianity, and are as eager to restore this broken unity as are the signatories of the petition which they carefully considered at their recent meeting.

The question which confronted them, and which must be seriously considered before any final action can be taken, is, how shall the problem be successfully solved?

May we not charitably believe that the problem, as it confronted them in Chicago, was the biggest problem they had ever been asked to consider? And involving such tremendous issues, may we not also believe that such a problem was beyond their jurisdiction?

Of course they had the right to call a special meeting of the General Convention in which such action might be taken as was deemed advisable. But it is doubtful whether any General Convention would take such radical action as was desired, even as a war measure. To do so without concurrent action by the Anglican Church would place us in an inglorious and isolated position in relation to that great Church, and would have strengthened the barriers which now divide us from the Eastern and the Latin Churches.

And we are naturally compelled to ask why should the grace of Orders be given to a small body of men who have hitherto rejected it when it is denied the picked men of our Church until such time as they have proved their fitness for it by meeting every canonical requirement?

The men who possess only the minimum requirements for the priesthood must be soundly ground in the fundamentals of the faith before they can be ordained; and it is certainly no breach of charity to assert that many of those who would willingly submit to ordination at the hands of our bishops are suspiciously unorthodox in regard to the Virgin birth!

It is an acknowledged fact that a large portion of Congregationalism is impregnated with unitarianism. We have many such in this part of the country. Then, what assurance have we that these men have been even validly baptized?

We have known a Congregational minister who baptized simply in the name of God—not of the Trinity!

And believing as we do in the necessity of infant baptism why should we give the grace of Orders to Baptist ministers who deny its efficacy? It is not likely that after their return from the front, and in the absence of conviction, these men would repudiate all their previous teaching.

And how could such men, so hurriedly ordained priests, be expected to teach the value of the Blessed Sacrament to those who are dying at the front? To most of them it is a bare memorial; to our boys who have been well-trained it is a Presence! And it is this Presence they must have to light their way to Paradise!

But there are also weighty questions of discipline to be considered as well as questions of doctrine. When the war is over, and these men come home to us what would be their status? To whom would they minister, and to whom would they be amenable?

Every priest must have jurisdiction, and must be responsible to his bishop. What then would happen to our Baptist priests, and our Methodist priests, and our Congregational priests?

They are first Baptists, or Methodists, or Congregational ministers, with priestly Orders superimposed!

Imagine the chaotic condition of things if they were to continue in the ministry of the denomination to which they first gave allegiance!

Could anything be more tragic than to have as minister of a Baptist church in any town a man who had also received his ordination to the Priesthood of the Church? Such men would be a thorn in the side of any rector who happened to be so unfortunate as to live in that community.

Moreover, what could prevent him from ministering to our aggrieved parishioners—baptizing their little ones, marrying their sons and daughters, and burying their dead, and according to the forms provided by the Church?

God will not be hurried! He is as much displeased as we at the deplorable divisions which exist among us, and He will ultimately indicate the way in which these divisions can be removed.

Let us first set our own house in order by a deeper spirituality among us all, and by a larger charity among ourselves; but don't let us ask our bishops to do impossible things, and then anathematize them because they dissent.

Compromises there may have to be when the great day of reunion shall arrive, and the Church will be glad to make them. But she dare not sell her birthright for a mess of pottage! She dare not surrender her glorious heritage even though it be for such a consummation as a united Church.

The agony of waiting may be almost unendurable—it may test men's souls to the utmost—but a thousand years in God's sight are but as a day, and when Christ comes we do want Him to find faith on the earth!

Tolerance

To the Editor of The Churchman:

I venture to ask space in your columns to call attention to a fact which seems to be unknown to many eminent and learned men, as, for instance, the venerable and esteemed Dr. John P. Peters, who asserts in your "Open Forum" that "our forebears drove out the Methodists for this cause," namely, that they "were men who had a fervent zeal for the spiritual life but who failed to appreciate to its fullest extent the value of tradition and of order in their fervor for spreading the Gospel of Christ and winning souls"!!

In Whitehead's life of Wesley there is given in full a letter written to Wesley by one of his fellow workers, in which the writer refers to the fact of Wesley's being shut out of the pulpits of the Established Church, and Wesley, in his Journal quotes a part—a part only, mark you—of this letter, dwelling upon the fact of his exclusion from said pulpits; but Wesley for some reason saw fit to omit a most important part of his fellow-worker's letter in which that fellow-worker asserted that the reason for his, Wesley's, exclusion from said pulpits was the fact of his preaching the doctrine of Perfection, and he most earnestly urged Wesley to cease to preach this doctrine and to content himself with the preaching of the Gospel!

Now surely, Mr. Editor, it must be seen how important is this fact, since it affords a complete answer to the oft-encountered charge that the Church made a grave mistake in driving out of its fold such pious souls as Wesley and his followers, for thus appears, themselves being the judge that they were denied the pulpits of the Established Church, not for any such reason as Dr. Peters alleges, but for the reason that they insisted on preaching a doctrine that flatly contradicts the fundamental and formulated doctrines of the Established Church.

And surely under such circumstances there was no other course for the Church to pursue, unless, indeed, she agreed with Dr. Delany's opinion, recently vented in your paper, that it is best to have no authoritative and enforced standards of belief, but to adopt the liberal policy of "every one for himself and the Devil," and the learned doctors, "to take the hindmost"!!

Narcotics

To the Editor of The Churchman:

The Joint Commission of Social Service suggests the importance of the clergy preaching on health. When more than twenty-five per cent. of the young men drafted are found unfit for the service of their country we may well consider the seriousness of the situation. Surgeons are finding it harder to heal the wounds of soldiers who use tobacco than those who don't. One of the great evils of our time is the use of narcotics, especially tobacco by boys and young men. Science tells us that narcotics are always hurtful to every one who uses them. The excuse that some give—"I feel no bad effects"—is a very poor one.

Charles B. Town's book, "Habits The Handicap," deals with alcohol, drugs and tobacco in a calm and scientific manner. The use of any of them affects unfavorably body and brain. He says: "Tobacco addiction is more dangerous than the drug habit." Again: "I consider that cigaret smoking is the greatest vice devastating humanity today, because it is doing more than any other vice to deteriorate the human race." W. H. Tomlins.

The New Books

Canadian Sea Dogs

SEA DOGS AND MEN AT ARMS, A Canadian Book of Songs. By Jesse Edgar Middleton. G. P. Putnam's Sons: New York and London. 1918. $1.50.

There is a swing that is a bit reminiscent of Barrack Room Ballads in these delightful sea and war songs of a Canadian. Jesse Middleton knows the sea; he knows Canada; he loves them both, and loves England beyond all else. The strong, rugged courage of the boys who fought at Ypres, the breath of the northern woods and the northern seas, the spirit of a liberty-loving race make these virile war poems brave reading.

The American Aviator,

Full brother to the Matterhorn,
A sword point in the blue.

Lord Kitchener,

. . . . . who understood
The luxury of dying to be free.

The Engineer, on the grim lower decks of the battleship,

. . . he who dies without a fight
The prisoned Engineer.

are pictured with vivid, broad strokes. I should like to quote a good many of the poems, The Rejected, The Canadian, Off Heligoland, Missing at Lloyds, but the only satisfactory thing for the reader to do is to buy the book and read them.

The Science of Slaughtering Men

AIRCRAFT AND SUBMARINES. By Willis J. Abbot. New York, 1918: G. P. Putnam's Sons. $3.50.

At first glance this appears to be an ordinary book of the all too abundant kind, but no sooner does one start reading than one finds it to be quite different. Despite its resemblance to the average run of pot boilers it is so well written that it is worth while. Mr. Abbot possesses what so few of his fellow writers on technical war subjects possess, a command of language and a facility of expression which carries one along gleefully. The story he tells of the development of "the science of slaughtering men" through the perfecting of machines which defy the elements is at once fascinating and, though it may be unconsciously so, philosophical. The deeds of the brothers Montgolfier, of Santos-Dumont and Zeppelin and our own Wright brothers are related with real charm. One would like to quote certain passages but perhaps it would be better to advise the reader to get the book. Following the tale of the development of those ingenuities which have changed the locality of Hell come stories of the present war. One could wish there were not so many quotations from sources already public property, but perhaps the papers have already published everything. All in all it is a good book for the scientifically uneducated public. A. R. G.

A New Lincoln Biography

LATEST LIGHT ON ABRAHAM LINCOLN: AND WAR-TIME MEMORIES. By Ervin Chapman, LL.D., Fleming H. Revell Company, New York. 1918. $5.00.

The author of these two volumes is a hero worshiper, as every man should be. He has selected as his hero the greatest of all Americans—Abraham Lincoln. His work is not a "Life" of Mr. Lincoln; it is a cyclopedia. Mr. Chapman, who himself is now nearing his eightieth year, enjoyed personal acquaintance with him, earnestly advocated his election and re-election to the presidency, made a number of speeches in his behalf, and, living in Washington during the Civil War and after, was personally acquainted with many of the famous men of that period.

The work represents a labor of love during fifty years. It has taken that length of time to gather together the numberless authenticated incidents, facts and observations therein recorded. Its value is largely enhanced by many reproductions from original paintings, photographs, etc., and a very complete index of the contents.

Of special interest to the readers of THE CHURCHMAN will be the treatment accorded to the question of the martyred president's attitude toward religion. Some unfortunate remarks of his former law partner in Illinois, Mr. Herndon, have given a general impression that Mr. Lincoln was an unbeliever in religion. This volume shows conclusively that such was not the case. It proves him to have been a man of prayer, strong in his religious faith and experience, and a devout student of the Bible, reading it on every occasion and frequently studying it with the help of a concordance.

The author has borrowed many incidents from an unpublished manuscript by the Rev. Dr. Gurley, whose church in Washington the President attended. One of these tells us of how the clergyman once went, at his parishioner's request, to the White House very early in the morning, in order that they might "talk an hour before breakfast." Their talk was of what may happen to us after death, "a subject of which," says his pastor, "Mr. Lincoln never tired." And he adds: "This morning, however, I was a listener, as Mr. Lincoln did all the talking." To the multitude of his admirers these volumes will prove an exhaustless mine of great value. G. T. D.

A Great American Soldier

THE SOUL OF LEE. By Randolph H. McKim, Longmans, Green & Company, New York. 1918. $1.50.

Not quite sixty years ago America, north and south, was on the march towards the fields of battle. That she is today on the march towards other battlefields gives an extraordinary timeliness to this new study of General Robert E. Lee. For in this time of national trial and effort it is surely well that America should renew her spirit by renewing her contact with the great soldiers of her past. And it is Lee, the great soldier and the great American, that Dr. McKim has portrayed in his book.

The method of the book, too, gives it exceptional interest. It is neither a biography nor a history of Lee's campaigns, though it reveals the outlines of his life and, in a large way, of his battles. Nor is it merely a character study, for the central figure is drawn not at rest but in motion. The author selects the more critical periods in General Lee's career and lets us see the spirit of Lee revealing itself in the press of events—recording itself in decisions, in speech, and in action. His inner spiritual history is thus allowed to manifest itself in a singularly living fashion. We are admitted to the supreme crisis in his life at the beginning of the Civil War; and its progress discloses the spirit of a great military genius, audacious in attack, steady and resourceful in defense. But more and more as the struggle draws down to its close, Lee the man comes to overshadow even Lee the soldier. For the passing of the period of military successes means the full unfolding of a personality of rare and splendid moral and spiritual beauty, a personality of which we see the full stature only in the disaster of Appomattox and in the years in Lexington that followed the surrender. And it is in the portrayal of this Lee, Christian in faith and life, that the study reaches its adequate climax and conclusion.

The book thus has the interest of movement and development without the burden of detail. There are not many left who can write of the Civil War with that sureness of grasp which belongs to those who have shared in the events which they narrate. And Dr. McKim has put in his debt alike those who know much and those who desire to know something of one who, on any accounting, must be reckoned as one of the first among great Americans. W. C. B.

Belgium in War-Time

BELGIUM IN WAR-TIME. By Commandant de Gerlache de Gomery, George H. Doran Company, New York. 50 cents, net.

This is the tragic story of Belgium, the straightforward telling of the Prussian attempt to kill "the country that will not die." It begins with a setting forth of the great economic importance of Belgium before the war, an importance which one did not realize—just as one did not realize the great spirit of the people who could knowingly sacrifice themselves for the safety of civilization.

The author tells of the neutrality of Belgium and the promises of the great countries to preserve that neutrality; then he goes on to tell of the German invasion. This part of the narrative is neither bitter nor partisan, but it has an air of entire truth; it is a compelling indictment—if we needed any further indictment—against the people who have tried to kill a nation. After a chapter on "Ruin and Waste and Devastation" there is a last chapter on "The Soul of Belgium." Belgium does not fear them that have power only to kill the body, and even Prussia's iron heel has not had power to stamp out her soul. So our author says:

"Belgium is not dead; she will not die; she will live because in her soul those virtues are flowering which make nations great and beautiful; a sense of honor, the spirit of independence, courage and patriotism."

Undoubtedly Belgium is from henceforth destined to be thought the most heroic country the world has ever known. If we did not know it before we are sure of it as we read Commandant de Gerlache de Gomery's book. H. J. M.

HEALTH FOR THE SOLDIER AND SAILOR. By Professor Irving Fisher of Yale and Eugene Lyman Fisk, M.D., Funk & Wagnalls Company, New York. 1918. 60 cents. By mail 64 cents.

This little volume, handily bound in khaki cloth, pocket size, is packed with matter of vital importance to the health of our men, in camps, on shipboard, and on the firing-line, every one of whom should have a copy in his kit.

Church History

A HISTORY OF THE CHRISTIAN CHURCH. By Williston Walker. Charles Scribner's Sons. 1918. $3.00.

To write a comprehensive and readable history of the Christian Church in a single volume of six hundred pages would seem to be an impossible task. Yet it is this which Professor Walker has attempted, and in a remarkable degree accomplished. The difficulties of condensing so much and such varied history into a single volume are obvious. Either the narrative is so compressed that the result is a bare summary of events and dates; or else the author confines himself chiefly to an interpretation, or philosophy of Church history, as Rudolph Sohm has done, for example, in his brief, but brilliant, Outlines of Church History, Some have endeavored to meet these difficulties by singling out the chief epochs or turning points of Church history for fuller treatment and neglecting the rest.

Professor Walker has done none of these things. He has written a history of the Church from the very beginning to the present time, dealing with all periods in proper proportions; it is not too condensed to be interesting and readable; and it is a remarkable combination of historical narrative and interpretation. It is, furthermore, a scientific Church history based upon a first-hand study of the sources, taking into account the most recent literature on each period, and written without partisanship. If the known facts do not justify an opinion Professor Walker frankly says so.

One of the most admirable and helpful features of this history is that there are rather full references to the original sources on almost every page. Such references were of little use to the student or general reader in former days, who did not have access to large libraries, but in recent years a number of excellent "Source books" have been published which are convenient and accessible. Our author by constant references to such books makes it possible for the student, or even the general reader, to study Church history in close connection with the sources.

While the whole history is admirably done we may single out some periods for special mention. The treatment of the reformation period shows a profound grasp of the whole subject, as we should expect from the author of The Reformation, and of John Calvin. Period VII, dealing with the modern period, is also especially noteworthy, revealing as it does a wide knowledge of modern events and developments and a deeply intelligent interest in the present situation. This section is all the more acceptable, since most Church histories stop short of the modern period.

With some of Professor Walker's conclusions in the section on the Apostolic and Early Church we find ourselves in disagreement.

We believe, for example, that Mark 1: 27 is susceptible of other interpretations than that Jesus "at first seems to have regarded it (His Kingdom) for Jews only."

We believe that the majority of modern scholars would date St. Mark's Gospel earlier than 75-80 A. D., and that they would place both St. Luke and St. Matthew earlier than 80-95 A. D. Professor Walker joins many continental scholars in thinking that a residence of St. John at Ephesus is not assured, and that "I Timothy and Titus can scarcely be conceived as coming from Paul's time." I Peter is dated 90 A. D., and the "Teaching of the Twelve Apostles" 130-160 A. D., "but presenting a survival of very primitive conditions;" we believe that a majority of modern scholars would place it much earlier—80-110 A. D.

We may add in conclusion that a very helpful feature of the book is the "Bibliographical Suggestions" which give a brief but well-selected list of the best books on each period, including the most recent literature.

There are also four good maps and a very complete index. W. E. Rollins.

A Book of War Prayers

PER CHRISTUM VINCES, Prayers in Time of War. Longmans, Green & Company, New York and London. 1917. 20 cents.

Of all the pamphlets of war prayers which have been published, this thirty-page booklet, which has already passed through numerous editions, seems in many ways the most comprehensive and satisfactory. The order of prayers gives some clue to its scope: The Home, At Eventide, Penitence, Courage in Adversity, The Nation, Those Serving at Home, Army and Navy, Those Who Suffer, Prisoners of War, The Departed, Those Who Minister, The Bereaved, Women of Everyland (a subject often omitted), The Anxious, The Poor and Needy, The Enemy, The Alien and Exile (another subject sometimes forgotten), International Friendship, Russia, Peace and Brotherhood in Ireland, The Church Abroad, Thanksgivings. The very list is suggestive. Suffice it further to say that the prayers chosen are unusually satisfactory, and that the verses and quotations at the beginning of each section give food for meditation. M. J. H.

Early Documents

THE LETTER OF ARISTEAS. Translated by H. St. J. Thackeray, M.A., The Macmillan Company, New York. 1917. $1.00.

THE BOOK OF JUBILEES, OR THE LITTLE GENESIS. Translated by R. H. Charles, D.D., with an introduction by G. H. Box, M.A., The Macmillan Company, New York. 1917. $1.50.

These are two of the latest volumes in that very useful series, Translations of Early Documents, published in England by the S. P. C. K. The first is virtually a new work, edited by a scholar of recognized competence in all matters pertaining to the Septuagint. The translation is very smoothly performed into running English, which it is a pleasure to read. The very brief introduction adopts a date of ca. 120 B. C., and refuses to enter into partition theories. A collection of important passages bearing on the Septuagint forms an interesting appendix.

The translation of Jubilees in the second volume is that published by Dr. Charles in 1902 and reprinted also in the large Oxford Corpus. Canon Box, in his introduction, inclines to the theory of Sadducean authorship. B. S. E.

Books on Prayer

THE RICHES OF PRAYER. By the Author of The Splendor of God, Longmans, Green & Company, New York. 1918. 90 cents.

This is a helpful and beautiful book of devotional literature on the subject of prayer. An old subject surely, but ever capable of new treatment and our author's treatment of the subject is new and fresh. Others have written of the difficulty of prayer; of the scientific and philosophical questions which are involved. Here we have not an attempt to make prayer easy, but to make it real. Prayer is an instinct—the instinct of the consciousness of God—we need to deepen that instinct.

So from the words of the Psalm "Unto Thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul," which the author says is the best definition of prayer in the Bible, he proceeds to deal with the questions of The Directing of Prayer; Our Personal Responsibility; The Labor of Prayer; and the Subject of Prayer. All he says is very real and suggestive. A Scripture Concordance of Prayer, which the book contains, is very valuable. H. J. M.

THE SCIENCE OF PRAYER. By Albert Clarke Wyckoff, Association Press, New York. 1918. 75 cents.

Another book on prayer? Yes, because men discover new meanings to life and new times create new approaches to old truths, and besides prayer is more than a truth, it is a way of living. This book is neither hortatory nor devotional, but academic, though popular, and confines itself to a scientific investigation of the theory and practice of prayer.

Mr. Wyckoff sympathizes with the man who feels that the weight of the world leans against his door and appreciates the difficulties of "Law and Grace," so he builds carefully with the help of science, philosophy and psychology a foundation for the modern man to use as an intellectual base for the superstructure of The Temple of Prayer. The second half of the book deals in a fresh and thoughtful way with the practical side of prayer. To read this book is to be moved to pray in the way commended by St. Paul when he exhorted men to pray with the understanding.

THE TEMPLE. A Book of Prayer. By W. E. Orchard, D.D., E. P. Dutton & Company, New York. 1918. $1.00.

Dr. Orchard's continued affiliation with the so-called Free-Catholic movement in England, a movement laying emphasis on devotional and sacramental practices, quite naturally explains this new book of prayers. The title is suggestive of the manner of approach to the mercy seat and allows for a grouping of the prayers under the headings of "outer gate," "the inner court," etc. The conditions and needs of those who set their faces Godward will always correspond to the ancient divisions of the Temple. The prayers have been used in public worship, after careful preparation but are now meant to be used in the development of personal religion. The Foreword has much practical advice on a proper preparation for prayer. Dr. Frank Crane writes the introduction in which attention is called to the present reaction from materialism and the help afforded through such deeply spiritual prayers as those in this little volume of Dr. Orchard's. R. P. K.

For Country

A LETTER from the Rev. J. Howard Mellish, of Holy Trinity Church, Brooklyn, to the boys of his parish in service, closes as follows:

Lastly, and by no means least, we are all praying for you dear fellows: that you may be kept clean and strong in heart and limb, that you may serve God in the tragic tasks of your day and generation with all your strength, and that in His good time you will return finer and nobler men than when you left us. Or, if you must in the course of duty give up your lives, we pray that you may make the sacrifice with the assurance that true life is not measured in years but in thoughts and deeds; and that for all valiant souls there is the Great Beyond. May the Living Father who never leaves us be your strength and comfort.

THE HONORARY DEGREE of Doctor of Divinity was conferred on the Rev. Samuel Tyler, rector of St. Luke's Church, Rochester, New York, by the Virginia Theological Seminary. "Colonel Nathaniel Rochester, one of the founders of St. Luke's Church," the Rev. Dr. W. A. R. Goodwin, rector of St. Paul's Church, Rochester, writes from the seminary, "was from Westmoreland county, Virginia, from which county came also General George Washington and General Robert E. Lee."

Dr. Samuel Tyler is now engaged in war welfare work at a camp in Alabama, where many men from the district about his former parish in Cincinnati are under training.

THE REV. ELMER M. M. WRIGHT, the ex-rector of the Church of the Holy Trinity, Nashville, Tennessee, is a chaplain in the National Army. He joined the colors sometime in March and arrived in France the early part of April. His present army address is as follows: First Lieutenant, Chaplain Elmer M. M. Wright, 505th Service Battalion, Engineers, American Expeditionary Forces. Anyone who desires to correspond with him can do so by sending the mail to the above given address or through Mrs. E. M. M. Wright, 1732 Heiman Street, Nashville, Tennessee.

THE REV. JOHN E. GERSTENBERG, Vicar of Christ Chapel, Brooklyn, has resigned his post to do war work in France.

THE REV. WALTER D. BUCKNER, rector of Calvary Church, Memphis, Tennessee, is being urged to accept appointment as chaplain for overseas duty. The urgent appeal came from Major E. C. Mitchell, in command of base hospital unit No. 57, and Major F. D. Smythe, chief surgeon. Base hospital unit No. 57 will be one of the largest base hospitals in France.

THE REV. W. J. LOARING CLARK, the beloved rector of St. Paul's Church, Chattanooga, Tennessee, has accepted the war call as chaplain of the Fourth Tennessee and is probably now on his way to France.

This makes four of the Episcopal clergy of the Diocese of Tennessee who have gone into the overseas work. Archdeacon Claiborne has already arrived in France.

Dr. Clark has been doing chaplain service at the Chickamauga cantonment ever since it was established. He was with the 4,000 young men who composed the first training camp and was with the second and third training camp boys.

Both Dr. and Mrs. Clark have been among the most zealous workers in all patriotic lines. One son, Harry Loaring Clark, is now with the 117th infantry "somewhere in France." He was among the very first to volunteer with the American forces. Their oldest boy lost his life in the early part of the war, fighting side by side with the Canadians.

THE REV. FREDERICK H. DANKER, rector of St. Luke's Church, Worcester, Massachusetts, has been given a leave of absence from his parish and is now in France. He is attached to the American Expeditionary Force as War Secretary of the Y. M. C. A. Chaplain Walton S. Danker, his brother, who was recently awarded the Croix de Guerre for bravery under fire, has been in France since last October with his regiment, the 104th Infantry.

THE REV. G. P. T. SARGENT, rector of Grace Church, Grand Rapids, Michigan, will be at Camp Logan as Camp Chaplain throughout the summer, representing the War Commission of the Diocese of Chicago, and under appointment by the Senior Chaplain of the Naval District.

THE REV. HENRY P. HORTON, rector of St. John's Church, Ithaca, has been granted leave of absence for the summer and expects to do Y. M. C. A. work at Camp Dix.

THE REV. ROLFE P. CRUM, rector of St. Mark's Church, Syracuse, has been granted leave of absence for one year and expects to sail soon for France to be Red Cross Chaplain under Bishop McCormick.

FROM THE WAR COMMISSION

THE WAR COMMISSION is frequently getting letters both from voluntary chaplains and from chaplains overseas to the effect that our men in home camps and at the front are eager to receive letters from their clergy. This applies to the laity as well as to the clergy; to fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters and friends. As one of our army chaplains overseas writes: "Tell your people to write long and often to the men in the army and navy. Letters are the chief pleasure we have, and that is not to say that life has not many pleasant features."

THE WAR COMMISSION Office is making out as thorough a list as possible of chaplains in the army, of voluntary chaplains and of Red Cross chaplains, also of the clergy who are enlisted as either officers or privates. It will be published before long. It will necessarily be incomplete, for the chaplains move from place to place very rapidly. Corrections will be received at this office with pleasure. In fact, the Commission counts on the clergy of the Church to keep it specifically informed of the movements of the chaplains. It would also be glad to hear of the work being done in a more informal way by local clergy at any of our camps.

MANY LETTERS ARE coming in to the office asking whether the names of our men in the service should be filed with the War Commission. Such names should be sent to the Army and Navy Council of the Brotherhood of Saint Andrew, corner Twelfth and Walnut Streets, Philadelphia, Pennsylvania. The Brotherhood has charge of this list.

If your copy of The Churchman is late in arriving, wait two weeks before writing. We are doing all that we can to speed up deliveries.

Atlantic Mutual Insurance Co.

Atlantic Building 51 Wall Street New York

Insures against Marine and Inland Transportation Risk and will issue policies making loss payable in Europe and Oriental countries.

Chartered by the State of New York in 1842, was preceded by a stock company of a similar name. The latter company was liquidated and part of its capital, to the extent of $100,000, was used, with consent of the stockholders, by the Atlantic Mutual Insurance Company and repaid with a bonus and interest at the expiration of two years.

During its existence the company has insured property to the value of $30,949,773,989.00. Received premiums thereon to the extent of $312,671,550.90. Paid losses during that period $152,928,388.68. Issued certificates of profits to dealers $96,523,710.00. Of which there have been redeemed $90,801,110.00. Leaving outstanding at present time $5,722,600,00. Interest paid on certificates amounts to $24,494,668.95. On December 31, 1917, the assets of the company amounted to $18,041,890.25.

The profits of the company revert to the assured and are divided annually upon the premiums terminated during the year, thereby reducing the cost of insurance.

For such dividends, certificates are issued subject to dividends or interest until ordered to be redeemed, in accordance with the charter.

Commencement at St. John's

SALINA, KANSAS.—St. John's Military School held its closing exercises during the week beginning June 3. On Sunday the Commencement sermon to the graduating class and cadets was delivered in Christ Cathedral by Bishop Sage.

On Wednesday Commencement Day drills, Guard Mount, Dress Parade, and various exhibition drills were held, after which the guests, parents and school repaired to the gymnasium for the luncheon and awarding of academic, athletic, and military medals and trophies. About two hundred guests were served at the luncheon. Commencement closed with the ceremony of Retreat on the school campus.

Because of the conditions brought about by the war, the past year has been one of the most difficult ever experienced by St. John's and yet from the standpoint of attendance it has been one of the most successful in the history of the school.

Encouragement From Major Brent

NEW YORK CITY.—Major Charles H. Brent, Senior Headquarters Chaplain of the American Expeditionary Force in France, has recently written to Dr. Robert E. Speer, Chairman of the General War-Time Commission of the Churches, as follows: "I am deeply indebted to the War-Time Commission for their encouragement. We are trying to shape our office with a view to meeting the situation in the most whole-hearted way, and do everything with reference to the Kingdom of God. We have met with nothing but support from all sides. The new Chaplains who are coming in impress us as being men of right type."

COLONEL TELLS TRINITY MEN HE LIKES TO PREACH

And Proceeds to Preach Against Grandiloquent Statements by America

HARTFORD, CONN.—Theodore Roosevelt told a throng of 5,000 persons under the campus elms of Trinity College at the services of the commencement exercises here Sunday last that the censorship, "unpleasant as it has been at times," should be extended to put a stop to "grandiloquent statements" of what Americans were going to do in the war. He urged that words be translated into deeds, and declared that the Gettysburg speech had been made possible only by men who had fought there. He charged that the boast that America would have 20,000 airplanes by this spring with Pershing's men stimulated Germany to build and not to brag.

The Colonel also said that Americans should not deceive themselves with the notion that they had done their duty, because the war had just begun for America. Profiteering, he said, had been wiped out, 90 per cent. of it at least had stopped when the United States became an active belligerent.

"I have been accused of liking to preach," he declared. "I do. My text for today will be from First Kings, xx, 11, in which the King of Israel told Ben-Hadad: 'Let not him that girdeth on his harness boast himself as he that putteth it off.'"

Increasing Demand for Chaplains

Figures recently received from the War Department indicate that Protestant churches will be called upon to supply 160 candidates for chaplaincies each month for some time.

Have You a Lantern?

New York City.—About 600 children and mothers from the hot and ill-ventilated tenements of New York City are given a recuperative vacation every year at Tomkins Cove by the Fresh Air Association of the Cathedral (St. John the Divine). This summer the committee in charge would like to give lantern talks to the mothers and children; they would like to show pictures that illustrate the history and character of our Allies in Europe. Patriotic work of a real kind could thus be done. The Home at Tomkins Cove has no lantern. Some individual or parish that has recently purchased a moving picture machine may have an electrical lantern that is not being used. Would such a parish or individual lend or donate the lantern for this patriotic work? Please correspond through The Churchman.

A Southern Bishop Writes:

"I have been taking The Churchman 48 years, from the time of its old safe and sane ways, never offending anybody, nor helping anybody very much to keep abreast of world movements, and I am moved to say to you that your issue of the 18th instant (May 18) was the most interesting number I have read in the now near 50 years that I have been reading your paper; and I want heartily to congratulate you on bringing the paper up to the highest standard it has ever reached in its long career, and which, I am sure, if the present editorial policy continues, will make it a great power in our Church, and out of it. The paper is full of good things from the editorial columns all the way through."

For Country

ENSIGN CHARLES CABANNE KROEHLE was buried with full military honors in St. Louis recently. His father, Ernest F. Kroehle, has long been an active member of the League of Lay Readers of the diocese. Ensign Kroehle lost his life at the age of twenty-three, as an aviator, in an accident at the Naval Operating Base Air School at Hampton Roads, Virginia.

THE REV. THOMAS C. CAMPBELL, Rector of St. John's Episcopal Church, Jamaica Plain, Massachusetts, whose services for Red Cross work in England have been asked by Ambassador Page, has secured the Rev. George D. Harris, Rector of St. James' Episcopal Church, Fall River, to take care of the parish during the summer. Mr. Harris and his family will occupy the rectory, 24 Alveston Street, Jamaica Plain.

MR. WARWICK HARRIS, son of the Rev. George D. Harris, is in the 101st Infantry in France. He was one of those "eighty days in the trenches" reported a short time ago. He writes, however, that he is "well and feeling fine."

HORACE R. CHASE, Camp Secretary, Brotherhood of St. Andrew, has asked that rectors, friends and relatives send the full names, regiment, battery, or company of Church boys who are at Camp Wheeler, Georgia. He should be addressed in care of Y. M. C. A. 46, Camp Wheeler, Georgia.

Personals

THE REV. H. M. SAVILLE may be addressed at his summer home at East Greenwich, Rhode Island.

THE STANDING COMMITTEE of the Diocese of Central New York has organized by the election of the Rev. Edward H. Coley, D.D., of Utica as President, and the Rev. James C. Parker of Waterville as Secretary.

THE REV. A. B. HUNTER of Raleigh, North Carolina, is in charge of St. John's Church, Manchester, Vermont, for the summer. His address is Manchester Depot, R. F. D., Vermont.

GROVE CITY COLLEGE, Pennsylvania, conferred the degree of Doctor of Divinity upon the Venerable Reginald S. Radcliffe, rector of Grace Church, Ridgway, and Archdeacon in the Diocese of Erie at the Commencement, June 12.

THE ADDRESS OF the Rev. Geo. R. Van De Water, rector of St. Andrew's Church, New York City, until next October will be Gilbertsville, Otsego County, New York. The Rev. Charles J. Mason will be the curate in charge of the parish.

THE REV. ROBERT LEB. LYNCH has been called to the rectorship of St. James' Church, Amesbury, Massachusetts. This is the same parish of which he was rector some ten years ago. He has since been rector at Woodstock, Vermont, and locum tenens at St. Michael's Church, Milton, Massachusetts.

THE RT. REV. SAMUEL G. BABCOCK, D.D., Suffragan Bishop of Massachusetts, is spending the summer in Cohasset, Massachusetts. He returns regularly to Boston for office hours at the Diocesan House.

AT THE LATE Commencement of the University of Pittsburgh the degree of Doctor of Divinity was bestowed upon the Rev. Edward Schofield Travers, rector of Trinity Parish, Pittsburgh.

ON THURSDAY EVENING, June 13, the Rev. Floyd W. Tomkins, Jr., was instituted into the rectorship of All Saints' Church, Allegheny, Pennsylvania, by Bishop Whitehead, the Rev. Dr. John Dows Hills of the Church of the Epiphany preaching the sermon.

THE REV. DANZEL C. LEES, late of Alva, Oklahoma, is now in charge of the work at Buena Vista and neighborhood, Diocese of Colorado.

THE REV. EDWARD F. HAYWARD, late of Chippewa Falls, Wisconsin, has entered upon his duties as rector of St. Matthew's Church, Enid, Oklahoma (West Oklahoma).

THE REV. FREDERICK LOUIS GRATIOT, for the past two years Children's Curate at Trinity Church, Highland Park, Delaware, has become assistant to Dr. James S. Stone at St. James' Church, Chicago. His address is 666 Rush Street.

Our Contributors

We recall reading in an old book of devotion, Corbett's Self-Employment, an admirable piece of advice for editors to take to heart: "Guard against the expectation of hearing thine own praise, and when such thought arises instantly suppress it." But after all, editors are not likely to be left long exposed to the temptation of complacency. The other day one of THE CHURCHMAN'S well-wishers sent the following roseate view of our labors: "I never read a copy of THE CHURCHMAN nowadays (which is every week) without renewing my admiration for the genius that has transformed it." Self-satisfaction was beginning to get in the thin edge of its dangerous wedge, but the morning mail brought this: "Please discontinue THE CHURCHMAN. The tone of its editorials is not gentlemanly."

It evens up.

Dean Hodges has been good enough to let us publish his sermon upon Hatred, which was preached in St. Paul's Chapel of Columbia College during Lent. Everything the Dean of the Cambridge Theological School has written about the war has been so profoundly Christian that we are glad to share this sermon upon Hate with our readers.

The Rev. R. T. Henshaw is the rector of Christ Church, Rye, New York. His paper Christian Marriage in the Early Church was read before the 1917 Church Congress.

Rose Scott, a member of the Guild of St. Barnabas for Nurses, read the paper on the Guild published in this number at the synod of the Province of Washington held in Philadelphia last November. Miss Scott's home is in Rosemont, Pennsylvania.

Arthur Wallace Peach, whose verses Illusion appear this week, is a regular contributor who lives in Northfield, Vermont.

The Rev. Arthur R. Gray, D.D., who is now secretary for Latin-America at the Church Missions House, was Educational Secretary from 1911 until 1917. During that time the Education Department, from being a small one-man department or half-a-man department of the Board of Missions, became one of the most important and useful departments in that bee-hive at 281 Fourth Avenue, New York. One of the most interesting and serviceable of its features is the lending library developed under Dr. Gray's leadership, and now enlarged and housed in adequate quarters in the new offices into which Dr. Sturgis has just moved the Educational Department. Dr. Gray is a specialist on Books About the Mission Field, and his three articles, of which the first is published this week, should be of real service to Churchpeople.

How the War Promotes Unity

By Roy B. Guild

Executive Secretary, Commission on Inter-Church Federations of the Federal Council

The determination of the churches in large cities to deal effectively and unitedly with community problems which have been made more serious by the war has resulted in the rapid advance in the church federation movement. Inactive federations have come to life, new federations have been formed, executive secretaries are being called for faster than they can be secured.

After a steady campaign of education the churches of Norfolk, Virginia, have been mobilized. A financial campaign has just come to a close in which pledges for two years amounting to over four thousand dollars have been secured. The presence of fifty thousand soldiers, sailors, aviators and navy yard employes in that district required such a campaign.

Youngstown, Ohio, has organized a federation and will have an executive secretary, June 1. Akron, Ohio, is completing the mobilizing of the churches. The new St. Paul Federation conducted its financia campaign April 22 to 29. Johnstown Pennsylvania, revived its federation and has had a secretary for six months. Omaha Nebraska, has completed plans for securing funds to carry on the work under executive leadership.

For several years there has been a federation of churches in Philadelphia. No much has been done except by the Committee on Social Service. At the last annua meeting the Rev. Carl E. Grammer, recto of St. Stephen's Protestant Episcopa Church, was elected president. For th next few months, assisted by the Rev. Wm Berg, pastor of the Central Congregationa Church, Dr. Grammer will supply the executive leadership as "his bit" in war service. At a recent luncheon $2,000,000 wa raised in a few minutes to finance the federation until October, by which time a executive secretary will be employed.

The Fourth of July and a New Nation

IT is a transformed people who will celebrate the Fourth of July this year. A new international consciousness has come into being, loose as yet, it may be, and not clearly articulate in its aims, but nevertheless the citizens of the United States are feeling themselves to be in a new sense a nation. One could not help being strongly impressed by this fact the other day in New York City, when one of the most picturesque processions which has ever passed through the streets of the city wound its way out of Yorkville. People of every nationality who inhabit that thickly populated section of the metropolis, in their holiday and patriotic attire marched through the streets. There were Greeks and Hebrews, Poles and Scandinavians, Italians and Slavs of every type. Their bands played the national airs, and as men and women, young and old, and little children marched to the tune of "Over There" and the "Star Spangled Banner" a sympathetic observer saw that this group of people gathered from many races was symbolic of a hope that America has aroused in the heart of the world, and the new meaning which the world struggle has taken on since America entered the world conflict. It would be a tragic failure in responsibility if America should disappoint this childlike, passionate dream of the world's disfranchised and lowly folk.

It has been interesting to note how during the last two years the emphasis of the war has shifted. From the first days of August, 1914, it was apparent that the struggle was one of tremendous spiritual significance. It was not to be like other wars. And yet America's entrance into the conflict compelled the world to see that a new passion was transfiguring the nature of the struggle; that the common man had determined to find a place in the council chambers of the nations for a new definition of diplomacy. The visionaries and dreamers were at last to demand with their sacrificial blood that human values which the lowly men of earth prize shall have a hearing from the statesmen. Poor, shepherdless, blind Russia, paying with her blood and treasures for folly, tragic in its consequence, presents after all a sublime picture of a nation's soul reaching upward for life. Russia, sinned against for ages by her own flesh and blood, kept by intent in ignorance, the taxes she has so lavishly poured into the public treasury by her sweat and blood, filched for the oppressors' enrichment, becomes in her very zeal for freedom a victim of that same ignorance which was fastened upon her by those who should have led her into light.

The Fourth of July this year will give a new thrill to that age-old passion for human freedom.

Japan and America

THE web of anti-Japanese propaganda has been cleverly spun by jingo politicians and the jingo press until at times it has menaced very seriously the friendship between the United States and the kingdom of the Rising Sun. This is the more tragic because the United States, though so young a nation, was the one to rouse Japan from her three centuries of sleep and introduce her to the European Powers. The bond that exists between us is an especially close and sacred one. The very thought of disharmony between the two nations is therefore peculiarly deplorable.

The visit of Viscount Ishii and the Imperial Japanese Mission last autumn did much to allay suspicion and to bring about a better understanding between the two peoples and their Governments. The record of their visit, just published by the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace,[1] is reassuring reading. The theme of everyone of Viscount Ishii's speeches is the friendship and the necessity of co-operation between Japan and the United States, the likeness of our national aspirations and the similarity of our motives in the present war.

"The purpose of my mission," he said at a meeting at Independence Hall, Philadelphia, "was and is to tell this and only this—that we stand with you and will stand throughout the struggle for liberty and for freedom, and that we shall rejoice with you when this bell shall again ring the proclamation of a righteous peace as it rang one hundred and thirty-four years ago."

He was frank in his treatment of the German anti-Japanese propaganda, especially in his addresses to newspaper men. His attitude is summarized very well in the following words, again from one of the Philadelphia speeches:

> Japan and America have been victims of a vicious campaign of slander and intrigue as dastardly and as horrible indeed as the black record of German crimes on the Atlantic, in Belgium, or in France can show. But we are wide awake now to the danger, and in this as in other fields of active warfare against our common enemy we will in future stand closer together because of the experiences of the past.

And again in his address at the Municipal Dinner in New York, speaking of the Open Door in China:

> I am persuaded that the grumblings and the whisperings about a door closed in China by the Japanese against America did not come from the broad and generous heart of the enterprising American in New York or elsewhere, but as the result of ten years of an enemy's effort to create prejudice and distrust. Gentlemen, I assure you that a closed door in China has never been, and never will be, the policy of my government. The door is open, the field is there. We welcome co-operation and competition, all tending to the betterment of the equal opportunity. . . . For many years our common enemy has been the worst enemy of China, as Germany is the worst enemy of all that is honest and decent and fair. Since the outbreak of the war in Europe China has been a hot-bed of German intrigue, and in all of this China has perhaps been the greatest sufferer. . . . I can give you as my conviction that the German in China is responsible for most of the unfortunate occurrences and the malicious widespread misinformation scattered throughout the world for the one purpose of impairing the relations of the countries concerned in China and securing the downfall of China to Germany's advantage. When Japan or America appeared to make progress in China we always have had the sinister rumor of oppression or the false suggestion of a policy directed against the integrity of that country; boycotts, which have cost you, first of all, and then us, millions; revolutions, disturbances and civil war have prevented a development by which China, first of all, and her honest friends might profit.

There are alarming evidences that this propagandum is still active. On the very day that the Ishii mission landed in the United States a syndicated article of the most venomous type, attempting to discredit the mission and its purpose, appeared simultaneously in newspapers all over the country. Two incendiary books giving full information of the devilish plottings of Japan and of the awful danger that lurks across the Pacific were published no later than last year. It is therefore reassuring to know that two excellent refutations of these miserable stories have also been recently published,[2] one by the 1913-14 Billings lecturer in China, Japan and India, the Rev. Dr. Jabez T. Sunderland, called Rising Japan, and the other, Anti-Japanese War Scare Stories,[3] by no less an authority than the Rev. Dr. Sidney L. Gulick.

Dr. Gulick's pamphlet takes up in detail the absurd stories that have been so freely circulated, and places by their side the irrefutable facts. The Magdalena Bay story is typical. The Hearst journals insisted that there were 60,000 Japanese, fully armed, and drilling daily on the shores of Magdalena Bay; inquiry revealed six immigrant fishermen! The 150,000 veteran Japanese troops in Mexico likewise dwindled down to 2,000 odd laborers. "It may not be amiss to note that all these stories about masses of Japanese troops in Mexico have ceased to circulate since January, 1917," Dr. Gulick dryly adds. "Had there been truth in them, the Japanese soldiers would of course still be in Mexico and we could not fail to hear about them."

Dr. Sunderland goes deeper. He analyzes the new civilization and the national aspirations of the Japanese with the result of a reductio ad absurdum of the whole structure of falsehood which has been reared on this Japanese-über-America ambition made in Germany. It is absurd to suppose that a nation whose national ambition is industrial and commercial development, who has always deprecated war and urged peace, who has shown sincere and earnest desire to maintain friendly relations with us, who is bound by treaties to our own ally, Great Britain, would leave her back exposed to China, Russia and Germany, and imperil her commerce, to wage an offensive war on a nation with between two or three times as large a navy, across the broadest ocean in the world. One gasps at the gullibility of people! That even the clever yellow-journal hoax that stoops to the most flagrant misquotation and misrepresentation, and that gives as authentic the reports of daring scandal mongers, should be able to make anybody believe the possibility of this ridiculous supposition seems incredible.

The Problem of the Pacific

The trouble is, as Dr. Gulick says, that German intrigue and German gold—and we know to our sorrow how powerful these weapons are—are not the exclusive cause of the anti-Japanese campaign in America. There has been a real racial problem on the Pacific. Anyone familiar with conditions in California appreciates the truth of this fact. In the second place, to quote Dr. Gulick again, "it has been notable that for a dozen years whenever bills have been before Congress calling for substantial increase in the navy, a flood of scare stories has gone out over the country of the dangers we face and the need of more battleships." Our need for battleships to check another power than Japan is so pressing at present that this second factor in the anti-Japanese propaganda has ceased to exist, but the first must be faced.

Matters are improving. The Gentlemen's Agreement has stopped immigration. The fine and loyal response of the Japanese to Liberty Loan and Red Cross appeals and their readiness to fight for their adopted country is changing the attitude of their neighbors on the Pacific Coast.

A Revised Immigration Law

Dr. Gulick proposes and Dr. Sunderland endorses as a remedy for the present unhappy condition in which the United States by racial discrimination in her immigration laws has wounded the pride of both China and Japan, that there be national control of immigration and that a new and better immigration law be evolved. The applications of the principles of Christianity to international relationships, as has been pointed out by many, is the only possible way of ending war. The prevention of misunderstanding, falsehood, suspicions and enmity is the only prevention of international strife. It is a well-known fact that the Emperor of Japan has given very largely to the new St. Luke's Hospital in Tokyo; his example has been followed by many Japanese high in the affairs of government and of industry. The new hospital will be St. Luke's International Hospital. It is regarded as a pledge of international friendship. It is said that this tangible evidence of the principles upon which alone international good feeling and understanding can rest has done much to reassure excited public feeling in Japan. Missionaries are sometimes our most successful diplomats.

Chronicle and Comment on Current Events

Simplicity in Dress

SIMPLICITY of dress at public worship was one of the strikingly practical admonitions in Bishop Lines's address to his Convention this year. The question of apparel was in an earlier time considered to be of enough importance to receive a good deal of Scriptural emphasis. One of the most pointed Homilies of our Church is devoted to the question. It is a subject, perhaps, all too seldom touched upon by rectors in their public teaching. Doubtless the reason of this reticence is that one naturally assumes that simplicity of dress in church is a matter of instinct with Christians. One hesitates to give public admonition on questions of good manners that are so obvious, yet experience ought to tell us we can't afford to take too much for granted in this respect. There are congregations in the Episcopal Church which have the word fashionable stamped on every lineament and they are unashamed. This is partly the fault of the teaching. People could have been taught to see that Christian good taste makes for simplicity. In this connection it is a privilege to quote from a little pamphlet of suggestions for the communicants of Grace parish written by Dr. Huntington many years ago. It is very intimate and personal and was not designed for general distribution, but we believe that Dr. Huntington would not be unwilling to let our readers profit by words that were part of a message that has been builded into the spiritual life of the great parish associated with his name. In speaking of dress at the Holy Communion he says: "It is timely to add that while simplicity of attire is to be wished for on all occasions of public worship, it is especially the duty of Christian people when celebrating 'these holy mysteries,' to avoid anything in the way of dress or personal ornament, likely to distract the attention of others, or to be even misinterpreted as ostentatious."

The Yellow Peril

THE Hearst publications must have been hard hit by the wave of public indignation and disgust which has passed over the country. Popular waves of feeling are the very breath of Mr. Hearst's nostrils and he is the first to scent their meaning. A campaign of public education is now undertaken by the Hearst journals to inform the public of the high brand of patriotism of the owner of these journals. We are informed of what they have done in behalf of Liberty Bonds and of their work in the Red Cross Drive. Evidence is presented to show us that they are one hundred per cent. American.

It doesn't interest us in the least to know what Mr. Hearst has done to help sell Liberty Bonds and to further the drives of the Red Cross. The country can jog along with its war debts and provide for the Red Cross without Mr. Hearst's help. But people are beginning to take an interest in the damage which can be done by the streak of yellow in Mr. Hearst's patriotism. He will be made powerless to do harm if the American people can keep fully informed of just what interests Mr. Hearst is serving.

Seminaries in War-Time

A DISCERNING contributor and friend of The Churchman called up the editor by telephone the other day to make some suggestions, offered in all modesty, for increasing the usefulness of our theological schools during the period of the war. As publicity has been given to the fact that as the war goes on we shall have professors without students and seminaries without classes, "long-felt wants" begin to assert themselves. In passing these suggestions on the seminaries, The Churchman does so in an humble spirit, knowing that the faculties of our theological schools are men well abreast of the times and conversant with the larger spiritual movements of the day. They are eager to offer to their church and country the best which it lies within their power to give. Among the suggestions of our contributor are these: Why not have classes for laymen? Massachusetts, we read, is about to conscript laymen for the work of the Church. Let the seminaries have night classes or vacation schools to train laymen for Church work. Some of the seminaries are already doing this.

Again it is suggested that the subject of community organization receive the attention of the theological seminaries. There is leisure now for inquiring into some of the principles of community work. The problem has many sides, and some pretty strong light has been thrown upon it by revelations made by the war. Again there might be held at the seminaries general conferences upon the problem of the Church and the world. This is one of fundamental Christian interest just now. We are publishing in our news columns extracts from a circular entitled "War Measures" adopted by the Philadelphia Divinity School. It deserves careful reading.

Kossovo Day

JUNE 28 is Kossovo Day, the anniversary of the day when the medieval empire was overthrown by the Turk. It will be observed this year to commemorate the continuing spirit of resistance to oppression and the love of liberty of the Serbian race. Dean Robbins, in his sermon at the impressive service held in the Cathedral of St. John the Divine, said of that indomitable spirit:

"Kossovo Day is a cry out of the deep. It voices the sufferings of a race that, more than five hundred years ago, met martyrdom for freedom. It voices its patience through a captivity which lasted centuries longer than the exile which Israel, when this psalm was written, had been called to undergo. And it voices a hope, a hope kept burning through five centuries, that has all the sacredness of faith and patience which we associate so justly with Israel's deathless hope. Do not these two nations belong together in our thoughts? They passed through an identical experience. Each stood in the path of great and ruthless conquerors seeking world dominion. Each defied those conquerors in the name of freedom and of faith. Each, after offering heroic resistance, was smitten down by brutal force. But Israel proved, and Serbia has also proved, that there is something in the world which is stronger than brute force, however overwhelming in its onset. There is that indestructible thing, the spirit of a nation, that remembers. There is that invincible thing, the faith that through defeat, through captivity, through martyrdom, still lifts up its heart, and calls to God for deliverance out of the deep.

"So today, friends of Serbia, let our first word be one of gratitude, gratitude to the nation that has given the world a great example of steadfastness, gratitude to the nation that through five centuries of darkness kept burning the torch of faith. Some years ago my attention was called to a peculiarity in the headdress worn occasionally by the peasants of Montenegro. It was a little badge of mourning. I was told that this emblem of sorrow was in memory of the battle of Kossovo, a battle fought in 1389, in which the Serbian army had been defeated and all but annihilated by the Turks, and the remnant had fled to the Black Mountains to find refuge, becoming there the ancestors of the modern Montenegrins. I confess that I had never heard of Kossovo before. But having once heard the story, who can ever forget it? It is one of the most romantic stories in history, this story of the nation that in the fourteenth century guarded the frontiers of Eastern Christendom, and there did battle for the liberties of Christendom against the Turk. It was a lost battle, so far as the immediate outcome was concerned. The Turks swept on in their career of conquest. One by one they conquered for Mohammed the Christian principalities of southeastern Europe, and were surging at the very gates of Vienna before they were finally stayed. But by that bloody engagement on the field of Kossovo the Turks were halted. Europe was given a breathing space in which to muster her forces of resistance, and to rescue Christendom from the blight of an inferior civilization. And this breathing-space was made possible by Serbian resistance. What Belgium did for the Entente Allies in the first months of 1914, Serbs did for Europe on the field of Kossovo. They laid down their life, but their life was the purchase price of freedom for those who stood behind them."

Making Ready for the New Day

IN President Wilson's letter read in Newark, New Jersey, March 20, 1918, there is set forth more clearly than we have yet seen it expressed the spirit of disinterested service in which all of us must attack the problem of the new day. These words are as instructive to Churchmen troubled over the problems of their responsibilities as they are to politicians and statesmen:

"Every sign of these terrible days of war and revolutionary change, when economic and social forces are being released upon the world whose effect no political seer dare venture to conjecture, bids us search our hearts through and make them ready for the birth of a new day—a day, we hope and believe, of greater opportunity and greater prosperity for the average mass of struggling men and women, and of greater safety and opportunity for children.

"The old party slogans have lost their significance and will mean nothing to the voter of the future, for the war is certain to change the mind of Europe as well as the mind of America. Men everywhere are searching democratic principles to their hearts in order to determine their soundness, their sincerity, their adaptability to the real needs of their life, and every man with any vision must see that the real test of justice and right action is presently to come as it never came before.

"The days of political and economic reconstruction which are ahead of us no man can now definitely assess, but we know this, that every program must be shot through and through with utter disinterestedness; that no party must try to serve itself, but every party must try to serve humanity, and that the task is a very practical one, meaning that every program, every measure in every program, must be tested by this question, and this question only: Is it just; is it for the benefit of the average man, without influence or privilege; does it embody in real fact the highest conception of social justice and of right dealing without respect of person or class or particular interest?

"This is a high test. It can be met only by those who have genuine sympathy with the mass of men and real insight into their needs and opportunities, and a purpose which is purged alike of selfish and of partisan intention."

The Practical Politics of Home Reunion

AN important address was lately given by Canon E. A. Burroughs to "the deputies of Protestant dissenters of the three denominations (Presbyterian, Independent and Baptist) at their Annual Meeting at the Memorial Hall, London," and is now published by the Christian Commonwealth, Salisbury Square, E.C.4. It is a valuable contribution to the great cause of union. Its title—"The Practical Politics of Home Reunion"—is, as the author himself says, not a very exact description of the address itself. Rather he gives us the philosophy of the question. This is, as he says, something more important. His permanent policy turns on two points: (1) the recognition of Nonconformist orders as valid, though from an Anglican point of view irregular; (2) the acceptance by Nonconformist bodies of episcopacy. The former would rid the latter of any suggestion that in the acceptance of the Episcopate there was implied condemnation of the earlier ministrations; and while Canon Burroughs' language is not identical with that of the interim report just issued by the Joint Committee on Faith and Order, there is not a great gulf between them in practice. One practical suggestion, however, Canon Burroughs has to make. He urges it not only in the cause of unity, but also of the national well-being. It is a great preaching mission, in which all religious bodies should unite, "to create the moral passion, which, to our shame, does not exist today, or if it exists cannot yet express and assert itself." It must be a united effort, for separately we can make no impression; but a united effort is possible, for "there is nothing here in which Cardinal Bourne might not unite with General Booth," and there may be much truth in Canon Burroughs' contention that after a six months' campaign together the problem of reunion, so far as the Church of England and the Free Churches are concerned, would be already in a fair way to solution.—The Challenge.

The Case of Ireland

By THE REV. REGINALD J. CAMPBELL

THE state of affairs in Ireland at the present time is occasioning much perplexity to thoughtful and fair-minded Englishmen. The Government is being severely blamed in many quarters in this country for introducing and determining to force through in the teeth of all opposition a measure applying conscription to Ireland on the same terms as it has long existed in the rest of the United Kingdom. A certain section of the public press has attacked the Prime Minister and his colleagues with great bitterness on this account, using freely such epithets as "insane," "lunatic politicians," "cynically tyrannous," &c., &c. Some organs go so far as to inform us that the contemplated measure puts us in a false light before the world, is on a par with Prussian methods in enslaving Belgians and Poles, and diametrically opposed to the principles for which we profess to be fighting. That such language should be common in Irish periodicals is not perhaps surprising under the circumstances, but that there should be so much of it in journals claiming to represent Liberal feeling in Great Britain is somewhat difficult to understand considering all that is at stake. The Government may be well-advised or ill-advised in pursuing the course announced; it may issue in disaster or it may not; but what on earth has that to do with the right or wrong of the issue thus declared? The only question for us is whether Ireland ought to fight or not, and there could hardly be a doubtful answer on that point once the facts are fairly faced.

We are fighting for our lives today; our backs are to the wall; we have thrown into the conflict every morsel of strength that we possess. We are fighting, not for empire or domination, but to avert from the whole world the gravest menace that has ever assailed human liberty and well-being. The war is not our war; it was none of our making; it is a war of mankind, and we were brought into it in the first instance because of the horrible fate that befell a little Catholic country with which one might have supposed Ireland's sympathies would be even keener than ours. As time has gone on the nature of the moral principles involved in the struggle has become so clear that practically every democracy on the face of the globe has been enlisted on our side, and this has been demonstrated above all by the whole-hearted manner in which the United States have come to our aid. America had no national interest to serve in joining in the bloody inferno in Europe. Never was a loftier act on the part of a great people than that with which she threw in her lot with the Allies; American troops fight by our side in France and Flanders today because President Wilson saw and said that the nation whose elected chief he was could not stand by and see the old world mastered by Prussianism; he knew that the moment had come for the universal vindication of the great principles on which the American constitution rests.

This is how America thinks and acts, and yet Ireland hangs back—nay more, is largely hostile to the British cause, which is the American cause and the cause of all free people. We do not forget the noble exceptions to this sweeping classification. We remember with respect and something warmer the magnificent lead which Mr. John Redmond endeavored to give to his countrymen at the beginning of the war; we remember how his brother died fighting with our armies; we recall with gratitude and admiration the glorious record of the Irish regiments, who have stood shoulder to shoulder with their comrades of the sister island in the blood-soaked trenches on the Western Front and elsewhere for the last three and a half years: in particular, we cannot but acknowledge what Ulster has done, is doing, and will do in the sharing of our burdens and perils. But the rest of Ireland—the Irish swayed by the Spanish De Valera and Sinn Fein, now aided and abetted by Mr. Dillon and the Nationalists—this Ireland will have nothing to say to any proposal that she should do her bare duty. No coercion should have been necessary; for her own credit's sake, for truth and honor's sake, Ireland, as a whole, should have been in this war long ago shoulder to shoulder with the men of France, Italy, and Belgium, and her own kinsfolk and ours beyond the seas. To put the case on the very simplest ground, what is America's fight is Ireland's fight, and if Ireland is recreant now there will be a moral breach between her and America for the first time in the history of both; it will no longer be possible for Ireland to appeal to America to support her own claim to justice and freedom if she on her part refuses to strike a blow for these ideals in concert with America.

We are told that Irishmen reject conscription because it is imposed at the bidding of England. Then why did they tarry till England spoke? There was no need to do so. We are told that they would obey the mandate if it came from an Irish Parliament. There is not the slightest evidence of it, much, indeed, to the contrary. We are told and retold and told again that if England would only remedy Ireland's grievances there would be no unwillingness left and that Irishmen would spring to arms to defend the common heritage. Ireland has no grievances, and it is absolutely false to say that England enjoys any privilege today which she withholds from the sister kingdom. The nonsense that is talked in this way is detestable. Irish farmers are buying their own land with English money, taxation is immensely lighter in Ireland than in England, yet the Irish people share in every social benefit of English Legislation down to State insurance and old age pensions. If they want Home Rule let them have it, but they will be worse and not better off economically and otherwise if England withdraws her supporting hand. That England has many things to repent of in her past treatment of Ireland may be sorrowfully admitted; but that she has done her best for many years to atone for these is no less evident, and today the balance has swung to the other side; it is England and not Ireland that stands in need of emancipation from Imperial burdens and responsibilities which should be spread over a wider area. The scandal is intolerable that Englishmen, Scotsmen, Welshmen, not to speak of our kinsmen throughout the world, should be making every sacrifice for humanity and Ireland make none; that our sons should be maimed and slain that Ireland's may walk the streets in safety; that here old men should have to shoulder the rifle that there young men by the scores of thousand may be permitted to dwell at ease. These things can no longer be; let those who speak for Ireland see to it.

No Man's Land

By AMELIA JOSEPHINE BURR

(In the Y. W. C. A. War Work Bulletin)

THIS quiet country where I stand
A year ago was No Man's Land.
Over that tangle of barbed wire
The wild convolvulus has spread
And poppies light a lovely pyre
Above innumerable dead.
The barbs are sharp enough to tear
Rash fingers catching at the flowers,
But soon the sunlight and the air,
The soft persistence of the showers
And tiny patient hands of rust
Will take their malice all away.
O God of growth and of decay,
How shall we venture not to trust
With faith which does not fail nor haste
To Thee our fields of bitter strife
Whose ravage is a ruined life,
Whose No Man's Land a heart laid waste!

From Hatred, Deliver Us

By THE VERY REV. GEORGE HODGES, D.D.

THERE is something worse than the losing of a battle, and that is the losing of a soul. There is a spiritual defeat which is a more serious disaster than any flight from a stricken field. The most important possession not only of a man but of a nation is the soul, for the soul of a nation is that which the nation is, as compared with that which the nation has. By the soul of a people we mean the national character, the general standard of conduct, the popular ideals, the common sense of moral values. Where this is maintained on a high level, though for the moment the world be lost, the soul is saved, and the nation is equipped to go on through temporary material disaster to future victory of every kind.

Thus the prophet Habakkuk, as the Chaldean invasion swept over the land, bringing destruction with it, found hope and assurance in the great word, The just shall live by faith: by the kind of faith which we call faithfulness, by resolute goodness, by invincible patience, by the fact that nothing can be destroyed except the things which are destructible, and that the best of life cannot be burned with any fire, nor spoiled by any foe. Thus in one of the most notable pictures which has been made since the beginning of the war, a cartoon in Punch, the Emperor of Germany says to the King of the Belgians, pointing to the smoking heaps of broken walls, "You see, you have lost everything;" and the King of the Belgians answers, "Not my soul!"

In the midst of all our preparations against the defeat of our arms we must see to it that we bring an equal vigor to the defense of our ideals. If while we are occupied in holding back the Germans from the conquest of the world we leave ourselves open to the assaults of the devil, our moral defeat will overbalance all our material victories. It is within the easy range of possibility that the war, in spite of the high ideals for which we are contending, may do us moral harm. It may materialize us, coarsen us, brutalize us, and put our soul in peril. This is what the War of Independence did. It was followed by a long period of profound moral and religious depression. We were a worse people, for many years, than we had been before. It is an experience to be remembered, that we may not repeat it.

I purpose, therefore, to consider one of the moral dangers to which we are at present exposed. I mean the peril of spiritual defeat by the vice of hatred. We need to guard ourselves against the demoralization which proceeds from the vice of hatred.

I.

We are tempted to hatred by the constitution of human nature. It is a part of our brute inheritance. It was the habit of our ancestors who fought each other in the jungle. It is in our blood. In times of peace, indeed, it sleeps, until we think that it is dead. We congratulate ourselves that we love our enemies, and we are not conscious of compunctions of conscience when we read the Sermon on the Mount, or the First Epistle of St. John. But this is because we have no enemies. When an enemy appears, and actually puts us to shame or pain by word or deed, assaults us, pursues us, persecutes us, spoils our goods, and worse, we hate him. Happily, there are few of us who know what enmity means. In our sheltered lives we have had no acquaintance with it. We have hardly gone further than mild dislike, which our neighbor has for us, or we for him; proceeding, perhaps, to some form of minor injustice. We are able to say honestly that we have not an enemy in the world. Under these conditions the Christian command to love our enemies is an academic requirement to which we give our easy assent.

There was a whole population of people of our kind in Belgium when the Germans appeared, quiet, pleasant, kindly and friendly folk. These very qualities of friendliness and kindliness greatly magnified their hatred when the Germans behaved as enemies. It is said of the soldiers in the trenches that they do not hate their enemies. They are doing their best to destroy them; they assault them with machine guns, and grenades, and bayonets, and poison gas; they kill them when they can; but without hatred. This is because it is a frank fight. It is not embittered by a sense of injustice. But the civilian in Belgium, in Serbia, in Poland, in Armenia, is attacked without provocation; his friendliness is met with the fierceness of a beast of prey; and in the ruin of his village, the wanton destruction of his home, the horrible sufferings of his family, he says to himself, "But I did nothing; I was not fighting; I had no place nor part in the war; all this has come upon me unprovoked and undeserved. These armed men came into our quiet and peaceful country, and attacked us who were not able to defend ourselves, and did all this." This, you see, is quite a different thing from the fortune and misfortune of fighting men. It compels hatred.

II.

The instinct of hatred, thus dormant in human nature, and now awakened by the war, is encouraged by the Old Testament. The larger part of the Old Testament is the literature of defeat. It is what men thought and said under conditions of invasion, and destruction and deportation. Almost all of the prophets preached to people who were either in peril of the invincible assault of a foreign enemy, or suffering the consequences of it. A little country, without strength for self-defense, and offering no more provocation than consisted in the fact that a great power, intent on conquering the world, had found them in the way, was subjected to immeasurable injustice, robbery, pain and tragedy. To such a people the Old Testament prophets preached, for such a people the psalmists wrote hymns. Some of them wrote hymns of hate. The Old Testament was written in Belgium—in a land where the conditions were those of Belgium. It is a collection of books whose common notes are suffering and hatred.

Nothing could be more natural. The Old Testament is an authentic expression of human nature under the stress of injustice, and wrong, and robbery, and oppression. But it is very different from the Sermon on the Mount. It is very different from the spirit of Jesus Christ. It is so different that we may gravely question the wisdom of the early Christians who brought over into the new religion these writings which the old religion had held sacred. They thereby sanctioned much which Christianity was meant to contradict. Side by side with the gospels in which hatred is pronounced a vice, they caused to be read these other scriptures in which it is held to be a virtue.

III.

The truth is that hatred is at the same time a vice and a virtue, like all the elemental emotions: like love. We need to discriminate between the bad and the good in it. One reason why it persists is because it is possible for honest people to say, "We ought to hate our enemies. We are told, indeed, to love them, but we do not know what that means. We know that unless we hate them they will conquer us, and all the world. For the sake of truth and righteousness the enemies of truth and righteousness must be enthusiastically hated." But let us draw a line of clear distinction between a good hatred and a bad hatred.

It is a good hatred when it stirs up in us a righteous indignation. Anger, for instance, is a kind of holy hatred, when we see it in the face of Jesus Christ as he looks about him in a synagogue, where men care more for the observance of ecclesiastical customs than for the healing of a sick neighbor. "He looked round about on them with anger, being grieved for the hardness of their hearts." When St. Paul says, "Be ye angry, and sin not," he implies that it is possible to be angry without blame. Of course it is. Our anger is an expression of our sense of the difference between right and wrong. It is the spirit of the psalmist who says, "Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee? I hate them with a perfect hatred." In this there is no taint of personal interest. There is no complaint of injury. This hatred is aroused by the sight of wanton wickedness against God. That ought to be hated wherever it is seen. Whoever can read unmoved the accounts of the savagery of German soldiers against defenseless persons, women and little children, is no good Christian. He is no true follower of him who said concerning the bringer of harm into the life of a little child, "It were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck and that he were drowned in the depths of the sea." "It must needs be that offenses come"—the offense of suffering, the offense of injustice, the offenses which come along with war—"but woe to that man by whom the offense cometh." To say that in a voice which trembles with emotion, having one's hands involuntarily clenched, is to give expression, in the Lord's own words, to a perfect hatred, a holy hatred, blessed of God.

What, then, is wrong about it? It is right thus far. It is the opposite of an ignoble and shameful indifference. It forbids surrender. It prevents us from standing passive and unhelpful and basely allowing evil to have its own way in the world. Its motto is in the word of St. Paul when he said, "To whom we gave way by subjection, no, not for an hour; that the truth of the gospel might continue with you." What is the matter with it? Under what conditions does this stalwart virtue become a vice?

IV.

Hatred is a vice when it is unjust. It is unjust when it fails to make discriminations and allowances.

A vicious hatred makes no discriminations. It waits for no investigations or acquittals, but condemns alike the innocent and the guilty. It does not hesitate to lay an indictment against a whole people. It includes a race or a class under a single adjective. Our Lord found this undiscriminating hatred in the community in which He lived, and rebuked it. He had only disapproval for the narrow prejudice which called all publicans sinners and which said of every Samaritan that he had a devil. Because such a judgment is unjust; it is against the facts. The Lord was an effective adversary of all that was evil among Samaritans and publicans because He was the friend of good publicans and good Samaritans. The hatred which includes all Germans is as irrational as the hatred which includes all Americans. It operates only to block the way to a better understanding. It contributes nothing to the progress of the kingdom of God. The only justification of any form of hatred is that it helps to make the world better by bringing evil persons under the ban of general dislike. The force of it is destroyed if under this dislike it includes the good also. These blind haters are like surly dogs who bark and bite at every passer-by, and are of no use because they do not know the difference between friends and foes.

A vicious hatred makes no allowances. It attributes to all enemies the same malicious motives and the same deliberate choice of evil in the place of good; our foes are wholly bad. As a matter of fact, our foes are not wholly bad, and we know it. We know very well that there are honest, righteous, and Christian Germans. Some of them are in the war because they cannot help themselves, being under a government against which the protesting individual is completely powerless. But many more of them are in the war because they misunderstand the situation. They have been systematically taught to misunderstand it. They have been surrounded since the war began by a censorship which has shut them up to such an interpretation of events as the Prussian court, for its own purposes, provides. They see the world through the medium of a carefully manufactured prejudice. We say to ourselves, "These people have undertaken the conquest of the planet. Their intention is to make us all their slaves. For the furtherance of this ambition they have broken their treaties, invaded and ravaged neutral countries, set at naught all the sanctions of humanity, and are assailing their civilized neighbors as the savage Indians with war-whoop and fire and tomahawk attacked the peaceful settlements of our colonial ancestors." In the light of this understanding of the German purpose we read quotations from the sermons of German preachers. It must be confessed that they are hard reading. They sound to us like the words of men who have sold their souls. And that is what they are, if these men understand the German aims as we do. But suppose that they do not so understand them. Suppose that they honestly believe that the Germans are fighting for the existence of Germany, that the war is one of self-defense on their side, and that the barbarities of their army—so far as they are aware of them—are the desperate work of men who are striving to protect their homes. We may easily say that they must be impossibly ignorant to believe that; but nothing is impossible to the ignorance of those who are diligently misinformed. We have got to make allowances: in the spirit of Him who in the face of His victorious enemies and in the tragedy of crucifixion said, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."

V.

Hatred is a vice, then, when it is unjust; when it fails to make discriminations and allowances. It is also a vice when it is ineffective, when the result of it is to make things worse rather than better.

The reasonableness of the Sermon on the Mount is vindicated by its results. The desire of the preacher is to set forward the kingdom of God and His righteousness. He would have here on this earth a commonwealth of heaven, in which goodness and peace and brotherly love shall prevail. It is to that end that He says, "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you, bless them that curse you, pray for them that despitefully use you; and unto him that smiteth thee on the one cheek offer also the other, and him that taketh away thy cloak forbid not to take thy coat also." The idea is that at such an unexpected response as this strife will stop. And that is what will actually take place, nine times out of ten. It takes a deal of faith and courage to try this Christian experiment, but that is how it works. The saints and martyrs proved it. Milton spoke of "the martyrs, with the irresistible might of weakness, shaking the powers of darkness," but it was rather the irresistible might of brotherly love, and faith, and patience, which transformed darkness into light. By this method, which contradicts every primitive principle of success in the jungle, the Christian Church conquered the Roman Empire. They overcame evil, not with evil, but with good. Thus they made, not a truce, during which each antagonist is preparing for another battle, but a true peace, which they achieved by bringing their adversaries not so much to defeat as to repentance, to a change of mind and heart, so that they were no longer adversaries but fellow-workers.

The failure of hatred, in its manifestation under the form of power, of compulsion, of punishment, of reprisal, of revenge, is in the fact that it postpones the triumph of the kingdom of God. It does for the reign of righteousness and happiness what Queen Mary did for the Roman Church, and what Archbishop Laud did for the English Church, in England. Mary made the continued existence of the Roman Church almost impossible by bringing to its aid a hatred which burned Protestant saints alive. The instant and automatic reaction was an answering hatred of the Church of Rome which has never since ceased. So it was in a milder way with the Puritans. It was Laud whose hatred of the Puritans compelled the Puritan schism.

It is a poor sort of hatred which accomplishes nothing, and worse than nothing; which defeats its own purpose, and wrecks its own cause. This is the argument which sets revenge and reprisal among the criminal follies. We are told that the peace of the world demands not only the conquest but the humiliation of Prussia; but the peace of the world demands a great deal more than that. It demands a settlement of international differences on terms so large and generous and just that they shall be settled to stay. It excludes every proposal of that ineffective hatred whose only result is more hatred in the future.

This is the vice from which, in the Litany, we pray to be delivered; along with envy, and malice and all uncharitableness—the vice of a hatred which is unjust, because it makes no distinctions nor allowances, and ineffective, because it does but add to the sorrow of mankind.

Christian Marriage in the Early Church

By THE REV. RICHARD TOWNSEND HENSHAW

FOR the first twelve centuries of the Christian era the Church had nothing to do with the legalization of marriage. The Church took no part in what today we call the marriage ceremony. That was left entirely to the State, and the Church accepted the acts of the State, even making no objection to the use of heathen rites and ceremonies in the marriage service. According to Tertullian (on Idolatry, XVI: Ante-Nicene Fathers, III, 71)—"No breath of idolatry" attaches even to the heathen ceremonies connected with the espousals, among which he mentions the ring, the veil, the kiss, and the joining of hands.

"It is a noteworthy fact," comments Howard (page 291, Vol. I, G. E. Howard's History of Matrimonial Institutions), "that the early Church accepted and sanctioned the existing temporal forms of marriage. The existing legal character and the popular forms of betrothal and nuptials were not disturbed. During the period preceding the Teutonic invasion, speaking broadly, the Church adhered to the Roman law and custom: thereafter those of the Germans, even when the marriage consisted in the formal sale and tradition of the bride, were accepted."

The only innovation effected by the primitive Church was of a purely religious character. Though she might content herself with the Roman or the Germanic forms of marriage, there remained an ethical mission peculiarly her own. "In order at the outset to fill the wedded life with the blessing and spirit of the Christian life, the Church, without reference to the matrimonial law in force, demanded of her members that the very beginning of marriage should be placed under the word of God and be hallowed by its power." (Sohm.) Hence from the first century onward we find evidence of a priestly benediction usually in connection with the betrothal and probably with the nuptials. Thus Ignatius declares that it "becomes both men and women who marry to form their union with the approval of the bishop," that it may be according to God. (Epistle to Polycarp, IV; Ante-Nicene Fathers, I, 95.)

For centuries a marriage liturgy was not adopted either in the East or in the West. During the first three or four centuries Christian marriages were not as a rule celebrated in church. The betrothal or nuptial benediction was not essential to a valid marriage, however important it may have been regarded from a religious point of view. Gradually it became an established custom for the newly wedded pair, after the celebration of the nuptials, to attend religious services in the church and partake of the Sacrament, at the close of which the priest invoked a blessing upon the future married life. But at first the church service was the ordinary service; only after a considerable interval were phrases introduced into the prayers especially applicable to the wedded pair.

Thus stood the custom in the period immediately following the conversion of the Teutonic nations. The nuptials consisted of two distinct acts. The first was the "gifts," or traditional ceremony in the usual form. Thereafter, often on the day following the bridal night, the newly wedded couple celebrated the bride-mass (Brautmesse) and received the benediction of the priest. But this religious act had no legal significance. No doubt it was performed by all good Christians as a religious duty. The benediction was invoked on the married life, a fact of immense ethical importance, just as it was invoked on all important undertakings. It was observed as a fitting solemnity for a believer and not as a part of the marriage. Therefore in the case of second marriages it was omitted. Broadly stated, the canon law maintained the validity of all proper marriages solemnized without the priestly benediction, though spiritual punishment might be imposed for neglect of religious duty.

This was the clearly defined attitude of the early Church toward marriage, an attitude due to various influences generally recognized as guiding the thought of the Christian community. There was a general breaking away from the elaborate law-codes of Judaism, in which no line was drawn between civil and religious law, for State and Church were identical in the mind of the Jew. Christianity goes out into the Roman world, and distinguishes between the things that belong to Caesar and the things that belong to God. There was also at work in the thought of the early Church a certain ascetic dualism, clearly indicated in St. Paul's letters. The things of the flesh, and the things of the spirit, belonged to separate worlds. Marriage belonged to the world of the flesh. Therefore its regulation was the affair of the State. The Church at first would have nothing at all to do with it. Members of the Church might marry if they wished. That was their private concern. There was no wrong in marrying, provided it did not take your mind from spiritual things, or lead to unbelief. St. Paul considers it wiser not to marry. That, he says, is his personal opinion. There is the thought of the second coming: "The time is short." (I Cor., 7:29:ff.)

With the passing of the years of persecution, and the establishment of the Church under Constantine, the feeling of the immediacy of the second coming grew dim. The Church settled down to keep house in this world. There was no change in theory in regard to marriage. Christian marriage was simply marriage between a Christian man and a Christian woman. The forms and ceremonies of the State were all that was required to make that marriage valid and legal in the eyes of the Church. But the Church did begin to recognize the importance of marriage in the lives of its members, and to insist that Christians should ask God's blessing upon their unions at their inception. Failure to seek this blessing was a failure in religious duty. God might punish such neglect. But there was no legal penalty. The marriage was perfectly valid from the point of view of both Church and State. The good Christian would ask God's blessing on all he undertook, on the building of a house, on the planting of crops, even at the eating of a meal. So much the more then was this blessing necessary at an event so important as the institution of a new family life.

The Church service for the newly-married couple constituted no separate sacrament. It was the sacrament of the Holy Communion with special intent, that Christ might enter into the new home and make His abode there. Gradually the ceremony was elaborated, and a special ritual grows up, but it is not until after the twelfth century that the Church begins to take over the functions of the State, and to consider the religious ceremony necessary for a legal and valid marriage.

The development of the marriage liturgy in the first twelve centuries may be summed up briefly in a quotation from Howard (Vol. I, page 308)—"It appears that between the first and twelfth centuries the religious element in the marriage ceremony runs through three phases, not sharply defined by dates, but overlapping and blending; and for the sake of clearness it may be necessary to summarize the history of this development before proceeding further.

"(1) During about four centuries no liturgy was prescribed; the ancient popular forms of contract were accepted; the nuptials were usually celebrated in the home of the bride, less often in church; and the priestly benediction, though doubtless commended as a religious duty, was not exacted by the Church as essential to a legal or a canonical marriage.

"(2) Between the end of the fourth century and the middle of the tenth the custom became well established for the newly wedded pair to attend religious service in the church, to partake of the Sacrament and receive the priestly benediction on their future married life; and this practice soon led to the institution of the regular bride-mass, containing phrases directly applicable to the nuptials. In the bride-mass may be found the genesis of the ecclesiastical marriage liturgy; but it is a purely religious office and adds nothing to the validity of the private contract.

"(3) In the next phase, falling between the tenth and twelfth centuries, the clergy make rapid progress. An elaborate and imposing ritual is developed; the priest, inheriting the functions of the ancient orator, directs the entire celebration; the nuptial ceremony takes place before the church door, and is followed by the bridal mass in the church itself; but even now the priest is a mere helper, and the religious service adds nothing to, nor its omission takes nothing from, the validity of the nuptial contract."

From the twelfth century to the Reformation comes the period of the development of the temporal power of the Church. During this period the Church took to itself the right of jurisdiction over many fields which had formerly been left entirely in the hands of the State. Marriage was but one of many subjects over which the Church assumed legal control. The Church claimed for its ecclesiastical courts jurisdiction in regard to inheritances, a claim which grew out of the power of spiritual control over the last will and testament. The scope of these courts to deal with various crimes and misdemeanors was much enlarged. The full extent of the claims of the Church to legal jurisdiction may be seen in English history, where the kings, representing the State, sought to get back the power into the hands of the civil law. The "Councils of Clarendon," and the controversy between Thomas à Becket and Henry II show the intensity of this struggle. Pollock and Maitland in their authoritative work, History of English Law, show the great extent of the claims of the Church to legal jurisdiction.

Within the last half century there has been a marked return to the separation of the functions of Church and State in regard to the ceremony of marriage. But this has not been through the desire of the Church, Catholic or Protestant, to return to ancient usage. Rather has this separation been secured by the State in spite of the opposition of the Church. This has been the case in France and Italy. In the United States, while there is complete separation of Church and State, a union of their functions is accomplished to a certain extent as the clergyman is licensed to act as a State agent. The clergyman thus acts in a dual capacity. As an agent of the State he must conform to the laws of the State by which he is licensed. He can grant no legal privileges that the State does not grant, nor can he impose any legal restrictions that the State does not allow. On the other hand, the clergyman, by reason of canon law or conscientious objection, may refuse to solemnize marriages that the State allows. There is a certain confusion in the popular mind because one person acts for both Church and State, and a single ceremony is used. Thus, in the ceremony of the Episcopal Church, the couple promises to live together "till death us do part," but this promise means nothing legally. The couple married by an Episcopal clergyman, with the rites of the Episcopal Church, has the same legal right to secure a divorce as the couple married by a magistrate. The Church may impose spiritual penalties, excommunicate, refuse to allow remarriage, but this is without legal effect. These ecclesiastical penalties are even without much spiritual effect, for what one Christian sect may refuse another will allow.

Here is cause for much confusion—one ceremony with two different functions, two different sets of meanings; one man acting in two different capacities at one and the same time, governed by two different sets of laws. The mediaeval Church surmounted this difficulty by making its canon law the law of the State as well. There is no chance today of any church in this country imposing its canon law upon the State, nor would such a result appear desirable to most people. There is, however, the solution of the early Church, which this writer has been setting forth, a separation of function and ceremony—a legal ceremony by a State official, a religious ceremony with a purely religious significance.

The State would gain little by this separation. It would have its own officers and a prompt and thorough record of marriages. But the present system of marriage licenses in use in most States accomplishes this now. The town clerk takes care of everything but the actual ceremony, receives the sworn statements of the contracting parties, determines as to their legal right to marry, and files the paper as soon as the clergyman returns it. The clergyman does not have to go behind the facts stated on the license as far as the law of the State is concerned.

The Church, however, would gain immeasurably by a separation of ceremony. To many couples the religious part of the ceremony has far too little significance. It is the proper thing socially and legally. Then the Church is criticized because so many couples married by its ceremony avail themselves of their legal right of divorce. One result of the separation of the ceremonies would probably be that many would omit the religious ceremony, but that would be only because they would not value the blessing of the Church. For those that did seek this blessing the distinctive meaning of the ceremony would be enhanced. The man and woman would first enter into a legal contract under such conditions as the State might impose. Then if they looked upon their married relationship as an indissoluble spiritual bond they would come to the Church to make their vows before God, and to ask His blessing, and they could not fail to realize that this ceremony was something entirely different from the legal contract into which they had already entered.

In support of such a separation of the functions of Church and State there is the practice and experience of the first twelve centuries of the Christian era. That should afford a better precedent for present-day practice than the confusion of the Middle Ages which marks the American marriage of today.

The Guild of St. Barnabas

By ROSE SCOTT

IN the year 1876, in England, Miss Susan Antrobus—a nurse and Churchwoman—founded a guild for nurses and called it by the name of Saint Barnabas, the Son of Consolation. This was the first attempt that had ever been made to provide, in any special way, for the spiritual welfare of the nurse. Though her hours of duty were long and hard, weighted with responsibilities of the gravest nature, and she was often exposed to temptations that were peculiarly hers, it had not occurred to those who were dependent upon her services that she, herself, was in need of help—not only for her own soul's welfare, but for the patients' sake as well.

Miss Antrobus, having learned this by her hard experience as a nurse, determined to establish a better order of things. The outcome of this was the guild which she founded, and of which she was the beloved Superior General until her death in 1913.

In 1886—ten years after the founding of the English guild—a similar guild was established in Boston by the Rev. Edward Osborne, S.S.J.E. His work in Boston in the early eighties brought him into contact with many nurses and he became interested in trying to help such of them as were communicants of the Church by providing special celebrations of the Holy Communion for them, at a very early hour, on one Sunday of the month and the greater festivals. But he saw that there were other needs to be met and other difficulties to be overcome, loneliness often, and temptations both in hospitals and in private homes.

This guild has had no connection with the older English guild, other than a strong bond of sympathy. The important difference between the two is the fact that in the older English guild only communicants of the Church of England are admitted to membership. This, at first, was the rule in our constitution, but on account of differing conditions in England and America, and at the request of many nurses themselves, it was decided to admit any earnest Christian nurse. Membership in the guild consists of: active members, who are nurses graduated from a recognized training school, or pupil nurses in such schools; associates who are Churchwomen interested in the welfare of nurses and desirous of advancing the objects of the guild; medical associates, and priests associate. The last named are priests of the Episcopal Church who approve of the guild and promise their cooperation. The officers are a chaplain general, vice chaplain general, secretary general and treasurer general. Each local branch has its chaplain, secretary and treasurer.

The control of the guild is vested in an annual council, and an executive committee. Father Osborne held the office of chaplain general for three years and was succeeded by the Rev. Charles H. Brent, who continued in office for several years. Since that time the chaplain general has been a bishop. The present chaplain general is the Rt. Rev. Charles S. Burch, D.D., of New York. There are twenty-five branches in all, with a total membership of about 2,100.

At a meeting of the executive committee in New York, in October, the office of a corresponding war secretary was created, and the Rev. Frank Bigelow of Pomfret, Connecticut, was appointed by the chaplain general. He will obtain from the secretaries of the different branches the names of all active members who have gone to the Front as Red Cross nurses, and if possible, the hospital units to which they are attached. These names he will forward to Bishop McCormick, who has undertaken (as far as he is able) to get in touch with each nurse of the guild who is on active service.

I have said that the total membership of our guild is 2,100. But, when we remember that the American Nurses' Association alone represents a membership of nearly 40,000, and there are approximately 100,000 graduate nurses in the United States, we can form some idea of the possibilities that lie before us. That the present number of branches—widely scattered as they are—cannot possibly reach any considerable number of those thousands upon thousands of nurses is quite obvious. So we earnestly hope that we may see more branches established—one at least in each city that is a working centre for nurses.

Will you not help us to do this? In all your varied activities for war relief, and particularly the Red Cross, I beg of you to remember that most important part of its organization—the Red Cross nurses! They have responded to the call of their country—voluntarily and in great numbers. They have gone away quietly, without any sound of trumpets; gone to do battle with that terrible aftermath of war—disease and death, or wounds. Remember them in your daily prayers, that they may have the strength to endure!

The object of the guild is two-fold: social and religious. We hear so much of the social side of every kind of work, nowadays, that I am not going to dwell upon that side of our work. But, for a moment, I should like to speak of what I believe is the need for greater emphasis on the religious and devotional side.

I know of no one who has a greater opportunity than the earnest nurse, not only to "minister to a mind diseased," but to a troubled soul as well. The very helplessness of her patients, and their dependence upon her for comfort and strength in their physical weakness often leads them to give her their confidence in a way that is withheld from others.

But how can the nurse put them in the way of obtaining help and comfort at such a time unless she understands the ways and means thereto herself? She cannot possibly give out strength to others unless she has first received the power within herself.

The Rev. E. F. Russell, of St. Alban's Parish, Holborn—chaplain of the English guild ever since its foundation—says of the Guild of St. Barnabas: "Its object is a spiritual one; it is not a benefit society or a league of defense, nor does it concern itself with the practice of nursing or the economics or politics of the profession. Its concern is simply with the soul of the nurse, with her motives and ideals, with her faith and hope and love; offering the guild fellowship and the guild ministrations to all trained nurses, belonging to the Church, who wish to make their service to the sick a service to the Lord Jesus Christ."

Prayer of a Fallen Soldier

This prayer was found in the pocket of a British colonel after he was killed in action in Flanders on October 11, 1917. It was sent to the New York Evening Post by one of his friends.

FATHER of all, Helper of the free, we pray with anxious hearts for all who fight on sea and land and in the air to guard our homes and liberty. Make clear the vision of our leaders and their counsels wise.

Into Thy care our ships and seamen we commend; guard them from chance sown mines and all the dangers of this war at sea, and as of old give them the victory.

To men on watch give vigilance, to those below calm sleep. Make strong our soldiers' hearts and brace their nerves against the bursting shrapnel and the unseen fire that lays the next man low.

In pity blind them from the sight of fallen comrades left upon the field.

May Christ Himself in Paradise receive the souls of those who pass through death.

Let not our soldiers ever doubt that they shall overcome the forces of that king who "seeks to wade through slaughter to a throne and shut the gate of mercy on mankind".

O God of Love and Pity, have compassion on the wounded, make bearable their pain or send unconsciousness.

To surgeons and dressers give strength that knows no failing and skill that suffers not from desperate haste.

To tired men give time to rest.

Pity the poor beasts of service who suffer for man's wrong.

For us at home, let not that open shame be ours, that we forget to ease the sufferings of the near and dear of brave men in the fighting line.

O Thou, who makest human hearts the channel of Thy answers to our prayers, let loose a flood of sympathy and help for children and their mothers who wander desolate and suffering, leaving wrecked homes and fields and gardens trodden under ruthless feet.

With Thee who sufferest more than all, may we with reverence Thy burden share, for all are Thine and in Thine image made; they too are Thine who caused the wrong.

O Father, may this war be mankind's last appeal to force. Grant that from the stricken earth, sown with Thy dead, an everlasting flower of peace shall spring, and all Thy world become a garden where the flower of Christ shall grow.

And this we beg for our dear Elder Brother's sake, who gave Himself for those He loved, Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen.

Illusion

By ARTHUR WALLACE PEACH

BECAUSE his weary feet found not
The shining vale of dreams,
He spoke of his unhappy lot
And life's deceiving schemes.

Yet life made plain the humble ways
Of toil that lead to peace,
Nor hid from him the end of days
Where human pathways cease.

Beyond his acres' brown content
He sought a dreamer's goal,
Nor learned that life's illusion meant
His own illuded soul!

Books About the Mission Field. I

By THE REV. ARTHUR R. GRAY, D.D

IT is now many months since I promised to write an article on recent literature of the mission field, and I have no excuse to offer for the delay—except the usual one. However, I hope that the ill-wind may have brought some advantages, certainly in these less strenuous Summer months I shall be the better able to dig down into my memory and bring up some of the results of past reading. I say dig down into my memory, for during the past seven years I have been having what one might call a shower-bath of books. During Sewanee years it was possible to follow the advice of a very learned man and resist the temptation which comes to us to try and read everything. While I was educational secretary, however, it was not a question of temptation but of obligation, and in order to be able to answer the innumerable inquiries which came in day after day I had to read books, books, books, all the day long. And by the way I discovered one trick which may be of value to others in the same position; namely, when you have to wade through a whole field of literature, get as many reactions as possible! What I mean is that if one tries to read fifteen books on the same subject, one after the other, his mind becomes jumbled—at least mine does—and so to avoid this my prescription is: sandwich in between the volumes trashy novels. They act like a bit of mustard or like a stimulant, causing a reaction enabling one to approach the next book with a great deal more avidity.

What I would like to do here would be to confine myself as nearly as possible to books which seem to have enduring value and which avoid the two extremes of old-fashioned—what shall I call it, provincialism or puritanism, and new-fashioned snapshotism. Perhaps I should elucidate these terms. By the old-fashioned type I mean those books which were devoid of both a sense of humor and a realization of sociological values; which presented the whole matter without the least delicacy of touch and from a purely individualistic standpoint; which regarded the missionary as a man going forth because he was commanded to go, rather than because the love of Christ constrained him. The verse in that old hymn which begins, "Shall we whose souls are lighted with wisdom from on high", epitomizes this type.

By the new-fashioned type of book I mean that which would reduce missionary literature to a matter of photographs of contemporary events. These things are, of course, most interesting and have their message, but when it comes to writing books about our neighbors who dwell in darkness the less said about their weaknesses and idiosyncracies the better. Of course, this is an extreme statement of the case, but that is the best method to pursue when endeavoring to make a point.

The trouble with this latter kind of literature is that it is apt to make people forget the meaning of the propagation of the gospel. What we are engaged upon is, first and foremost, education. In fact, paraphrasing an advertisement which one sees plastered all over St. Louis, I would suggest as a very good watchword for these days, "Don't say Christianity, say education".

Now, just because Christianity is education, the thing which the Church is trying to do should be studied from the point of view of history and philosophy. Present conditions, such as the bound foot or the suttee or the dervish dance, are merely symptoms, and the Church's relation to them is about the same as that of the physician to the pox. Of course, he wishes to prevent the scar from becoming permanent, but his chief concern is with the disease itself and that which caused it.

I am not sure also whether we have not been living on our principal in the past; that is to say, whether such constant reference to the wounds or the gangrene in this or that creed or organization has not created a sort of hot-house sympathy—a sympathy which needs for maintenance a continually increasing exhibition of more appalling wounds and gangrenes. The argumentum ad misericordiam is, of course, wonderful and we have to thank God for the many fine things that it has initiated. But when all is said and done the missionary propaganda needs to be built on the solid rock of spontaneous love for all mankind.

I have started with this kind of introduction because I think it is necessary to explain why in the books to which I shall refer there will seem to be a preponderance of the historical and philosophical and perhaps a surprising lack of reference to popular material. Above all things, I am not trying to suggest a five-foot bookshelf; what I want to do is point the way towards a fifty or sixty-foot shelf and towards a study of the causes of the disease which we are endeavoring to eradicate from the world.

Let us now begin with a discussion of books about books. By far the best bibliography that I know of is that which will be found on pages 333 and following of Volume VI of the Edinburgh Conference Reports. In the 225 pages devoted to this subject is given as fair and well-selected a list of books as can be desired.

Perhaps before I go a bit further I had best warn the reader that in this bibliography will be found but little dealing with the work of the Roman Church. The reason is not hard to find. As the Rev. Frederick Schwager, S.V.D., has most forcefully pointed out in his little book, The Most Vital Mission Problem of the Day (published by the Mission Press, Techny Illinois), the Church of Rome is alarmingly far behind all other Churches in the matter of missionary literature. In paragraph after paragraph he scores (and his book has the Nihil Obstat and the Imprimatur) the backwardness of his denomination—I think it is perfectly fair to call the Roman Church by that name—and exhibits in an almost eloquent manner the wisdom and ability of the mission study campaign of the other Churches.

It's well worth while to hear what Father Schwager has to say about us and our brethren. One can allow for his inability to understand that there is something eternal and true between Protestantism and Romanism and may profit considerably by his estimate of the value of our educational work. I wish, by the way, that Churchmen who do not see the fundamental value of the Educational Department of the Board would read this book.

The value of the foregoing digression is to explain why it is not to be expected that one will find much in the way of missionary literature in the Roman Church.

Next to the Edinburgh Conference bibliography the best that I know is one put forth by the Board of Missionary Preparation, A Bibliography for Missionary Students, published by Oliphant, Anderson and Ferrier, London. In it one finds in well-segregated groups the solidest material on the various divisions of the world's mission field. Thus, Section 1 deals with the general history of missions, and we find therein a wide range, including such books as Ramsay's St. Paul the Traveller and St. Paul the Roman Citizen; Harnack's Mission and Expansion of Christianity, and Montalembert's Monks of the West. There follows a modern division, which is not quite so Catholic, but which is none the less useful, and an admirable section devoted to histories of Societies. Under Section B, Special Fields, we have a list, with helpful comments, of most of the books with which a student of missions should be familiar. Having been published in 1913 there are inevitably some omissions: for example, that stirring book on Mary Slessor will not be found under Africa; and I regret to say O'Rork's useful sketch—published before 1913—of the Anglican Missions in Africa is not given a place. But it is not for me to write a review on this excellent little book.

Lastly, and perhaps best of all, is the list of books to be found in the International Review of Missions. No one can afford to remain in ignorance of this. The Review, which comes out quarterly, is edited in Edinburgh by J. H. Oldham. Its scholarship and fairness can be vouched for, and anyone who has a file of it from the beginning possesses an almost complete bibliography of modern missionary literature

To turn next to periodical literature, there is naturally, of course, The Spirit of Missions. Our Church papers supplement quite freely since they are always glad to print the news of the work on the frontiers. Of the other periodicals, of which there are many, my own preference is decidedly for the S. P. G. quarterly, The East and the West, which can be secured for $1.00 a year. Though we have never been able to do much with it, the Educational Department of the Missions House has for some years been an agency for receiving subscriptions to this magazine. It is a most admirable publication. To the International Review I have already referred. If anything, it is particularly for specialists; the average reader would, I fear, find it a bit heavy. It might be dubbed the Hibbert Journal of the Mission Boards.

NEWS OF THE CHURCH

A PRIZE ESSAY CONTEST FOR THE RURAL CLERGY

$75 for Best Article on Parish Work in Country

NEW YORK CITY.—Through the kindness of a friend who desires to remain anonymous, the Joint Commission on Social Service is enabled to offer a prize of $75 for the best essay on the relation of the rural parish to the country community by any clergyman of the Episcopal Church who has done, or is doing, active work in the field. In order to secure something like uniformity of results, the committee in charge of the competition has decided that the essays should be written on one of the two following general subjects:

I. A program for the rural community (based upon your own local conditions.) (1) The field as you know it. (2) Agencies at work (local, state, national—voluntary or official). (3) An ideal program for your community (in view of actual conditions and possibilities). (4) The outstanding need of the community. (5) The function of your parish in co-operation with other agencies now working in the field.

II. A special report on a phase of rural social service in which you have been or are now particularly interested, either in view of the above or independently.

Other conditions of the contest are:

(1) Manuscripts shall be from 3,000 to 5,000 words, and must be submitted in typewritten form (double spaced) in triplicate, in order to avoid undue delay in reading by the judges.

(2) Each essay must be signed by a nom de plume accompanied by a sealed envelope bearing this pseudonym and containing the real name of the writer.

(3) The contest will close on January 1, 1919, on which date all essays must be in the Commission's office (281 Fourth Avenue, New York City).

(4) The Commission reserves the right to publish the essay to which the prize may be awarded, and any others deemed worthy of honorable mention.

Inquiries may be addressed to the Commission's office, 281 Fourth Avenue, New York City.

WASHINGTON CHURCHMEN PETITION PRESIDENT

Asking Reasonable Sunday Law for National Capital

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—There is no Sunday law in the District of Columbia and the peace, order, and worship of the Lord's Day in Washington are increasingly broken by amusements, business, and labor. Consequently the recent Convention of the diocese appointed a committee to memorialize President Wilson on behalf of a reasonable Sunday law, this committee to be the spokesman of the clergy and laity of the diocese. The memorial, which is signed by the Rev. R. H. McKim, D.D., the Rev. Roland Cotton Smith, D.D., the Rev. W. L. DeVries, Ph.D., Col. George Truesdell, and J. Holdsworth Gordon, Esq., has been duly presented to the President. It reads as follows:

"May we be permitted to remind you, Mr. President, that at present we have no Sunday law in this city, and in consequence toil and traffic go on in our streets without let or hindrance on the Lord's day—and the laboring man is robbed of his God-given rest. Theatres, moving picture shows and other forms of commercialized amusement are in full swing, drawing the people away from their firesides and their churches, and the children from their Sunday Schools—thus neutralizing the social and sacred influences of the day.

"We disclaim with emphasis any intention to embarrass the administration at this critical time, but we are convinced, as patriots, as philanthropists and as Christians, that a reasonable law of Sunday observance is greatly needed.

"We have no wish to restore the rigid Sabbatarian Sunday, or to recast our observance of the day along pharisaical lines. On the contrary, we believe that the Christian Sabbath should be a day of sweetness and light, of joy and thanksgiving—a festival, not a feast; a day of family reunions, not shadowed by the gloom of Sinai, but bathed in the sunshine of the Easter morn.

"From the beginnings of Anglo-Saxon civilization in America, whether in Virginia or in Massachusetts, it has been the custom of our people to pay reverent regard to the Lord's day. Its observance has been handed down to us as a constituent part of that Christian morality which is the basis of our national life. In fact, the Sunday rest day is one of the distinctive symbols of our republic. It has helped to make us great and strong and free. Such have been its blessings to society that it has been said by a great English statesman: 'Of all divine institutions the most divine is that which secures a day of rest to man.' Not only is it of primeval and Divine enactment, but modern science has demonstrated that the law of the weekly rest is written by the finger of the Creator on the physical and mental constitution of man. Our complicated civilization, far from calling for a relaxation of its observance, only emphasizes its importance, for the danger of physical and moral debasement that comes from uninterrupted labor was never greater than it is at present. The toiler's Sabbath rest was never such a necessity as it is now.

"In conclusion, Mr. President, remember-

Yale Gives Bishop Tuttle Degree

NEW HAVEN, CONNECTICUT.—At the annual commencement last week Yale conferred the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity upon Bishop Tuttle.

Bishop McCormick Gassed

GRAND RAPIDS, MICHIGAN.—According to a letter received by Mrs. McCormick, the Bishop has been gassed, but is recovering rapidly.

CHAPLAIN W. S. DANKER DIES FROM SHELL WOUND

Worcester Rector Was Recently Awarded the Croix de Guerre

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS.—The Rev. Walton S. Danker, rector of St. John's Church of this city, and chaplain of the 104th Infantry, died on Tuesday last week in France from a shell wound. He was buried on Wednesday near the spot where he fell.

Mr. Danker was decorated a month ago with 116 men for gallantry in the fighting at Apremont last April.

Mr. Danker had received leave of absence for the duration of the war. He was born in Little Falls, New York, in 1874, was graduated at Trinity College in 1897 and the General Theological Seminary in 1900, and after pastorates in Bayonne, Milford, Massachusetts, and Brooklyn, came to Worcester in 1907. He was chaplain of the Sixth Massachusetts Regiment, 1904-06, and was made chaplain of the Second Regiment in 1909. He served with this regiment on the Mexican border in 1916 and became chaplain of the 104th Regiment when his regiment was taken into the Federal service in 1917.

SEMINARY PROFESSOR WAS A CAPTAIN OF INFANTRY

The Rev. H. L. Jewett Williams Killed in Action

ATLANTA, GEORGIA.—A shadow of gloom has been cast over the diocese by the news of the death of the Rev. H. L. Jewett Williams. Captain Williams was in the ministry of the Church and was serving as professor of New Testament Greek in the Theological Department at the University of Sewanee when a state of war was declared between Germany and the United States. After consultation with his bishop he entered the Officers' Training Camp at Fort McPherson. At the end of his training he was commissioned as a captain of infantry. He went to France with the 82nd Division. And it was a great shock when news of his death in battle came on June 15.

Captain Williams was a graduate of the University of Georgia and of the Theological Department of the University of Sewanee. He was a clean, strong, magnetic and noble character, and much beloved by all who knew him. He felt it his duty to enter the service of his country as a soldier. He felt that he could do more good as an officer than as a chaplain. His intention was to re-enter the active ministry after the war.

Captain Williams was in the first years of his ministry rector of the church in Milledgeville, Diocese of Atlanta, and was a canonical resident of this diocese while professor in Sewanee University.

Captain Williams was one of THE CHURCHMAN's regular book reviewers.

WILL GO TO FRANCE AS A SPECIAL PREACHER

The Rev. John Moore McGann to Be Gone Six Months

SPRINGFIELD, MASSACHUSETTS.—The Rev. John Moore McGann, Rector of Christ Church, goes to France July 1 for Young Men's Christian Association work. He is accepting an urgent appeal from the war work committtee of the association to go for six months as a special preacher to the American expeditionary forces. The exact date of his sailing is, of course, not made public. This decision comes following a conference the Rev. Mr. McGann had with John R. Mott and C. V. Hibbard of the overseas war committee of the association in New York recently. The committee considered Mr. McGann especially well fitted for the position, as he served as a chaplain in the United States army for some time and has thus had considerable experience in religious work connected with the army.

Mr. McGann said to his congregation at the close of his sermon announcing his decision: "I want to see Christ Church 100 per cent. in this war; ninety-two splendid fellows from the church are serving in the army and navy, five women have gone to do their part, my valued associate here, the Rev. Edmund R. Laine, Jr., has qualified as a chaplain in the national army, and will probably be called soon into active service, and now comes the chance to give your rector. Mr. Laine has promised to take my place during my absence until he is called as a chaplain. I would go myself into this branch of the service if I was not too old. Anything I can do to help win this war I will."

A UNIQUE WAR WORK

St. Louis Church Women Operate Government Cannery

ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.—The women of St. Philip's Church of this city are undertaking a piece of war work this summer which is unique. Under the direction of Mrs. Edmund J. Cleveland, wife of the rector, they are operating a cannery of the St. Louis Branch of the United States Food Administration, downtown in St. Louis, in the Laclede Gas Company's buildings. So far as is known, this is the first case of a Church organizing to undertake patriotic work of this kind.

Commencement at St. Faith's

SARATOGA SPRINGS, NEW YORK.—The twenty-eighth commencement of St. Faith's School was celebrated during the third week of June. The growth of the music department during the past year was such that it was necessary to have two music recitals. In addition there was a recital by the members of the music faculty. The commencement play was Twelfth Night. This was given on the school lawn and elicited much praise.

The commencement speaker was the Rev. Eugene S. Pearce of Rome. The baccalaureate sermon was delivered by the Rev. Irving G. Rouillard of Bethesda Church, Saratoga.

The most significant feature of the week was the laying of the cornerstone of Shackelford Hall—a new dormitory and recreation hall, the building of which was necessitated by the steady growth of the school. Ex-Senator Brackett of Saratoga Springs made a strong address on this occasion, in which he congratulated Miss Eleanor Shackelford, the founder and principal emerita of the school, on having seen her vision so abundantly realized. Gifts toward the building of Shackelford Hall during the past year have amounted to $3,300.

The past year has been the most prosperous in the history of the school. Sixty pupils have been enrolled and a score of others turned away for lack of room. Application has been made to the Synod of the Province of New York and New Jersey for recognition of the school as a provincial institution.

PORTER COMMENCEMENT

Bishop Guerry Awards Cup and Dedicates Service Flag

CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA.—The fifty-first annual commencement of the Porter Military Academy, which was held in St. Timothy's Chapel here, was largely attended by the parents of the cadets and friends of the Academy.

On commencement day, the address to the graduating class was delivered by the Hon. Jos. W. Barnwell, a most distinguished member of the Charleston bar and public-spirited citizen of South Carolina. Medals were awarded for excelling in drilling, choir work, mathematics and different studies. An incident which was touching and most effective was the awarding of a silver cup "to that senior classman who has set the best example to the school and who has stood for the highest things." This cup was presented to the Academy by Dr. Wm. H. Frampton in loving memory of his brother, Joseph Maybank Frampton, who gave his life for his country in the present war. Bishop Guerry awarded the cup to Lieut. W. A. Clark and paid a most loving tribute to the beautiful life of Private Frampton a graduate of the Academy.

He then dedicated a handsome service flag. There are about one hundred and seventy-five boys from this Academy who are now enlisted in the war. Two gold stars represent Joseph M. Frampton and James Hemphill, who have died for their country. The Rev. Walter Mitchell, D.D., who has just completed his tenth year as rector of the Academy, presented after an affectionate and striking address the diplomas and certificates to the graduates. The Salutatory was delivered by Capt. John Porter, grandson of the founder of the Academy, and the Valedictory by Lieut. W. A. Clark. A number of the clergy were in vestments and the service was led by a large chorister of cadets. The service closed with the national hymn.

Thus ended one of the most interesting and successful commencements in the history of the Academy. The total enrolment of the school this year was two hundred and forty-three. The Academy this year has representation from twenty-five States, including some from the far Northwestern States, besides four foreign countries. Five cadets represented Cuba, one from Costa Rica, one from Mexico and one from the Canal Zone. This shows the national reputation of the Academy.

RUSSIAN TRAGEDY DUE TO HALF-BAKED AMERICANS

Roumania's Fate Ours if We Quit, Says Y. M. C. A. Man

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—From the Rev. Jesse Halsey, pastor of the Seventh Presbyterian Church, who went to Russia with the first Y. M. C. A. group, the following letter has reached Cincinnati:

Mourmansk, Russia, March 1, 1918.

Don't be deceived, and if any one was lukewarm heretofore, this recent denouement of the German plans in Russia ought to make clear the real aims of our enemies, viz., conquest and domination. Don't be deceived, I say, into thinking that there is any easy way ahead for our country, or any peace that is lasting and just, without victory. When one has seen first hand the trail of the serpent through this land, and reads about it even in our own, he realizes that it is the part of humanity, to say nothing of self-preservation, to kill the serpent.

When you hear any one fainthearted about the war, assure him that Roumania's fate is ours if we quit. Russia is out of it entirely. France has done her part. England will hold on until we come, but the outcome is with us. It ill becomes us to criticize Russia until we have done as much as she has, or to loudly tell the British and French what we'll do when we get there, but rather quietly straining every muscle to go ahead and do, for unless we do it won't or can't be done. In a relay race I suppose that the man who takes the first lap has as much to do with the winning of the race as the one who takes the last lap and crosses the tape. Russia ran the first lap, she will get her rights, no doubt, in the final settlement, no matter what terms are forced upon her now.

Then a word about internal policies at home. It has been the cause for the greatest humiliation with most of us out here to find that so much of this Russian tragedy is due to Americans—that is, the half-baked Russo-American who returned here in great numbers after the Revolution—each with his soap box—and began to talk, often defaming America as a land of capitalists, etc. I feel very strongly at times against all these; then I realize that they have never seen the real America that we know and love, but are the product of our slums and of the injustice of our competitive system; then I realize that in the future America must breed a different type from her immigrants, and that we must not allow the forces to work that produce that type.

ing that we are still, as the Supreme Court has held, 'a Christian country,' we cannot withhold the expression of our conviction that it is vain to expect the blessing and guidance of Almighty God in the tremendous crisis that this war has precipitated unless we pay due regard to the laws that He has promulgated. Your excellency has wisely and admirably reminded us that our dependence for strength and victory must be upon the power and the blessing of the God of heaven and earth, and our conscience tells us that we have no right to expect this divine help while, as a people, we continue to set the law of the Sabbath rest at defiance.

"As to matters of detail we do not venture to suggest what the precise terms of the law should be. But we are in general sympathy with the provisions of Senate Bill 404, which has twice passed the Senate, and is, we understand, still pending in the House."

BASE HOSPITAL SCENES ON THE WESTERN FRONT

Bishop Francis Writes of His Experiences in France

By Chaplain Joseph M. Francis

SOMEWHERE IN FRANCE, May 1, 1918.—The long expected day arrived at last. The period of waiting had been long and weary. Having calmly braved the dangers of the sea, its storms and its submarines, we were filled with enthusiasm for the work for which we had enlisted. No one ever put the hope into words, but I think there was a general feeling that we should be in "the thick of it" as soon as we reached our appointed place! The commanding officer was alone supposed to know our destination and he received the information only on the departure of the train from the port of debarkation. As a matter of fact, the luggage vans attached to our special were clearly marked with the name of the town to which we were bound, but the name did not suggest much to those who saw it.

ARRIVE AT NIGHT

It was the middle of the night as the train pulled into the little station in the small mountain village. Deep snow covered the ground; the temperature was frigid or, more exactly, Arctic. After a while, we were marched to a building where hot coffee was said to be awaiting us. We gathered in a large room and around a stove—a typical French stove—which warmed rather by suggestion than by any heat that it radiated. In course of time, we marched off again to our quarters in a big building, where we went to bed between clean sheets and well-nigh froze for the balance of the night. The next morning, after ablutions in about a cupful of ice water and a petit dejeuner, we started out to investigate.

Our village was placed amid beautiful surroundings and had many fine buildings. Some of these buildings were to be taken over by our Government for hospital purposes. We had come over equipped as a 500-bed hospital, but were ordered to expand so as to care for from twelve to fifteen hundred patients. Parenthetically, let me say that this would have been an extremely difficult undertaking save for the assistance of the Red Cross, which supplied necessary things such as bed linen, towels, pajamas, etc., in quantities of two hundred dozens, almost on an hour's notice.

With the buildings already here it seemed an easy matter to take possession, move in and go to work. But we were ignorant of the formalities that had to be gone through: The signing of leases, the inventories to be made, the removal of the furnishings and the substitution of hospital materials, the repairing or installing of plumbing, the securing of stoves, and so forth. Well, to make a long story short, we were three months in this state of getting ready.

How slowly the time passes! The great war was going on and we seemed to be doing nothing! We were impatient. Then, one day, a telegram came. A train load of wounded American soldiers would arrive the next day at 5 o'clock. The electricity that carried the message must have jumped the wires and entered into the personnel of Base Hospital No. —. Everything now was ordered activity, trained preparation. Each one knew what he was expected to do. Ambulances were requisitioned from other base hospitals in the vicinity, guards were placed about the station platform to keep back the inquisitive crowds, the stretchers with their bearers and doctors assigned to the duty of detraining the patients were in their places. A whistle blew, all eyes turned expectantly, and then a U. S. Red Cross Hospital train ran quietly alongside the platform.

Have you ever seen a Red Cross train? Then you know how your heart thrilled at the sight, for it is something of which an American may justly be proud. It is a train equipped with every convenience and contrivance for the comfort and care of the sick and wounded; scrupulously clean, sanitary, airy, attractive.

Without the slightest confusion, the stretcher cases first were tenderly lifted and carried to the waiting ambulances which rushed away to the hospital designated by a tag placed on each patient. Others, not seriously wounded, were helped across the platform to the ambulances, and still others walked the short distance to the nearest hospital. While waiting for the return of the ambulances, Red Cross representatives went about among the wounded, giving to each who desired it a cigarette, always appreciated and apparently a solace and help in their sufferings.

A BUSY SCENE

Within the hospitals, all were busy—doctors, nurses, orderlies. The wards were brilliantly lighted, the beds white and attractive. Among the patients were some who had lost a leg, some who had been wounded by shrapnel and high explosive shells, others who had been gassed. For each one the immediately necessary treatment for relief and comfort was given. The doctors worked overtime. The nurses were splendid. From the men, not a complaint was heard. They bore their sufferings not so much stoically as heroically. When all had been made comfortable, supper was served—a well-cooked, appetizing meal. As the writer went about among the patients, speaking a word of cheer and ministering to their comfort in little ways, as best he could, the universal expression he heard was of satisfaction and thankfulness that they were in an American hospital, with American doctors and American women for nurses. "It is just like getting into heaven," said one. "You bet it is," came from an adjoining bed.

Two of those brave fellows are now lying in a little churchyard, on the hillside overlooking the village. They were buried with full military honors. A cross, with name, company, regiment, date of death, marks their resting place "until the day dawns and the shadows flee away." Flowers are placed upon these sacred mounds frequently by nurses and others.

There is not one among us who does not shudder at the thought of the cruel sufferings that must be endured by those engaged in this struggle for Liberty, but since there must be suffering and injury, we are thankful that it has been given to us to minister to these brave fellows who so valiantly and cheerfully are fighting a good fight for all for which our country and civilization stand.

BISHOP MIKELL MAKES VISIT TO CAMP WHEELER

Guest of Brotherhood of St. Andrew and Chaplain

CAMP WHEELER, GEORGIA.—The Bishop of Atlanta has just made a most successful visitation of two days at Camp Wheeler. He was the guest of Horace R. Chase, camp secretary of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, and Rev. Robb White, Jr., chaplain of the 118 F. A. United States Army during his stay in the camp. The first day his time was taken up chiefly in visiting different parts of the camp. He went through the base hospital and talked with many of the patients and gave them words of comfort. Supper was taken with officers of the 121 Infantry, after which he went to the stockade and spoke to the prisoners, and then returned to Y. M. C. A. Building No. 47; here he addressed a well-filled house of the soldiers. Immediately following this he attended a reception given by the officers and wives of the 121 regiment. Thursday was also a very busy day, commencing same with an early celebration of Holy Communion at the base hospital. A conference then with the clergy of the city of Macon was held as to the very best means of carrying on the religious work of the camp among the soldiers. This lasted over one hour. Various opinions were expressed, but with the suggestions made it was left to the civilian and camp secretary to work out a definite plan. Dinner was given to the Bishop by the officers of the 124th Infantry Regiment. In the afternoon the 118th F. A. had a tea served by the wives of the officers to which the Bishop was guest. Supper was taken at the headquarters of the Y. M. C. A. followed by a religious service in "Y" building No. 44. At this service the Bishop made the principal talk. His words were full of the burning thoughts of the day and he was listened to by a large number of the boys from the camp. They showed their interest and approval by the closest of attention. After the meeting was completed the Bishop was driven to Macon where he took the night train for Atlanta. There is no doubt but that the visit of the Bishop at this time will result in much good. His talks are always full of abundant thought and study. Many came forward and express their feelings along lines of better resolutions.

SPECIAL WAR COURSE FOR THEOLOGICAL STUDENTS

School to Provide Two Years' Work for Men Beyond Draft Age

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA. — Dean Bartlett has announced the following war measures which have been adopted by the Philadelphia Divinity School:

I. Provision for Students Returning from the National Service: When once the war is over, and even to some small degree perhaps before, our seminaries will probably receive many applications for admission from young men who have been in the national service. A double provision must be made for these men. First: the course of study preparatory for the ministry may require adaptation to their special needs. Second: If their numbers are considerable, the scholarship funds available will have to be supplemented.

The Divinity School in Philadelphia desires to make it publicly known that it will meet either or both of thes problems, as they arise; and that it is already preparing itself to do so.

A committee of two is to be appointed, who, together with the Dean, shall prepare and issue to Church people, particularly in this Diocese and State, an appeal for gifts and pledges for a War Scholarship Fund, to be used for the financial aid of young men who, having served their country in the war, shall afterwards desire to study for the ministry.

II. A Special Course for Older Men: At the annual meeting of the Boards the Faculty were authorized to make public the following announcement, which will explain itself:

War conditions are affecting so gravely the number of candidates for the ministry that the Church is being forced to consider the possibility of recruiting its ranks from among men who have passed the draft age. Such men would probably need a special and abbreviated course of preparation. The Divinity School in Philadelphia is desirous of doing its share towards meeting the emergency. And the Faculty accordingly announce that they are ready to receive older men as students in a course of preparation specially adapted to their needs. This course is planned to cover two years of class-work, and to fit men for the canonical examinations in all the usual subjects except the languages of the Old and New Testaments. Stress will be laid in particular upon a thorough knowledge of the English Bible,—its contents and interpretation. Careful instruction (somewhat less full and technical than the usual course provides) will be given in Doctrine, Apologetics, History, and Contents and Use of the Prayer Book. Homiletics and Pastoral Care will be dealt with almost on the normal scale. Polity and Canon Law will be treated on a scale sufficient to equip the student for an intelligent appreciation of his place in the Ministry of the Church. Religious Pedagogy and Elocution will receive full attention.

In some departments of instruction, perhaps in all, the successful carrying out of this plan will necessitate the giving of two sets of courses by the professors: the usual ones for the students contemplating three years of study, and the special courses (in which many details and much technical information is omitted) for these older students. The Faculty will gladly undertake the additional work necessary, as a part of their war service; and will endeavor to add to their class instruction as much individual and personal guidance as may be possible for these older men.

Two conditions only need clear mention in this announcement:

(1) The Faculty will receive for this special course only men who possess genuine ability and promise, and will insist upon full and satisfactory evidence of these qualifications in advance. (2) It must also be understood that the completion of this special course, even with distinction, does not entitle the student to the diploma of the School, which is granted only on the completion of the full three years' course. Scholarship aid, to an amount greater than usually offered, may be possible for such students—or for a limited number.

MISSIONARY SOCIETY HAS RECEIVED OVER $2,035,000

English Church Gives More Than Ever Before

NEW YORK CITY.—The English Church Missionary Society has just closed its fiscal year with receipts of $2,035,000, not including special funds. This is the "largest ordinary income the society has ever received." The society was able to meet all its obligations for the year with a surplus of $7,500.

The Rev. C. C. B. Bardsley, D.D., secretary of the Church Missionary Society, writing about the responsibility of the Church Missionary Society to the Government in what he calls "these fate-laden days," declares:

"We must retain with intensity the conviction that the greatest contribution of the Church to the nation is through helping to strengthen all the spiritual forces in her life. The morale of the nation depends upon her attitude towards God.

"The spirit in which the Church responds to the call," Dr. Bardsley continues, "will largely determine her influence in the nation. Her sacrifices must be neither tardy nor niggardly. Fresh and different sacrifices are required.

"It is seen again that we are fighting for freedom and truth, which are the ideals of the Kingdom of God: in days when the clouds are heavy, the rays of a new hope are breaking through, as all side issues and secondary aims recede into the background and great ideals once more stand out clear-cut and challenging. The war-spirit must be cleansed and quickened by the true passion for righteousness and brotherhood. The sacrifice which must be made must be a spiritual sacrifice. It must be made by men and women who are aflame with devotion to God and His cause, and whose action is the answer to their own prayer, 'Thy Kingdom Come.' The Church that is scattered abroad must be living and witnessing."

One of the significant features of Dr. Bardsley's statement is that it nowhere suggests contraction or postponement in the Church's missionary work in these days of war, but rather calls upon the people of the Church of England to meet extraordinary emergencies and requirements by extraordinary sacrifices made in a spirit of loyal devotion to God and to the nation.

GOVERNMENT ASKS FOR 37,500 TRAINED NURSES

Clergymen Are Asked to Help Recruit Young Women

WASHINGTON, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.—The National Organization for Public Health Nursing has sent to all clergymen of the United States a letter urging their co-operation in helping to enlist for the Army and Navy 37,500 registered trained nurses by July 1, 1919. The letter follows in part:

The United States Army and Navy have asked for 37,500 registered trained nurses by July 1, 1919, for the care of wounded and sick soldiers and sailors.

This will take one-half of the present skilled nursing forces of the United States. The effect of this upon public health will be disastrous unless most strenuous efforts are made to supply the needs of the civil population with skilled workers.

In normal times there are approximately 6,000 public health nurses scattered over the United States, caring for the families of the people who cannot afford the entire time of a trained nurse. They go into the homes, staying long enough with the sick mother and the ailing child to give expert care, setting things right for the day and carrying out the instructions of the physician. They do more. They teach the family how not to be sick. They instruct the mother how to care for the baby the twenty-three hours when the nurse cannot be in the house.

Although a concerted effort is being made by the Government to protect the vital public health service, numbers of public health nurses have volunteered for military service. The campaign for the protection of children and the extension of public health nursing to rural areas is demanding large numbers of public health nurses. Child conservation and tuberculosis work in France is using them. A profession that has never been oversupplied is meeting greater and greater demands every day.

All these factors have forced upon our organization the great task of increasing the number of public health nurses in the land.

First, and most important, every well educated young woman who is interested in dealing with the many problems in this field is urged to enter one of our training schools for nurses, where she will get a firm foundation for future work, while at the same time immediately entering as a student nurse on the serious nursing work of the country.

Second, private duty nurses, who, on account of family ties or some other reason, cannot join the Red Cross Nursing Service for military duty, are urged to consider most seriously the needs of home service in the public health field. The call is imperative.

Third, the private patient is urged to utilize the visiting nurse service. The visiting nurse is a highly skilled nurse who is especially trained to supplement the care of the family or the trained attendant, teaching them to care for the patient during the time she herself is not there. By using the visiting nurse, the patient releases the private nurse for duty where the value of her services can be multiplied. The nurse can then enter the teaching field where she trains others to become nurses, or the public health field where instead of caring for one patient she cares for many.

In addition, we must all put our shoulders to the wheel and help the schools for nurses already established and give scholarships to help those nurses who need financial assistance while taking graduate work. One thing is certain—we must keep trained women in the field for this service.

We feel that through the medium of your Church we can reach a group of earnest young women, who can be reached in no other way, to whom this service will especially appeal. Your sanction will give encouragement to those eager to enter the profession, and will do much towards making their parents give a glad consent to their rendering such patriotic service.

NEW YORK

Poughkeepsie Church has Memorial Lights—On Trinity Sunday the congregation at the Church of the Holy Comforter, Poughkeepsie, made a thank offering to complete the fund necessary for placing electric lights in the church. It was deemed most fitting to take the offering on Trinity Sunday, as the Rev. Robert Fulton Crary, D.D., for whom the lights are a memorial, was advanced to the priesthood on that feast, and it also marked a close of the second year of the rectorship of the present rector, the Rev. Clarence Archibald Bull.

A fund for electric lights had been started prior to the coming of the present rector, but shortly after his coming it was decided to make this work a fit memorial to Dr. Crary, who for forty years was rector of this parish. More than one thousand dollars of the fund has been raised by the untiring efforts of the present rector.

The church will be wired and the lights installed during the present summer.

Grace Church Summer Services—Grace Church, Broadway and Tenth Street, has the following schedule of services for the summer:

Sundays—Holy Communion at 8 a. m. Morning Service with sermon at 11 a. m. Evening service with sermon at 8 p. m. Dean Fosbroke of the General Theological Seminary will be the Sunday morning preacher for July, and the Rev. C. C. Bentley, assistant minister of Grace Church, will preach every Sunday evening during July.

The week day services will be as follows:

Every Monday and Saturday, service for intercession for the war at 12.30 p. m. in the church.

Every Tuesday and Thursday, noonday service with address by one of the clergy of the parish at 12.30 p. m. in the church.

Every Wednesday and Friday, outdoor service and address in Huntington Close to the south of the church at 12.30 p. m.

Visiting clergy will speak at most of these outdoor services. The list for June and July includes:

June 26—The Rev. R. W. Conklin, St. George's, Newark, New Jersey.

July 3—The Rev. C. R. Cregg. Holy Faith, New York.

July 5—The Rev. H. O. Boon, Armonk. New York.

July 12—The Rev. W. P. McCune, Ph.D., St. Ignatius', New York.

July 17—The Rev. J. H. Fitzgerald, Christ's, Bay Ridge, New York.

July 24—The Rev. Dr. Carstensen, Holy Rood, New York.

The seats at all the services are free.

PITTSBURGH

An Educational Campaign—All Saints' Church, Pittsburgh, has been holding a series of parish conferences to consider the objectives of the Christian Army, of which the parish is a unit. The meetings were held in the parish rooms, during the week beginning June 16, and were in preparation for a "drive," commonly known as an "Every Member Canvass." The objectives were studied under three heads on three successive evenings: The Neighborhood, the Diocese, and the Whole World. The first conference was opened by Miss Bailie, the organizer and manager of the Business Women's Luncheon in Trinity parish, on the general subject of a parish's responsibility to its neighborhood. Other addresses that evening were by persons already engaged in welfare work close to All Saints' Church: Mr. Eliot of the Woods Run Settlement; Chaplain Millir of the Western Penitentiary; Mrs. Newheart of St. John's Hospital; Mrs. Claney of the City's Child Welfare Department, and Mr. Gilling, Commissioner of Boy Scouts.

On the evening on which the diocese was the topic for consideration, the Rev. Dr. H. A. Flint of Crafton, chairman of the convention's committee on the subject, showed the great need of the rural portions of the diocese; Brother Hance spoke of the St. Barnabas' Home for Convalescents and Incurables; Miss Coulson in behalf of the Church Home for children and old ladies; the Rev. F. O. Johnson, chaplain of the St. Margaret Memorial Hospital, told of its work, and Mr. C. S. Shoemaker gave some account of the work of the Laymen's Missionary League.

The third evening was devoted to the World Objective, under the leadership of Mrs. M. C. Adams, diocesan president of the Woman's Auxiliary, when missionary strategy was considered, also the sectors most open to successful attack, and the method of supplying the troops in the field.

Grace Church—Sunday morning, June 16, a large gathering of men assembled at the early celebration of the Holy Communion, in connection with the Rector's fifth anniversary, the Rev. William Porkess. At the later morning service the rector preached a special sermon, dwelling upon the marks of progress, covering the five years. During that time the Sunday School had been absolutely transformed. The real awakening to regular church attendance had been manifested. A missionary spirit, on the part of many parishioners, had been stirred. Considerable increase in systematic giving to current expenses had been brought about. Somewhat elaborate structural improvements to the church property had also been effected during the present rectorship. A formal request, from a number, for the publication of this anniversary sermon was made after the service.

LOUISIANA

The Church at Camp Beauregard—Camp Beauregard, accommodating some 25,000 men, is situated seven miles from the city of Alexandria, near the centre of the State. There are two Episcopal churches in this town, but these have recently been united under the rectorship of the Rev. W. S. Slack. There is a parish school in connection with this work. Many of our Church boys scattered through the diocese are at the camp nearby and are served in many ways by the Church in Alexandria. Recently, under the auspices of the War Camp Community Service Board, there was carried out a fine musical program on a Sunday afternoon on the grounds between St. James' Church and the parish house. There was a large soldiers' chorus and the 156th Infantry band. A large number of both civilians and soldiers attended. Bishop Sessums, coming up from New Orleans, makes frequent visits to the camp, organizing the Church's work, confirming candidates and making addresses. The Rev. J. Tilmer Buskie, for some years rector of St. James' Church, Baton Rouge, capital of the state, is chaplain of the First Louisiana Infantry and has been a great help in the Church's work. He has been granted a leave of absence from his parish during the war and the Rev. J. H. Spearing has taken his place. Sixty-four men from this parish are in war service. The Brotherhood of St. Andrew is doing its work at the camp and Mr. Edward Shields, long an active layman of the Church in New Orleans, has been placed in charge. He has arranged for the erection of a Brotherhood of St. Andrew building and this will soon be realized. The congregation in New Orleans are now raising money to provide him with an automobile.

Red Cross Nurse Gassed—Among the many women from New Orleans now serving as Red Cross nurses in France are three of our Church girls, two of them sisters, Misses Minnie and Maud Mims and their cousin, Miss Ada. The latter has lately been severely gassed while serving in a hospital, but is expected to recover.

Churches Confer on War Work—Thirty Roman Catholic and Protestant clergymen and Jewish rabbis recently held a conference in New Orleans with the Rev. Dr. W. H. Tippy of New York, executive secretary of the Federal Council of Churches to inaugurate plans for co-operation in church and social work in the city. The Rev. Dr. W. A. Barr, Dean of Christ Church Cathedral, acted as presiding officer. Others of our own clergy are actively interested in this movement and part of the work it plans to do is to welcome and put in touch with friends many new comers who will be attracted to New Orleans by the development of the shipbuilding industry.

Dr. Coupland's Boat Torpedoed—The Rev. Dr. Coupland, rector of Trinity Church, New Orleans, who has been granted a leave of absence for one year to go to France as a chaplain, has arrived safely, but the ship on which he sailed was twice attacked by U-boats. The Rev. Walter B. Copers, for the past twelve years president of the Church Institute at Columbia, Tennessee, has accepted an invitation to act as locum tenens during the rector's absence.

NEW HAMPSHIRE

Diocesan School Commencements—Holderness School, the diocesan school of New Hampshire, closed a successful year Wednesday, June 12. The sermon to the graduating class was preached on the preceding Sunday by the Rev. Dr. Flavel S. Luther, president of Trinity College.

On the closing day the Bishop made the address on co-operation. At the luncheon several of the alumni made speeches.

The program of the evening consisted of prize declamations, the first prize being awarded to Hugh Huggins, several selections by the school orchestra which drew forth well-deserved applause and piano solos of more than ordinary merit by Hugh Huggins.

A service flag with sixty stars was unfurled with a dedicatory address by the Rev. Wm. Porter Niles, a former boy and master of the school.

The following prizes were awarded:

For excellence in algebra, Frank C. Cosby; in Latin, Albert Atwood; in English, Hugh Huggins; in German, Clay Marsh; in French, Sumner Pratt; in Botany, Reginald Gresley. The prize for the highest stand for the year was awarded to Reginald Bresley.

The Webster Trophy Cup, for best all around athletic attainment, to Edward R. Clare.

The Medal for Manliness, the school's highest award, was given to Oakes K. Lawrence.

The Bishop then gave diplomas to the members of the graduating class with a few words of parting counsel. The year closed with a compline service in the chapel.

St. Mary's, the diocesan school for girls, closed its year Saturday, June 15. Bishop Parker presided and awarded prizes as follows: For Excellence in Domestic Science, Nellie Conklin; the Devin Prize in English, Rachel Nauss; the Heath Prize in Mathematics, Myla Cavis; for Excellence in Latin and French, Constance Hopkins; for Excellence in Conduct and Scholarship, Gertrude Hambleton.

Diplomas were given to the Misses Bass, Conklin, Hambleton, Hopkins, Hidden, Macy and Payne.

The address was made by Mrs. William P. Ladd, wife of the Dean of the Berkeley Divinity School, whose intimacy with woman's work in England made her address most timely and interesting.

An exhibition of aesthetic dancing was given and the work of the departments of art and domestic science was inspected.

The sermon to the school was preached in St. Paul's Church on Sunday evening, June 17, by the Rev. Allen J. Holley of Lancaster. Bishop Parker gave a hearty welcome to the newly chosen vice-principal, Miss Mary E. Ladd, a former St. Mary's girl and graduate of Smith College.

SOUTHERN FLORIDA

Receives Croix de Guerre—Randolph H. Cobb, son of the Rev. and Mrs. R. P. Cobb (of the Cathedral School, Orlando) and a communicant of the Cathedral parish, was recently awarded the "Croix de Guerre" for bravery and efficient service in the ambulance corps in France. So far as is known, he is the first Florida boy to be thus honored. For three weeks' time in April his ambulance division was working at the battlefront, removing under fire the wounded, he and others driving their ambulances at times for periods of thirty-six to forty-eight hours without rest, and amid narrowest escapes. Five huge shells exploded within a few yards of his ambulance on one of these trips. His whole section received official commendation for their work at this time, and Mr. Cobb was one of nine men to receive the French cross.

Commencement at Orlando—Commencement at the Cathedral School for Girls, Orlando, closed brightly the eighteenth year of that excellent institution, the largest class in its history receiving their displomas, the school year marked by increased attendance of both boarding and day pupils, also its final report of a surplus instead of the expected deficit was received with glad surprise by Bishop Mann and other members of the school board—for with marked increase of necessities and no corresponding increase of rates the board had no hope of meeting all bills through the school income.

Bishop Mann preached the baccalaureate sermon in St. Luke's Cathedral, the service taken by Dean Glass and the Rev. R. P. Cobb and the students attending in a body. Clear, forceful and practical, Bishop Mann's sermon stressed high ideals of womanhood—that amid the manifold avenues of work now open to woman, her chief duty and privilege is still that of home making.

The class play, class day exercises and the final event of commencement, with its award of displomas and honor medals, were each attended by large and deeply interested audiences. The Alumnae Association held its annual meeting and arranged for an extra meeting next October.

Bishop Gray Visits Old Friends—The Rt. Rev. Wm. Crane Gray, D.D., retired, first bishop of Southern Florida, recently made a brief visit to relatives in St. Petersburg and Orlando, receiving heartiest welcome, for he is deeply beloved throughout this large field where for twenty-one years he gave himself with increasing devotion and zeal to furthering the work of the Church. Though now nearing eighty-three years of age, he continues vigorous, with all his former interest in Southern Florida. From Orlando he returned to his present home in Nashville, Tennessee, but was to continue his journey after a brief stop to Rhinelander, Wisconsin, where he expected to spend some weeks with his son, the Rev. Campbell Gray, and family.

BOSTON

The Bishop at Radcliffe—Bishop Lawrence preached the baccalaureate sermon at Radcliffe College on June 16. He laid the greatest stress on the weakness of hatred in personal, national and military senses. "We must withstand our foes, not on grounds of hatred or bitterness, but on grounds of principle." He then spoke of receiving a letter from a chaplain in France saying that his colonel had objected to his expressing this same idea through the medium of one of the Bishop's authorized prayers that he had used during a regimental service.

"None of us," said the Bishop, "is going to criticize those at the front, because we do not know the strain they are under. But, as a rule, those at the front are less liable to hate than those who are safe at the rear. Hatred is not only a moral wrong, but it is a military weakness. Team work is sacrificed. The struggle becomes personal. Those who lay out our campaigns must lay them out on principles, and those who carry them out, even to the humblest private, must be moved to action by passion for a principle, so that when he strikes, even though he strikes his bayonet through a body, there is no hatred except hatred of a wrong, but he is moved by that spiritual power of justice and liberty that compels him to strike, as Lincoln, Grant and Lee struck. They struck hard, but great soldiers are not guilty of hatred.

"Think of the spirit of this country two or three years ago: intent on making money, intent on professional competition, on the pursuit of pleasure. Think of the self-centred spirit of most of us then; contrast it with the spirit of the country today—and we realize that God's hand is in it all. Our eyes have been opened and we are doing what we can to meet the onslaught of physical force. We know that justice, truth and liberty are the final forces of the world. Our fathers wrought with them and we are living on what they accomplished with them. God is the embodiment of these moral principles and if we are to do our best work, we must look to God for these powers."

A Strenuous Rescue—The Rev. Karl S. Cate, a priest of this diocese, brought up in St. James' Church, Roxbury, though canonically resident in Rhode Island, has recently been reported in a heroically strenuous piece of rescue work in France. Acting as district secretary of the Y. M. C. A., he had occasion to be driving a truck full of supplies from behind the battle-line, when he came upon five wounded soldiers and a party of French refugee children helpless by the roadside. Emptying his truck, he made room for the children and the soldiers and, except for brief naps by the road, drove without sleep for forty-eight hours to Paris. Mr. Cate was formerly in the Y. M. C. A. at Camp Devens and before our entering the war was curate at All Saints' Church, Providence, Rhode Island.

Arlington Digs—The men of the Mission of Our Saviour, East Arlington, are conspiring together to defeat the high cost of building. They have already begun the task of digging the cellar for a new church building for which the plans have been drawn by Messrs. Brigham, Coveney and Bisbee. The material for the new building is being assembled on the building lot, to be ready for use as soon as the enthusiastic amateurs have completed the work of excavation. Blisters are badges of honor today in East Arlington. The Rev. Warren Newton Bixby is priest-in-charge.

At the Cathedral—Bishop Johnson of Colorado was the preacher at the Cathedral on the Third Sunday After Trinity.

On the Fourth Sunday After Trinity there was a notable service in the Cathedral at 7:30 p. m., consisting of the dedication of the flags of the Allied Nations. Dean Rousmaniere made an address on "The Aim of the Allies." These British, French and Italian processional flags were recently presented to the Cathedral. They were carried in procession to the porch at 7:15, where the usual fifteen minutes of outdoor singing of familiar hymns was held. Afterwards the procession reformed and marched up the centre aisle to the choir. "An Office for Use in Time of War" was then read, at the conclusion of which the flags were blessed.

Another Gold Star—Roger Sherman Dix, Jr., a member of the Honor Roll of Trinity Church, Boston, has been killed in France as the result of an airplane accident. He enlisted in the American Field Service after finishing his junior year at Harvard, and sailed for France in July of last year. He was at the front at Verdun at a time of fierce fighting and his section received "citation militaire" for bravery in carrying off the wounded. Later on he enlisted in the American Aviation Service and made his first flight last March.

"Conference for Church Work"—The Conference For Church Work at the Cambridge Theological School opened on June 21. There was a reception in the afternoon of this first day from 5 to 6 and a "Sunset Service" in the quadrangle of the school at 7:15. The conference continues till July 6.

PHILADELPHIA

Two Old Churches Unite—A merger of two of the oldest Episcopal parishes in the northern part of the city will go into effect at once. St. John's Northern Liberties and Emmanuel Church, Kensington, will combine.

The Rev. Edwin S. Lane, rector of St. John's, will be in charge of the combined new parish. Mr. Lane will not have active care of the parish for the present, as he has been appointed a chaplain in the army, and has been granted an indefinite leave for service in France. Mr. Lane is well known as having accompanied Dr. Mockridge in service at Fort Niagara.

For the present the congregations will continue to worship in their present locations, and the Rev. C. B. Krantz, Jr., will act as curate, giving most of his time to the work at Emmanuel Church.

The Rev. E. G. Knight, who has been rector of Emmanuel for sixteen years, is going to become rector of the Church of the Incarnation at Drexel Hill. The work has so rapidly grown at Drexel Hill that the plans for a rectory, parish house and an enlarged chapel are complete.

Tentative plans have been made for including in the new parish the Church of the Advent at Fifth and Buttonwood Streets and the Church of the Messiah in Kensington. If this latter plan goes through, a large church will be erected on the site of Emmanuel Church on Girard Avenue.

Union Service at Old Christ Church—On July 4 there will be a great united service under the auspices of many religious bodies in the city. This union service has taken a prominent part in worthier celebration of Independence Day in the city.

Bishop Garland and Dr. Washburn (rector of Christ Church) represent the Episcopal Church, Bishop Berry the Methodist, Dr. Roberts the Presbyterian, and Dr. Delk the Lutheran Church on the committee arranging for the special service.

Church Choirs Aid Sane Fourth—The Germantown business men have for some years held an evening celebration of the Fourth in Vernon Park: speakers of note, and a safe setting off of fireworks have marked their community celebration. But this year they have urged church choirs to come to their aid to make community singing the feature of the annual celebration.

Service for War Victim—A special service was conducted at St. Peter's Church, Germantown (Rev. S. P. Keeling, rector), on Sunday, June 16, to honor the memory of Lt. Albert Bolay, who lost his life with the aviation corps of the British Army. Lt. Bolay was a former member of St. Peter's choir and of the Brotherhood chapter in the parish.

104th Anniversary at Valley Forge—The Rev. Dr. Burke observed the 104th anniversary of the evacuation of Valley Forge by the Continental Army on June 19. This was also the fifteenth anniversary of the laying of the cornerstone of the Memorial Chapel. Sedalia were dedicated in the chapel in memory of the Rev. Lee Massey and the Rev. Bryan Fairfax of Virginia, clergymen who ministered to Washington.

Evangelistic Campaign—George Long of the Inasmuch Mission is to conduct evangelistic services this summer, beginning the end of June, in a large tent erected at Sixtieth and Locust Streets in West Philadelphia. A large volunteer choir is being trained to lead the singing at these services.

IRVING A. MCGREW.

BALTIMORE

Archdeaconry Meetings—All the archdeaconries of the diocese have recently held their spring meetings. That of Baltimore met at Christ Church and listened to an address by the Rev. Romilly F. Humphries, rector of Grace and St. Peter's Church, upon "The New Plan of the Junior Auxiliary." Reports were received from the missionary workers and plans made for the coming year. The archdeaconry of Annapolis met at Trinity Church, Dersey's. An address was made by Bishop Murray and the sermon was preached by the Rev. F. P. Willes, rector of Mount Calvary Church. The Rev. Romilly F. Humphries gave a lecture upon missionary work. The archdeaconry of Towson met at St. John's Church, Kingsville, the first church established in Baltimore county, in 1671. Thirty clergymen and thirty laymen were in attendance. Confirmation was administered by Bishop Murray and the special sermon was preached by the Rev. Henry B. Lee, the new rector of Trinity Church, Towson. The archdeaconry of Cumberland met at St. James' Church, Mt. Airy. Addresses were made by the Rev. Louis A. Peatress of Japan upon Missions, the Rev. Edwin S. Hinks upon "The Problems of the Rural Parish," the Rev. Dr. George F. Dudley, rector of St. Stephen's, Washington, District of Columbia, on "The Church and the War;" the Rev. W. R. B. Turner upon "The Holy Ghost, the Vicar of Christ," and the Rev. Romilly F. Humphries upon the "New Junior Plan." The meeting was most enjoyable and profitable.

A Clerical Removal—The Rev. Clarence Stuart McClellan, Jr., has resigned his position as assistant to the Rev. Dr. Niver at Christ Church, Baltimore, after a service of eight months. No definite announcement has been made as to his plans for the future. During his stay in Baltimore Dr. Niver has been absent the greater part of the time in the discharge of his duties as chaplain of the Marines at Quantico, Virginia, and the care of the parish has devolved largely upon Mr. McClellan. He has been active in looking after the interests of visiting soldiers and sailors, for whose benefit special services and receptions have been held at Christ Church on Sunday evenings with good results.

A New Doctor of Divinity—The Ven. Peregrine Wreth, Archdeacon of Baltimore, has recently been granted the honorary degree of Doctor of Divinity by his alma mater, the Theological Seminary of Virginia.

WYLLYS REDE.

LOS ANGELES

Convocation—The semi-annual meeting of the Convocation of Los Angeles was held in St. Luke's parish, Long Beach, which, with its large and beautiful new church and parish hall, gave practical evidence of the remarkable growth of the Church in that city and, indeed, of the great expansion of the city itself, when it entertained more than 260 people, delegates and others, on that occasion.

After the service the Rev. Wm. Smith presented his report as chaplain of the city institutions, which was full of interest and commanded not only the attention but the deepest sympathy of all present, the account given of some of the inmates of the County Farm being most touching.

The Venerable Archdeacon Marshall made a strong plea for more interest in a financial way to be shown by the Church people of the Convocation for the work of the County and City Mission; and a committee was appointed which subsequently recommended that each of the parishes and missions be requested to contribute its quota for the generous support of this work—which was adopted.

At the luncheon in the parish hall, of which 260 people partook, the Rural Dean, after a short speech of welcome, referred to the fact that there was present a young priest of the Church who, to further his influence among the men, had enlisted as a private of Marines in the navy, and he called upon the Rev. Mr. Johnson for a speech.

Mr. Johnson's address made a distinct impression on the company, who wished that there were many such to offer themselves so unreservedly to the service of the country and in doing that to serve the Church as well.

Mr. John Sampson, president of the Bishops' Guild, told the story of a charity whose work redounds to the glory of the whole diocese. He spoke of a display of garments lately on exhibition at St. Paul's Parish Hall, Los Angeles, when about 250 children's dresses, which had been largely made out of scraps of material of all kinds, were greatly admired. These dresses would clothe many children who but for them would literally have nothing to wear.

Commencement of Bishop's School—On Sunday, June 2, the baccalaureate sermon of the Bishop's School for Girls was preached in St. James' Church by the Rev. Frank Doudenbush, now serving as voluntary chaplain at Camp Kearney, ten miles from the town. This was followed on Tuesday by the senior class play, "A Thousand Years Ago," which was most creditably rendered.

On Wednesday evening a reception was given by the School in honor of Bishop Johnson and Mrs. Johnson. This was followed by the annual dance, held out of doors, altogether a delightful affair. Then on Thursday afternoon came the musicale, which showed how much time and skill had been brought to bear on this department of the year's work.

Of course the outstanding feature of the week's events was the final graduation of the senior class on Friday, thirteen pupils receiving their diplomas at the hands of the Bishop after the invocation had been given by the Chaplain of the School, the Rev. Wm. Bedford-Jones, and the address by the Rev. Charles E. Deuel, D.D., rector of Trinity Church, Santa Barbara, California. The Bishop made the announcement that Miss Marguerite Barton of Cambridge, Massachusetts, had been chosen and had accepted the position made vacant by the resignation of Miss Gilman as principal.

ALFRED FLETCHER.

CENTRAL NEW YORK

Annual Meeting of G. F. S.—The Annual Meeting of all the Branches of the G. F. S. in Utica was held Monday evening, June 10, at the Memorial Church of the Holy Cross, Utica. The sermon was preached by Bishop Fiske, who has also been commencement orator or baccalaureate preacher at some half dozen colleges and schools this spring.

Special Services—The services at St. Lawrence Church, Alexandria Bay, will be conducted during the summer by the Bishop Coadjutor of Iowa and by Archdeacon Hegeman of Central New York.

Clerical Appointments—The Rev. David Bland is to be locum tenens at St. John's Church, Ithaca, during the absence of the rector on war duty. The Rev. John E. Wooton is to be Priest-in-charge of the work at Homer, Marathon and McLean.

Will Attend 100th Anniversary—The Presiding Bishop has appointed Bishop Fiske to be the representative of the Church at the 100th Anniversary of the Presbyterian Seminary at Auburn, New York, which is to take place in the fall. The Bishop has also been appointed Grand Chaplain of the Grand Lodge of F. and A. Masons of the State of New York.

MISSOURI

In New War Work—The rector of St. Philip's received orders to report at Camp Taylor on June 15, to take training in preparation for duty as an army chaplain. With the consent of his vestry Mr. Cleveland has taken a leave of absence and will spend five weeks at Camp Taylor. Mr. Cleveland has been one of the most active of all the St. Louis clergy in war work of all sorts. During the last Red Cross drive he made a speaking tour of Kansas and aroused much enthusiasm everywhere he went.

Great Italian Celebration—The Italians of St. Louis held a monster mass meeting in the Coliseum the other night, following a parade in which thousands of Italian-born residents of St. Louis and their children were in line. Addresses were made in English and Italian, and messages of cheer and pledges of support were sent to fellow-countrymen across the sea. The invocation was given by Archbishop Glennon of the Roman Church and the benediction by Bishop Tuttle.

Ordination—In St. Stephen's Church, St. Louis, on the Second Sunday after Trinity, Bishop Tuttle acting for Bishop Johnson ordained to the priesthood the Rev. W. W. S. Hohenschild, deacon. The sermon was preached by the Rev. H. N. O'Connor, rector of St. Alban's, St. Louis, and the candidate was presented by the Rev. H. W. Mizner, minister of St. Stephen's.

Missionary Host Meeting—The annual meeting of the Missionary Host is one of the established customs in the Diocese of Missouri. On a summer Sunday afternoon, before the city exodus begins which always comes with the coming of hot weather, the Sunday Schools of the city, with teachers and officers, each school with its appropriate banner, march in procession to the singing of spirited missionary hymns to some large theatre in the city and announce their annual offering for missionary work. This is an offering quite apart from that which is collected in Lent through the mite boxes. It is placed in the hands of the Bishop for work in the Missouri Diocese. This year the meeting was held at the Odeon. Addresses were made by the Bishop and the Bishop Coadjutor and by Mr. Frank Wyman, the treasurer, who announced that the offering was nearly $1,200, "one of the largest," he said, "in many years." It is remarkable that with all kinds of "drives" in the field, the Church offerings all along the line have increased. The Missionary Host was founded by Bishop Robertson and will celebrate its fiftieth anniversary next year.

HARRINGTON ROGERS.

HARRISBURG

Ordinations—On Friday, June 14, Bishop Darlington ordained to the Diaconate in St. Matthew's Church, Sunbury, Charles Nelson Thomas, Joseph Herbert Bond and Clayton E. B. Robinson. These were presented by the Rev. Lewis Nichols of St. Paul's, Lock Haven. He also ordained to the Priesthood the Rev. James Hart Lamb, Jr. Mr. Lamb was presented by his father, James Hart Lamb, D.D., rector emeritus at St. David's, Radnor, and his two brothers, the Rev. Addison A. Lamb of Trinity Church, Coatesville, and the Rev. George Warrington Lamb of Radnor, Pennsylvania. The sermon was by the Rev. James Hart Lamb, D.D. The Rev. F. M. C. Bedell of Trinity Church, Shamokin, conducted the quiet hour with the ordinands just previous to the ordination.

Mr. Thomas will remain in charge of the Church of Our Savior at Montoursville. Mr. Bond will take charge of St. Luke's, Blossburg, and other missions in the vicinity. Mr. Robinson will take charge of Christ Church, Lykens, St. Paul's, Williamstown, and St. Bartholomew's, Millerstown.

Funeral of Mr. Rutter—John Clayton Rutter was to have been ordained with this class, but he was accidentally and fatally shot in the eye a few days previously. His funeral took place from St. Paul's, Bloomsburg, on the 13th instant—the day before the day set for his ordination to the diaconate. His intention was to enter the army after his ordination. Bishop Darlington officiated at the funeral. There were present of the clergy the Rev. F. O. Musser, rector of St. Paul's, Bloomsburg; R. P. Kreitler of St. Luke's, Scranton; W. A. Sparks of Far Rockaway, Long Island; M. K. H. Ake of Christ Church, Berwick.

Mr. Gordon Reese of Lancaster, graduate of the Virginia Seminary, was also to have been ordained at this time, but he has accepted work with the Y. M. C. A. abroad and his ordination has been deferred a year.

Mr. Rutter's certificate of ordination had been made out and was presented to his parents.

LEROY F. BAKER.

DETROIT

Brotherhood Meeting—The Michigan Diocesan Assembly of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew held a patriotic service in St. Peter's Church, Detroit, on Friday evening, June 14, the speakers being the Rev. Wm. Heilman and C. J. S. Williamson, representatives at Camp Custer of the Church War Commission. The meeting was well attended by both men and women. Preceding the service, members of the Assembly met at supper, and were addressed by Geo. H. Randall, editor of St. Andrew's Cross, and general secretary of the Brotherhood in the United States.

COLORADO

Clerical Changes—Amongst recent changes in the personnel of the diocese of Colorado we find the recently-ordained deacon, the Rev. John S. Foster, under charge of Dean Casady entrusted with churches at St. James, Pueblo and Walsenburg, the congregation of the latter place having agreed to double their contributions so that he can have an adequate stipend. The Rev. James McLaughlin goes to the San Luis Valley, a wide area containing churches at La Jara, Alamosa, Del Norte, Monte Vista and Creede. This leaves Littleton, Sedalia and Bastle Rock vacant, but the Rev. Z. T. Savage has kindly consented to officiate till a permanent successor to Mr. McLaughlin can be found. Legislation affecting the Southwest of Colorado has from time to time been suggested looking to dividing the diocese on a more equitable basis, but at the recent convention it seemed to be the general opinion to ask for union of the missionary district with the diocese before marking out a division which could be done more easily after than before.

Talks—Amongst interesting missionary talks of late we have heard in Denver Archdeacon Schofield tell of his hair-breadth escapes to and from Liberia and Rev. Floyd Van Keuren's exciting experiences in evacuating the population of Amiens in France in which he had a great part. The Rev. D. C. Lees, who lived five years in Jerusalem, has also described Eastern life with very interesting pictures.

Bishop Given Degree—Bishop Coadjutor I. P. Johnson has had the degree of Doctor of Laws conferred on him causa honoris by Chancellor Buchtel of the University of Denver.

Dean Hart in Wyoming—Dean Hart is to spend July and part of August preaching in the churches of Wyoming, and during that time his pulpit and house will be occupied by Dean Abbott of Cleveland, Ohio.

Life at St. Mark's—St. Mark's, Denver, reports $1,300 in its memorial fund to the late rector, the Rev. John H. Houghton, also a communicant list of 670, with 275 services during the past year and amongst occasional offices thirty-five marriages and the same number of baptisms. Three men of the parish are engaged in prominent Brotherhood of St. Andrew positions. They are Frank Shelby at headquarters in France, F. S. Titsworth, executive secretary in Philadelphia, and Walter Macpherson with oversight of secretaries at camps in Texas, Louisiana, Arkansas, New Mexico and Oklahoma. G. H. Holoran.

VERMONT

Bishop Hopkins Hall Commencement—The events of closing week at Bishop Hopkins Hall began on Saturday, June 1, with a recital given by three of the more advanced pupils of the school. On Monday evening there was a dance, and Wednesday noon a school picnic, the class night exercises taking place Wednesday evening. On closing day, Thursday, June 6, several scenes from Alfred Noyes' Sherwood were presented, the woods south of the hall forming a lovely setting for the forest story.

Late in the afternoon the school and its guests assembled in the chapel, where Bishop Hall gave an inspiring address, taking as his theme "Carry On." The Bishop then presented diplomas to a class of six, most of whom expect to enter college.

MONTANA

The Rev. J. P. Anshutz Sails for France—The Rev. J. Phillip Anshutz of St. Luke's Church, Billings, who has received an appointment as chaplain in the army, was given a very hearty and enthusiastic reception just before his departure for the front by the citizens of Billings, regardless of church affiliation. A letter was handed him telling him in very touching language how much his splendid work in the community was appreciated by all classes of people, both in the city and in the whole county, and that they were proud to have him go as chaplain, feeling that he would render to their boys the most helpful and efficient service, while they pledged themselves to do all they could for his family during his absence. With the letter was a purse of six hundred dollars. Among the subscribers was the rector of the Roman Catholic Church and a number who are not members of St. Luke's parish.

WYOMING

Personals—The Rev. Edward J. d'Argent, formerly of Aberdeen, South Dakota, has accepted appointment in the Missionary District of Wyoming, and has taken charge of the work of the Church of the Good Shepherd, Sundance.

Mr. Charles G. Baird, candidate for Holy Orders, has been assigned to summer work at Encampment and Saratoga, and will be ordained to the diaconate at the time of Convocation. Mr. Baird is a student of the Philadelphia Divinity School.

Mr. Otey R. Berkeley of Bexley Hall has accepted appointment as summer worker in Medicine Bow and Hanna, under the direction of Dean Thornberry of St. Matthew's Cathedral, Laramie.

The Rev. A. Gordon Fowkes, who has spent the period of his diaconate as minister in charge of the Mission of St. John the Baptist, Big Piney, has been transferred to the Diocese of Fond du Lac for duty after his ordination to the priesthood.

Mr. John S. Gillespie, who has just completed his middle year in the Philadelphia Divinity School, has arrived in Meeteetse to take up his summer work there. Mr. Gillespie is a candidate for Holy Orders in the Missionary District of Wyoming.

The Rev. R. B. W. Hutt, who for four years has been rector of St. Mark's Church, Casper, Wyoming, has resigned his work to enter the army. Mr. Hutt is now with the Machine Gun Company, Sixty-second Infantry, Camp Fremont, California.

Lucy M. Taylor.

DALLAS

Junior Auxiliary Meets—The annual meeting of the Dallas diocesan branch of the Junior Auxiliary to the board of missions was held at St. Andrew's Church, Fort Worth, St. Barnabas' Day. In the absence of Bishop Moore, who arrived later in the day, the Rev. E. H. Eckel, rector of the parish, celebrated the Holy Communion, assisted by the Rev. F. T. Datson, rector of Trinity Parish, Fort Worth. The three clergymen named gave short missionary talks in the course of the day's program.

Miss Martha Russ of Dallas, diocesan president, carried on the meeting. Eight branches responded at roll-call, two of which have been organized during the year —Trinity, Fort Worth, and Good Shepherd, Mineral Wells. Financial provision was made for transportation to enable the Bishop to use a stereopticon formerly used by one of his archdeacons. Articles valued at about $90 were reported for a box to be sent to a mission hospital in the Tennessee mountains.

Bishop Moore offered a banner, to be known as "the Bishop's Banner," for the Sunday School making the largest per capita Lenten mite-chest offering, beginning next year. In response to his request, it was voted to send a box of hospital supplies to All Saints' Hospital, Fort Worth, next year, and to make a money pledge for the Bishop's discretionary use for the mission at Denton. After luncheon was served in the parish house and the completion of the afternoon program, the visitors were taken by automobile to the military camps and elsewhere.

WEST VIRGINIA

Notes—The Rev. W. H. Meyer, rector of Emmanuel Church, Kayser, West Virginia, was elected secretary of the Diocesan Council at the session recently held in Charlestown. Mr. Meyer's address is Kayser, West Virginia.

Mr. L. O. Forqueran, missionary in charge of Chester, West Virginia, has been placed in charge of Hinton parish of the same diocese. Mr. Forqueran is expected to be in residence by the last of June. His address will be Hinton, West Virginia.

Bishop Gravatt has appointed Mr. W. M. Cleveland, a student of the Virginia Theological Seminary, to be in charge of St. Paul's Church, Weston, West Virginia, during the summer. Mr. Cleveland is the son of the Rev. W. M. Cleveland, rector of St. Andrew's, Edwardsville, Illinois.

J. H. Clarke.

EASTON

Correction—In the report of the Diocesan convention there was a misleading statement to the effect that "all the officers of the diocese were unanimously elected." The Rev. Henry Davies, rector of Christ Church, Easton, was added to the Standing Committee, and was made dean of the Middle Convocation.

ALASKA

Council of Advice—The Council of Advice consists of the following: The Very Rev. G. D. Christian of Juneau, Canon Butcher of Douglas, and Messrs. J. H. Cobb and D. D. Evans of Juneau.

The Finance Committee of the Jurisdiction consists of: The Very Rev. G. D. Christian, Juneau; Mr. J. H. Cobb, Juneau, and Mr. B. D. Stewart of Sulzer.

The Council of Advice has recommended the following to the Bishop as candidates for Holy Orders: Mr. Richard Ceredig Jenkins of Seattle, recently received from the Congregational ministry.

Notes—Dean Christian, of Juneau, gives one of the courses of lectures at the Summer Theological School at Portland. The general subject will be: "The Belief and the Book"—I. "Pre-suppositions" and "Assumptions." II. The "Gospel" not in the "Gospels," but in the Epistles. III. Purpose and scope of the Synoptics.

Canon Butcher, custodian of the War Commission Fund, received over $200 for that purpose.

Dean Christian recently celebrated the tenth anniversary of his ordination to the Diaconate in St. John's Church, Richmond, Virginia.

CHICAGO

Waterman Hall Closes—The Rev. B. F. Fleetwood, D.D., the rector of Waterman Hall, the diocesan school for girls, last year presented his resignation after twenty-nine years of active service. The trustees having failed in their efforts to secure a successor, and owing to war conditions, decided that "the operation of Waterman Hall be suspended until further action in relation to the same is taken by the Board of Trustees." Dr. Fleetwood has purchased a residence adjoining the school grounds and will continue to reside in Sycamore.

Diocesan Social Service Commission Organizes—The Diocesan Social Service Commission, appointed at the recent Convention, at its meeting held during the week past elected as officers the following: Chairman, the Rev. George Craig Stewart, D.D.; vice-chairman, the Rev. Edwin J. Randall; secretary-treasurer, Mr. Carl B. Roden. The Rev. James B. Haslam was unanimously elected field secretary. The program of work for the ensuing year will recognize the following problems: 1. The Rehabilitation of Returned Wounded Soldiers and Training of the Same for Industrial Independence; 2. Conditions arising from the Influx of Negroes into Chicago; 3. Canvass of the Churches for Votes for Legislators who will pledge themselves to Vote for Ratification of the Federal Amendment; 4. Recreational Facilities for Soldiers in or near Chicago.

Elect Rector—Trinity Church, Aurora, has called to the rectorship the Rev. Pembroke Waller Reed, rector of St. John's Church, Petersburgh, Virginia. Mr. Reed has accepted the call and will assume charge of the work in August.

Longwood Rector Resigns—The Rev. Thomas N. Harrowell, F.S.O.R., who has been in charge of the Church of the Holy Nativity, Longwood, for more than ten years, has resigned and will assume charge of All Saints' Church, Pullman, and St. Joseph's Church, West Pullman. Mr. Harrowell has been actively engaged in the organization and training of the Illinois Reserve Militia on the South Side of Chicago, under the auspices of the State Council of Defense. He received his military training with the Royal North Western Mounted Police Service in Western Canada.

Memorial Service at Oak Park—A memorial service in honor of the Rev. Hedley Heber Cooper, who was gassed in France on Thursday, May 30, while in the active performance of his duties as a Y. M. C. A. secretary in the front line trenches, was held at Grace Church, Oak Park, during the week past. While at the time of his engaging for war service Mr. Cooper was rector of Christ Church, Piermont, New York, he was, until last year, the vicar of St. Christopher's Church, Oak Park. Soon after war was declared he resigned his parish and failing to receive a chaplaincy in the National Army, finally entered the service as a Y. M. C. A. hut secretary. His father, the Rev. Robert Octavius Cooper, is rector of St. Paul's Church, Riverside, one of the suburbs of Chicago.

Dr. Stewart Sails in July—The Rev. George Craig Stewart, D.D., rector of St. Luke's Church, Evanston, and secretary of the Church War Commission, on Saturday last received his orders from the American Red Cross to report for sailing the first week in July. Dr. Stewart will leave Evanston on June 24. ALBERT EDWARD SELCER.

NEWARK

Memorial Service—The memorial service for the late rector of Grace Church, Van Vorst, Jersey City, New Jersey, was held in the parish church. Bishop Lines presided and was assisted by the present rector, the Rev. Henry B. Bryan, the Rev. Claudius M. Roone, the Rev. Dr. Butterworth, and the Rev. D. T. Weidner. The service was attended by the wardens and vestrymen, also by the guilds and other organizations of the parish. Representatives of Mr. Bissell's class in Columbia University were also present. The music was rendered by the parish choir under the leadership of Mr. H. H. Cooper.

Bishop Lines spoke impressively of Mr. Bissell's relationship to the diocese and his bishop, and of his desire to be remembered by his people, after his departure out of this life. The Rev. Mr. Roone referred tenderly to his early association with Mr. Bissell when they were classmates in Columbia University. Three men in that class some time after graduation found themselves in Holy Orders. Canon Bryan spoke feelingly of Mr. Bissell as friend and brother priest. A letter was read from the Rev. F. Collertimes, rector of St. Mark's Church, Jersey City, expressing appreciation of Mr. Bissell's love of souls and devoted ministry to the sick and suffering.

English Church News

"A Soft-Hearted Archbishop"—You would scarcely recognize this as an appropriate description of the Archbishop of York. He has come, fresh from the approving plaudits of Americans, to encounter a fusillade of criticism at home. What he said was this: "With the Cross before our eyes, let us think kindly of the rulers, soldiers, and peoples of Germany and Austria. Those rough soldiers who are fighting us so desperately are simple and ignorant: they do only what they are commanded to do." You can imagine how the letter-writers have been busy over this sentiment in the daily press. We are told, even by a public man like Lord Denbigh, in a long letter to the Times, that the German crimes are not going to be forgotten, and that we must arouse the offensive spirit by reciting them in full detail. He adds: "All this miserable gush about forgiveness is only calculated to have the opposite effect." The Archbishop has not yet replied to his critics, but I should imagine that he would make it clear that he was not advocating the forgiveness of the Prodigal while still unrepentant. And he sees quite clearly that a gospel of hatred is a moral danger to any nation. Stern justice for crime is one thing, passionate vindictiveness quite another.

Whitsunday at the Abbey—The King and Queen and Princess Mary did not have their customary Whitsun service at the chapel of Buckingham Palace, but attended Westminster Abbey instead. There was no ceremony: this at the express desire of the King. There was a special interest in the shape of an ancient chalice and paten which were brought into use again at the Choral Celebration of Holy Communion. The Dean (Bishop Ryle) told the story of it in his sermon. The chalice and paten were made in 1571, and, through a strange chapter of accidents, they were recovered from the mud of the river Isis some forty years ago, and had now been presented to the Abbey, in memory of a young officer named Cyril Dupe, who fell on March 21. He was only a boy of nineteen, but in his last letter he wrote—and the Dean quoted the words—"Until England falls on her knees before God and acknowledges His omnipotence, we shall never win."

The Modernist and the Creed—We never seem to go along for many months without some recrudescence of the Modernist controversy. The latest case is one calling for the strictest impartiality, and, for the present at least, suspension of judgment. Dr. Glazebrook, canon of Ely, has published a book entitled "The Faith of a Modern Churchman," which has brought him under the censure of his Bishop, Dr. Chase of Ely. The point in dispute is as to how far the Creed is to be interpreted symbolically, and how far to be received as historical truth. He maintains that the evidence for the Virgin Birth is not such as to compel belief. As to the Resurrection of our Lord, he accepts the fact on its adequate evidence, and the "appearances" as historical events, but claims that those who follow the guidance of St. Paul regard these not as "the presentment of flesh and blood to the bodily eye, but as the manifestation of a spiritual body to spiritual perception."

The Bishop of Ely has written to Canon Glazebrook, saying that he is unable to admit the claim that the Virgin Birth and the Resurrection can be interpreted symbolically, quoting the Lambeth Conference of 1908 in support of his position. Canon Glazebrook has replied at great length, remarking that even bishops in council may err. He does not, however, assert that they have erred: the point is, Which are the historical facts of the Creed? He quotes the Bishop of Oxford as admitting the word metaphor in connection with the Descent, the Ascension, and the Session. He claims that "the historical facts" means such of the statements as appear in the light of our present knowledge to be historical. The Bishop of Ely rejoins by saying, in a letter to the Times, that he hopes, as soon as is possible in these exacting days, to challenge publicly these arguments. Contemporaneously with this incident, but apparently unconnected with it, a petition has been sent round to the clergy asking them to obtain signatures of communicants to a memorial to Convocation. The bishops are asked to make a plain declaration, by synodical act or otherwise, on the interpretation of the two Articles of the Virgin Birth and Resurrection.

Spoiling a Good Story—"From grave to gay"—we are all rather amused at the story which was told by Col. Seymour of the Canadian Force, which he told at a meeting of Unitarians. It will be remembered that five American flags were committed to the care of the St. Paul's Cathedral authorities. Mrs. Page and Lady Perley (wife of the Canadian High Commissioner) were asked to place the flags in position. The story was that Dean Inge was horrified at the suggestion of women taking part in an ecclesiastical ceremony, and that he was only placated by the reminder that women were even allowed to baptize in an emergency. In case this story has reached your country, it is only fair to add that the Dean has written a curt letter of four lines to say that there is no truth in it. "Ladies frequently take part in such ceremonies, and I should be the last to object to it."

The Scottish Church Assemblies—The proceedings of the two assemblies of the Scottish Presbyterian churches are of unusual interest to us this year, owing to the strong movement for their union with each other. Things are undoubtedly shaping in this direction: the laymen seem much in favor of it. Parliamentary sanction will have to be obtained, and in this matter our Scottish friends will be fighting our battle as well as their own, as they will have to retain their spiritual independence of the State, while at the same time holding on to their endowments. The question in Scotland seems to be one of re-establishment, rather than disestablishment. And that good friend of our Church, Dr. Cooper, the retiring Moderator, openly said that he anticipated a deputation from the Church of England in the next few years, inviting them to join in a united Church.

FROM BISHOPS' CONVENTION ADDRESSES

The Pastor and the War

From Bishop Fiskes' 1918 Convention Address

Of all the addresses delivered by the Archbishop of York during his stay in America (and I heard him on more than a dozen occasions) none seemed to me quite so remarkable as a short devotional talk given by him at a conference for the rural clergy of the Diocese of Missouri. Laymen of St. Louis had arranged that the clergy from the smaller parishes of the diocese should be entertained in the city during the Archbishop's visit and given an opportunity to meet him. The Archbishop spoke in detail of the work which the clergy of the Church of England had done since the beginning of the war and of the gradual change of emphasis in this work as the war progressed. From the start the clergy had been anxious to serve. Thousands of them had volunteered for work—many of them as chaplains; many more for other forms of service; many of the younger men insisted upon the abrogation of the custom which had exempted the clergy from military duty and urged that they be permitted to take their place in the fighting ranks. . . . . The clergy who could not secure war appointments gave themselves with zeal to the sort of work at home which many of our own men have been doing. . . .

Then came the first casualties. The number of these soon multiplied appallingly. At last the clergy began to see more clearly the distinctly spiritual side of their work. They found that their office was something more—something vastly higher—than an opportunity for the usual type of patriotic service. They began to see why the clergy were exempt from military duty. It is because the nation recognizes the value of spiritual service and deliberately counts upon it as a true part of national service. It is the duty of the clergy to lift high the spirit of national consecration to a great task; to bring home to their people the duty of offering themselves, all that they are as well as all that they possess, to the accomplishment of this task. Especially in days of anxiety and sorrow, of depression and loss, they must bring to those committed to their care the comfort and joy of Christian faith and hope.

So it is with ourselves. I think we may say, without fear of contradiction, that no class has been more generous in patriotic service than the men of the ministry. Our own clergy have been in the forefront in offering themselves for any duty they can perform. We are proud of those who are doing Y. M. C. A. work and Red Cross work here or overseas; we rejoice that, far out of proportion to our numbers, our younger men have been selected for chaplaincies in the army and navy. . . . But there are many others who cannot go—many who chafe at being compelled to stay at home when they want to go and have tried hard to get the chance to go, that they may serve with the men who are leaving our shores by thousands every day. Here at home these clergy have certainly had an enviable record in the performance of every patriotic duty. . . . I can sympathize with those of our clergy who want to secure military appointments and minister to the men at the front.

My consolation—and I trust theirs—has been that the task set upon our shoulders is such that if we perform it faithfully we are doing our whole duty in ways none the less effective because often unrecognized. Some of you may have seen the letter written by Bishop Gailor giving his reasons for remaining in his diocese and declining an appointment abroad. You have probably read also the address of Dr. Slattery of Grace Church, New York, telling why he felt obliged to decline a similar call and to remain with his people. These letters show that the faithful priest and pastor has a duty now which will, if well performed, make him a power for righteousness. It may not bring him into public prominence as will his much speaking on many platforms; it does not have the glamour of sacrifice which goes with duty abroad; but it will tell far and count long for Christ and His Church. We need to lay emphasis again and again on the great responsibility of the priestly office, on the wonderful opportunity offered now for pastoral faithfulness, and on the greatness of the prophetic message which can gain a hearing in these days as never before.

I was dining in New York recently with a representative of the English government who was here in connection with the air service. He had been speaking in the usual restrained fashion of an Englishman on conditions in his own country, when suddenly a turn in the conversation made him break through his reserve and with almost a cry of agony he said, "My God, it is awful; sometimes it is awful." Then he added: "Bishop, if you clergy can bring us any ray of comfort and sure faith in these dark days, you have the biggest and finest job of any men on earth."

It is true, of course, and we shall know increasingly how true it is, as our own dark days come. It is our work to lift up American life, to lift it far enough to make us worthy of the high and holy cause to which the nation has given its adherence. We must make the allied peoples fit instruments for God's use in the saving of the world. If we fight for truth and honor and righteousness and the very decencies of humanity, I do not see how we dare hope for victory until we have cleansed ourselves of all dishonor and brought our individual lives up to the level of our professions of national purpose. More than that, if the winning of the war shall mean more sacrifice, many lives lost and much suffering still to bear, I do not know how our people shall have strength to make the offering, endure the hardship and remain brave in the sorrow, save as we gain a new grip on our faith and discover in the Christianity we have professed to believe the answer to the problems which make belief difficult—the same old problems which we have always had with us and now see thrown into sharper outline and pressing upon us with new insistency. That is the great opportunity which we of the Church, both clergy and laity, have in these days. We must sound the call back to realities.

Clerical Salaries

From Bishop Lines' 1918 Convention Address

I would urge all our parish and mission churches to have thought for the salaries of the clergy. There is no need of speaking here of the greatly increased cost of living which affects people of moderate salaries especially. It is very easy to allow the old arrangement to continue without study of the new conditions. The officers of the churches ought to ask themselves whether it may not be in their power to increase small salaries and take anxiety from the clergy and their homes. They ought not to wait until the subject is forced upon their attention but to act at once. I am sure that the clergy do not expect what are called large salaries and are quite content to accept what the people can fairly give. I hear no complaints but I know how closely men are compelled to live, going without many things, such as books which they ought to have. To say as they do in some parishes that the minister is receiving the average wage of his people does not excuse the payment of an inadequate salary. Business men give, and men expect to receive, adequate tools for their work and to have the conditions favorable for the largest accomplishment. Ministers need, as all good workmen need, such equipment for work. With them it may be an automobile, a typewriter, books, a properly lighted and heated rectory, provision for the education of the children, ability to show hospitality or to make a short journey now and then to see something new, some good periodicals, insurance, and in more cases than most of us know, means to provide for dependents. I am sure that none of the clergy wish to live in luxury, and the simplicity of their lives is a good object lesson in the community where people are bewitched to show their ability to live better than their neighbors. Many of our clergy are living dangerously near the limit of necessary expenditure. Sickness and like misfortune come to bring great anxiety and under the strain and stress of limited means no man can do his best work. The diocese does in various ways, some of which are known and some of which are not known, help out and there are a great many friendly actions of which one is glad to know. The workman is worthy of his hire and the parishes and church officers ought to ask how much they can fairly do for those who serve them. Ill-paid service is poor service in every department of life. It is not the office of the parishes to train their clergy in self-sacrifice and the endurance of poverty. The clergy are the best givers in the Church and many of them with meagre salaries are maintaining the finest standard of giving in their parishes. I wish that I might learn that the officers of parishes and missions in their first meeting after this convention are asking whether they ought not to give their ministers a better support and whether they are not able to do so.

Attention is called to the fact that The Open Forum is designed for letters and not for articles. No letter exceeding 350 words in length can be published, except under very special circumstances.—The Editor.

War-Time Poverty

To the Editor of The Churchman:

You have "smoked out" one of the stay-at-homes, by the statement in your splendid editorial, England, that "There is no hunger in America; but there are starving children, mothers, old men and aged women in all the war-stricken zones of Europe and Asia".

We welfare workers have been doing some pretty serious thinking in the past year. Those of us who are working under state or county moneys did our first "bit" by asking no increase of appropriation from boards of supervisors, suddenly faced with increased budgets for Home Defense and a thousand other things. We have watched the increase of living mount to 50 per cent., we have seen employment given, but most unsteady. We have seen an entire factory made into a haven of joy when word was received of a Government order that would last throughout the year, and two weeks later learn that the order had been rescinded. We have seen poverty so terrible this past Winter that no war-stricken zone of Europe could furnish any worse. We are now seeing the terror in the eyes of the poor as they face the question of another such year, when the breadwinner has gone, the oldest girl—succumbed to the romance of a "war marriage", and the mother gone to work—leaving the babies to a Day Nursery or to the careless protection of any neighbor. Those who are earning a decent wage in the factories we have seen as the first to come forward to respond to the first and second Liberty Loan, the Red Cross, Y. M. C. A. or Knights of Columbus; we know of some pay envelopes that have three war charities deducted from them every week. We have seen rents mount up so that families are actually on the street. We have seen the mothers and children come out of these months "Spring Poor" requiring the services of a doctor to get them into even livable condition. We are daily seeing the poor people trying to get more necessities, but obliged to buy pounds of things that they neither can afford, can use, or want. We are seeing children who would be able to obtain a working certificate this Summer failing because they can't be in school the required number of days, from ill health, increased more this year than ever before.

We are receiving applications daily from candidates for the Widows' Pension and other aids, who have a perfect right to it, and we have to refuse for lack of funds.

We who have gladly sent our families out on the firing line, and are just aching to go over and help reconstruct, are trying to keep steadily at work here, because we know that the America of the Peace will depend on what we can do to save the children now. We are Quaker Patriots, doing our work in silence, so as not to distract the world gaze where it seems most needed. But if this war continues many years more, we shall as patriots be obliged to speak out plainly about the conditions here at home.

In conclusion, please let me say, "the poverty poor are hungry, there are almost as many starving children, mothers, old men and aged women here as there are in all the war-stricken zones of Europe and Asia", and these people are voluntarily giving of their nothingness, while we, the well-cared for, have not yet begun to give. We boast of what we have done! And not one of us knows what it means to be hungry or cold!

Intercessions

To the Editor of The Churchman:

May I suggest through the columns of your paper, The Churchman, that one day each week be set apart for a noonday service of Intercessory Prayer for the World at War, such a service to be held by all denominations in unison? Services of this kind were held in several churches during the Lenten season, but I have heard of none since, excepting on Memorial Day, and now, while this long and fierce struggle rages, I feel it behooves us to assemble together, and with one accord implore our Father in Heaven that He in His great mercy and power will stretch forth His hand and stay the conflict, bringing peace once more to the stricken world.

Pensions for Organists

To the Editor of The Churchman:

While we are all giving our utmost to war relief, a plea for any other cause may seem an untimely suggestion. But the success of the Church Pension Fund gives me courage to present an object—or rather dream—very near my heart: that is, a similar pension fund for organists.

Worship is a very complex thing, but to me Church music brings more help and comfort than the most eloquent sermon, and its uplifting influence helps mind and spirit toward a closer communion with Christ.

Every fine organist has spent a considerable amount on his musical education, and in most churches the salary is small, so the organist is obliged to teach or do other musical work during the week. We are proud of an organist who can give recitals, who is an associate or fellow of the Guild, or who presents his own compositions, but the casual listener does not realize that such attainments are the fruit of years of preparation and of constant practice and study. Besides selecting appropriate music for every service from the wealth of material offered by publishers, the organist should keep in constant touch with the larger world of music by membership in the Guild or other organization: he should "keep abreast of the times" by reading musical books or periodicals, and be acquainted with the best Church music by contemporary writers: most important of all, he should take every opportunity to hear fine music of every kind and to develop his own musicianship. Besides choir rehearsals he should devote ample time to his own organ practice, as a minister spends hours reading in his study. A young organist may be continuing his studies under instruction; the experienced organist must spend much on books and music for his own use and offer his services gratuitously on many occasions. In every case the conscientious organist, like the faithful minister, must spend and give much while carrying on his work, and when his work is done has saved little. We are apt to forget that the organist has worked seven days in the week preparing the music we hear Sunday morning, and that only by industry, devotion, ability and self-sacrifice can one hope to attain distinction in this glorious profession.

Let us not forget that the organist of the smallest mission is serving God just as faithfully as one who plays in a great cathedral, and if Church music has given exaltation to our joy, or consolation in our sorrow, let us remember the organist when his keen eyes are dim and his skilled fingers are weary, and show him we are grateful.

The Loss of Young People

To the Editor of The Churchman:

Will you permit me to say a few words in regard to the loss from our schools of the youth of both sexes soon after confirmation, and in many cases before it.

Many girls and boys pass from the school and become regular attendants at the Church services; some take part in the work of the various Church organizations. But a very large number, considering themselves too old for Sunday School, drift away from it and are often lost to the Church.

It is gratifying to see the constantly increasing attention now being given to religious education. The graded school was a gigantic stride forward in the right direction, but even this seems to have failed in solving the problem in question. After our children have passed through the various grades, won their diplomas, some of them pass into a Bible class, but in most cases the diploma is won at the age of fourteen or fifteen and an adult Bible class does not appeal to children of that age.

Our Church has, in its history and in its Prayer Book, two subjects which, properly handled by the right teacher, cannot fail to provide material which would prove of intense interest and fascination to these young people. A year given to the study of each would not be too long. There is a glamour and romance about our history which would appeal to the youthful imagination. It would then be a comparatively easy matter to form a Bible class which, in course of time, would become the largest class in the school.

Under present conditions I believe it would be easier to find a competent Bible class teacher than one for the class in Church history or the Prayer Book, for the simple reason that these two important subjects are little known by the average Churchman.

Until such classes have been under training for some time, the teaching would necessarily fall upon the clergy.

Such a plan, if adopted, might result in another most desirable condition; might be the means of stimulating many young men to offer themselves for the ministry and thus help to fill a crying need.

The Church's Apologia

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

On all hands the Church is accused of being in some guilty manner indirectly responsible for this war. "Why couldn't the Church prevent this war?" is the way the matter is generally put, not only by the thoughtless but by the thoughtful who should know better. The strange part of it is that the Church, under the fierce assault, has a frightened, semi-apologetic attitude. As a matter of fact and of right the Church could turn on its accusers and with the voice of a just indignation and the awful aspect of offended righteousness lay an accusation against the accusers, thus:

I am the Church—I could not prevent this war. Because you Mr. and Mrs. Man and Woman everywhere for years before this war consistently and unremittingly robbed me:

1. Of your presence,
2. Of your financial support,
3. Of your moral support.

It matters not what denomination I am called, Catholic or Protestant, Methodist or Adventist, my doors were open; every Sabbath I read aloud from God's Word. every Sabbath I invited you to the community worship of the Living God, every Sabbath, even in my extreme forms, I preached the Supreme Selflessness, Jesus Christ and Him crucified. I was there in all your streets to take or leave—and you left me.

Where was your presence when I would gather weekly those poor handfuls of souls whom you despised as "church-members?"

You were out in your soul-damning automobile, rising earlier for your Sunday "jaunt" than you would ever have done for the Church.

You were out on the golf course, on the tennis courts, on "hikes" or yachting because, forsooth, you needed "fresh air."

What does it profit a man if he gain the physique of Goliath and lose his own soul?

You were at work, either in the place of your accustomed business, aching for just one more dollar, or you were out in your garden, blasting the fair fruits of the earth, serving them and yourself instead of the Creator thereof.

In the automobile, on the golf course, at your office or in your garden you gave to Caesar—the Caesar of health, of pleasure, of comfort, of profit, more than was Caesar's, and to the God of Worship and Self-denial nothing that was God's.

Not only did your self-satisfied individualism injure your own morality, but your automobile, your golf-game, your work, were anti-social in that everything which tends to smirch the sacredness of Sunday hastens the evil time when that day shall become merely a seventh in a sordid week of days. Your saintly forbears, at whose remembrance of the Sabbath day to keep it holy you have so often indulgently smiled, gave you this Sabbath you have abused and which, from all the consecration it will have from you, will be unknown to your descendants. Yes, even now there is no Sabbath for your sons in the trenches.

You have robbed me of your financial and moral support. In your own street gabble you have "let the other man do it."

The Other Man built my houses.

The Other Man planned and toiled and saved and served and generally burned up what little energy he had left from a hard day's toil in order to have a place wherein to worship God.

The Other Man hallowed the middle of the week with a prayer meeting, while you indulged the debauching "morality" of the film shows.

The Other Man planned, established and toiled without your aid or comfort in the Sunday schools, regarding children not as "cute" dolls to be over-dressed, but as responsible, immortal souls on whom the future of Church and State, under God, depend.

The Other Man gave his sons to the ministry of God's Word when that office was openly derided and despised, and he gave them thanking God for the privilege.

The Other Man maintained institutional religion, by the grace of God, the very fibre of a healthy State.

He could not do it all. So in your day of stress and testing when you called to me I heard but I could not help, for your own was the hand which had struck me first.

And now in the trenches whither the philosophy of that Mammon you serve has led the world I call, and the boy who hears my voice clearest and quickest is—the Other Man's. ARTHUR M. HARRIS.

Prayers for Prisoners

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

Can you tell me why, with all the prayers put forth by our Bishops and clergy, we find none for the prisoners taken by the Germans, and subjected, as we know they are, to inhuman treatment? Captivity is hard enough with all mitigating circumstances, but captivity in Germany today means worse than death. Yet only when we use the Litany do we remember them.

And why do not the clergy use the prayers for Congress as set forth and ordered by the Church? It seems they too need our prayers as much now as ever in our history. FRANCES S. HILLYER.

The Single Tax and Sailors' Snug Harbor

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

In your article on "Sailors' Snug Harbor," in criticizing the trustees, you speak of the "great wealth entrusted to them." What Robert Richard Randall left was not wealth, but legal title to certain acres of land on Manhattan—land which had little value in his lifetime, but which, through the extraordinary increase of population, possesses remarkable rent-drawing power. The old sailors are supported, not by any wealth left by Randall, but by the labor of present-day citizens of New York City. Because of a bad land and tax system, the trustees virtually levy tribute upon the people of New York, and far in excess of the needs of the few old men who are cared for at the Harbor. What they do with the excess it would be interesting to know. I suppose it is invested in more land, or in securities representing partly land, or, perhaps, in Government bonds. At any rate, the fund must be growing at an amazing rate if it is safely and honestly administered, as I presume it is.

But it is an exceedingly bad system which is the basis of landed aristocracy and is at the root of our perplexing problem of poverty. I hope your Church will move to destroy it, and not serve, as does the Church of England, as a defender of legalized exploitation of the industrious.

Bishop Gailor's Appeal

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I have just returned from another visitation to the camp at Ft. Oglethorpe, near Chattanooga, where I held two confirmation services for the Rev. J. Craik Morris, D.D., acting chaplain for the War Commission; and I ask the privilege of expressing my great satisfaction with the work that is being done and my conviction of the pressing need of more men to do it.

This camp at Ft. Oglethorpe is no mere temporary provision for the accommodation of troops in war-time; but it is a vast permanent establishment for medical training and hospital work in the future; and when the Government buildings are completed it will be the largest medical training school in the world. The camps occupy an area of about eleven square miles. There are five huge hospitals for the sick and wounded in course of construction. It is estimated that there will be at least forty thousand men on the ground.

At present we have three representatives of the Episcopal Church there. The Rev. H. J. Geiger, chaplain of the Fifty-first Infantry Regiment, attends to his own men and may be ordered away at any moment. The Rev. Dr. Morris, of Madison, Wisconsin, has volunteered for three months without salary and has virtual charge of all the work done by the Episcopal Church. He has made himself a power for good, and, with the excellent assistance of Mr. Poole of the Brotherhood of St. Andrew, is exercising a splendid influence and is holding services at six or more stations. But the work is too tremendous for any one man; and then what are we going to do, when Dr. Morris' term expires and he returns to his parish in September?

There is no work more important than this anywhere, not even in France, and we ought to have at least two priests of the very best ability permanently settled at Ft. Oglethorpe, and we ought to be assured of the assistance of the Brotherhood men, which has proved of immense value. The only difficulty in the way seems to be the lack of money to pay the comparatively small salaries and necessary expenses, and we hope that the appeals of the War Commission and the Brotherhood of St. Andrew will meet with a liberal response from our people. THOMAS F. GAILOR,

Sewanee, Tennessee.

We Will!

To the Editor of THE CHURCHMAN:

I am interested to read that Church people in Connecticut are anxious that the rural clergy receive an increase in salary. One thousand dollars and house is not sufficient with the present high cost of living.

How beautiful it would be if they were as interested that the unemployed clergy of the diocese receive something! One thousand dollars and house may be insufficient, but it is a great improvement upon nothing.

I wonder if THE CHURCHMAN will publish this! It is an unpopular subject.

R. BANCROFT WHIPPLE.

New War Books

Some of the New War Books

From the press of the John Lane Company come two interesting little books, one by the Rev. William James Dawson, the other by his son, Lieut. Coningsby Dawson. Both are of more than temporary value, for they deal with the meaning of war. The Father of a Soldier, by W. J. Dawson (John Lane Company, $1.00), is an intimate, personal record of the mental and emotional experiences of the author when his three sons enlist for service in the war. The book is written at the request of his eldest son in the hope that it will prove of help to those other fathers who are confronted by the same problem. Mr. Dawson has passed through all the stages of the conflict, from utter unwillingness to his sons' enlistment, through rebellious resignation to the inevitable, up to a noble pride that he has the honor to be the father of a soldier. He can answer his son's question at the Folkestone Docks: "If you knew that I was going to be killed within the next month, would you rather I went or stayed?" with the words, "Much rather you went." Today many fathers and mothers are passing through similar experiences. Mr. Dawson's book will cheer and help them!

The Glory of the Trenches, by Coningsby Dawson (John Lane Company, $1.00), is an interpretation of the spiritual significance of war. He does not minimize its dangers and horrors. He knows them all in his own experience. But he does insist that men who daily face death in its most dreadful form come to have a clearer appreciation of the spiritual values and a closer acquaintance with God. It is this that makes the trenches glorious.

The present state of the war and its probable outcome is depicted for us by Dr. Roland G. Usher in his new book, The Winning of the War (Harper and Brothers, $2.00). He believes that the failure of the first German offensive to reach its goal in Paris has forced the Central Empires to the slower but equally effective conquest of the Allies by a ruthless economic wastage of enemy territory. In this they have been helped by the Allies themselves, who have failed to realize that the war may be won on the western front only to be lost on the eastern. In Dr. Usher's opinion this is just what has happened. No victory in France, unless it involves the complete destruction of the German army, can compensate the Allies for what they have lost in the Balkan Peninsula and in the collapse of Russia. It remains for the Allies to turn present defeat into ultimate victory by taking advantage of the opportunities given them by Germany's ruthless method of conducting the war. One of these opportunities the author finds in the moral and social isolation in which the Central Empires will be placed at the close of the war. Another opportunity lies in the drawing together of the Atlantic nations on the basis of a common interest and a common ideal of democracy. Dr. Usher's conception of the final victory of the Allies seems somewhat attenuated and wraithlike: one still hopes for something more substantial. The book deserves careful reading and thoughtful consideration.

Another book for alert Americans to read now is America After the War, by an American Jurist (The Century Company, $1.00). The book is a compilation of the articles which attracted such general attention when they were published in the New York Times during the month of January. The author is deeply impressed by the changes that are taking place in our national life as a result of the war. The book is a serious attempt to help the average citizen to a better understanding of his country and its welfare, and to prepare him for the inevitable readjustment that confronts America in the near future.

The English novelist, Jeffery Farnol, has been doing his "bit" by contributing an illuminating description of his experiences in making the rounds of the battlefields of France, the grand fleet, the training camps and the great munitions centres and shipyards of England. Many of the chapters in Great Britain at War (Little, Brown & Company, $1.25) have already appeared in the newspapers of England and America. They seem to have been written as part of an educational program to assure the English citizen that his country is neglecting no possible means of winning the war. Mr. Farnol's lucid and interesting penpictures ought to convince even the most exacting of Englishmen.

Three recent books dealing with daily life at the front are A "Temporary Gentleman" in France (G. P. Putnam's Sons, $1.50); Front Lines, by Boyd Cable (E. P. Dutton & Company, $1.50); and The Real Front, by Arthur Hunt Chute (Harper & Brothers, $1.50). The "Temporary Gentleman" owes its title to the fact that the writer is listed as a temporary officer in Britain's new army. It consists of a series of letters written from the front to relatives in England. No alteration has been made in the letters to prepare them for the press beyond the deleting or changing of some of the names. They are mostly cheery and intimate accounts of what has really happened to the writer. As they contain a wealth of detail they convey to the noncombatant a much more vivid picture of the war than a more elaborate and pretentious description possibly could. Boyd Cable's Front Lines is written with the deliberate intention of awakening the civilian populace to a sense of their personal responsibility for the success of the war and as an antidote for the "war-weariness" that so frequently afflicts the workers in shipyards and munition factories when they have no clear picture of conditions at the front. This picture Mr. Cable supplies. Mr. Chute's The Real Front deals not only with the things that he has seen, but with those more intangible realities, the hearts of the men who were his comrades. Those of us who are wondering what the war will mean to the inner life of the men who are engaged in it will find a satisfying hint in Mr. Chute's book.

Out There, by Charles W. Whitehair (D. Appleton & Company, $1.50), recounts the life of a Y. M. C. A. worker in Egypt and Scotland and on the battlefields of the Marne, Ypres and Verdun. The huts of the Red Triangle are established not only at the safe distance of the base headquarters but even within a few feet of the front line trenches. The men stationed in them are the very first to greet the long line of walking wounded as they return over their own parapets after a charge across no man's land. If it were possible for one to have any lingering doubt of the value and efficiency of the Y. M. C. A. army work, Mr. Whitehair's book would dispel it.

The Firefly of France, by Marion Polk Angellotti (The Century Company, $1.40), uses the war as a background for a tale of romance and mystery. It has all of the thrills and none of the grimness of much of our war literature. There is not a dull moment in it.

Roving and Fighting, by Major Edward S. O'Reilly (The Century Company, $2.00), has the merit of having nothing to do with the present European conflict. When a boy of seventeen O'Reilly enlisted for the Spanish-American war and has been roving and fighting ever since that date. He has seen service in the Philippines, taught school in Japan, been a policeman at Shanghai, fought with Villa and Zapata in Mexico and filibustered in Venezuela. In simple and straightforward words he tells his varied experiences in all these places.

An American Ace

THE ADVENTURES OF ARNOLD ADAIR, AMERICAN ACE. By Laurance LaTourette Driggs, Little, Brown & Company, Boston. 1918. $1.35.

A book worth the paper it is printed on, if not, indeed, more; which should not be taken up for the first time at 10 p. m., for it takes a good four hours to read it; and if your blood is red, you are going to be in at the death before you put it down. It is in truth a book of wonderful adventures, and yet does not draw unreasonably on your credulity, even if the hero does wear a charmed life. The writer is a real story-teller, and one feels truly the joy and generosity of fighting in the air. Here there is change and surprise, picturesqueness, individuality and chivalry. Furthermore, Mr. Driggs knows his subject. Kipling does not know his locomotive better than the writer of this tale his airship and his air. "My First Submarine," "A Zeppelin Raid Over Paris," "The Tail Spin," and so on, are titles of the chapters, and give one an idea of the definiteness of the book. There is a good story of friendship in the background and it has a happy ending. For young or old, it is a sincere, virile and delightful tale; and also very informing. No doubt from now on the air will be the favored realm for tales of adventure.

The Action of the House of Bishops

From Bishop Burton's Convention Address

I stop here to refer to the action upon this subject (unity) at a recent special meeting of the House of Bishops, because of which the House has been the target of bitter criticism. I feel that this criticism proceeds from an unreasoning disappointment. The disappointment is natural; but circumstances should be considered. The bishops met, at the busiest time of the Church's year, for two special purposes. These they accomplished, after most deliberate, yet intense, application, apparently to the satisfaction of the public. One of these was a most involved and vexatious subject. Not very long before the meeting the individual bishops received a printed copy of a memorial from two distinguished Congregational ministers, which made a proposal that, by their own confession, "went to the very core of our existing disunity." This was "that a joint consecration and authorization should be given to the chaplains by both the Episcopal and non-Episcopal Churches." The memorial was referred to a special committee, which made its report late in the afternoon of the closing session, after a number of the bishops had left, supposedly to return to their homes. I myself feel that, at this crisis in the world's affairs, involving so seriously the Kingdom of God, the bishops should have felt that no diocesan engagements were so important or binding as to prevent their continuing in session as long as might be necessary to the fullest consideration of every pertinent subject that might be constitutionally before them.

So far as concerns the tone of the resolution, which has been complained of as cold and unsympathetic, every one acquainted with parliamentary assemblies is aware that the tone of a report is a matter of temperament and literary style on the part of those composing it, which it is very difficult to alter after the report has emerged from the committee that prepared it. But the essential thing to observe is that here was a proposition that went to the very core of our disunity, which the House of Bishops, with no time for debate, was expected to adopt, or for it, to suggest a practical and satisfactory substitute, when the proposition has been the bone of ecclesiastical contention ever since the Reformation, and when the proposed World Conference on Faith and Order is taking years to make ready for its profound discussion.

The truth of the matter is that it was impossible for some seventy-five men spontaneously, on the spur of the moment, to assume the leadership on this subject demanded of them, when they represented among themselves schools of thought that radically differ on subjects pertaining to what we call Churchmanship. It is better frankly to acknowledge the fact that on not one of all four of the points of the Chicago-Lambeth platform for unity are we in perfect agreement within our own household of faith. And, to be entirely straightforward, had the majority of the House of Bishops committed themselves to the proposition of the two distinguished memorialists, the result would have been dissensions within the Episcopal Church, the noise of which would not have been drowned even by the roar of artillery and the clash of arms in the awful international war in which we are now engaged.

I have profound respect for the memorialists, and feel especially drawn to the Rev. Dr. Newman Smyth, and, as I said at the start on this branch of my subject, I believe that the times demand that we shall promptly arrive at a union between the churches that will end present competition and alienation. I wish also that our reply had been given a note of sympathy more satisfactory to the memorialists. But I owe it to the House of Bishops to declare that, after mature reflection, I cannot see that the proposition of the memorialists was a practical one.

The advice of the memorialists was "Do it first, and discuss it afterward," provided "it seems the right thing now to be done." But it was asked in the memorial that the House of Bishops should confer such orders as would satisfy those who "would not feel well assured of sacramental grace, unless the Eucharist were communicated to them by a presbyter who had been ordained by a bishop." Surely the learned memorialists should have known that there is no ordination which the bishops, as a House or as individual diocesans, can furnish that would satisfy those in view by the memorialists except such an ordination as is hedged about the constitution, rubrics and canons of this Church, and such as requires the co-operation of examining chaplains and standing committees.

The House of Bishops cannot precipitate the issue of corporate unity when it has been committed by General Convention to a Commission on Faith and Order. But I respectfully submit that it should be possible for the next General Convention to agree upon some proposition for a working union between the various evangelical communions that will co-ordinate us all in a great movement for the redemption of man, for the Christianization of society and for the winning of the nations to a league of righteousness, justice, liberty and peace. And there is no subject to which the clergy and laity may so well devote their vigorous thought, their earnest prayers and their public service by speech and pen, from now on until the General Convention meets in 1919.

Meanwhile in this diocese we may do much to promote such a practical co-operation as will smooth the way for an ultimate corporate union. I have had, throughout my twenty-two years' episcopate, in the eastern half of Kentucky, an experience of friendliness and hospitality on the part of ministers and laymen of other communions that is almost without exception. And, speaking generally, this relationship was not merely a personal one, such as ought to subsist between gentlemen, however widely sundered in opinion, but also a courteous recognition of my office and an interested disposition to co-operate in my work. I believe that all of our clergy and the bulk of our laity in this diocese go as far as canons and rubrics will allow, to sustain fraternal relations with our separated brethren; and I exhort them to make every possible advance to their brethren of other churches, and to encourage every approach to themselves that the laws of this Church will permit, with a view to mutual understanding and effective co-operation.

OBITUARY

HENRY GRIFFING

A minute adopted at a meeting of the rector, wardens and vestrymen of the Church of the Holy Cross, Warrensburgh, Diocese of Albany, New York, held on Saturday, June 22, A D. 1918.

By the entrance into life eternal of HENRY GRIFFING this parish has suffered, so it seems to us, an irreparable loss. One of the original incorporators of the parish in 1862, he was at that time elected a vestryman and was appointed as clerk of the vestry and treasurer of the parish, in which capacities he served ever since, a length of service but seldom if ever equalled in the American Church. He was elected a church warden in 1877 and served in that capacity up to the present time. He represented this parish in every convention of the Diocese of Albany from its erection up to the last one. His devotion to the Church and his wonderfully mature judgment in all things pertaining to its welfare won well deserved recognition when the Diocese of Albany for four consecutive times chose him as one of its lay deputies to the General Convention. A Churchman in everything that that name implies, devout, steadfast, zealous and, above all, intelligent, he found his greatest pleasure in lengthening the cords and strengthening the stakes of the Church, his greatest delight in giving to Almighty God the honor and service that are His due in His House; his greatest privilege in the reception every Sunday morning of the Body and Blood of his Lord present in the Sacrament of the Altar. No personal inconvenience, no stress of weather, not even bodily infirmity was allowed to keep him from what he felt and knew to be his religious duty. To his wise and skilful management this parish owes whatever of temporal prosperity it enjoys; and much of spiritual blessing it has brought on this community is due to his unflagging zeal and earnest support of the Church and all for which she stands. Knowing these things, we can but thank God for giving us such a man as Henry Griffing for our colleague and pray to Him that He would give us His grace to follow in the path that he has shown us. May he rest in peace and may light perpetual shine upon him.

Death of Dr. Jackson

NEW YORK CITY.—A message from China to the Board of Missions announces the death in Kiukiang of the Rev. James Jackson, D.D. For more than twenty years Dr. Jackson was one of the missionaries of the English Wesleyan Church in China. In 1900 he was confirmed by Bishop Graves and later in the same year was ordained to the diaconate and priesthood. After a year on the teaching staff of St. John's University, Shanghai, he became, in February, 1900, rector of what was then Boone School. Dr. Jackson's experience and ability as an educationalist were at once felt in the school administration.

Harry Lauder's Book

A MINSTREL IN FRANCE. By Harry Lauder. H. I. L. Company, New York. 1918. $2.00.

"A Minstrel in France" has been well called the unique book of the war. It shows us the war, both its tragic side and its lighter side—for even war has its lighter side—as seen through the eyes of one of the most popular stage artists of today.

Harry Lauder, than whom there is perhaps no better known character in the amusement world, has not only subscribed every cent of his wealth to the British War Loans, but he has done a far greater thing—he has given his only son. Captain John Lauder was killed in action on December 28, 1916. "A Minstrel in France" is in part a memorial to Capt. Lauder, and in part an account of what Harry Lauder himself has done to overcome his sorrow by helping others to forget. All his efforts for more than a year have been devoted to entertainment, on both sides of the Atlantic, of the soldiers in hospital, camp or billet, and in addition he has gathered large sums for "The Harry Lauder Million Pound Fund for Maimed Men, Scottish Soldiers and Sailors."

From practically the very beginning of the war, Harry Lauder helped in the great recruiting that raised Kitchner's Army. He organized a recruiting band and equipped it himself; but not content with this he also spoke at many recruiting meetings. Then suddenly the message that he feared came to him. His only son had been shot down in battle by the Germans.

For a time Harry Lauder wavered, but then the memory of his son's last words won the day, and Lauder decided to "carry on." He volunteered his services, and for many weeks thereafter toured the front, often within sound of the guns, and visited the first trenches, particularly in the vicinity of Vimy Ridge.

It is this story that Harry Lauder tells in his own simple words, lightened by his inimitable flashes of kindly humor.

Of course, he has high praise for the Highland regiments of which his son had been a member, but of the British Army he remarks: "I hear praise, even from men who hate the Hun even as I hate him, for the superb organization of the German Army. They say the Kaiser's people may well take pride in that. But I say I am prouder of what Britain and the new British Army that has come into being since this war began have done than any German has a right to be."

There are few people who will not find a thrill of inspiration and fresh courage in Harry Lauder's ringing words. S. C.

A Handbook on St. Mark

THE GOSPEL OF MARK: AN EXPOSITION. By Charles R. Erdman, The Westminster Press, Philadelphia. 1917.

Professor Erdman holds the chair of Practical Theology in Princeton Theological Seminary, and this fact forms a very fair characterization of his little volume. Its purpose is simply edificatory and devotional, a purpose carried out with much homiletic skill and tact, and the book might serve admirably as a handbook for Bible classes in very conservative circles. It does not profess to contain anything novel.

Two Remedies for the Dearth of Clergy

From Bishop Tucker's 1918 Conciliar Address

There are two ways in which the present clerical scarcity can at least be partially met. In the first place, the rural charges should be united wherever it is possible—so that one man may serve the field to which two men are assigned in normal times. This involves fewer services and some sacrifice on the part of our Churchpeople. But this is the day for willing sacrifices.

The other way, where the minister may not be had, is to make a larger use of the services of lay-readers—so that the people may gather in their churches for the worship of Almighty God. Where lay-readers cannot be secured in the congregation a student from the Theological Seminary—if proper provision is made for his maintenance—might take charge of the vacant places during the Summer, and, if necessary, on the Sundays of the year. We must all, my brethren, do what we can to keep our churches open and to bring their influence to bear upon the people.

"I have been in France," says Harry Lauder. "With my own eyes I have seen the work of the Hun, and only those who have seen can have even a glimmer of an understanding. God tells us we must love our enemies. He cannot expect us to love His enemies."

FOR thirty-five careless years Harry Lauder had used his talents only to amuse. Great audiences the world over hailed the famous Scottish singer and humorist with delight. $5,000 a week was paid to him for a few minutes of song and laughter. Suddenly he got word that his only son, a captain in the British army, had been killed by the Germans. Black despair overwhelmed the greatest of all fun-makers. He wavered between the depths of surrender and the heights of faith. But the thought of his son's last words to the oncharging Highlanders carried the day. Harry Lauder decided to "carry on."

He became a worker for patriotism and for religion as well. With this object he went to the front, where he sang to the soldiers in the hospitals, in the camps and the blood-sodden trenches, cheering them and inspiring them. Many a soldier who might not have listened to a clergyman listened to the Scottish singer and Christian father, turning his sorrow into cheer and joy and telling his hearers of the faith that is now his.

At the height of his fame Harry Lauder has written a wonderful book, entitled in which he has related his experiences of the last two years. Profoundly inspiring, the story is told in his own simple words, lightened by inimitable flashes of pathos and kindly humor.

If you have a son in the service, if you have a friend in uniform, you will find courage and inspiration in Harry Lauder's ringing words of patriotism and faith.
